1. ANTIOCH IN SYRIA.—A city on the banks of the Orontes, 300 miles north of Jerusalem, and about 30 from the Mediterranean. This metropolis was situated where the chain of Lebanon, running northward, and the chain of Taurus, running eastward, are brought to an abrupt meeting. Here the Orontes breaks through the mountains; and Antioch was placed at a bend of the river, partly on an island, partly on the level which forms the left bank, and partly on the steep and crazy ascent of Mount Silpius, which rose abruptly on the south. It was in the province of Seleucis, called Tetrapolis, from containing the four cities Antioch, Seleucia, Apamea, and Laodicea; of which the first was named after Antiochus, the father of the founder; the second after himself; the third after his wife Apamea; and the fourth in honor of his mother. The same appellation (Tetrapolis, Τετραπόλις) was given also to Antioch, because it consisted of four townships or quarters, each surrounded by a separate wall, and all four by a common wall. The first was built by Seleucus Nicator, who peopled it with inhabitants from Antigonía; the second by the settlers belonging to the first quarter; the third by Seleucus Callinicus; and the fourth by Antiochus Epiphanes (Strabo, xvi, 2; iii, 354). It was the metropolis of Syria (Tac. Hist. ii, 79), the residence of the Syrian kings, the Seleucide (1 Macc. iii, 37; vii, 2), and afterward became the capital of the Roman provinces in Asia. It ranked third, after Rome and Alexandria, among the cities of the empire (Josephus, War, iii, 2, 4), and was little inferior in size and splendor to the latter or to Seleucia (Strabo, xvi, 2; iii, 355, ed. Tauch.). Its suburb Daphne was celebrated for its grove and fountains (Strabo, xvi, 2; iii, 356, ed. Tauch.), its asylum (2 Macc. iv, 33), and temple dedicated to Apollo and Diana. The temple and the village were deeply bosomed in a thick grove of laurels and cypresses which reached as far as a circumference of ten miles, and formed in the most sultry summers a cool and impenetrable shade. A thousand streams of the purest water, issuing from every bill, preserved the verdure of the earth and the temperature of the air (Gibbon, ch. xxiii). Hence Antioch was called Epiphaphnes (Ἀντιόχεια ἢ ἐπι Δάφνης, Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 1; Epiphaphnes cognominata, Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 18). It was very populous; within 150 years after its erection the Jews slew 100,000 persons in it in one day (1 Macc. xi, 47). In the time of Chrysostom the population was computed at 200,000, of whom one half, or even a greater proportion, were professors of Christianity (Chrysos. Ad. Jud. i, 588; Hom. in Ipat. ii, 597; In Matt. Hom. 85, vii, 810). Chrysostom also states that the Church at Antioch maintained 3000 poor, besides occasionally relieving many more (In Matt. Hom. vii, 658). Cicero speaks of the city as distinguished by men of learning and the cultivation of the arts (Pro Archia, 3). A multitude of Jews resided in it. Seleucus Nicator granted them the rights of citizenship, and placed them on a perfect equality with the other inhabitants (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 1). These privileges were continued to them by Vespasian and Titus—an instance (Josephus remarks) of the equity and generosity of the Romans, who, in opposition to the wishes of the Alexandrians and Antiocheans, protected the Jews, notwithstanding the provocations they had received from them in their wars (Apion, ii, 4). They were also allowed to have an archon or ethnarch of their own (Josephus, War, vii, 3, 3). Antioch is called libera by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 18), having obtained from Pompey the privilege of being governed by its own laws (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.).

The Christian faith was introduced at an early period into Antioch, and with great success (Acts xi, 19, 21, 24). The name "Christians" was here first applied to its professors (Acts xi, 26). No city, after Jerusalem, is so intimately connected with the history of the apostolic Church. One of the seven deacons or almoners appointed at Jerusalem was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts vi, 5). The Christians who were dispersed from Jerusalem at the death of Stephen preached the Gospel at Antioch (xi, 19). It was from Jerusalem that Agabus and the other prophets who foretold the famine came to Antioch (xi, 27, 28); and Barnabas and Saul were consequently sent on a mission of charity from the latter city to the former (xi, 30; xii, 25). It was from Jerusalem, again, that the Judaizers came who disturbed the Church at Antioch (xv, 1); and it was at Antioch that Paul rebuked Peter for conduct into which he had been betrayed through the influence of emissaries from Jerusalem (Gal. ii, 11, 12). Antioch soon became a central point for the diffusion of Christianity among the Gentiles, and maintained for several centuries a high rank in the Christian world (see Semler, Initia societatis Christ. Antiochie, IIal. 1767). A controversy which arose between certain Jewish believers from Jerusalem and the Gentile converts at Antioch respecting the permanent obligation of the rite of circumcision was the occasion of the first apostolic council or convention (Acts xv). Antioch was the scene of the early labors of the Apostle Paul, and the place whence he set forth on his first missionary labors (Acts xi, 26; xiii, 2). Ignatius was the second bishop or overseer of the Church, for about forty years, till his martyrdom in A.D. 107. In the third and following centuries a number of councils were held at Antioch [see ANTIOCH, COUNCILS OF], and in the course of the fourth century a new theological school was formed there, which thence derived the name School of Antioch. See ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF. Two of its most distinguished teachers were the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucian, the latter of whom suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 312 (Neander, Allgemeine Geschichte, i, 3, p. 1297; Gieseler, Lehrbuch, i, 272; Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii, ch. 55, 58). Libanius (born A.D. 314), the rhetorician, the friend and panegyrist of the Emperor Julian, was a native of Antioch (Lardner, Testimonies of Ancient Heathens, ch. 49; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc. ch. 24). It had likewise the less equivocal honor of being the birthplace of his illustrious pupil, John Chrysostom, born A. D. 347, died A.D. 407

(Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii, ch. 118; Neander, Allgemeine Geschichte, ii, 3, p. 1440-1456; Hug, Antiochia, Berl. 1863). On the further history of the Church of Antioch, see ANTIOCH, PATRIARCHATE OF.

Antioch was founded, B.C. 300, by Seleucus Nicator, with circumstances of considerable display, which were afterward embellished by fable. The situation was well chosen, both for military and commercial purposes. Antioch grew under the successive Seleucid kings till it became a city of great extent and of remarkable beauty. Some of the most magnificent buildings were on the island. One feature, which seems to have been characteristic of the great Syrian cities—a vast street with colonnades, intersecting the whole from end to end—was added by Antiochus Epiphanes. Some lively notices of the Antioch of this period, and of its relation to Jewish history, are supplied by the books of Maccabees (see especially 1 Macc. iii, 37; xi, 13; 2 Macc. iv, 7-9; v, 21; xi, 36). The early emperors raised there some large and important structures, such as aqueducts, amphitheatres, and baths. Herod the Great contributed a road and a colonnade (Josephus, Ant. xi, 5, 3; War, i, 21, 11). In A.D. 260 Sapor, the Persian king, surprised and pillaged it, and multitudes of the inhabitants were slain or sold as slaves. It has been frequently brought to the verge of utter ruin by earthquakes (A.D. 340, 394, 396, 458, 526, 528); by that of A.D. 526 no less than 250,000 persons were destroyed, the population being swelled by an influx of strangers to the festival of the Ascension. The Emperor Justinian gave forty-five centenaries of gold (2,000,000) to restore the city. Scarcely had it resumed its ancient splendor (A.D. 540) when it was again taken and delivered to the flames by Chosroes. In A.D. 658 it was captured by the Saracens. Its "safety was ransomed with 300,000 pieces of gold, but the throne of the successors of Alexander, the seat of the Roman government in the East, which had been decorated by Caesar with the titles of free, and holy, and inviolate, was degraded under the yoke of the caliphs to the secondary rank of a provincial town" (Gibbon, li). In A.D. 975 it was retaken by Nicephorus Phocas. In A.D. 1080 the son of the governor Philaretes betrayed it into the hands of Soliman. Seventeen years after the Duke of Normandy entered it at the head of 300,000 crusaders; but, as the citadel still held out, the victors were in their turn besieged by a fresh host under Kerbogha and twenty-eight emirs, which at last gave way to their desperate valor (Gibbon, lviii). In A.D. 1268 Antioch was occupied and ruined by Boadoobar or Bilbars, sultan of Egypt and Syria; this first seat of the Christian name being depopulated by the slaughter of 17,000 persons, and the captivity of 100,000. About the mil-dle of the fifteenth century the three patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem convoked a synod, and renounced all connection with the Latin Church (see Cellar, Notit. ii, 417 sq.; Richter, Wallfahrt, p. 281; Mannert, VI, i, 467 sq.).

Coins of Antioch in Syria, with Heads of Roman Emperors.

Antioch at present belongs to the pashalic of Halep (Aleppo), and bears the name of Antakia (Pococke, ii, 277 sq.; Niebuhr, iii, 15 sq.). The inhabitants are said to have amounted to twenty thousand before the earthquake of 1822, which destroyed four or five thousand. On the south-west side of the town is a precipitous mountain ridge, on which a considerable portion of the old Roman wall of Antioch is still standing, from 30 to 50 feet high and 15 feet in thickness. At short intervals 400 high square towers are built up in it, containing a staircase and two or three chambers, probably for the use of the soldiers on duty. At the east end of the western hill are the remains of a fortress, with its turrets, vaults, and cisterns. Toward the mountain south-south-west of the city some fragments of the aqueducts remain. After heavy rains antique marble pavements are visible in many parts of the town; and gems, carnelians, and rings are frequently found. The present town stands on scarcely one third of the area enclosed by the ancient wall, of which the line may be easily traced; the entrance to the town from Aleppo is by one of the old gates, called Bab Bablous, or Paul's gate, not far from which the members of the Greek Church assemble for their devotions in a cavern dedicated to St. John (Madox's Excursions, ii, 74; Buckingham, ii, 475; Monro's Summer Ramble, ii, 140-143; Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i, 121-126). The great authority for all that is known of ancient Antioch is Müller's Antiquitates Antiochenae (Gött. 1839). Modern Antakia is a shrunken and miserable place. Some of the walls, shattered by earthquakes, are described in Chesney's account of the Euphrates Expedition (i, 310 sq.; comp. the history, ib. ii, 423 sq.), where also is given a view of the gateway which still bears the name of St. Paul.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

ANTIOCH, COUNCILS OF. Among the more important of the councils held at Antioch are the following:

In 252, by the patriarch Fabius, or Fabianus, or his successor, Demetrius, concerning the Novatian heresy (Labbe, i, 719). In 264, against Paul of Samosata (ibid. p. 843). In 269, when Paul was deposed and anathematized (ibid. p. 893). In 330, against the patriarch Eustathius, who was falsely accused of Sabellianism and adultery, and deposed. In 341 (Conc. in Eucernis), on occasion of the dedication of the great church of Antioch; ninety-seven bishops were present, of whom forty at least were Arians. This synod was probably orthodox in its commencement, but degenerated into a pseudo-synod, in which, after the departure of the orthodox majority, the remaining Arians condemned Athanasius; and, in all probability, the "Three Chapters" [see CHAPTERS] were then composed. In 344, by the Arian bishops, in which the μακρόπτερος, or long confession of faith, was drawn up. In 354, by thirty Arian bishops, who again condemned Athanasius, because he had returned to his see without being first synodically declared innocent (Soz. lib. iv, cap. 8). In 358, at which Homousianism and Homolousianism were both condemned. In 363, in which Acacius of Caesarea and other Arians admitted the Nicene faith (ibid. ii, 825). In 367, in which the word "consubstantial" was rejected (ibid.). In 380, in which Meletius, at the head of one hundred and forty-five bishops, confirmed the faith of the council of Rome in 378 (Vald. ad Theod. lib. v, cap. 3). In 433, in which John of Antioch and Cyril were reconciled (Labbe, iii, 1265). In 435, in which the memory of Theodorus of Mopsuestia was defended and Proclus's work on him approved. In 440, against Theodorus of Mopsuestia. In 451, on the conversion of the Eutychians (Labbe, iv). In 560, in defence of the council of Chalcedon. In 781, for the worship of images, under Theodorus. In 1806 the bishops of the united Greek Church held, under the presidency of the papal patriarch, a synod, known under the name synod of Antioch, in the convent of Carapha, in the diocese of Beyrût, and endorsed the Gallican and anti-papal resolutions of the synod of Pistoja (q. v.). Nevertheless their proceedings received the approbation of the papal delegate, and were published, with his approbation, in 1810, in the Arabic language. But in 1834 Pope Gregory XVI ordered the Melchite patriarch to furnish an Italian translation of the proceedings, and then condemned them by a brief of Sept. 16, 1835.—London, Manual of Councils; Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

ANTIOCH, PATRIARCHATE OF. Tradition reports that St. Peter was the first bishop of Antioch, but there is no historical proof of it. It is certain, however, that the Church of Antioch stood prominent in the early ages of the Church, and its see was held by Ignatius and other eminent men. Its bishops ranked in the early Church only after those of Rome and Alexandria. When the bishop of Constantinople received his rank next to that of Rome, Antioch occupied the fourth rank among the episcopal sees. In the fifth century the bishop of Antioch received, together with the bishops of the other prominent sees, the title patriarch (q. v.). In the fourth century this powerful Church included not less than a hundred thousand persons, three thousand of whom were supported out of the public donations. It is painful to trace the progress of declension in such a church as this. But the period now referred to, namely, the age of Chrysostom, toward the close of the fourth century, may be considered as the brightest of its history subsequent to the apostolic age, and that from which the Church at Antioch may date its fall. It continued, indeed, outwardly prosperous; but superstition, secular ambition, the pride of life; pomp and formality in the service of God in place of humility and sincere devotion; the growth of faction and the decay of charity, showed that real religion was fast disappearing, and that the foundations were laid of that great apostasy which, in two centuries from this time, overspread the whole Christian world, led to the entire extinction of the Church in the East, and still holds dominion over the fairest portions of the West. For many years, up to the accession of Theodosius, the Arians filled the see; and after the council of Chalcedon Peter Fullo and others who refused to acknowledge that synod occupied the patriarchal throne; but of them all the worst was Severus, the abettor of the Monophysite heresy (A.D. 512-518). His followers were so many and powerful, that they were able to appoint a successor of the same opinions; and from that time to the present there has been a Monophysitic or Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, who, however, fixed his see, not at Antioch itself, like all the former, but at Taerita, in Mesopotamia, and at the present day in Diarbekir. The rest of the patriarchate of Antioch, after the separation between the Eastern and Western Churches, constituted a part of the Greek Church. In it there is still a patriarch of Antioch, yet with only a small district, and subordinate to the patriarch of Constantinople. For those Greeks and Jacobites who were prevailed upon to enter into a union with the Roman Church, two patriarchs, bearing the title patriarch of Antioch, are appointed, one for the united Greeks, and one for the united Syrians.

The provinces of the ancient patriarchate were as follows:

|-----------------------|-----------------------------|
| 1. Syria Prima. | 7. Syria Secunda. |
| 2. Phoenicia Prima. | 8. The Euphratean province. |
| 3. Phoenicia Secunda. | 9. Province of Osrhoene. |
| 4. Arabia. | 10. Mesopotamia. |
| 5. Cilicia Prima. | 11. Isauria. |
| 6. Cilicia Secunda. | |

The province of Theodorias, composed of a few cities in the two Syrias, was afterward formed by the Emperor Justinian. It is a question whether the region of Persia, which in the time of Constantine the Great was filled with Christians, was included in the patriarchate of Antioch. Peter, patriarch of Antioch in the eleventh century, William of Tyre, and the Arabic canons, assert that such was the case. The Christians now in Persia are Nestorians, and disclaim any subjection to the see of Antioch. It was the ancient custom of this patriarchate for the patriarch to consecrate the metropolitans of his diocese, who in their turn consecrated and overlooked the bishops of their respective provinces; in which it differed from the Church of Alexandria, where each individual diocese depended immediately upon the patriarch, who appointed every bishop. The patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites styles himself "Patriarch of Antioch, the city of God, and of the whole East."—Lardner, Works, iv, 558 sq.; Historia Patriarcharum Antioch. in Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. ii; Boschii Tract. hist. chronol. de Patriarchis Antioch. (Venet. 174b). See JACOBITES and GREEK CHURCH.

ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF, a theological seminary which arose at the end of the fourth century, but which had been prepared for a century before by the learned presbyters of the Church of Antioch. It distinguished itself by diffusing a taste for scriptural knowledge, and aimed at a middle course in Biblical Hermeneutics, between a rigorously literal and an allegorical method of interpretation (see Münter, Ueb. d. Antiochier. Schulen, in Stäudlin, Arch. v., i, 1, 1). Several other seminaries sprung up from it in the Syrian Church. As distinguished from the school of Alexandria, its tendency was logical rather than intuitional or mystical. The term school of Antioch is used also to denote the theological tendencies of the Syrian Church clergy. Nestorianism arose out of the bosom of this school. Gieseler gives the following names as belonging to it: Julius Africanus of Nicopolis (A.D. 232); Dorotheus (A.D. 290); Lucian (A.D. 311).—Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 150, 352, etc.; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. i, div. iii, § 63; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, i, 265; ii, 328.

2. ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA, being a border city, was considered at different times as belonging to different provinces (see Cellar, Notit. ii, 187 sq.). Ptolemy (v, 5) places it in Pamphylia, and Strabo (xii, 577) in Phrygia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.). It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, and its first inhabitants were from Magnesia on the Meander. After the defeat of Antiochus (III) the Great by the Romans, it came into the possession of Eumenes, king of Pergamos, and was afterward transferred to Amyntas. On his death the Romans made it the seat of a proconsular government, and invested it with the privileges of a Colonia Juris Italici, which included a freedom from taxes and a municipal constitution similar to that of the Italian towns (Ulpianus, lib. 50). Antioch was noted in early times for the worship of Men Arcaeus, or Lunus. Numerous slaves and extensive estates were annexed to the service of the temple; but it was abolished after the death of Amyntas (Strabo, xii, 8; iii, 72). When Paul and Barnabas visited this city (Acts xiii, 14), they found a Jewish synagogue and a considerable number of proselytes, and met with great success among the Gentiles (ver. 48); but, through the violent opposition of the Jews, were obliged to leave the place, which they did in strict accordance with their Lord's injunction (ver. 51, compared with Matt. x, 14; Luke ix, 5). On Paul's return from Lystra, he revisited Antioch for the purpose of strengthening the minds of the disciples (Acts xv, 21). He probably visited Antioch again at the beginning of his second journey, when Silas was his associate, and Timothy, who was a native of this neighborhood, had just been added to the party (2 Tim. iii, 11). See PAUL.

Till within a very recent period Antioch was supposed to have been situated where the town of Ak-Sheker now stands (Olivier, vi, 396); but the researches of the Rev. F. Arundell, British chaplain at Smyrna in 1833 (Discoveries, i, 281), confirmed by the still later investigations of Mr. Hamilton, secretary of the Geographical Society (Researches, i, 472), have determined its site to be adjoining the town of Falabatch; and consequently that Ak-Sheker is the ancient Philomelion described by Strabo (xii, 8; iii, 72, ed. Tauch.); "In Phrygia Paroreia is a mountainous ridge stretching from east to west; and under this on either side lies a great plain, and cities near it; to the north Philomelion, and on the other side Antioch, called Antioch near Pisidia; the one is situated altogether on the plain; the other on an eminence, and has a colony of Romans." According to Pliney, Antioch was also called Cæsarea (v, 24). Mr. Arundell observed the remains of several temples and churches, besides a theatre and a magnificent aqueduct; of the latter twenty-one arches still remained in a perfect state. Mr. Hamilton copied several inscriptions, all, with one exception, in Latin. Of one the only words not entirely effaced were "Antiocheae Cæsari." (See Arundell's Discoveries in Asia Minor, Lond. 1834, i, 268-312; Hamilton's Researches in Asia Minor, Lond. 1842, i, 472-474; ii, 413-439; Laborde's Asia Minor; Calmet, Plates, vii; Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 170.)—Kitto, s. v. See PISIDIA.

Antiochi'a, a more exact method of Anglicizing (1 Macc. iv, 35; vi, 63; 2 Macc. iv, 33; v, 21) the name ANTIOCH [in Syria] (q. v.).

Antio'chian (Ἀντιοχείη), an inhabitant (2 Macc. iv, 9-19) of the city ANTIOCH [in Syria] (q. v.).

Antio'chis (Ἀντιόχης, fem. of Antiochus), the concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes, who gave her the cities of Tarsus and Mallo, that she might receive their revenues for her own benefit, like the modern "pin-money" (comp. Cicero, Ad Verrem, 5). This was regarded by the inhabitants as an insupportable mark of contempt, and they took up arms against the king, who was obliged to march in person to reduce them (2 Macc. iv, 30). B. C. 168.

Antio'chus (Ἀντιόχος, opponent), the name especially of several of the Syrian kings, whose history, so far as relates to Jewish affairs, is contained particularly in the Books of the Maccabees, and is predicted with remarkable minuteness in the 11th chapter of Daniel. The name was first borne by one of the generals of Philip, whose son Seleucus, by the help of the first Ptolemy, established himself (B. C. 312) as ruler of Babylon. The year 312 is, in consequence, the era from which, under that monarchy, time was computed, as, for instance, in the Books of Maccabees. For eleven years more the contest in Asia continued, while Antigonus (the "one-eyed") was grasping at universal supremacy. At length, in 301, he was defeated and slain in the decisive battle of Ipsus, in Phrygia. Ptolemy, son of Lagus, had meanwhile become master of Southern Syria, and Seleucus was too much indebted to him to be disposed to eject him by force from this possession. In fact, the first three Ptolemies (B. C. 323-222) looked on their extra-Egyptian possessions as their sole guarantee for the safety of Egypt itself against their formidable neighbor, and succeeded in keeping the mastery, not only of Palestine and Coele-Syria, and of many towns on that coast, but of Cyrene and other parts of Libya, of Cyprus, and other islands, with numerous maritime posts all round Asia Minor. A permanent fleet was probably kept up at Samos (Polyb. v, 35, 11), so that their arms reached to the Hellespont (v, 34, 7); and for some time they ruled over Thrace (xviii, 34, 5). Thus Syria was divided between two great powers, the northern half falling to Seleucus and his successors, the southern to the Ptolemies; and this explains the titles "king of the north" and "king of the south," in the 11th chapter of Daniel. The line dividing them was drawn somewhat to the north of Damascus, the capital of Coele-Syria.—Kitto, s. v.

The most compact and unbroken account of the kings of this, the Seleucid or Syrian, dynasty is to be found in Appian's book (De Rebus Syriacis), at the end. A sufficiently detailed statement of the reign of each may be found in Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog.

s. v. On the dates, see Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, vol. iii, Appendix, ch. iiii. The reigns are as follows:

1. Seleucus I, Nicator, B. C. 312-280.
2. Antiochus I, Soter, his son, 280-261.
3. Antiochus II, Theos, his son, 261-246.
4. Antiochus III, Callinicus, his son, 246-226.
5. Alexander, or Seleucus III, Ceraunus, his son, 226-223.
6. Antiochus III, the Great, his brother, 223-187.
7. Seleucus IV, Philopator, his son, 187-176.
8. Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, his brother, 176-164.
9. Antiochus V, Eupator, his son (a minor), 164-162.
10. Demetrius I, Soter, son of Seleucus Philopator, 162-150.
11. Alexander Balas, a usurper, who pretended to be son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and was acknowledged by the Romans, 152-146.
12. Antiochus VI, Dionysus (a minor), son of the preceding. He was murdered by the usurper Tryphon, who contested the kingdom till 137.
13. Demetrius II, Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, reigned 146-141, when he was captured by the Parthians.
14. Antiochus VII, Sidetes, his brother, 141-128.
15. Demetrius II, Nicator, a second time, after his release from Parthia, 128-125.
16. Seleucus V, his son, assassinated immediately by his mother, 125.
17. Antiochus VIII, Grypus, his brother, shared his kingdom with the following, 125-96.
18. Antiochus IX, Cyzicenus, his half-brother, 111-75.
19. Seleucus VI, Epiphanes, eldest son of Antiochus Grypus, kills Antiochus Cyzicenus, 96-45.
20. Antiochus X, Eusebes, son of Antiochus Cyzicenus, asserts his claims to his father's share of the dominions, kills Seleucus Epiphanes, and prevails over the successors of the latter, but gives way to Tigranes, 45-33.
21. Philip, second son of Antiochus Grypus, succeeds to the claims of his brother Seleucus against Antiochus Eusebes, until the accession of Tigranes, cir. 94-83.
22. Antiochus XI, Epiphanes II, his brother, associated with him in the contest in which he lost his life, cir. 94.
23. Demetrius III, Eucarus, his brother, likewise associated with Philip till their rupture, when he was taken prisoner by the Parthians, 94-88.
24. Antiochus XII, Dionysius II, his brother, whose cause he took up against Philip, till slain by the Arabians, cir. 88-84.
25. Tigranes, king of Armenia, invited to the throne by the Syrians over all the rival claimants, and held it till his overthrow by the Roman general Lucullus, 83-69.
26. Antiochus XIII, Asiaticus, son of Antiochus Eusebes, allowed by Lucullus to hold the throne of the Seleucidae till its entire abolition by Pompey, 68-45.

The following (Nos. 3, 6, 8, 9, 12, 14, 17, 18, 20, 22, 24, of the above) are the only ones of the name of Antiochus that are important in sacred literature. (See Fröhlich, Annales Syriacæ; Vaillant, Seleucidar. Imp.)

1. ANTIOCHUS (II) THEOS (Θεός, god, so surnamed "in the first instance by the Milesians, because he overthrew their tyrant Timarchus," Appian, Syr. 65), the son and successor of Antiochus (I) Soter as king of Syria, B. C. 261. He carried on for several years the war inherited from his father with the Egyptian king, Ptolemy (II) Philadelphus, who subdued most of the districts of Asia Minor, but at length (B. C. 250), in order to secure peace, he married Ptolemy's daughter (Berenice) in place of his wife Laodice, and appointed the succession in the line of his issue by her (Polyb. op. Athen. ii, 45); yet, on the death of Ptolemy two years afterward, Antiochus recalled his former wife Laodice, and Berenice and her son were soon after put to death at Daphne. Antiochus himself died, B. C. 246, in the 40th year of his age (Porphyrus, in Euseb. Chron. Ann. i, 345), of poison administered by his wife, who could not forget her former divorce (Justin, xxvii, 1; Appian, Syr. 65; Val. Max. ix, 14, 1).

The above alliance of Antiochus with Ptolemy, by the marriage of Berenice to the former, is prophetic-ly referred to in Dan. xi, 6, as "the joining of themselves together" by "the king of the south and the king of the north," through "the king's daughter;" and its failure is there distinctly characterized, through the triumph of Laodice over "him that strengthened her," i. e. her husband Antiochus (see Jerome, Comment. in loc.). After the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy Evergetes, the brother of Berenice ("out of a branch of her root"), who succeeded his father Ptol. Philadelphus, exacted vengeance for his sister's death by an invasion of Syria, in which Laodice was killed, her son Seleucus Callinicus driven for a time from the throne, and the whole country plundered (Dan. xi, 7-9; hence his surname "the benefactor"). The hostilities thus renewed continued for many years; and on the death of Seleucus, B.C. 226, after his "return into his own land" (Dan. xi, 9), his sons Alexander (Seleucus) Ceraunus and Antiochus "assembled a great multitude of forces" against Ptol. Philopator, the son of Evergetes, and "one of them" (Antiochus) threatened to overthrow the power of Egypt (Dan. xi, 10).—Smith, s. v.

2. ANTIOCHUS (III) THE GREAT, Seleucid king of Syria, son of Seleucus Callinicus, brother and successor of Seleucus (II) Ceraunus, B.C. 223 (Polyb. iv, 40; comp. Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 347; ii, 235; see Göschen, in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit. 1831, iv, 713). In a war with the weak king of Egypt, Ptolemy Philopator, in order to regain Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, he twice (comp. Polyb. v, 49) penetrated as far as Dura (two miles north of Casarea), but on the second occasion he concluded a four-months' truce with his adversary, and led his army back to the Orontes (Polyb. v, 60; Justin, xxx, 1, 2; Athen. xiii, 577; comp. Dan. xi, 19). On the breaking out of hostilities again, he drove the Egyptian land-force as far as Zidon, desolated Gilead and Samaria, and took up his winter-quarters at Ptolemais (Polyb. v, 63-71). In the beginning of the following year (B.C. 217), however, he was defeated by the Egyptians (Polyb. v, 79, 80, 82-86; Strabo, xvii, 759; comp. Dan. xi, 11) at Raphia (near Gaza), with an immense loss, and compelled to retreat to Antioch, leaving Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine to the Egyptians. Thirteen [24] years after the expedition against Asia Minor, in which he subdued the greater part of it, and even crossed the Hellespont into Europe. By this means he became (B.C. 192) involved in a war with the Romans (Liv. xxxv, 13; Justin, xxxi, 1), in which, after many reverses, he was finally compelled, by an unfortunate battle at Magnesia, in Lycia (B.C. 190), to conclude a disgraceful treaty, B.C. 189 (Appian, Syr. 33-39; Polyb. xxi, 14; Liv. xxxvii, 40, 43, 45, 55; Justin, xxi, 8; comp. Dan. xi, 18; 1 Macc. viii, 6 sq.). See EUMENES. He lost his life soon afterward (B.C. 187, in the 36th year of his reign, according to Euseb. Chron. ii, 35, 235, but after 34 full years, according to Porphyry. Excerpt. i, 347) in a popular insurrection excited by his attempt to plunder the temple at Elymais, in order to obtain means for paying the tribute imposed upon him by the Romans (Strabo, xvi, 744; Justin, xxxii, 2; Diod. Sic. Exc. ii, 573; Porphyry, in Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 348; comp. Dan. xi, 19). During the war of Antiochus with Egypt, the Jews and inhabitants of Cœle-Syria suffered severely, and the suspense in which they were for a long time kept as to their ultimate civil relations operated injuriously for their interests (Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3); but, as the Jews quickly adopted the Syrian party after the battle at Paneas, he granted them not only full liberty and important concessions for their worship and religious institutions (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 3, 4), but he also planted Jewish colonies in Lydia and Phrygia, in order to secure the doubtful fidelity of his subjects there. Two sons of Antiochus occupied the throne after him, Seleucus Philopator, his immediate successor, and Antiochus IV, who gained the kingdom upon the assassination of his brother. (See, generally, Fluthe, Gesch. Macedon. ii, 226 sq.)—Winer, s. v.

3. ANTIOCHUS (IV) EPIPHANES (Ἐπιφανής, illustrious; comp. Michaelis on 1 Macc. i, 10, and Eekhel, Doctr. num. I, iii, 223; nicknamed Epiphanes, Ἐπιφανής, madman, Athen. x, 438 sq.; on coins Theos, Οὐός, god, see Fröhlich, Annal. tab. 6, 7), a Seleucid king of Syria, second son of Antiochus the Great (Appian, Syr. 45; 1 Macc. i, 11), ascended the throne on the death of his brother, Seleucus Philopator (on his enumeration, the 11th of the Seleucide, Dan. vii, 8, 24; see Lengerke, Daniel, p. 318 sq.), B.C. 175 (see Wernsdorf, De jule libr. Macc. p. 28 sq.), and attained an evil notoriety for his tyrannical treatment of the Jews (comp. Dan. vii, 8 sq.), who have described him (in the second Book of the Maccabees) as barbarous in the extreme (see Eiehorn, Apokr. p. 265). He had been terward, Antiochus (in connection with Philip III of Macedonia, Liv. xxxi, 34) opened another campaign against Egypt, then ruled over by a child, Ptolemy (V) Epiphanes. He had already conquered the three above-named countries, when a war between him and Attalus, king of Pergamus, diverted him to Asia Minor, and in his absence Ptolemy, aided by Scopas, obtained possession of Jerusalem; but, as soon as he had secured peace there, he returned through Cœle-Syria, defeated the Egyptian army at Paneas, and obtained the mastery of all Palestine, B.C. 198 (Polyb. xv, 20; Appian, Syr. 1; Liv. xxx, 19; Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3; comp. Dan. xi, 13-16). Ptolemy now formed an alliance with Antiochus, and married his daughter Cleopatra (Polyb. xxviii, 17, 11), who received as a dowry (comp. Dan. xi, 13-16) Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 1). Antiochus undertook in the following year a naval as well as land expedition against the Romans (B.C. 188) after his father's defeat at Magnesia. In B.C. 175 he was released by the intervention of his brother Seleucus, who substituted his own son Demetrius in his place. Antiochus was at Athens when Seleucus was assassinated by Heliodorus. He took advantage of his position, and, by the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, easily expelled Heliodorus, who had usurped the crown, and himself "obtained the kingdom by flatteries" (Dan. xi, 21; comp. Liv. xli, 20), to the exclusion of his nephew Demetrius (Dan. vii, 8). The accession of Antiochus was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the Hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert their supremacy. Jason (Jesus) of Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 1; see JASOS), the brother of Onias III, the high-priest, persuaded the king to transfer the high-priesthood to him, and at the same time bought permission (2 Macc. iv, 9) to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs (2 Macc. iv, 7, 20). Three years afterward, Menelaus, of the tribe of Benjamin [see SIMON], who was commissioned by Jason to carry to Antiochus the price of his office, supplanted Jason by offering the king a larger bribe, and was himself appointed high-priest, while Jason was obliged to take refuge among the Ammonites (2 Macc. iv, 25-26). From these circumstances, and from the marked honor with which Antiochus was received at Jerusalem very early in his reign (B.C. cir. 173; 2 Macc. iv, 22), it appears that he found no difficulty in regaining the border provinces which had been given as the dower of his sister Cleopatra to Ptol. Epiphanes. He undertook four campaigns against Egypt, in order to possess himself of Coele-Syria and Phœnicia, which he had claimed since Cleopatra's death (see the ANTI-OCHEUS preceding); the first B.C. 171, the second B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v, 1; 1 Macc. i, 17 sq.), the third B.C. 169, the fourth B.C. 168. On his return from the second of these campaigns, in the prosecution of which he had overrun the greater part of Egypt, and taken prisoner the Egyptian king, Ptolemy Philometor (comp. Dan. xi, 26), he indulged in the harshest manner of proceedings in Jerusalem, on occasion of the above shameful quarrel among the priests [see MENELAUS], which had been carried on by open force of arms (comp. Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 1), and vented his rage especially on the temple, which he plundered and desecrated with great bloodshed (1 Macc. i, 20-42; 2 Macc. v, 1-23). Being checked by the Romans in his fourth campaign against Egypt, and compelled in a very peremptory manner to retire (Liv. xlv, 12; Polyb. xxxi, 11; Appian, Syr. 66; Diod. Sic. Ecc. Vatic. xxxi, 2; comp. Dan. xi, 29 sq.), he detached (B.C. 167) a body of troops to Jerusalem, who took the city by assault, slaughtered a large part of the inhabitants, and gave up the city to a general sack (1 Macc. i, 30 sq.; 2 Macc. v, 24 sq.; comp. Dan. xi, 31 sq.). The Jewish worship in the Temple was utterly broken up and abolished (1 Macc. i, 43 sq.). At this time he availed himself of the assistance of the ancestral enemies of the Jews (1 Macc. iv, 61; v, 3 sq.; Dan. xi, 41). The decrees then followed which have rendered his name infamous. The Greek religion was forcibly imposed upon the Jews, and there was set up, for the purpose of desecrating (Diod. Sic. Ecclog. xxxiv, 1) and defiling the Temple, on the 15th of Kislev, the "abomination of desolation" [q. v.] (Dan. xi, 31; xii, 11; 1 Macc. i, 57), i. e. probably a little idolatrous shrine (Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 4) on the altar of burnt-offerings; the first victim was sacrificed to Jupiter Olympius, on the 25th of the same month. Many timidly submitted to the royal mandate (1 Macc. i, 43), being already inclined to Gentilism (1 Macc. i, 12), and sacrificed to the pagan gods (1 Macc. i, 45); but a band of bold patriots united (comp. Dan. xi, 34) under the Asmonean Mattathias (q. v.), and, after his death, which occurred shortly afterward, under his heroic son, Judas Maccabæus (q. v.), and, after acting for a long time on the defensive, at length took the open field (1 Macc. iv), and gained their freedom (comp. Dan. ix, 25 sq.). Meanwhile Antiochus turned his arms to the East, toward Parthia (Tac. Hist. v, 8) and Armenia (Appian, Syr. 45; Diod. ap. Müller, Strabon. ii, 10; comp. Dan. xi, 40). Hearing not long afterward of the riches of a temple of Nanea ("the desire of women," Dan. xi, 37) in Elymais (1 Macc. vi, 1 sq.; see Wernsdorf, De sile Maccab. p. 58 sq.), hung with the gifts of Alexander, he resolved to plunder it. The attempt was defeated; and, though he did not fall like his father in the act of sacrilege, the event hastened his death. He retired to Babylon, and thence to Tatar in Persia (not in the vicinity of Ecbatana, as in 2 Macc. ix, 3, the traditional burial-place of this king, see Wernsdorf, ut sup. p. 104 sq.), where he died in the year B.C. 164 (see Hofmann, Weissag. i, 310), in the twelfth year of his reign (Appian, Syr. 66; Polyb. xxi, 11; see Wernsdorf, p. 26 sq., 61 sq.; comp. Dan. xi, 8; viii, 25), the victim of superstition, terror, and remorse (Polyb. xxxi, 2; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 1 sq.), having first heard of the successes of the Maccabees in restoring the temple-worship at Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi, 1-16; comp. 2 Macc. i, 7-17?). "He came to his end, and there was none to help him" (Dan. xi, 45). Comp. Liv. xli, 24-25; xlii, 6; xlv, 19; xlv, 11-13; Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 8. See Jacob ben-Naphtali, מַנְטוּא הַמְּלִיכָה (Mantua, 1557). Compare MACCABEE.

The prominence given to the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes in the Book of Daniel accords with its representative character (Dan. vii, 8, 25; viii, 11 sq.). The conquest of Alexander had introduced the forces of Greek thought and life into the Jewish nation, which was already prepared for their operation. See ALEXANDER THE GREAT. For more than a century and a half these forces had acted powerfully both upon the faith and upon the habits of the people; and the time was come when an outward struggle alone could decide whether Judaism was to be merged into a rationalized paganism, or to rise not only victorious from the conflict, but more vigorous and more pure. There were many symptoms which betokened the approaching struggle. The position which Judæa occupied on the borders of the conflicting empires of Syria and Egypt, exposed equally to the open miseries of war and the treacherous favors of rival sovereigns, rendered its national condition precarious from the first, though these very circumstances were favorable to the growth of freedom. The terrible crimes by which the wars of "the North and South" were stained, must have alienated the mind of every faithful Jew from his Grecian lords, even if persecution had not been surpassed from Egypt first and then from Syria. Politically nothing was left for the people in the reign of Antiochus but independence or the abandonment of every prophetic hope. Nor was their social position less perilous. The influence of Greek literature, of foreign travel, of extended commerce, had made itself felt in daily life. At Jerusalem the mass of the inhabitants seem to have desired to imitate the exercises of the Greeks, and a Jewish embassy attended the games of Hercules at Tyre (2 Macc. iv, 9-20). Even their religious feelings were yielding; and before the rising of the Maccabees no opposition was offered to the execution of the king's decrees. Upon the first attempt of Jason the "priests had no courage to serve at the altar" (2 Macc. iv, 14; comp. 1 Macc. i, 43); and this not so much from wilful apostasy as from a disregard to the vital principles involved in the conflict. Thus it was necessary that the final issues of a false Hellenism should be openly seen that it might be discarded forever by those who cherished the ancient faith of Israel. The conduct of Antiochus was in every way suited to accomplish this end; and yet it seems to have been the result of passionate impulse rather than of any deep-laid scheme to extirpate a strange creed. At first he imitated the liberal policy of his predecessors, and the occasion for his attacks was furnished by the Jews themselves. Even the motives by which he was finally actuated were personal, or, at most, only political. Able, energetic (Polyb. xxvii, 17), and liberal to profusion, Antiochus was reckless and unscrupulous in the execution of his plans. He had learned at Rome to court power and to dread it. He gained an empire, and he remembered that he had been a hostage. Regardless himself of the gods of his fathers (Dan. xi, 37), he was incapable of appreciating the power of religion in others; and, like Nero in later times, he became a type of the enemy of God, not as the Roman emperor, by the perpetration of unnatural crimes, but by the disregard of every higher feeling. "He magnified himself above all." The real deity whom he recognised was the Roman war-god, and fortresses were his most sacred temples (Dan. xi, 38 sq.; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Isr., iv, 340). Confronted with such a persecutor, the Jew realized the spiritual power of his faith. The evils of heathendom were seen concentrated in a personal shape. The outward forms of worship became invested with something of a sacramental dignity. Common life was purified and ennobled by heroic devotion. An independent nation asserted the integrity of its hopes in the face of Egypt, Syria, and Rome. Antiochus himself left behind him among the Jews the memory of a detestable tyrant (ἡτῆρς, contemptible, Dan. xi, 21; ῥῆζα ἀμαρτωλός, 1 Macc. i, 10), although Diodorus Siculus (Ecl.og. 34) gives him the character of a magnanimous prince (βασιλεὺς μεγαλόφρονος καὶ τὸ ἥτορος ἡμίμορος). It cannot, indeed, be denied that the imputations of the Jewish writers are likely to have been exaggerated, but they could not well have fabricated the facts in the case, while the nature of the reaction (in the times of the Maccabees) shows an intolerable civil pressure preceding; accordingly Antiochus is depicted even in Diodorus (ii, 582 sq.) and other historians as a violently eccentric (almost atrocious) monarch, whose character is composed of contradictory elements (comp. Athen. x, 433). His attempt to extirpate the Jewish religion could certainly hardly have arisen from despotic bigotry, but he probably sought by this means to render the Jews somewhat more tractable, and to conform them to other nations—a purpose to which the predilection for foreign customs, already predominant among the prominent Jews (1 Macc. i, 12; 2 Macc. iv, 10 sq.), doubtless contributed. The Jews, no doubt, by reason of their position between Syria and Egypt, were subject to many hardships unintentional on the part of Antiochus, and his generals may often have increased the severity of the measures enjoined upon them by him, on account of the usual rigid policy of his government toward foreigners; yet in the whole conduct of Antiochus toward the Jews an utter contempt for the people themselves, as well as a relentless hastiness of disposition, is quite evident.—Smith, s. v. See HORN (Little).

4. ANTIOCHUS (V) ΕΥΠΑΤΟΡ (Ἐπιπάτωρ, having a noble father) succeeded, in B.C. 164, while yet a child (of nine years, Appian, Syr. 66; or twelve years, according to Porphyry, in Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 348), his father Antiochus Epiphanes, under the guardianship of Lysias (Appian, Syr. 46; 1 Macc. iii, 32 sq.), although Antiochus Epiph. on his deathbed had designated Philip as regent and guardian (1 Macc. vi, 14 sq., 55; 2 Macc. ix, 29). Soon after his accession (B.C. 161) he set out with a large army for Judaea (1 Macc. vi, 20), where Lysias already was, but hard pressed by the Jews (1 Macc. iii, 39 sq.; vi, 21 sq.). Respecting the route that he took and the issue of the engagement which he fought with Judas Maccabæus, the accounts do not agree (1 Macc. vi, and 2 Macc. xiii; comp. Wernsdorff, De fide Maccab. p. 117; Eichhorn, Apokr. p. 265 sq.); that victory, however, was not on the side of Judas, as one of these states (2 Macc. xiii, 29, 30), appears evident from all the circumstances. The statement (1 Macc. vi, 47) that the Jews were compelled to retreat on account of the superiority of their enemies, is very probable, and corroborated by Josephus (War. i, 1, 5; comp. Ant. xii, 9, 5). Antiochus repulsed Judas at Bethzacharia, and took Bethsura (Bethzur) after a vigorous resistance (1 Macc. vi, 31-50). But when the Jewish force in the temple was on the point of yielding, Lysias persuaded the king to conclude a hasty peace that he might advance to meet Philip, who had returned from Persia and made himself master of Antioch (1 Macc. vi, 51 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xii, 9, 5 sq.). Philip was speedily overpowered (Joseph. l. c.); but in the next year (B.C. 162) Antiochus and Lysias fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who now appeared in Syria and laid claim to the throne. Antiochus was immediately put to death by him (together with Lysias) in revenge for the wrongs which he had himself suffered from Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vii, 1 sq.; 2 Macc. xiv, 1 sq.; Appian, Syr. 46; Justin, xxxiv, 3), after a reign (according to Eusebius) of two (full) years (Polyb. xxxi, 19; Joseph. Ant. xii, 10, 1).

5. ANTIOCHUS (VI), surnamed EPIPHANES DIONYSUS (Ἐπιφανὴς Διώνυσος, illustrious Bacchus, on coins, see Eckhel. I, iii, 231 sq.; but THEOS, Θεός, god, by Josephus, Ant. xiii, 7, 1), son of Alexander (Balas) king of Syria (Ἀλεξάνδρος Ἀλεξάνδρον τὸν νόβον, App. Syr. 68). After his father's death (B.C. 146) he remained in Arabia; but, though still a child (παῖον, App. l. c.; παιδίον νεώτερον, 1 Macc. xi, 54), he was soon afterward brought forward by Diodotus or Trypho (Strabo, xvi, 752), who had been one of his father's chief ministers at Antioch, as a claimant of the throne against Demetrius Nicator, and (through his generals) quickly obtained the succession by force of arms (1 Macc. xi, 39, 54), B.C. 145-144 (comp. Eckhel, Doctr. Num. I, iii, 231; Justin, xxxvi, 1; Appian, Syr. 68). Jonathan Maccabæus, who joined his cause, was laden with rich presents and installed in the high-priesthood, and his brother Simon was appointed commander of the royal troops in Palestine (1 Macc. xi, 57 sq.). Jonathan now reduced the whole land to subjection from Damascus to Antioch (1 Macc. xi, 62), defeated the troops of Demetrius (1 Macc. xi, 63 sq.), and even successfully repelled a fresh incursion of Demetrius into Palestine (1 Macc. xii, 24 sq.); but hardly was Antiochus established on the throne when Trypho began to put into execution his long-cherished plan of seizing the royal power for himself (1 Macc. xii, 59).

In order to this, Trypho first of all advised the young prince to get the powerful Jonathan out of the way, and having succeeded by stratagem in confining him in prison, he soon after (B.C. 143) put him to death (1 Macc. xii, 40 sq.). He then returned to Syria, caused Antiochus to be murdered, and seized upon the crown (1 Macc. xiii, 31 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 6; App. Syr. 68; Livy, Epit. 55 [where the decem annos amoluius habens is incorrect]; Diod. ap. Müller, Fragm. ii, 19; Just. xxxvi, 1).—Smith, s. v.

6. ANTIOCHUS (VII) SIDETES (Σιδιτήρ, from Sida in Pamphylia, where he was born, Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 349, and not from his great love of hunting, Plutarch, Apophth. p. 34, ed. Lips., comp. 775), called also EUSEBES (Εὐσεβής, pious, Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 2), on coins EVERGETES (Ἐβεργέτης, benefactor, see Eckhel, Doctr. Num. iii, 235), second son of Demetrius I. After his brother Demetrius (II) Nicator had been taken prisoner (B.C. cir. 141) by Mithridates I (Arsaces VI, 1 Macc. xiv, 1), king of Parthia, he married Demetrius's sister (wife) Cleopatra, B.C. 140 (Justin. xxxvi, 1), recovered the dominion of Syria (B.C. 137, comp. Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. i, 251) from the atrocious Trypho (Strabo, xiv, 668), and ruled over it for nine years (1 Macc. xv, 1 sq.). At first he made a very advantageous treaty with Simon, who was now "high-priest and prince of the Jews," but when he grew independent of his help, he withdrew the concessions which he had made, and demanded the surrender of the fortresses which the Jews held, or an equivalent in money (1 Macc. xv, 26 sq.; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 7, 3). As Simon was unwilling to yield to his demands, he sent a force under Cendebeus against him, who occupied a fortified position at Cedron (? 1 Macc. xv, 41), near Azotus, and harassed the surrounding country. After the defeat of Cendebeus by the sons of Simon and the destruction of his works (1 Macc. xvi, 1-10), Antiochus, who had returned from the pursuit of Trypho, undertook an expedition against Judea in person. In the fourth year of his reign he besieged Jerusalem, and came near taking it by storm, but at length, probably through fear of the Romans, made peace on tolerable terms with John Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 3, 4; comp. Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 349). Antiochus next turned his arms against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus accompanied him in the campaign; but, after some successes, he was entirely defeated by Phraortes II (Arsaces VII), and fell in the battle (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 4; Justin. xxxviii, 10; Diod. Sic. Ecc. Vat. p. 117 sq.), B.C. cir. 127-126 (App. Syr. 68; comp. Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. i, 251 sq.; Clinton, F. H. ii, 332 sq.). According to Athenæus (v, 210; x, 439; xii, 540), this king, like most of his predecessors, was inordinately given to the pleasures of the table (comp. Justin. xxxviii, 10).—Smith. See CLEOPATRA 3.

7. ANTIOCHUS (VIII) GRYPUS (Γρυπός, from his aquiline nose), and on coins Epiphonus, was the second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. After the murder of his brother Seleucus by his mother, she placed him on the throne, as being likely to submit to her dictation, B.C. 125; but with the assistance of Ptolemy Phycus, his father-in-law, he not only succeeded in ejecting the usurper Alexander Zebina from Syria (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 3), but eventually compelled his mother to drink the poison that in her jealousy she prepared for him, B.C. 120. Eight years afterward a quarrel arose between him and his half-brother Antiochus Cyzicenus about the succession (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 1), causing a protracted civil war that resulted in the partition of the kingdom of Syria between them and their descendants till the Roman conquest. He was assassinated, B.C. 96, in Hamaclon, after a reign of 29 years (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4), leaving four sons. (See Justin. xxxix, 1-3; Livy, Epit. 60; Appian, Syr. p. 63; Athen. xii, 540.) Most of his coins have his mother's bust together with his own (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. iii, 238). He appears to be the Antiochus Philometor (Φιλομήτωρ, lover of his mother) referred to by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 12, 2).

8. ANTIOCHUS (IX) CYZICENUS (Κυζικηνός, from Cyzicus, where he was brought up), and on coins (Eckhel, iii, 241) Philopator (Φιλοπάτωρ, lover of his father), acquired possession of Cæle-Syria and Phœnicia (B.C. 111-96) from his half-brother Antiochus Grypus (q. v.), on whose death he attempted to seize the whole of Syria, but was resisted by Seleucus, eldest son of the latter, by whom he was killed in battle, B.C. 95 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4). He made an unsuccessful campaign at Samaria, as related by Josephus (ib. 10, 2; War. i, 2, 7), under the following circumstances: John Hyrcanus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, having besieged the city, the Samaritans invited Antiochus to their assistance. He advanced speedily to help them, but was overcome by Antigonus and Aristobulus, sons of Hyrcanus, who commanded the siege, and who pursued him to Scythopolis; after which they resumed the siege of Samaria, and blocked up the city so closely that the inhabitants again solicited Antiochus. Having received 6000 men from Ptolemy Lathyrus, son of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, he wasted the lands belonging to the Jews, designing thereby to oblige Hyrcanus to raise the siege of Samaria, but his troops were at last dispersed, and Samaria was taken by storm, and razed by Hyrcanus.

he succeeded, B.C. 95, and defeated Seleucus of the rival portion of Syria, as well as the two brothers of the latter; but the Syrians, worn out with the continuation of the civil broil, at length offered the crown of all Syria to Tigranes, before whose full accession Antiochus perished in battle with the Parthians (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4).

10. ANTIOCHUS (XI), who also assumed the title of Epiphanes (II), was one of the above-named sons of Antiochus Grypus and brothers of Seleucus, who contended with Antiochus Cyzicenus; he was defeated and lost his life, B.C. cir. 94 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4), leaving the contest to his surviving brother Philip, assisted by another brother, Demetrius, till the dispute was finally terminated by Tigranes (q. v.) assuming supreme power of all Syria, thus putting an end to the Seleucid dynasty.

Coin of Antiochus Epiphanes the Second.

11. ANTIOCHUS (XII), the youngest son of Antiochus Grypus, surnamed likewise Dionysus (II), and on coins (Eckhel, iii, 246) Philopator CALLINICTUS (Καλλινίκτος, fully victorious), assumed the title of king after his brother Demetrius (see above) had been taken prisoner by the Parthians. He fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabians, after a brief exercise of power at Damascus, in opposition to his surviving brother Philip, B.C. cir. 90 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1).

Coin of Antiochus Callinictus.

Antiochus was likewise the title of several kings of the petty province of Commagene, between the Euphrates and Mount Taurus, having the city of Samosata for its capital, and originally forming part of the Seleucid kingdom of Syria, from which it appears to have been independent during the contests between the later kings of that dynasty—a circumstance that probably explains the recurrence of the name Antiochus in this fresh dynasty. The only one of these mentioned even by Josephus is the ΕΥΡΥΒΙΤΗΣ of the name, surnamed Epiphanes, apparently a son of Antiochus II of the same line. He was on intimate terms with Caligula, who gave him his paternal kingdom, A.D. 38, but afterward withheld it, so that he did not succeed to it till the accession of Claudius, A.D. 41. Nero added part of Armenia to his dominions in A.D. 61. He was one of the richest of the kings tributary to the Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.). His son, also called Antiochus Epiphanes, was betrothed, A.D. 43, to Drusilla, the daughter of Agrippa (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 1). He assisted Titus in the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 11, 3; Tacitus, Hist. v, 1). But in A.D. 72 he was accused by Pateus, governor of Syria, of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, and being deposed from his kingdom, retired first to Laecædæmon and then to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life in great respect (Josephus, War, vii, 7).

Antiochus, bishop of Ptolemais in Palestine, a Syrian by birth. At the beginning of the fifth century he went to Constantinople, where his eloquent preaching gained him the reputation of another Chrysostom. He died not later than 408. Besides many sermons, he left a large work "against Avarice," which is lost.—Theodore, Diad. ii; Phot. Cod. 288; Act. Concil. Ephes. iii, 118; Labbe, Catal. Codd. Vindobon. pt. i, p. 116, No. 58.

Antiochus, monk of St. Saba, near Jerusalem, at the time of the capture of Jerusalem by the Persians (A.D. 614), and author of an "Epitome of Christian Faith" (Πανόκνηρη τῆς Ἁγίας Γραφῆς), first published in Latin by Tilman (Paris, 1543, 8vo); reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum (Paris, 1579; Colon, 1618; Lugd. 1677); in the original Greek, first by Ducaeus, in the Auctarii Bibl. Patr. (Par. 1624), reprinted in Morell's Bibl. Patr. (Par. 1644), and a considerable fragment in Fabricius's Bibl. Græc. x, 501.

Antipædobaptists (from ἀντί, against, παῖς, child, and βάπτισμα, to baptize), persons who object to the baptism of infants, on the assumption that Christ's commission to baptize appears to them to restrict this ordinance to such only as are taught, or made disciples; and that consequently infants, who cannot be thus taught, ought to be excluded. The Baptists, Campbellites, and Mennonites are Antipædobaptists. See those titles.

An'tipas (Ἀντίπας, for Ἀντίπατρος, Antipater; comp. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 3), the name of three men.

1. A son of Herod the Great by Malthæe, a Samaritan (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 1, 3; War, i, 28, 4). He inherited of his father's dominions only Galilee and Perea (B.C. 5), as tetrarch (q. v.), with a yearly income of 200 talents (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 8, 1; II, 4); Jesus was thus within his territorial jurisdiction (Luke xxiii, 7). He first married the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas, but afterward became enamored with Herodias, his half-brother Philip's wife, and contracted a clandestine marriage with her, on which account the Arabian princess indignantly returned to her father (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5 1). Herodias inveigled her new husband into the execution of John the Baptist (Matt. xiv, 4). His former father-in-law, Aretas, not long afterward (according to Josephus about one year before the death of Tiberius, i. e. A.D. 36) declared war against him, on pretence of a dispute about boundaries, but probably in reality to avenge the insult to his daughter, and entirely routed his army (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 1), but was obliged to desist from further steps by the intervention of the Romans. Antipas visited Rome on the accession of Caligula, although fond of ease, at the instance of his vain and ambitious wife, in order to secure the same royal title (which is derisively ascribed to him in Mark vi, 14) that his nephew Herod Agrippa had just acquired (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 7, 1); but upon the accusation of the latter he was dethroned by the emperor (A.D. 39; see Ideler, Chronol. ii, 309 sq.; comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii, 6, II; 7, 2), and, together with Herodias, who would not desert him in his misfortune, banished to Lyons in Gaul (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 2), not to Vienna (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. i, II), but died in Spain (Joseph. War, ii, 9, 6), whither he eventually removed. (See Koch, De anno natali J. C. per numerum et fata Antipæ demonstrato, Helmst. 1721; comp.

Zorn, Biblioth. Antiq. i, 1021.) Although Josephus relates no great series of infamous acts on the part of Antipater, it is yet very evident that he was a frivolous prince (comp. Mark viii, 15; Luke xiii, 32), abandoned to the pleasures of life (comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii, 4, 5), destitute of firmness of character (comp. Luke xxiii, 11), aware of his faults (Luke ix, 7 sq.), yet not disinclined to arbitrary acts (Luke xiii, 38), whom Luke (iii, 19) charges with many crimes (πονοῦντά), as likewise Jewish tradition paints in the most disadvantageous light (Noble, Hist. Idum. p. 251 sq.).—Winer, i, 484. See HEROD.

2. A person "of royal lineage" in Jerusalem, and city treasurer, the first man seized by the assassins during the last war with the Romans, and soon after butchered in prison (Josephus, War, iv, 3, 4 and 5).

3. A "faithful martyr," mentioned in Rev. ii, 13, A.D. ante 100. He is said to have been one of our Saviour's first disciples, and a bishop of Pergamus, and to have been put to death in a tumult there by the priests of Esculapius, who had a celebrated temple in that city (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv, 5). Tradition relates that he was burned in a brazen bull under Domitian (Act. Sanctorum, ii, 3, 4). His day in the Greek calendar is April 11 (Menol. Gr. iii, 51).

Antipater (Ἀντίπατρος, instead of his father), the name of several men in the Apocrypha and Josephus.

1. The son of Jason, and one of the two ambassadors sent by the Jews in the time of the Maccabees to renew the league with the Romans and Laedæmonians (1 Macc. xii, 16; xiv, 22).

2. The father of Herod the Great (q. v.), was, according to Josephus (Ant. xiv, 1, 3; for other accounts of his parentage, see Nicoll of Damascus, ap. Joseph. in loc.; Africanus, ap. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 6, 7; Photius, Bibl. 76 and 238), the son of a noble Idumæan, to whom the government of that district had been given by Alexander Jannæus (q. v.) and his queen Alexandra, and at their court the young Antipater was brought up. In B.C. 65 he persuaded Hyrcanus to take refuge from his brother Aristobolus II with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, by whom, accordingly, an unsuccessful attempt was made to replace Hyrcanus on the throne (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 2; War, i, 6, 2). In B.C. 64 Antipater again supported the cause of Hyrcanus before Pompey in Cæle-Syria (Ant. xiv, 3, 2). In the ensuing year Jerusalem was taken by Pompey and Aristobolus deposed; and henceforth we find Antipater both zealously adhering to Hyrcanus and laboring to ingratiate himself with the Romans. His services to the latter, especially against Alexander, the son of Aristobolus, and in Egypt against Archelaus (B.C. 57 and 56), were favorably regarded by Scæurus and Galinius, the lieutenants of Pompey; his active zeal against Mithridates of Pergamus in the Alexandrian war (B.C. 48) was rewarded by Julius Cæsar with the gift of Roman citizenship; and, on Cæsar's coming into Syria (B.C. 47), Hyrcanus was confirmed by him in the high-priesthood through Antipater's influence, notwithstanding the complaints of Antigonus, son of Aristobolus, while Antipater himself was appointed procurator of Judæa (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, 1 and 2; 6, 2, 4 and 8; War, i, 8, 1 and 7; 9, 3-5). After Cæsar had left Syria to go against Pharnaces, Antipater set about arranging the country under the existing government, and appointed his sons Phasaclius and Herod governors respectively of Jerusalem and Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 9, 1 and 2; War, i, 10, 4). In B.C. 46 he dissuaded Herod from attacking Hyrcanus, and in B.C. 43 (after Cæsar's death) he regulated the tax imposed by Cassius upon Judæa for the support of the Roman troops (Ant. xiv, 9, 5; 11, 2; War, i, 10, 9; 11, 2). During the last-mentioned year he was carried off by poison which Malchus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer to him (Ant. xiv, 11, 2-4; War, i, 11, 2-4).

3. The eldest son of Herod the Great (q. v.) by his first wife, Doris (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 12, 1). Josephus describes him as a monster of crafty wickedness (κακίας μωστήριον, War, i, 24, 1). Herod, having divorced Doris and married Mariamme, B.C. 38, banished Antipater from court (War, i, 22, 1), but recalled him afterward, in the hope of checking the supposed resentment of Alexander and Aristobulus for their mother Mariamme's death. Antipater now intrigued to bring these his half-brothers under the suspicion of their father, and with such success that Herod altered his intentions in their behalf, recalled Doris to court, and sent Antipater to Rome, recommended to Augustus (Ant. xvi, 3; War, i, 23, 2). He still continued his machinations against his brothers, in concert with Salome and Pheroras, and aided by a certain Spartan Eurycles (comp. Plut. Ant. p. 947), till he succeeded in accomplishing their death, B.C. 6 (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 4, 11; War, i, 23-27). See ALEXANDER. Having thus removed his rivals, and been declared successor to the throne, he entered into a plot with his uncle Pheroras against the life of his father; but this being discovered during his absence to Rome, whither he had gone to carry out a part of the scheme, he was remanded to Judæa by his father, and then tried before Varus, the Roman governor of Syria. The sentence against him being confirmed by Augustus, although with a recommendation of mercy, he was executed in prison by the order of his father, now himself in his last illness (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1-7; War, i, 28-33; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 8, 12).

4. The oldest of the three sons of Phasaclius by Salampsio, the daughter of Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4). See HEROD.

5. The son of Salome, Herod's sister; he married his cousin Cypros, by whom he had a daughter Cypros (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 4). He was an able orator, and in an extended speech opposed the confirmation of Archelaus (q. v.) in his royal legacy before the Emperor Augustus (Ant. xvii, 9, 5). See HEROD.

6. A Samaritan, steward of Antipater the son of Herod the Great, who tortured him in order to procure evidence against his master (Josephus, War, i, 30, 5). See No. 3.

Antipatris (Ἀντιπατρίς; from Antipater; in the Talmud אֲנְטִיפַטְרִיס, see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 109 sq.), a city built by Herod the Great, in honor of his father (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 2; War, i, 21, 9), on the site of a former place called Caphar-saba (Καφαρ-ζαβθ or Καφαρζαβθ; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1; xvi, 5, 2). The spot (according to Ptolemy, lat. 32°, long. 66° 20') was well watered and fertile; a stream flowed round the city, and in its neighborhood were groves of large trees (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 2; War, i, 21, 9). Caphar-saba was 120 stadia from Joppa; and between the two places Alexander Balas drew a trench, with a wall and wooden towers, as a defence against the approach of Antiochus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1; War, i, 4, 7). Antipatris also lay between Casarea and Lydda (Hin. Hieros. p. 600). It was not exactly on the sea (Schleusner, Lex. s. v.), but full two miles inland (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 1) on the road leading to Galilee (Mishna, Gittin, vii, 7; comp. Roland, Palast. p. 409, 417, 444). These circumstances indicate that Antipatris was in the midst of a plain, and not at Arsuf, where the Crusaders supposed he had found it (Will. Tyr. ix, 19; xiv, 16; Vitracus, c. 23; Brocard, c. 10; comp. Reiland, Palest. p. 569, 570). On the road from Ramlah to Nazareth, north of Ras el-Ain, Prokesch (Reise ins Heilige Land, Wien, 1831) came to a place called Kaffir Sabat; and the position which Berghaus assigns to this town in his map is almost in exact agreement with the position assigned to Antipatris in the Itin. Hieros. Perceiving this, Raumer (Palästina, p. 144, 462) happily conjectured that this Kefr Saba was no other than the reproduced name of Caphar-saba, which, as in many other instances, has again supplanted the foreign, arbitrary, and later name of Antipatris (comp. the Hall. Lit.-Zeit. 1845, No. 230). This conjecture has been confirmed by Dr. Robinson, who gives Kefr Saba as the name of the village in question (Researches, iii, 46-48; see also later ed. of Researches, iii, 138, 139; and Biblioth. Sac. 1853, p. 528 sq.). Paul was brought from Jerusalem to Antipatris by night, on his route to Casarea (Acts xxiii, 31; comp. Thomson's Land and Book, i, 258). Dr. Robinson was of opinion, when he published his first edition, that the road which the soldiers took on this occasion led from Jerusalem to Casarea by the pass of Beth-Horon, and by Lydda or Diospolis. This is the route which was followed by Cestius Gallus, as mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 19, 1), and it appears to be identical with that given in the Jerusalem Itinerary, according to which Antipatris is 42 miles from Jerusalem, and 26 from Casarea. Even on this supposition it would have been quite possible for troops leaving Jerusalem on the evening of one day to reach Casarea on the next, and to start thence, after a rest, to return to (it is not said that they arrived at) their quarters at Jerusalem before nightfall. But the difficulty is entirely removed by Dr. Smith's discovery of a much shorter road, leading by Gophna direct to Antipatris. On this route he met the Roman pavement again and again, and indeed says "he does not remember observing anywhere before so extensive remains of a Roman road" (Biblioth. Sac. 1843, p. 478-498). Van de Velde, however (Memoir, p. 285 sq.), contends that the position of Mejdel Yabu corresponds better to that of Antipatris. In the time of Jerome (Epitaph. Paulæ, 108) it was a half-ruined town. Antipatris, during the Roman era, appears to have been a place of considerable military importance (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 1). Vespasian, while engaged in prosecuting the Jewish war, halted at Antipatris two days before he resumed his career of desolation by burning, destroying, and laying waste the cities and villages in his way (see Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 269). This city is supposed (by Calmet, s. v.) to have been the same with Capharsadoma (or Capharsaroma, perhaps also Coparsmelita; see Reiland, Palest. p. 690, 691), where a battle was fought in the reign of Demetrius between Nicanor, a man who was an implacable enemy of the Jews, and Judas Maccabæus, when five thousand of Nicanor's army were slain, and the rest saved themselves by flight (1 Macc. vii, 26-32).

Antiphilus (Ἀντιφίλος, instead of a friend), a friend of Antipater, charged by the party of Pheroras with bringing from Egypt a poisonous draught for Herod (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 4, 2; War, i, 30, 5); a suspicion confirmed by a letter intercepted between Antiphilus and Antipater (Ant. xvii, 5, 7). See ANTIPATER.

Antiphon (from ἀντι, in turn, and φωνή, a sound), the singing or chanting of one portion of a choir in reply to another when the psalms are sung or chanted. In the "responsorium" the verse is spoken only by one person on either side, or by one person on one side, though by many on the other; whereas, in antiphony, the verses are sung by the two parts of the choir alternately. Antiphonal singing is supposed to have been brought into use in the Western Church by Ambrose, who, about the year 374, is said to have introduced it into the Church of Milan, in imitation of the Eastern Church, where it appears to have been of greater antiquity, though as to the time of its institution authors are not agreed. The chanting of the psalms in this antiphonal manner was practiced by the Hebrews; and some of these were actually composed in alternate verses, with a view to their being used in a responsive manner. In the English Church, where there is no choir, the reading of the Psalter is divided between the minister and the people; and in the cathedral service the psalms are chanted throughout, two full choirs being provided, stationed one on each side of the church. One of these, having chanted one of the verses, remains silent while the opposite choir replies in the verse succeeding; and at the end of the psalm the Gloria Patri is sung by the united choirs, accompanied by the organ.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xiv, ch. i, § 11; Farrar, Ecl. Dict. s. v. See ANTHEM.

Antiphonarium or Antiphony, a Roman service-book containing all the anthems, responsaries, collects, and whatever else was said or sung in the choir, except the lessons. It is sometimes called the responsorium, from the responses contained in it. The author of the Roman antiphony was Gregory the Great. We read of nocturnal and diurnal antiphonaries, for the use of daily and nightly offices; of summer and winter antiphonaries; also antiphonaries for country churches. These and many other popish books were forbidden to be used by the 3 and 4 Edward VI.—Farrar, Ecl. Dict. s. v. See ANTIPHON.

Antipope (from ἀντι, against, i. e. a rival pope), a pontiff elected by the will of a sovereign, or the intrigues of a faction, in opposition to one canonically chosen. The emperors of Germany were the first to set up popes of their own nomination against those whom the Romans had elected without consulting them. Otho the Great displaced successively two bishops of Rome; and when Sylvester III had expelled from the capital of Christendom Benedict IX, whose profligacy had compromised in the eyes of all men the honor of the sovereign pontificate, Conrad II, king of Germany, brought back this worthless pastor, who hastened to sell his dignity to Gregory VI. As Benedict, however, soon repented of this transaction, there were now three popes at a time, and their number was increased to four by the election of Clement II in 1046. Shortly after, Alexander II found a rival in Honorius II; and in 1080 the same unseemly spectacle was witnessed, when Henry IV, emperor of Germany, elevated to the papal chair Guibert of Ravenna, under the title of Clement III, in opposition to his implacable adversary, Gregory VII. But after the death of Gregory Clement was himself opposed successively by Victor III and Urban II, and at last died at a distance from Rome, having just beheld the exaltation of Pascal II as the successor of Urban. During the twelfth century several antipopes flourished, such as Gregory VIII and Honorius III. On the death of the latter, France began to intermeddle in these disgraceful strifes, and upheld the cause of Innocent II against Anaclet; while the kings of Sicily, on the other hand, frequently set up a pontiff of their own against the choice of the emperors. The thirteenth and fourteenth centuries swarm with antipopes; but what specially deserves notice is "the great schism of the West," produced by these shameless rivalries in 1378—a schism which divided the Church for fifty years. It broke out after the death of Gregory XI, at the election of Urban VI, whom the voice of the Roman people, demanding an Italian pope, and not one who should fix his pontificate, like several of his predecessors, at a distance from Rome, had elevated to the papal throne. The French cardinals objected, withdrew to Provence, and elected a new pope, under the name of Clement VII, who was recognised by France, Spain, Savoy, and Scotland; while Italy, Germany, England, and the whole north of Europe, supported Urban VI. These two popes communicated each other; nor did they even fear to compromise their sacred character by the most cruel outrages and the most odious insults. The schism continued after their death, when three popes made their appearance "in the field," all of whom were deposed by the Council of Constance in 1415, and Cardinal Colonna elected in their room, under the title of Martin V. The last antipope was Clement VIII. With him the schism ceased; but the evil was done, and nothing could remedy it. The dogma of papal infallibility had received a mortal wound "in the house of its friends," and the scepticism induced on this point rapidly extended to others.—Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v. See POPE; PAPACY.

Antiquities, SACRED, a term that may be considered as embracing whatever relates to the religious, political, social, domestic, and individual life, not only of the Hebrew race, but also of those kingdoms, tribes, and persons that were connected with, or more or less influenced by the chosen people (with the exception of history and biography) in the several stages of its development prior to the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans, and to the usages of the Christian Church during the earlier ages.

I. Biblical.—The Scriptures themselves are the great source whence a knowledge of Hebrew and Christian antiquities may be drawn; and whoever wishes to have an accurate and thorough acquaintance with the subject must, with this express purpose in view, make the holy record the object of a careful, sustained, and systematic study. Much of the Old Testament is, in the best sense of the term, picture writing; and the history of the Saviour carries us into the very bosom of domestic life. The knowledge which is acquired from these sources is peculiarly valuable, from the stamp of truth which every part of it bears. Few, however, have the disposition, the leisure, or the ability for the requisite study; and therefore the aid of the scholar and divine is desirable, if not indispensable. But besides what may be learned from the Scriptures themselves, much remains to be known which they do not and cannot teach; for, like all other books relating to ages long by-gone, they contain allusions, phraseology, modes of thought and speech, which can be understood either not at all, or but imperfectly, without light derived from extraneous sources; and that the rather because the Hebrews were not a literary people, and the aim of the sacred penmen was far higher than to achieve intellectual reputation. The heathen writers afford very scanty materials for illustrating biblical antiquities, so ignorant or prejudiced were they on topics of that kind. Indirect information and undesigned testimonies may be here and there extracted from their writings, but in general they communicate no useful information except on geographical and kindred subjects. The least barren of them is the earliest prose writer extant, Herodotus, who, in his second book and part of the third, furnishes snatches of information which may be of service, especially in conjunction with the light which recent discoveries in Egyptian antiquities have so happily thrown on the biblical records (The Egypt of Herodotus, by John Keurick, M.A. 1841; Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians, by Sir J. G. Wilkinson, 1837, 1841).

The study of biblical antiquities, viewed as an aid in the interpretation of the books of the Old Testament, began probably on the return from the Babylonish exile, when a lengthened past already stretched out to the Israelitish nation as they looked back toward their origin; and, from the new circumstances in which they were placed, and the new modes of thought and action to which they had become habituated, they must have found many things in their sacred books which were as difficult to be understood as they were interesting to their feelings. The ideas, views, and observations which thence resulted were held, taught, transmitted, and from age to age augmented by Jewish doctors, whose professed duty was the expounding of the law of the fathers; and after having passed through many generations by oral communication, were at length, in the second and some subsequent centuries of the Christian era, committed to writing. See TALMUD. This source of information, as being traditional in its origin, and disfigured by ignorance, prejudice, and superstition, must, to be of any service, be used with the greatest care and discrimination. It seems, however, to have fallen into somewhat undue depreciation, but has been successfully employed by recent writers in delineating a picture of the age in which our Lord appeared (Das Jahrhundert des Heils, by Gfrörer, Stuttgart, 1838). In the first century Josephus wrote two works of unequal merit, on The Jewish War and The Antiquities of the Jews, which, notwithstanding some credulity and bad faith on the part of the author, afford valuable information, particularly in relation to the manners, customs, and opinions of his own times. Had another work of which the writer speaks (preface to the Antiquities) come down to these days, which appears to have been a sort of philosophical treatise on the Mosaic laws and institutions, giving probably, after the manner of Michaelis in his Mosaisches Recht, the rationale of the several observances enjoined, some considerable light might have been thrown on the antiquities of the nation, though the known propensity of Josephus to the allegorical method of interpretation diminishes the regret experienced at its loss. The works of Philo, the celebrated Alexandrian teacher, which were also produced in the first century, have their value too much abated by his love of the same allegorical method; which he was led to pursue mainly by his desire to bring the mind of the Hebrew nation into harmony with Oriental, and especially Grecian systems of philosophy, of which Philo was a diligent student and a great admirer. Little advantage is to be gained by the study of writers among the modern Jews; for, till a very recent period, no sound intellectual activity was found among this singular and most interesting race. Inspired, however, by the spirit of the eighteenth century, Mendelssohn opened to his fellow-believers a new era, and introduced a manner of thinking and writing which prepared the way for many valuable Jewish productions, and gave an impulse to the mind of "the nation," the best outward results of which are only beginning to be seen.

The study of classical antiquity, which commenced at the revival of letters, was not without an influence on biblical archaeology; but this branch of knowledge is chiefly indebted for its most valuable results to the systematic study of the Bible, and the cultivation of the long-neglected Hebrew language, which the interests of the Reformation both needed and called forth. It was not, however, till within the last century that the intelligent spirit which had been applied to the examination of classical antiquity in Germany so directed the attention of Oriental scholars to the true way of prosecuting and developing a knowledge of Hebrew and Christian antiquities as to bring forth treatises on the subject which can be regarded as satisfactory in the present advanced state of general scholarship. In no one thing has the mental activity of recent times contributed more to the science of biblical antiquities than by leading well-informed travellers to penetrate into eastern countries, especially Syria, since, by communicating to the world the fruits of their enterprise, they have been enabled to present to no small extent a picture of what these lands and their inhabitants must have been of old, permanence being one of the chief characteristics of the Oriental mind. From Shaw (Travels in Barbary and the Levant) and Harmer (Observations on various Passages of Scripture) down to the valuable work by Prof. Robinson (Biblical Researches in Palestine, 1841, 1856), a numerous series of publications have been put forth, which have contributed to throw very great light on Jewish and Christian antiquity.

The earliest treatise in the English language expressly on the subject of Jewish antiquities was written by Th. Godwyn, B.D. (Moses and Aaron, Civil and Ecclesiastical Rites used by the Ancient Hebrews observed, etc. 4to, 1614). This work passed through many editions in England; was translated into Latin by J. H. Reiz (1679); furnished with a preface and two dissertations by Witsius (1690); was illustrated, amended, and enlarged by Hottinger (1710); and further annotated on by Carpozivius (1748). In 1724-5, Thomas Lewis gave to the public his Origines Hebrææ, or Antiquities of the Hebrew Republic, 4 vols. 8vo, which is a very elaborate and carefully compiled treatise, composed of materials drawn from the best authorities, both Jewish and Christian. A work of much value, as affording fuller views on some topics, and written in an easy style, is a posthumous publication by Dr. Jennings, entitled Jewish Antiquities, or a Course of Lectures on the three First Books of Godwyn's Moses and Aaron, London, 1766; edited, with a preface of some value, by Philip Furneaux. Fleury's work (Dr. Adam Clarke's edition) on The Manners of the Ancient Israelites, containing an Account of the peculiar Customs, Laws, Policy, and Religion of the Israelites, offers a pleasing and useful introduction to the study of the Old Testament Scriptures. A valuable and (for ordinary purposes) complete treatise may be found by the English student in Biblical Antiquities, by John Jahn, D.D., translated by T. C. Upham (Andover, 1827, etc.; N. Y. 1858). Those who wish to enter more fully into the subject may consult the original, of which the foregoing is an abridgment (Biblische Archæologie). A carefully compiled and well-written work may be found in The Antiquities of the Jews from authentic Sources, and their Customs illustrated by Modern Travels, by W. Brown, D.D. (2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1820). Much important matter is presented in Academical Lectures on the Jewish Scriptures and Antiquities, by J. G. Palfrey, D.D., LL.D. (2 vols. 8vo, Boston, 1840). German scholars have produced numerous works on the subject, of which we may mention as worthy of special attention, G. L. Bauer's Kurzgefasstes Lehrbuch der Hebr. Alterthümer des A. u. N. T. (second edition, by E. F. K. Rosemüller, Leipsic, 1835); J. M. A. Scholz's Handbuch der Bibl. Archæologie (Bonn u. Wien, 1834); De Wette (Lehrbuch der Hebr.-Jüdisch. Archæologie, Leips. 1830), translated by Rev. Theodore Parker, Bost. Hebraic's Pilgrimage to Jerusalem may serve as a connecting link between Jewish and Christian antiquities, being almost equally useful for both, as it presents a picture of Judaism in the century which preceded the advent of our Saviour. The English translation (by the Rev. John Kenrick, M.A.) from the German original is accompanied by valuable notes and a preface, in which may be found a brief outline of the sources of biblical archæology. The work is conceived and executed in the form of a story or novel, and possesses no ordinary interest, independently of its high theological value, as affording a living picture of the customs, opinions, and laws of the Jewish people. In France there is a somewhat similar work by M. de Montbron, under the unsuitable title of Essais sur la Littérature des Hébreux (4 tomes, 12mo, Paris, 1819), in which a number of short tales illustrative of ancient Hebrew usages and opinions are prefaced by a large and elaborate Introduction, and followed by a great number of learned and curious notes.

II. Ecclesiastical Antiquities.—Among the fathers of the Christian Church, Jerome, who was long resident in Palestine, has left in various works very important information respecting the geography, natural history, and customs of the country. Most of the fathers, indeed, furnish, directly or indirectly, valuable notices respecting Christian antiquity, and in a body constitute the source whence for the most part writers and scholars of later ages have drawn their materials. The reader may with advantage consult Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria, by John, bishop of Lincoln (1835); also, Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr, by the same (Cambridge, 1829). A useful compendium, as giving specimens of the writings, and therein views of the opinions, manners, rites, and observances of the early Christian Church, may be found in Bibliothèque Choisie des Pères de l'Eglise Grecque et Latine, by M. N. S. Guillon (Paris, 1828).

For a long period after the revival of learning the subject of Christian antiquities received no specific attention, but was treated more or less summarily in general histories of the Church of Christ; as, for instance, in the great Protestant work, Ecclesiast. Historia per aliquot viros in urbe Mayjeburg (1559-74); and on the part of the Catholics, by Baronius, Annales Ecclesiast. à Christo nato ad annum 1198 (Rom. 1558). If any exception is to be made to this general statement, it is on behalf of Roman Catholic writers, whose works, however, are too inaccurate and prejudiced to be of any great value in these times. The first general treatise on Christian antiquity proceeded from the pen of an English divine, Jos. Bingham, Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church (London, 1708-22, 10 vols. 8vo); which was translated into Latin by Grisehew (1738), and into German (1778). The work corresponds in no slight degree to the learning, care, and time bestowed upon it; but, besides being somewhat in the rear of the learning of the day, it has its value diminished by the High-Church notions of the writer, as well as by the strength of his prejudices against the Roman Catholics. A useful compendium, written in a liberal spirit, and compiled chiefly from German sources, has lately been published in English (A Manual of Christian Antiquities, by Rev. J. E. Riddle, M.A. London, 1839), in which (Preface, § 2, and Appendix II) may be found a concise but detailed account of the literature of Christian antiquities. A more complete catalogue of works, embracing each particular branch, is given in Wiener's Handbuch der Theologischen Literatur. Among the best Continental treatises on the general subject of Christian antiquities may be mentioned those of Augusti, Handbuch d. Christl. Archæol. (Leipzig, 1836-7, 3 vols. 8vo); Böhmner, Die christl.-kirchl. Alterthums-Wissenschaft (Bresl. 1836, 8vo); Siegel, Handbuch der christl.-kirchl. Alterthümer (Leipzig, 1836-7, 3 vols. 8vo).—Kitto, s. v. See ARCHAEOLOGY.

III. Other treatises on Biblical archæology in general: Müller (Giess. 1830); Ugolini (Venet. 1734-69); Bellermann (Erf. 1787 and 1812); Ackermann (Wien, 1826); Schmidt (Neust. 1834). On Hebrew antiquities: Iken (Brem. 1732, etc.); Wähner (Gött. 1743); Warnkros (Weim. 1782, etc.); Faber (Halle, 1773); Baber (Weim. 1794, Lpz. 1805); Pareau (Utraj. 1823); Wait (Camb. 1825); Hüllmann (Lpz. 1834); Kalthoff (Munst. 1840). On Christian antiquities: Fabricius (Hamb. 1760); Palaotinus (Ven. 1766); Blackmore (Lond. 1760); Baumgarten (Hal. 1768); Simonis (Hal. 1769); Chrysdar (Lpz. 1775); Selvaggi (Neap. 1772); Pellicia (Neap. 1777-84); Haag (Tub. 1785); Volzthi (Gött. 1789); Binterim (Mainz, 1825-32); Rheinwald (Berl. 1830); Locherer (Erfk. 1832); Münter (Kopenh. 1828); Borsius (Lugd. B. 1825). For the sources of biblical antiquities, see ARCHAEOLOGY, where also will be given a more detailed view of the Christian department of the subject.

Anti-Sabbatarian, those who reject the Sabbath, both Jewish and Christian. See SABBATH.

Antitactæ (q. d. ἀντιτάκται, from ἀντίτασσω, to resist), the Antinomian branch of the Gnostics. Gnosticism regarded matter as absolutely evil, and the body as the seat and source of evil. Gnostic morality, therefore, consisted in the mortification of the body. One class of Gnostic sects tried to attain this end by means of rigorous asceticism [see ENCRATITES], the other by wilfully abusing it for debauchery. The latter class bore the collective name Antitactæ, as they considered the law as not obligatory for them, and intended to show their contempt of the law, and of the Demiurgos, the author of matter, and, consequently, of evil, by purposely transgressing the commandments of the law. To this class belong the Carpoetrans, Basilidians, and others. Whether any particular sect ever bore the name Antitactæ is still controverted.—Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 451. See Gnosticism.

Antitrinitarians, a general name either applied to all who oppose the doctrine of the Trinity (q. v.), or, in a more restricted sense, to the opponents of the Trinity in the first three centuries of the Christian Church and to those of the 16th century.

I. The Antitrinitarians of the ancient church, before the Council of Nice, were generally called Monarchians (q. v.). They may be divided into two classes: the rationalistic or dynamic, who denied the divinity of Christ, regarding him merely as a man filled with divine power, and the Patripassians (q. v.), who identified the Son with the Father, or admitted at most only a modal Trinity. The first class had its representatives even in the Apostolical Church, for Cerinthus (q. v.) taught that the origin of Jesus was merely human; and the Ebionites, though differing on some doctrinal points, agreed in denying the divinity of Christ, on a class regarding him as the son of Mary and Joseph, while the others, although looking upon him as born of the Virgin through the Holy Ghost, and acknowledging him to be a superhuman being, yet denied his divinity. The Magi (about 170) rejected the doctrine of the Logos and the Gospel of John. Theodotus the Elder, or the Tanner, was excommunicated about 200 by Bishop Victor, of Rome, for teaching that Christ was begotten in a miraculous way, but otherwise a man, without any superiority to others except that of righteousness. From the sect founded by him proceeded Theodotus the Younger, or the Money-broker, who advocated, but at the same time modified the views of the elder Theodotus. He maintained that the "Logos" dwelt in Melchizedek to a higher degree than in Christ, and thus became the founder of the Melchizedecians. Of greater influence than the heretics thus far named was Artemon (q. v.), who was also excluded from the Church of Rome for maintaining that the established doctrine of the church had always been that Christ was only a man, until Bishop Zephyrinus, of Rome, had introduced the newer doctrine of his divinity. Artemon also admitted the superhuman origin of Christ, but denied that he was superior to the prophets except by virtue. The most important of the representatives of this class of early Antitrinitarians is Paul of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, who was deposed for heresy in 269. He maintained that Christ, as a man, was begotten by the Holy Ghost; that the "Logos" which then began personally to exist dwelt in Christ as a divine power, by the use of which he rose above all other men, and became participant of divinity, which, therefore, was for him a moral, not a natural dignity.

The first representatives of the second class of the early Antitrinitarians was Praxeas (q. v.), a confessor in the time of Marcus Aurelius, and a prominent opponent of the Montanists. He taught that the Father himself descended into the Virgin, that he was born from her, and suffered, and that he (the Father) himself was Christ; that only in so far as he assumed flesh in Jesus he was called Son; that he was not, personally or otherwise, different from the Son, "but made himself the Son" (ipse se sibi filium fecit), and that he suffered in the Son (pater compassus est filio). His adherents, therefore, were called "Patripassians." Noetus (q. v.) of Smyrna, and probably a presbyter of Ephesus, was excluded about 230 from his church as a Patripassian. He denied this charge, and we are not fully informed about the peculiar kind of Monarchianism to which he was attached. Callistus, bishop of Rome, is also said to have belonged to this class. Beryllus of Bostra (q. v.) denied that Christ had any personal existence before his incarnation, or that there was in Christ a divine nature distinct from that of his Father, but he conceded that the Godhead of the Father dwelt in the person of Jesus. Under the instruction of Origen, he repudiated his views at the Synod of Bostra in 244. The views of Beryllus were further developed by Sabellius (q. v.), a presbyter of Ptolemais (250-260). According to him, God is an absolute, undivided unity (μονας), and the "Logos" is the self-revelation of God in the world. The Father reveals himself as God when he gives the law, as Son when he becomes man in Christ, and as Holy Spirit when he inspires the hearts of the believers.

II. The Middle Ages.—There are few traces of Antitrinitarian doctrines in the church history of the Middle Ages. Amalric of Bena, and his disciple, David of Dinanto, regarded the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost as expressions for three different ages of the world. The Paulicians, the Catharists, and some other sects, revived, with other Gnostic and Manichean heresies, also those concerning the Trinity.

III. The Time of the Reformation.—The rationalistic element, concealed and suppressed by the Church of Rome, came to the surface naturally at the period of the Reformation. The Anabaptist attack on practical points coincided in time, and partly in the men themselves, with the theoretical attack on the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. To the first Antitrinitarians of this period belongs Johannes Denk (died 1528), who regarded the "Logos" as the totality of all human souls, which received its highest development in Jesus. He denied consistently the pre-existence of the Logos, the divinity of Christ, and the Trinity. Hetzer, who was executed at Basel in 1529, seems to have been a disciple of Denk. Campanus, who died in prison at Cleves, was more attached to Arian views. He regarded the relation of the Father to the "Logos" as a kind of marital relation, and the Holy Ghost as an impersonal emanation from both. The views of David Georgs or Joris, of Delft, in Holland, were intermediate between Sabellianism and the Pantheism of Amalric of Bena. He regarded God as an undivided unity and as impersonal, but as having become man in three persons, Moses, Elias, Christ or Moses, Christ, David (himself), corresponding to three ages of the world. Servetus, who was burned in 1529, sought to unite Sabellianism with the teachings of Paul of Samosata. God, as undivided unity, is the Father; as descending upon the man Jesus, he is the "Logos;" Jesus, pervaded by the "Logos," is the Son; God, as the power which penetrates all creatures, and especially the human soul, is called the Holy Ghost. Later he modified his views, and represented God as the essence of all things; the Logos as the self-revelation of God, and including within himself the ideas of all other things; and the Holy Ghost as the self-communication of God to the creatures, and as identical with the world-soul. All the Antitrinitarians of this period thus far mentioned were more or less addicted to a pantheistic mysticism, and in their views concerning the Trinity agreed more with Sabellius than with Arius. One of the first prominent representatives of a rationalistic Antitrinitarianism was Gribaldo, a learned Italian jurist, who maintained that the Son was another God of the same nature, but derived from the Father. This doctrine of three gods of unequal rank was completed by Gentilis, a Calabrian. The adherents of Antitrinitarian views in the Reformed Church of Poland were expelled in 1565, and have since been known as Unitarians (q. v.). They honored Jesus simply as a man, but one who was richly endowed by God, and exalted for dominion over the whole world. Most of them paid adoration to him. The Unitarians were organized as a community, and received a complete system of doctrine from Faustus Socinus (q. v.), who carried out the views first set forth by his uncle, Lælius Socinus, an Italian nobleman. The principal article of his system was an attempt at an accommodation between different parties by the doctrine that, although Jesus was born a mere man, he was nevertheless without any earthly father, and was wonderfully endowed by God; was taken up into heaven, and the reward of his life was deified, that he might be a mediator to bring man, alienated from God by sin, to the knowledge and grace of God, and that he might reign as the king of his people in all periods of time. The Freethinkers, Deists, and Rationalists were, of course, all Antitrinitarians. In Germany, Seebach and Dippel were prominent by their opposition to the doctrine of the Trinity; in England, Whiston, Clarke, Lindsey, and Priestly. Owing especially to this influence, Unitarian congregations were organized in England at the close of the 18th century. In the United States the spreading of Rationalism, especially among the Congregationalists, led, in 1815, to a formal separation, and the organization of a Unitarian denomination. With them another religious denomination, who simply call themselves Christians, as well as the Universalists, and a seceding portion of the Society of Friends (the "Hicksites"), agree in the distinctive article of their faith. Swedenborg substituted for the doctrine of the Trinity a threefold revelation of the one God, who was obliged to become man that he might give a human character to the doctrines of faith, and drive back the powers of hell. Several denominations, as the Disciples, Mennonites, Quakers, and others, without rejecting the divinity of Christ, or explaining his relation to the Father, are opposed to the expression Trinity, as not being used by the Bible.

In Germany, Sabellianism has found many admirers in the school of speculative theology. Schleiermacher, in particular, was of opinion that Sabellianism both avoided the difficulties of the church doctrine, which he regarded as insoluble, and yet satisfied the natural desire of the Christian to attribute to Christ the highest predicate without endangering Monotheism (Christliche Glaubenslehre, 2d ed. ii, 532). Many new attempts were made to advocate a Trinitarian idea of God in a sense entirely different from that of the church doctrine. We refer to them more fully in the article TRINITY. See Lange, Geschichte der Unitarier vor der nic. Synode (Leips. 1831, 8vo); Bock, Historia Antitrinitariorum (Koenigsberg, 1774-84, 2 vols. 8vo); Trechsel, Die Protestant. Antirina. vor F. Socin (Heidelberg, 1839, 1844, 2 vols. 8vo); Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 131; ii, 210, 328, 478; Wallace, *Antirina. Antitype, that which answers to a type or figure. The corresponding Greek word, ἀντίτυπος, occurs twice in the New Testament (1 Heb. ix, 24; 1 Peter iii, 21), where it is rendered "figure" (q. v.). A type, in its primary and literal meaning, simply denotes a rough draught, or less accurate model, from which a more perfect image is made; but in the sacred and theological sense of the term, a type may be defined to be a symbol of something future and distant, or an example prepared and evidently designed by God to prefigure that future thing. What is thus prefigured is called the antitype. See TYPE.

Antoine, NICOLE, an apostate from Christianity to Judaism, was born at St. Brieux in 1600, and joined early the Reformed Church. A few years later he applied for admission among the Jews, but in vain. Having returned to Geneva, he became a teacher, and afterward Reformed pastor, at Divonne, where he preached only on texts from the Old Testament, rarely mentioning the name of Jesus, and professing strange opinions about him. He fell for some time into insanity, and, having recovered, acknowledged again his faith in Judaism. He was accused at Geneva of blasphemy, and burned in 1632.—Pierer, Univ.-Lexikon, s. v.

Antonia (a frequent Roman name, fem. of ANTONIUS), the name of two females mentioned by Josephus.

1. The mother of Germanicus and Claudius (afterward emperor); she loaned Herod Agrippa money to retrieve his credit with Tiberius (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 4). She was a woman of eminent virtue (ib. 6). She was born about B.C. 76, and lived to see the accession of her grandson Caligula (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.).

Coin with the Bust of Antonia.

2. A daughter of the Emperor Claudius by Petina (Josephus, War, ii, 12, 7). Nero had her put to death on a charge of treason, after her refusal to marry him (Suet. Claud. 27; Ner. 35; Tacit. Ann. xii, 2; xiii, 23; xv, 53; Dio Cass. ix, 5).

Antonia (Ἀντωνία, from Antony), a fortress in Jerusalem, on the north side of the area of the Temple, often mentioned by Josephus in his account of the later wars of the Jews. It was originally built by the Maccabees, under the name of Baris, and was afterward rebuilt with great strength and splendor by the first Herod (Josephus, Ant. xv, 11). In a more particular description Josephus states (War, v, 5, 8) that the fortress stood upon a rock or hill fifty cubits high, at the north-west corner of the temple area, above which its wall rose to the height of forty cubits. Within it had the extent and appearance of a palace, being divided into apartments of every kind, with galleries and baths, and broad halls or barracks for soldiers; so that, as having every thing necessary within itself, it seemed a city, while in magnificence it resembled a palace. At each of the four corners was a tower. Three of these were fifty cubits high; but the fourth, at the south-east corner, was seventy cubits high, and overlooked the whole temple, with its courts. The fortress communicated with the northern and western porticoes of the temple area, and had flights of stairs descending into both, by which the garrison could at any time enter the courts of the Temple and prevent tumults. On the north it was separated from the hill Bezetha by a deep trench, lest it should be approachable from that quarter, and the depth of the trench added much to the apparent elevation of the towers (War, v, 4, 2).

This fortress is called ἡ περιβολή in the New Testament (Acts xxi, 34, 37), and is the "castle" into which Paul was carried from the Temple by the soldiers, from the stairs of which he addressed the people collected in the adjacent court (Acts xxi, 31-40). Dr. Robinson (Researches, i, 422) conceives that the deep and otherwise inexplicable excavation called "the pool of Bethesda" was part of the trench below the north wall of this fortress; in which case, as he remarks, its extent must have been much more considerable than has usually been supposed.—Kitto. See JERUSALEM.

Antonians, 1. A sect of Antinonians in Switzerland, followers of Anton Unternährer, born a Roman Catholic at Entlebuch, 1761, whose mind seems to have been unsettled. In 1799 he began to hold meetings, and soon after announced himself as the Son of Man.

This he tried to demonstrate in the most singular manner from a number of scriptural passages, from his name, and from circumstances of his body and life. On Good Friday, 1802, he appeared, with a number of adherents, before the minister of Berne, proclaiming an impending crisis. He also summoned the government of the canton to appear before him. This led to his arrest and to an investigation, in consequence of which he was sentenced to two years imprisonment. As soon as dismissed from the prison, he again held assemblies in the neighborhood of Thun, was again arrested, and sentenced (April 4, 1805) to life-long banishment from the canton. He then went to Schlupfheim in the canton of Lucerne, where he was visited by many of his adherents. The government was first inclined to treat him as a monomaniac, but subsequently arrested him, and kept him in prison until his death in 1824. Unternährer published fifteen small volumes, several of which were printed secretly. All are written in the tone and language of the Bible. He combined the passages of the Bible without any regard to sense and connection, and justified this arbitrariness by saying that the Scriptures were only "fragments," and that he, as the Man of God, had the mission to put these fragments together in the proper way. Of God he speaks as a personal being, having all the attributes given to him in the Scriptures. Still, his conception is unconsciously pantheistic, inasmuch as he regards him merely as a natural being, without the idea of concrete holiness. He also accepted the doctrine of the Trinity, but thought himself to be the God who became man the second time. Every thing created by God, inclusive of man, with all his natural instincts, was regarded by him as good; the making of any distinction, as between good and evil, he declared to be the work of the devil. According to him, the man who recognises all such distinctions as opposed to the will of God, is redeemed. The redemption of mankind was begun by Christ, and completed by himself (Unternährer). All institutions of church and state, marriage, property, religious service, sacraments, he denounced and cursed as distinctions taught by the devil. The only religious service he taught consisted in the cultivation of love—in particular, sexual love, without any restraint or distinction whatever. He found adherents in several places, and many continued to believe in him even after his death, expecting that his spirit would appear again in another form. In Amstaldingen, his former place of residence, the sect was suppressed in 1805. In Wohlen, near Berne, and several adjoining communities, a certain Bendicht Schori became the centre of the sect. They were summoned before the courts in 1830, but dismissed with a moderate fine, and still exist. Another branch of the sect existed in the community of Gsteig, near Interlachen, under the leadership of Christ. Michel. The courts several times proceeded against this branch (1821, 1830, and 1840), and in 1841 Michel and others were sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Traces and branches of this sect, it is said, may also still be found in the cantons of Lucerne, Aargau, and Zurich. (See Zyro, Chr. Michel und seine Anhänger, in Trechsel's Beiträge zur Geschichte d. Schweiz. vöf. Kirche.—Herzog, i, 410.)

2. The name of several orders. See ANTHONY, ORDERS OF.

Antoniewicz, CHARLES BOLAZ, a Polish poet and pulpit orator, born at Lemberg, Nov. 6, 1807, died at Odra, Nov. 11, 1852. He early distinguished himself as a poet, and took an active part in the Polish revolution of 1830. After the death of his wife he entered, in 1839, the order of Jesuits, and at once obtained the reputation of being the most distinguished among the living Polish pulpit orators. His countrymen compared him with Laocordia (q. v.) and Ventura (q. v.). He had, in particular, great success as an apostle of temperance. Antoniewicz contributed many poetical and theological articles to Polish journals, and also published a number of books, as Smettes (1828), Bielang (1829), Reminiscences of Pol. sch. Couvents, etc. A biographical sketch of Antoniewicz, in Polish ("Reminiscences of the Life and the Writings of Antoniewicz?"), was published by the priest Ignaz Polkowski (Warsaw, 1861).—Unsere Zeit, viii, 717 sq.

Antoninus, TITUS AURELIUS FELIPIUS BOJONIUS PIUS, a Roman emperor, born Sept. 19, A. D. 86, at a villa near Lanuvium (now Civita-Lavinia), and died at Lorium (now Castel di-Guido), March 7, 161. He was first one of the four administrators of Italy, afterward proconsul of Asia. Adrian having adopted him, he became his successor as Roman emperor, and governor from 138 to 161. He showed himself in every respect one of the greatest and noblest emperors pagan Rome ever had. He was just, mild, liberal, a supporter of science and art, and averse to carrying on war. Under Adrian he saved the lives of many senators whose execution had been ordered, and he prevailed on Adrian himself to desist from committing suicide. The Roman empire greatly prospered under his administration, and neighboring nations frequently chose him as an umpire of their feuds. From him are the celebrated sayings: "I prefer saving one citizen to slaying a thousand enemies," and "A prince must have no property of his own, but devote every thing to the common weal." He protected the Christians when the pagans ascribed several public calamities, as the inundation of the Tiber, the earthquake in Greece, conflagrations, etc., to the wrath of the gods, in consequence of the Christians being tolerated. Antoninus forbade all towns in Greece, and especially Larissa, Thessalonica, and Athens, to persecute the Christians. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., iv, 13) gives a rescript of this emperor to the assembly of deputies of Asia Minor, ordering even the punishment of such as would accuse Christians; but it is doubtful whether this decree is genuine.—Capitolinus, Vita Antonini; Wencp, *Divus Pius, sive ad leges imp. Antoninus, MARCUS ANNIUS VERUS AURELIUS. See AURELIUS.

Antoninus, archbishop of Florence: his real name was Antonius, but he was called by the diminutive Antoninus on account of his small stature. Born at Florence in 1389, he entered at sixteen years of age the order of St. Dominic, and soon acquired such a reputation that, even when yet quite young, he was intrusted with the government of various houses of his order, at Cortona, Rome, Naples, Florence, etc., and contributed greatly to its reformation. In 1439 he took part in the Council of Florence. In 1446, Pope Eugenius IV appointed him to the archbishopric of Florence. He died in 1459, and Pius II granted a plenary indulgence of seven years to all persons who kissed his body before it was placed in the tomb! He was canonized in 1523. His works are: 1. Summa Historialis, seu, Chronicon Tripartitum; from the creation to the year 1459 (Venice, 1481, Basle, 1491, 5 vols. fol., and elsewhere);—2. Summa Theologie moralis, partibus 4 distincto (Venice, 1477, 4 vols.; a new edition, with very copious notes by Father Mamachi, Venice, 1751, 4 vols. 4to);—3. Summa Confessionalis (Argent. 1492, Venice, 1572);—4. Annotaciones de Donatione Constantini M.;—5. Trilogus de Discipulis Emmanucis; with his Life;—6. De Virtutibus Iler. His life is given by Echard, De Script. Ord. Prædicator. i, 818, and in the Acta Sanctorum, vol. i.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1444.

Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.; Hoefcr, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 859.

Antoninus, a martyr, who is said to have suffered either in the fourth or in the seventh century. He has been commemorated at Pamiers, France, since the eighth century, on the 2d of September.—Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 431.

Antoninus, a priest and martyr of Palestine, who is said to have been present at Caesarea with Zebinus and Germanus, and, together with them, reproached the governor Firmilianus for sacrificing to idols, for which they were put to death. This happened under Galerius Maximianus. They are commemorated as saints in the Roman Church on the 13th of November.—Ruinart, p. 327; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 432.

Antoninus Honoratus, bishop of Constantina or of Cirta, in Africa. He is chiefly known by a letter of his (A. D. 437) to a Spanish bishop named Arcadius, and three others, banished by Genseric, king of the Vandals, because they would not embrace Arianism. He exhorts them to suffer patiently for the sake of Jesus Christ. The letter is short, but written in vigorous and even elevated language. It is given in Baronius, Annales, A. D. 437, and in the Bibl. Patrum, viii, 665.—Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 338; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, i, 447; Hoefcr, Biog. Générale, ii, 859.

Antonio, Augustine, of Saragossa, in Aragon, son of the vice-chancellor of that kingdom; studied at Salamanca, whence he passed into Italy, and made himself master of law, ecclesiastical history, languages, etc. At twenty-five years of age he published Enundationes et Opiniones Juris Civilis. Paul III made him auditor of the Rota; and Julius, his successor, sent him as legate into England when Philip of Spain went there to marry Queen Mary. He was made successively bishop of Alifia in 1556, and Lerida in 1561, and lastly, in 1576, archbishop of Tarragona, which dignity he held till his death in 1586. Baluze has given a list of his works at the end of his Treatise on the Correction of Gratian, which is the most considerable of his writings.—Dupin, Hist. of Eccl. Writers, iii, 743; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio, Juan, a Franciscan of Salamanca, ex-definitor and ex-guardian of the Franciscan Discalceates of St. Paul, also censor of the supreme tribunal of the Inquisition, and general historian of the entire order of Franciscans. He wrote Bibliotheca Minorum Discalceatorum (Salaman. 1724, 4to);—Chronica de Franciscanos della Provincia de S. Paulo en Castilla (tom. 1, Salaman. 1727; tom. ii, Madrid, 1729, fol.);—Bibliotheca Universa Franciscana (3 tom. Mad. 1732).—Richard and Giraud, Biblioth. Sacrée, cited by Landon, s. v.

Antonio of Cordova, an Observantine monk of the order of St. Francis, who was looked upon in his time as an oracle in theology. He refused the bishopric of Placenza, which was offered to him, and died at Guadalaxara, in New Castile, in 1578, aged ninety-three. Among his works are De Potestate Papæ (Venice, 1579, fol.); Comm. in Regul. S. Francisci (Paris, 1621, 8vo); Questiones 4 de Destructione, etc. (Alcala, 1553); Questionarium Theologicum lib. v (Venice, 1604, fol.); Commentaria in 4 libros Magistri Sent.; De Indulgentiis (Ale. ut, 1554); De Conceptione B. Virginis.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio of Santa Maria, a Franciscan monk and missionary, born at Placentia, Spain, about 1610. He went as missionary to the Philippine Islands, where he taught theology in the monastery of the Discalceates. In 1633 he went to China, and was made superior of the missionaries of his order in that country. For thirty-seven years he labored with great zeal, suffering chains and imprisonment. He preached first in the province of Fokien, then at Nankin, and lastly in Xantung, where he founded a church. He died in 1670. Among the works which he has left may be mentioned Relatio Sinensium Sectarum; De Controversia Primigenitorum Defunctorum; Confucii Cultus; An Apology for Christianity, in Chinese; A work in Spanish on the Chinese rites (translated into French by the Board of Foreign Missions, and printed at Paris, 1701); A Catechism, in Chinese (Canton, 1660); An Apology for the Dominicans and Franciscan Missionaries in China; History of the Venerable Brother Gabriel, of Madelaina, and the Seven Discalceat Franciscans, martyred in Japan; De modo Evangelisandi regnum Dei in Sinico imperio; Tractatus de Sinurum Conversione; Relationes 5 de Conversatione, Progressibus, ac Fructibus Missionariorum discalceatorum in Sinensium imperio; and many other works, chiefly relating to the Chinese missions.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio of the Holy Spirit, a Portuguese monk, of the order of Barefooted Carmelites, and a famous theologian and preacher, who died bishop of Angola, in Upper Ethiopia, in 1667. He left many treatises, printed at Lyons, in five vols. fol.—Richard and Giraud, Biblioth. Sacrée, cited by Landon, s. v.

Antonius (a frequent Roman name), the name of several men in Josephus. See also ANTONY.

1. Lucius, third son of Marcus Antonius Creticus, and younger brother of Marc Antony, became tribune in B. C. 44, and consul in B. C. 41. Upon the death of Julius Cæsar, he actively supported his brother's cause as triumvir (Dion Cass. xlviii, 5); but in the issue he was besieged in Perugia, and forced to surrender, B. C. 40. He was shortly afterward appointed to the command of Iberia, after which we hear no more of him (Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Antonius, 14). Cicero describes him as infamous (Phil. iii, 12; v, 7, 11; xii, 8, etc.), but with exaggeration (Drumann, Gesch. Roms. p. 527). His decree as "Roman vice-quæstor and vice-prætor" to the Sardinians in favor of the Jews is recited by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 10, 17).

2. Marcus (surnamed PRIMUS), a native of Tolosa, in Gaul, received in his boyhood the epithet of Bravo, i. e. in Gallic a cock's beak (Suetonius, Vitell. 18; Martialis, ix, 10). He afterward went to Rome, and rose to the dignity of senator; but, having been degraded for forgery, he was banished (Tacit. Ann. xiv, 40). After the death of Nero (A. D. 68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion in Pannonia. When the fortunes of Vitellius began to fail (A. D. 68), Antonius was one of the first generals of Europe to declare in favor of Vespasian, to whom he subsequently rendered the most important military services (Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Prinnus). His dispossession of the forces of Vitellius from Rome is related by Josephus (War, iv, 11, 2 and 3). His haughty behavior in consequence, however, appears thenceforth to have left him in comparative obscurity (Tacit. Hist. ii, 86; Dio Cass. lxx, 9-18).

3. A captain of the Roman garrison at Asealon, attacked by the Jews in the beginning of the final struggle (Joseph. War, iii, 2, 1). It is uncertain whether he was the same with the centurion who lost his life during the siege of Jotapata by the treachery of one of the Jews who had fled into the neighboring caves (ib. iii, 7, 35).

Antonius, a martyr of the 14th century, who, with his brother, abandoned Paganism for Christianity in Lithuania. The grand-duke Olgar made vain efforts to induce the brothers to abjure Christianity, and finally ordered them to be tortured and hung. They are celebrated as martyrs in the Roman Church April 14.—Acta Sanctorum, April 14; Hoefer, Bi g. Générale, i, 823.

Antonius Melissa, a Greek monk toward the end of the eighth century (?). He made a collection (something after the manner of Stobæus) of passages from the classics and from the church fathers, ranging the materials under seventy-six titles. It was first printed by Gesner (Zürich, 1546, fol.), and is given also at the end of Stobæus (Franf. 1581), and also in the Bibliotheca Patrum, t. v.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, i, 823.

Antonius or Anton, PAUL, a German theologian, born at Hirschfeldt in 1661. He became professor at Halle, and was for many years the friend and collaborer of Francke (q. v.) in the revival of religion known as Pietism. He died at Halle in 1730. Among his writings are De s. teris processionibus gentium (Leipzig, 1684, 4to);—Conciliū Tridentinū doctrina publica (Halle, 1697, 8vo, and often);—Elementa Homilietica (Halle, 1700, 8vo);—other writings of his are named in Walch, Bibliotheca, ii.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 834.

Antony, MARC (properly MARCUS ANTONIUS), the triumvir, son of M. Antonius Creticus and Julia, the sister of Julius Cæsar, was born apparently B.C. 83, for he was chosen consul as early as B.C. 64. His father dying while he was yet young, and his mother marrying again, he was left in his youth to all sorts of dissipation, and early became distinguished for profligacy, which continually afterward involved him in want and danger. To escape from his creditors, he served in the army in Syria under Gabinus, where he acquired a reputation for intrepidity (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, 3; War. i, 8, 5). He took part in the campaigns against Aristobolus in Palestine (B.C. 57, 56), and also in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt (in B.C. 55). In the following year he followed J. Cæsar into Gaul, through whose influence he was elected quaestor in B.C. 52, and whose legate he became during the contest with the party of Pompey (B.C. 49-47). On the murder of Cæsar, Antony was left in supreme power, but a rival soon appeared in the young Octavianus, with whom, after a defeat in battle, he at length formed the first triumvirate, in connection with Lepidus, the chief in command of the consular troops, B.C. 43, the death of Cicero being one of the terms of the compact. Antony now vigorously prosecuted the war against the opponents of the late dictator Cæsar, and defeated Brutus and Cassius in a pitched battle at Pharsalia, B.C. 42. Then, after an interval spent in Rome, he passed over to Asia, in order to procure funds for paying his troops, and in Egypt he became enamored of the famous Cleopatra (q. v.), and neglecting his affairs in dalliance with her, at last became involved in inextricable reverses, which terminated in the disastrous battle of Actium,

B.C. 31, by which Octavianus became master of Egypt. Antony fled to Alexandria, and when Octavianus appeared before the place, he committed suicide, B.C. 30 (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.). Several of the events in the later part of his career are referred to by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 13, 1; War. i, 16, 4), who speaks in detail of his connection with Herod (Ant. xiv, 13-xv, 4), and recites his decrees to various countries in favor of the Jews (Ant. xiv, 10, 9 and 10). See HEROD THE GREAT. Plutarch wrote a Life of Antony. See Liddell's Hist. of Rome, p. 674-729.

Anthoth'jah (Heb. Anthothiyah', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ v. r. אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, answers from Jehothak; Sept. Ἀναθωθιά v. r. Ἀναθωθί), a descendant of Shashak, a chief Benjaminite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 24). B.C. apparently ante 536.

An'thothite, the rendering in the Auth. Vers. in two passages (1 Chron. xi, 28; xiii, 3) of the name more properly, or at least more analogically, Anglicized ANATHOTHITE, i. e. an inhabitant of Anathoth (q. v.). It is observable that while the city is invariably written Anathoth' (אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, Josh. xxi, 18; 1 Chron. vi, 60 [45]; vii, 8; Ezra ii, 23; Neh. vii, 27; x, 19 [20]; xi, 32; Isa. x, 30; Jer. i, 1; xi, 21, 23; xxii, 8; with the art., אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, as a var. read. in Jer. xxii, 7; "defectively," אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, in 1 Kings ii, 26, as a var. read. in Jer. xxii, 9; Sept. Ἀνωθίτης, Vulg. de Anathoth, Auth. Vers. "Anethothite;" 1 Chron. xi, 28, Anthothit', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, Ἀναθωθί, Anathothites, "Antothite;" 1 Chron. xii, 3, Anthothit', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, Ἀναθωθί, Anathothites, "Anthothite;" 1 Chron. xxvii, 12, An'othit', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ [v. r. Anthothit', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ], ἔξ Ἀναθωθί, Anathothites, "Anethothite;" Jer. xxix, 27, Anethothit', אַנְתוֹתִיָּהוּ, ἔξ Ἀναθωθί, Anathothites, "of Anathoth."

A'nub (Heb. Anub', אַנּוּב, bound together; Sept. Ἐνωβ v. r. Ἐνωβ), the first named of the two or three sons of Coz of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 8). B.C. post 1618.

Anūbis (Ἄνουβις, derivation unknown), the name of an Egyptian deity, who had a temple in Rome, where Mundus, by personating the god, through the contrivance of a freed-woman and the collusion of the priests, secured the gratification of his passion for Paulina, a chaste matron (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 3, 3). His worship in Egypt is referred to by Herodotus (ii, 66), and was widely disseminated during the Roman Empire (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv, 47; Apul. Met. xi, 262; Lamprid. Commod. 9; Spartian, Presenn. Fig. 6; Anton. Carac. 9). He appears to have been adored under the figure of a dog-headed man, a myth of which the ancients give various interpretations (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). In the temples of Egypt he is represented as the guard of other gods, particularly the attendant of Osiris and Isis, occupying, in accordance with the form under which he is symbolized, the space in front of the temple (Strabo, xvii, p. 805; Stat. Sylv. iii, 2, 12). For his rites, see Jablonsky, Panth. Æg. v, 1, § 12 etc.; Champollion (Le Jeune), Panthéon Égypt. (Par. 1823); Prichard, Egyptian Mythology. See NIBHAZ.

and by Josephus (Ant. xi, 3, 5) as that of a concubine of Darius (Hystaspis), of whom he was very fond, being the daughter of one of his nobles (Rabsases [? Rab-saris] Themasis, or "the admirable Bar-tacus"). Apamea was the name of the wives of several of the Seleucid kings (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.), but none of this name are assigned in history to Darius.

APAMEA (Ἀπάμεια, so called from Apame, q. v.), the name of several cities of antiquity (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.), none of which are mentioned in Scripture, though two of them are of interest in sacred literature.

1. APAMEA OF SYRIA, a large city in the valley of the Orontes, and capital of the province of Apamea (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Ptol. v, 15, § 19; Festus Avienus, v, 1083; Anton. Itin.). It was fortified and enlarged by Seleucus Nicator, who named it after his wife Apama (not his mother, see Strabo, xvi, p. 752), although it also bore the Greek name Phla. The fortress was placed on a hill, the windings of the Orontes giving it a peninsular form; hence its other name, the Chersonese (Χερσόνησος). Seleucus had a large commissariat there for his cavalry, and the pretender Trypho made it the basis of his operations. Josephus relates (Ant. xiv, 3, 2) that Pompey, in marching south from his winter quarters, probably at or near Antioch, razed Apamea. In the revolt of Syria under Bassus it held out for three years, until the arrival of Cassius, B.C. 46 (Dio Cass. xvii, 26-28; Joseph. Jar. i, 10, 10). During the Crusades it was a flourishing and important place under the Arabic name of Famieh, and was occupied by Tancred (Wilken, Gesch. d. Kreuzz. ii, 474; Abulfeda, Tab. Syr. p. 114, 157). Niebuhr heard that the site was now called Kulu ed-Mudik (Reise, iii, 97), and Burckhardt found a castle of this name not far from the lake El-Takah, which he fixes as the location of Apamea (Trav. p. 138). The enormous and highly ornamental ruins still standing are probably remains of the temples of which Sozomen speaks (vii, 15); besides the castle on the hill, a part of the town is found in the plain. The adjacent lake is full of the celebrated black fish.

2. APAMEA CIBOTUS (ἡ Κυβωτός), a town of Phrygia, built near Celæna by Antiochus Soter, and named after his mother Apama. Strabo says it lay at the head of the Marsyas, which ran through the town to join the Meander (Groskurd, Strabo, ii, 531), forming the Catarrhactes described by Herodotus (vii, 26). The site has been fixed at the modern Denair (Arundell, Discoveries, i, 201), corresponding to the ancient descriptions (Hamilton, Researches, ii, 499), which have been collected by Leake (Asia Minor, p. 156 sq.). Notwithstanding its frequent earthquakes, Apamea continued to flourish during the Roman Empire, and its bishops are recorded in the early Christian councils, the Gospel having probably been introduced there by Paul during his visits through Phrygia (q. v.).

The epithet Cibotus has been conjectured to have been derived from the fact that the city was the emporium of the region (see Pliny, v, 29), for κυβωτός signifies a chest or coffer; but, according to others, it is connected with the position of Noah's ark after the Flood, a hypothesis which, however untenable on general grounds, is supported by some singular coincidences. The Sibylline verses place the mountains of Ararat, where the ark rested, on the confines of Phrygia, at the sources of the Marsyas. On a medal struck in honor of Hadrian is the figure of a man, representing the river Marsyas, with this inscription, ΑΠΑΜΕΩΝ ΚΙΒΩΤΟΣ ΜΑΡΣΥΣΙΑ—a medal of the Apameans—the ark and the river Marsyas. That this was one of the commemorative notices of the ark and of the Deluge there is little doubt; but only in the sense that traditional memorials of the ark were here very ancient. There are several other medals of Apamea extant, on which are represented an ark, with a man in it receiving the dove, which is flying to him; and part of their inscription is the word ΝΕΟ; but either this should be read ΝΕΟ, an abridgment of "Neokoron," or it is the end of a word, ΑΠΑΜΕΩΝ, or (some of) the medals are spurious, which has been suspected. Still, as they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it seems that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition of commemoration respecting the ark preserved in this city. See ARK. Many more such commemorations of an event so greatly affecting mankind were no doubt maintained for many ages, though we are now under great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials, and referred to them as proofs of their antiquity. See ARABAT.

Apathy (ἀπάθεια, want of feeling) or affectuum vacuitas, a term formerly used to denote the entire extinction of the vicious passions, so that not the smallest movement of them is felt. It implies the utter rooting out of concupiscence, and the annihilation of all sin within. This was a favorite doctrine with the Stoics; and some of the fathers, as St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Macarius, and others, have used expressions which, at first sight, seem to imply that they had themselves attained to this state; but, in fact, they mean only that a perfect Christian keeps all his passions and desires in perfect subjection, so that they have not in any degree the mastery over him. The doctrine of apathy, in its strictest sense, is at variance with Holy Scripture and experience. The term apathy is also used in a limited sense, to signify a contempt for worldly things.—Landon, Ecol. Dict. s. v.

Ape אָפֶה, (koph), an animal of the monkey tribe mentioned in 1 Kings x, 22, and in the parallel passage in 2 Chron. ix, 21, among the merchandise brought by the fleets of Solomon and Hiram once in every three years. The Sept. renders the word by πῆθκος, which is equivalent to the Latin simia. The Greeks have the word κῆβος or κῆπος, for a long-tailed species of monkey (Aristot. Hist. Anim. ii, 8, 9), and Pliny (viii, 19, 28) uses cephus. Both Greeks and Hebrews received the word, with the animal, from India, for the ape, both in Sansc. and Malabar, is called kapi—swift, active. Hence also the German affe, the Anglo-Saxon apa, and the English ape. The name, under these modifications, designates the Simiadae, including, no doubt, species of Cercopithecus, Macacus, and Cynocephalus, or Guenons, apes and baboons; that is, all the animals of the quadrumanous order known to the Hebrews, Arabs, Egyptians, and the classical writers. Accordingly, we find Pliny and Solinus speaking of Ethiopian Cephî exhibited at Rome; and in the upper part of the celebrated Prænestine mosaic representing the inundation of the Nile (see Shaw's Travels, p. 423, 2d ed. 4to) figures of Simiadae occur in the region which indicates Nubia; among others, one in a tree, with the name KHIHEN beside it, which may be taken for a Cercopithecus of the Guenon group. But in the triumphal procession of Thebines III at Thebes nations from the interior of Africa, probably from Nubia, bear curiosities and tributes, among which the camelopardalis or giraffe and six quadrumana may be observed. Ethiopia are described and figured in Ludolf's Historia Æthiopia, i, 10, § 52 61. They are represented as tailless animals, climbing rocks, eating worms and ants, and protecting themselves from the attack of lions by casting sand into their eyes. Apes also occur in the lately discovered Assyrian sculptures, both in bass-reliefs on slabs (Layard, Nineveh, i, 118), and of various species on an obelisk at Nimroud (ib. ii, 330). The Koph of Scripture, named only twice (1 Kings x, 22; 2 Chron. ix, 21), is in both cases associated with אָפֶה, tokiyim, rendered "peacocks." The fleet of Solomon is said to have brought these two kinds of animals from Ophir. Now neither peacocks nor pheasants are indigenous in Africa; they belong to India and the mountains of high Asia; and therefore the version "peacocks," if correct, would decide, without doubt, not only that koph denotes none of the Simiadae above noticed, but also that the fleet of Tarshish visited India or the Australasian islands. For these reasons we conclude that the Hebrew koph, and names of same root, were, by the nations in question, used generically in some instances and specifically in others, though the species were not thereby defined, nor on that account identical. For the natural history of the ape family, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. For some attempts to identify the various kinds of quadrumana which were known to the ancients, see Lichtenstein's Commentatio philologica de Simiaturum quotquot veteribus innotuerunt formis (Hamb. 1791), and Tyson's Homo sylvestris, or the Anatomy of a Pigmie (Lond. 1699), to which he has added a philosophical essay concerning the Cynocephali, the Satyrs, and Spingees of the ancients. Aristotle (De Anim. Hist. ii, 5, ed. Schneider) appears to divide the quadrumana order of mammalia into three tribes, which he characterizes by the names πῆθκος, κῆβου, and κενυκίαλον. The ancients were acquainted with several kinds of tailed and tailless apes (Plin. Hist. Nat. viii, 80; xi, 100; Ælian, Anim. xvii, 25), and obtained them from Ethiopia (Plin. ut sup.) and India (Ctes. in Phot. Cod. lxxii, p. 66; Arrian, Ind. 15; Ælian, Anim. xvii, 25, 39; Philostr. Apoll. iii, 4), but in Mauritania they were domesticated (Strabo, xvii, 827), as now in Arabia Felix (Niebuhr, Bed. p. 167).

Monkeys as Tribute. From the Assyrian Monuments.

Some species of baboon may be denoted by the term אָפֶה, shedim, or dæmons ("devils") in Deut. xxxiii, 17; Psa. cvi, 37; and perhaps by אָפֶה, scirim, or hoary ones (goats, "satyrs") of the desert (Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14), since these animals (see Rich's Babylon, p. 30) are still found in the ruins of the Mesopotamian plains, under the name Scir Assad (see generally Bochart, Hieroz. ii, 398 sq.). It is some confirmation of this last interpretation that the Egyptians are said to have worshipped apes, and they are still adored in many places in India. See SATYR.

Apel, JOHN, a German theologian of the 16th century, was born at Nuremberg in 1486. After having studied theology at the university of Wittenberg, he became canon at Würzburg, where he married a nun, in consequence of which he was expelled. He was one of the most zealous adherents of Luther, and eagerly labored for the spreading of the Reformation. He died in 1540 at Nuremberg, where he had been, during the last years of his life, jurist of the republic and councillor of the elector of Brandenburg. He wrote, among other works, Defensio pro suo conjugio cum profuit. Lutheri (Wittenb. 1523, 4to); Erachylogus juris civis, sive corpus legum: a work long ascribed to the Emperor Justinian.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, ii, 875.

Apel'les (Ἀπέλλης, from the Lat. appello, to call), a Christian at Rome, whom Paul salutes in his epistle to the church there (Rom. xvi, 10), and calls "approved in Christ," i. e. an approved Christian, A. D. 55. Origen doubts whether he may not have been the same person with Apollus; but this is far from likely. See APOLLUS. According to the old Church traditions, Apelles was one of the seventy disciples, and bishop either of Smyrna or Hieracليا (Epiph. Cont. Hæres. p. 20; Fabricii Lux Evangelii, p. 115, 116, etc.). The Greeks observe his festival on Oct. 31. The name itself is notable from Horace's "Credat Judæus Apella, non ego" (Sat. i, 5), by which he less probably means a superstitious Jew in general, as many think, than a particular Jew of that name well known at Rome.—Kitto, s. v.

Apelles, surnamed from his length of life, Senex, a heretic, and disciple of Marcion, who, having been falsely charged with the seduction of a young girl of Alexandria named Philumene, set up a school of his own, and became a critic of his former master. He taught that the Lord, when descending from heaven, formed to himself a body of particles of air, which he allowed to resolve itself into air again as he ascended. He taught that there was one God, the Creator of all things, who, when he had created the bad angels, intrusted to one of them the formation of the world. He denied the resurrection of the flesh, and repudiated the law and the prophets.—Cævo, Hist. Lit. anno 188; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v, 13; Mosheim, Comm. i, 487, 488; Lardner, Works, viii, 539 sq.; Laudon, s. v.

Aphāca (τὰ Ἀφάκα, according to the ancients, from the Heb. אֶפְחַק, aphak', to embrace, with reference to the loves of Venus and Adonis, Etymol. Mag. s. v.; see Movers, Phön. i, 192), a town of Cæle-Syria, midway between Heliopolis and Byblus (Zosim. Hist. i, 58), a position, as Ireland thinks (Palest. p. 315), not inconsistent with the other notices of the place as being situated on Lebanon. It was notorious for its temple of Venus, where all the abominations of an impure idolatry were practised to such a degree that Constantine destroyed it (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii, 55; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. i, 5). Near it was a lake celebrated for certain marvellous properties (Seneca, Quæst. Nat. iii, 25). It has been regarded as identical with the אֶפְחַק (q. v.) of Josh. xix, 30, and the Aphik of Judg. i, 31. Setzen first observed the probable coincidence of Aphaca with the present אֶפְחַק, a village of the region indicated, and containing ruins (Reisen, i, 245), which have since been described by Thomson (in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1838, p. 5). The lake has been identified with that now called Linnun, three hours distant (Burekhardt, Travels, p. 25), but Robinson thinks it is rather the neighboring spring (new ed. of Researches, iii, 607).

Apher'ema (Ἀφαιρημά in the Apocrypha) or Apherima (Ἀφαιρημά in Josephus), one of the three "governments" (πόλεις) added to Judea from Samaria (and Galilee, 1 Macc. x, 30) by Demetrius Soter, and confirmed by Nicanor (1 Macc. xi, 34; comp. Joseph. Ant. xiii, 4, 9; and see Ireland, Palest. p. 178). It is probably the same as the EPHRAIM of the New Test. (John xi, 54) and the EPHRAIM (q. v.) of the Old.

Aphar'sachites (Chald. Apharsakayē, אֶפְחַק־עַשְׁרִית; Sept. Ἀφάρσαχαιοί, Ezra v, 6; vi, 6) or Aphar'sathchites (Chald. Apharsathkayē, אֶפְחַק־עַשְׁרִית; Sept. Ἀφάρσαθαχαιοί, Ezra iv, 9), the name of the nation (or one of the nations) to which belonged one portion of the colonists whom the Assyrian king planted in Samaria, in place of the expatriated northern tribes, and who violently opposed the Jews in rebuilding Jerusalem. Schulthess (Paral. p. 362) identifies the "Apharsachites" with the Persian, or rather Median Paratacen of Greek geography (Strabo xi, 522; xv, 732; Herod. i, 101; Plin. xvi, 29), the A being prosthetic (as in Strabo, xv, 764, Mardi and Anardi are interchanged). They, together with the Apharsites (q. v.), for whose name this would seem only another form, appear to have been some foreign tribe of Eastern Asia, conquered by the Assyrians, and removed (according to well-known usage, see 2 Kings xviii, 32 sq.) to another region for security and political extension. Ewald (Isr. Gesch. iii, 375), following Gesenius, regards the name as only another for the Persians themselves, adopted out of hostility to the Jews (ib. p. 120), and in a three-fold form to enhance their own importance.

Aphar'sites (Chald. Apharsayē, אֶפְחַק־עַשְׁרִית; Sept. Ἀφάρσαιοί), the name of a tribe removed along with the Apharsachites (q. v.) to Samaria by the king of Assyria, and forming one of the opponents of the Jews after the captivity (Ezra iv, 9). Hiller (Onomast.) regards them as the Parhasii, a tribe of Eastern Media, and Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 143) thinks they are the Persians, to whose name theirs certainly bears a much greater affinity, especially in the prolonged form of the latter found in Dan. vi, 29 (Chald. Parsaya', אֶפְחַק־עַשְׁרִית). The presence of the proper name of the Persians in Ezra i, 1; iv, 3, must throw some doubt upon Gesenius's conjecture; but it is very possible that the local name of the tribe may have undergone alteration, while the official and general name was correctly given.

A'phek (Heb. Aphék', אֶפְחַק, prob. strength; with ך directive, Josh. xiii, 4; 1 Kings xx, 26; 1 Sam. xxix, 1; hence not to be confounded with אֶפְחַק־עַשְׁרִית, the name of at least three cities (Schwarz, Palest. p. 90).

1. (Sept. Ἀφάκα and Ἀφάκα.) A city of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix, 30), apparently near Phœnicia (Josh. xiii, 4), doubtless the same with אֶפְחַק (q. v.), which the Israelites were unable to capture from the Canaanites (Judg. i, 31). This has been thought (see J. D. Michaelis, Supplic. p. 114; Rosenmüller, Altherth. II, ii, 96; Gesenius, Thes. Heb. i, 140; Raumer, Palest. p. 120, and others) to be the same place with the Aphaca (Ἀφάκα) which Eusebius (Constant. iii, 55) and Sozomen (Hist. ii, 5) place in Lebanon, on the river Adonis (Zozim. i, 58), where there was a famous temple of Venus (Theophanes, Chron. p. 181). A village called Afka is still found in Lebanon, situated at the bottom of a valley, and probably marks the site of this latter place (Burekhardt, p. 25; Richter, p. 107). It is situated in the south-east bank of the great basin of Akurah, where are the sources of the Nahr Ibrahim, the Adonis of the ancients, and in an amphitheatre of verdant beauty. Here a fine fountain bursts forth in cascades from a cavern; and directly in front of these are the shapeless ruins of a large temple—that of the Venus of Aphaca, still containing massive columns of syenite granite (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1853, p. 150). (For the history and description of this place, see Robinson's Bibl. Res. new ed. iii, 604 sq.) But Ireland (Palest. p. 572) correctly observes that this place is situated too far north to have been included within the bounds of the twelve tribes (see Keil, Comment. on Josh. xix, 30). It is possible, nevertheless, that the Aphék of Josh. xiii, 4, is identical with this Aphaca in Lebanon (Schwarz, Palest. p. 63, 90), and this may, perhaps, be the Canaanitish royal city mentioned in Josh. xii, 18; but even this is doubtful, and it cannot have been the city in the tribe of Asher near Rehob (Josh. xix, 30; Judg. i, 31). From this last circumstance Schwarz thinks (Palest. p. 194) that the Aphék in question may be the En-Fit (which he says is also called En-Fik) three miles south-west of Banias (see Zimmermann's Map); but this is beyond the bounds of Asher, and the Rehob of that tribe is probably different from the Syrian city of the same name. See KIRKON. Kiepert (in his last Wandkarte von Palästina, 1857) gives this Aphék a conjectural location south-east of Acoho, apparently at Tell Kison (Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 103). See אֶפְחַק.

2. (Sept. Ἀφάκ.) A city in the tribe of Issachar, not far from Jezreel, where the Philistines were encamped before battles with the Israelites (1 Sam. iv,

1; xxix, 1; comp. xxviii, 4). Either this or the preceding, but most probably this, was the Aphék (Sept. Ἀφακά) mentioned in Josh. xii, 18, as a royal city of the Canaanites. Reland (Paläst. p. 572) and others (e. g. Schwarz, Paläst. p. 136) assume that the Aphék of 1 Sam. iv, 1, must have been in the tribe of Judah, because presumed to be near Mizpeh (comp. 1 Sam. vii, 12); but this is unnecessary. See ΑΠΗΕΚΑΗ. Josephus calls it Apheca (Ἀφεκά, Ant. v, 11, 1; viii, 14, 4). Eusebius (Onomast. Ἀφείρ) places it in the vicinity of Endor. Schwarz (Paläst. p. 168), confounding this Aphék with that of 1 Kings xx, 26, seeks it in the village of Fuknah, two miles east of En-Gannim; but this is beyond the territory of Issachar. Kiepert (Waukkarte von Paläst. 1856) locates it between the river Kishon and Shunem, apparently at El-Afulah, where the Crusaders placed it (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 286), or, rather, at the neighboring El-Fulch, a ruined village (Robinson's Researches, iii, 163, 176, 181).

3. (Sept. Ἀφεκά.) A town near which Benhadad was defeated by the Israelites (1 Kings xx, 26), evidently on the military road between Damascus and Palestine. It was walled (1 Kings xx, 30), and was apparently a common spot for engagements with Syria (2 Kings xiii, 17). The use of the word פְּלִינְיָה (Auth. Vers. "the plain") in 1 Kings xx, 25, fixes the situation of Aphék to have been in the level down-country east of the Jordan [see MISTON], and it seems to correspond to the Apheca of Eusebius (Onomast. Ἀφεκά), a large castle situated near Hippo, east of the Sea of Galilee. Josephus also (Ant. viii, 14, 4) calls it Apheca (Ἀφεκά) and it appears to have been in the tower of this place (πύργος Ἀφακῶν) that some of the insurgent Galileans threw themselves during the war with Cestius Gallus (Joseph. War, ii, 19, 1). The same place is probably mentioned by Burckhardt, Seetzen, and others, under the name of Fik or Afik (see Gesen. in Burckhardt, Reise, i, 539). It is a village on the top of a mountain, containing about two hundred families, who dwell in huts built out of the ruins of the ancient city, which appears to have been peculiarly situated so as to cause the ruin of the Syrian army by an earthquake (Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 52, 53).

Aphé'kah (Heb. אֶפְהַכָּה, פִּתְּסַן, fem. of Aphék; Sept. Ἀφακά v. r. Φακαίκα), a city in the mountain tract of Judah, mentioned between Beth-tappuah and Humtah (Josh. xv, 53). Raumer (Paläst. p. 170) and others confound this with the Aphék of Josh. xii, 18; but the Heb. accentuation of the names is different. Schwarz (Paläst. p. 106) finds it in the village Afik, 4 miles east of Jannath; but this position is entirely out of region of the associated names, which require a locality near Hebron, perhaps between that place and Tappuah (Keil, Comment. in loc.), possibly at the ruined site Sibta (Van de Velde, Map).

Apher'ema. Apherima. See ΑΠΗΕΡΕΜΑ.

Apher'ra (Ἀφρήρά), one of "the servants of Solomon" whose sons are said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 34); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 51) has no such name.

Aphí'ah (Heb. אֶפְהָיָא, פִּתְּסַן, blown upon; Sept. Ἀφίχ v. r. Ἀφίε), the father of Bechorath, a Benjamite, ancestor of King Saul (1 Sam. ix, 1). B.C. considerably ante 1033.

Á'phik (Heb. אֶפְחִיק, פִּתְּסַן, strong; Sept. Ἀφεκά), one of the cities from which the Asherites were unable to expel the Canaanites (Judg. i, 31); doubtless the same as the ΑΠΗΕΚ (q. v.) of Josh. xiii, 4; xix, 30.

Aph'rah (Heb. אֶפְרָה, פִּתְּסַן), another form of the name ΟΠΡΑΗ (Mic. i, 10). See ΒΕΤΙ-ΛΕ-ΑΦΡΑΗ.

Aph'ses, or, rather, ΠΙΖ'ΖΕΖ (Heb. Pitstset's, פִּתְּסַת, dispersion, with the art., פִּתְּסַת, hap-Pitset's; Sept. Ἀφείσι v. r. Ἀφείσι; Vulg. Aphses), the head of the eighteenth sacerdotal family of the twenty-four into which the priests were divided by David for the service of the Temple (1 Chron. xxiv, 15). B.C. 1014.

Aphthartodocetæ (from ἄφθαρτος, incorruptible, and δόξια, to think), a sect of Monophysites, who affirmed that the body of our Lord was rendered incorruptible in consequence of the divine nature being united with it. These were again divided into parties, who debated whether the body of Christ was created or not. Others of them asserted that our Lord's body was indeed corruptible, but that the divine nature prevented its actual corruption. The heresy spread widely in the 6th century, and, in 563, Emperor Justinian issued a decree, which, by favoring this doctrine, sought to reconcile the Monophysites with the orthodox Church.—Hase, Ch. Hist. § 115; Farrar, Ecol. Dict. s. v. See ΜΟΝΟΦΥΣΙΤΕΣ.

Apion (Ἀπίων, lean), a Greek grammarian, against whose attacks upon Jewish history Josephus wrote the treatise Contra Apionem. Some writers call him a son of Pleistonicos, while others more correctly state that this was only his surname, and that he was the son of Poseidonius (Gell. vi, 8; Seneca, Epist. 88; Euseb. Præp. Evang. x, 10). He was a native of Oasis, but used to say that he was born at Alexandria, where he studied under Apollonius and Diölymus (Suidas, s. v.; Josephus, Apion, ii, 3, etc.). He afterward settled at Rome, where he taught rhetoric during the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius. In the reign of Caligula he travelled in Greece. About A.D. 38, the inhabitants of Alexandria having sent complaints to the emperor against the Jews residing there, Apion headed the embassy that made the prosecution, the defence by the Jews being made by Philo. According to his enemy Josephus (Ap. ii, 13), he died of the effects of his dissolute mode of life. He appears to have enjoyed an extraordinary reputation for his extensive knowledge and versatility as an orator, but the ancients are unanimous in censuring his ostentatious vanity (Gell. v, 14; Pliny, Hist. Nat. prof. and xxx, 6; Josephus, Ap. ii, 12). Besides the treatise named above, of which we only know what Josephus relates, he wrote commentaries upon Homer, a history of Egypt, a eulogy of Alexander the Great, and several historical sketches, of all of which there remain only the fragmental stories about Androclus and the lion, and about the dolphin near Dicaearchia, preserved by Gellius.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

Apis (Ἄπις), the sacred bull of Memphis, worshipped by the ancient Egyptians, who regarded it as a symbol of Osiris, the god of the Nile, the husband of Isis, and the great divinity of Egypt (Pomp. Mela, i, 9; Elian, Hist. An. xi, 10; Lucian, De Sacrif. 15).

A sacred court or yard was set apart for the residence of Apis in the temple of Ptah at Memphis, where a numerous retinue of priests waited upon him, and sacrifices of red oxen were offered to him. His movements, choice of places, and changes of appetite, were religiously regarded as oracles. It was an understood law that Apis must not live longer than twenty-five years. When he attained this age he was secretly put to death, and buried by the priests in a sacred well, the popular belief being that he cast himself into the water. If, however, he died a natural death, his body was embalmed, and then solemnly interred in the temple of Serapis at Memphis. The burial-place of the Apis bulls has lately been discovered near Memphis (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, abridgm. i, 292). As soon as a suitable animal was found for a new Apis, having the required marks—black color with a white square on the brow, the figure of an eagle on the back, and a knot in the shape of a cantharus under the tongue—he was led in triumphal procession to Nilopolis at the time of the new moon, where he remained forty days, waited upon by nude women, and was afterward conveyed in a splendid vessel to Memphis. His Theophany, or day of discovery, and his birth-day were celebrated as high festivals of seven days' duration during the rise of the Nile (Herod. iii, 28). The worship of the golden calf by the Israelites in the wilderness, and also the employment of golden calves as symbols of the Deity by Jeroboam, have been very generally referred to the Egyptian worship of Apis.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Mythol. s. v. See CALF (GOLDEN).

Mummied Bull. From Abbott's Collection of Egyptian Antiquities.

Apoc'alypt, the Greek name of the Book of REVELATION (q. v.).

Apocalypse, KNIGHTS OF THE, an association founded in 1692 at Rome by Agostino Gobrino, for the purpose of defending the Catholic Church against the pope, whom it considered to be the Antichrist. The members always went out armed, and their chief was called Monarch of the Most Holy Trinity. The Inquisition suppressed the association in 1697.

Apocaritæ (q. d. Ἀποκαριταί, from ἀποκρίνω, to separate), a sect, in the third century, who asserted that the human soul is part of God, a portion of His substance joined to man. They are ranked among the Manicheans (q. v.).

Apocatastasis, a term used in Acts iii, 21, in the combination apocatastasis panton (ἀποκατάστασις πάντων), i. e. the restoration of all things. Origen, and, after him, many theologians and sects of ancient and modern times, put upon this passage the construction that at one time, evil itself, sin, condemnation, and Satan, would be reconciled through Christ with God. See RESTITUTION; RESTORATIONISTS.

Apocisarius (Ἀποκισάριος; Lat. Responsalis), literally a respondent, the title of a legate to negotiate concerning matters ecclesiastical. Justinian (Novell. 6) calls the Apocisariū those "who administer the affairs of the churches." At first they were bishops, but afterward priests or deacons were substituted, and the term seems to have been applied to any one acting as locum-tenens for a bishop (or even monastery) in ecclesiastical matters; but the name was principally applied to the pope's nuncio at Constantinople, who resided there to receive the pope's instructions and to report the answers of the emperor. This custom ended with the Iconoclast divisions. After Charlemagne had been crowned emperor, the popes conferred the name and the office of apocisarius upon the imperial arch-chaplain. Later the name apocisarius became a mere title, which the arch-chaplains of the palace bore, without being any longer representatives of the pope.—Suicer, Thes. p. 456; Collier, Hist. Dict. vol. iii, Suppl.; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 446.

Apoc'rypha (ἀποκρύφα, sc. βιβλία, hidden, mysterious), a term in theology, applied in various senses to denote certain books claiming a sacred character. The word occurs in the N. T. in its ordinary sense (Mark iv, 22). It is first found, as denoting a certain class of books, in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata, 13, c. 4, ἐκ τῶν ἀποκρίφων).

1. Definition and Application of the Term.—The primary meaning of ἀποκρίφως, "hidden, secret" (in which sense it is used in Hellenistic as well as classical Greek, see Eclus. xxiii, 19; Luke viii, 17; Col. ii, 13), seems, toward the close of the 2d century, to have been associated with the signification "spurious," and ultimately to have settled down into the latter. Tertullian (de Anim. c. 2) and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i, 19, 69; iii, 4, 29) apply it to the forged or spurious books which the heretics of their time circulated as authoritative. The first passage referred to from the Stromata, however, may be taken as an instance of the transition stage of the words. The followers of Prodicus, a Gnostic teacher, are said there to boast that they have βιβλιον ἀποκρίφον of Zoroaster. In Athanasius (Ep. Fest. ii, 58; Synopsis Sac. Scrip. ii, 154, ed. Colon. 1686), Augustine (Faust. xi, 2; Civ. Dei, xv, 23), Jerome (Ep. ad Latam. and Prolog. Gal.) the word is used uniformly with the bad meaning which had become attached to it. The writers of that period, however, do not seem to have seen clearly how the word had acquired this secondary sense; and hence we find conjectural explanations of its etymology. The remark of Athanasius (Synops. S. Scr. l. c.) that such books are ἀποκρίφως μᾶλλον ἢ ἀνεγνωσίως ἄζια is probably meant rather as a play upon the word than as giving its derivation. Later conjectures are (1), that given by the translators of the English Bible (ed. 1599, Pref. to Apoc.), "because they were wont to be read not openly and in common, but as it were in secret and apart;" (2), one, resting on a misapprehension of the meaning of a passage in Epiphanes (de Mens. ac Pcul. c. 4) that the books in question were so called because, not being in the Jewish canon, they were excluded ἀπὸ τῆς κρηπίδος from the ark in which the true Scriptures were preserved; (3), that the word ἀποκρύφα answers to the Heb. סְפָרִים סְתוּמִים, libri absconditi, by which the later Jews designated those books which, as of doubtful authority or not tending to edification, were not read publicly in the synagogues; (4), that it originates in the κρηπίς or secret books of the Greek mysteries. Of these it may be enough to say, that (1) is, as regards some of the books now bearing the name at variance with fact; that (2), as has been said, rests on a mistake; that (3) wants the support of direct evidence of the use of ἀποκρύφα as the translation for the Hebrew word; and that (4), though it approximates to what is probably the true history of the word, is so far only a conjecture.—Smith, s. v.

In the early ages of the Christian Church this term was frequently used to denote books of an uncertain or anonymous author, or of one who had written under an assumed name. Its application, however, in this sense is far from being distinct, as, strictly speaking, it would include canonical books whose authors were unknown or uncertain, or even pseudepigraphal. Origen, on Matt. xxii, had applied the term apocryphal in a similar way: "This passage is to be found in no canonical book" (regulari, for we have Origen's work only in the Latin translation by Rufinus), "but in the apocryphal book of Elias" (secretis Eliæ). And, "This is plain, that many examples have been adduced by the apostles and evangelists, and inserted in the New Testament, which we do not read in the canonical Scriptures which we possess, but which are found in the Apocrypha" (Origen, Prof. in Cantic.). So also Jerome, referring to the words (Eph. v, 14) "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead," observes that "the apostle cited this from hübden (reconditis) prophets, and such as seem to be apocryphal, as he has done in several other instances." Epiphanius thought that this term was applied to such books as were not placed in the Ark of the Covenant, but put away in some other place (see Suicer's Thesaurus for the true reading of the passage in this father). Under the term apocryphal have been included books of a religious character, which were in circulation among private Christians, but were not allowed to be read in the public assemblies; such as 3 and 4 Esdras, and 3 and 4 Maccabees. (See Stare, De apocryphor. appellatione, Greifsw. 1766.)

In regard to the New Testament, the term has been usually applied to books invented by heretics to favor their views, or by Catholics under fictitious signatures. Of this description were many spurious or apocryphal gospels (see below). It is probably in reference to such that Basil, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Jerome gave cautions against the reading of apocryphal books; although it is possible, from the context, that the last named father alludes to the books which were also called ecclesiastical, and afterward deuterocanonical. The following passage from his epistle to Læta, on the education of her daughter, will serve to illustrate this part of our subject: "All apocryphal books should be avoided; but if she ever wishes to read them, not to establish the truth of doctrines, but with a reverential feeling for the truths they signify, she should be told that they are not the works of the authors by whose names they are distinguished, that they contain much that is faulty, and that it is a task requiring great prudence to find gold in the midst of clay." And to the same effect Philastrinus: "Among whom are the Manichees, Gnostics [etc.], who, having some apocryphal books under the apostles' names (i. e. some separate Acts), are accustomed to despise the canonical Scriptures; but these secret Scriptures—that is, apocryphal—though they ought to be read by the perfect for their morals, ought not to be read by all, as ignorant heretics have added and taken away what they wished." He then proceeds to say that the books to which he refers are the Acts of Andrew, written by "the disciples who were his followers," etc.

In the Bibliothèque Sacerde, by the Dominicans Richard and Giraud (Paris, 1822), the term is defined to signify (1.) anonymous or pseudepigraphal books; (2.) those which are not publicly read, although they may be read with edification in private; (3.) those which do not pass for authentic and of divine authority, although they pass for being composed by a sacred author or an apostle, as the Epistle of Barnabas; and (4.) dangerous books composed by ancient heretics to favor their opinions. They also apply the name "to books which, after having been contested, are put into the canon by consent of the churches, as Tobit, etc." Jahn applies it, in its most strict sense, and that which it has borne since the fourth century, to books which, from their inscription, or the author's name, or the subject, might easily be taken for inspired books, but are not so in reality. It has also been applied by Jerome to certain books not found in the Hebrew canon, but yet publicly read from time immemorial in the Christian Church for edification, although not considered of authority in controversies of faith. These were also termed ecclesiastical books, and have been denominated, for distinction's sake, the deuterocanonical books, inasmuch as they were not in the original or Hebrew canon. In this sense they are called by some the Antilegomena of the Old Testament. "The uncanonical books," says Athanasius, or the author of the Synopsis, "are divided into antilegomena and apocrypha."—Kitto, s. v. See ANTELEGOMENA.

Eventually, in the history of the early Church, the great number of pseudonymous productions palmed off upon the unwary as at once sacred and secret, under the great names in Jewish or Christian history, brought this entire class of works into disrepute. Those whose faith rested on the teaching of the Christian Church, and who looked to the O. T. Scriptures either in the Hebrew or the Sept. collection, were not slow to perceive that these productions were destitute of all authority. They applied in scorn what had been used as a title of honor. The secret books (libri secretiores, Orig., Comm. in Matt., ed. Lomm. iv, 237) were rejected as spurious. The word apocryphal was soon degraded to the position from which it has never since risen. So far as books like the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs and the Assumption of Moses were concerned, the task of discrimination was comparatively easy, but it became more difficult when the question affected the books which were found in the Sept. translation of the Old Testament, and recognised by the Hellenistic Jews; but were not in the Hebrew text or in the canon acknowledged by the Jews of Palestine. The history of this difficulty, and of the manner in which it affected the reception of particular books, belong rather to the subject of CANON than to that of the present article, but the following facts may be stated as bearing on the application of the word: (1.) The teachers of the Greek and Latin Churches, accustomed to the use of the Septuagint, or versions resting on the same basis, were naturally led to quote freely and reverently from all the books which were incorporated into it. In Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, we find citations from the books of the present Apocrypha, as "Scripture," "divine Scripture," "prophecy." They are very far from applying the term ἀπόκρυφος to these writings. If they are conscious of the difference between them and the other books of the O. T., it is only so far as to lead them (comp. Athan. Synops. S. Scr. l. c.) to place the former in the list of οἱ κανονίζόμενα, ἀντιλεγόμενα, books which were of more use for the ethical instruction of catechumens than for the edification of mature Christians. Augustine, in like manner, applies the word "Apocrypha" only to the spurious books with false titles which were in circulation among heretics, admitting the others, though with some qualifications, under the title of canonical (de doct. Chr. ii, 8). (2.) Wherever, on the other hand, any teacher came into contact with the feelings that prevailed among the Christians of Palestine, there the influence of the rigorous limitation of the old Hebrew canon is at once conspicuous. This is seen in its bearing on the history of the canon in the list given by Melito, bishop of Sardis (Euseb. H. E. iv, 26), and obtained by him from Palestine. Of its effects on the application of the word, the writings of Cyril of Jerusalem and Jerome give abundant instances. The former (Catech. iv, 33) gives the canonical list of the 22 books of the O. T. Scriptures, and rejects the introduction of all "apocryphal" writings. The latter in his Epistle to Læta warns the Christian mother in educating her daughter against "omnia apocrypha." The Prologus Galeatus shows that he did not shrink from including under that title the books which formed part of the Septuagint, and were held in honor in the Alexandrian and Latin Churches. In dealing with the several books he discusses each on its own merits, admiring some, speaking unhesitatingly of the "dreams," "fables" of others. (3.) The teaching of Jerome influenced, though not decidedly, the language of the Western Church. The old spurious heretical writings, the "Apocrypha" of Tertullian and Clement, fell more and more into the background, and were almost utterly forgotten. The doubtful books of the Old Testament were used publicly in the service of the Church, quoted frequently with reverence as Scripture, sometimes, however, with doubts or limitations as to the authority of individual books according to the knowledge or critical discernment of this or that writer (comp. Bp. Cosins's Scholastic History of the Canon). During this period the term by which they were commonly described was not apocryphal but "ecclesiastical." So they had been described by Rufinus (Ep. in Synb. Apost. p. 26), who practically recognised the distinction drawn by Jerome, though he would not apply the more opprobrious epithet to books which were held in honor. (4.) It was reserved for the age of the Reformation to stamp the word Apocrypha with its present signification. The two views which had hitherto existed together, side by side, concerning which the Church had pronounced no authoritative decision, stood out in sharper contrast. The Council of Trent closed the question which had been left open, and deprived its theologians of the liberty they had hitherto enjoyed, by extending the Canon of Scripture so as to include all the hitherto doubtful or deuterocanonical books, with the exception of the two books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh, the evidence against which seemed too strong to be resisted (Sess. IV de Can. Script.). In accordance with this decree, the editions of the Vulgate published by authority contained the books which the Council had pronounced canonical, as standing on the same footing as those which had never been questioned, while the three which had been rejected were printed commonly in smaller type and stood after the New Testament. The Reformers of Germany and England, on the other hand, influenced in part by the revival of the study of Hebrew and the consequent recognition of the authority of the Hebrew Canon, and subsequently by the reaction against this stretch of authority, maintained the opinion of Jerome and pushed it to its legitimate results. The principle which had been asserted by Carlstadt dogmatically in his "de Canonis Scripturis libellus" (1520) was acted on by Luther. He spoke of individual books among those in question with a freedom as great as that of Jerome, judging each on its own merits, praising Tobit as a "pleasant comedy," and the Prayer of Manasseh as a "good model for penitents," and rejecting the two books of Esdras as containing worthless fables. The example of collecting the doubtful books into a separate group had been set in the Strasburg edition of the Septuagint, 1526. In Luther's complete edition of the German Bible, accordingly (1534), the books (Judith, Wisdom, Tobias, Sirach, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Additions to Esther and Daniel, and the Prayer of Manasseh) were grouped together under the general title of "Apocrypha, i. e. Books which are not of like worth with Holy Scripture, yet are good and useful to be read." In the history of the English Church, Wickliff showed himself in this as in other points the forerunner of the Reformation, and applied the term Apocrypha to all but the "twenty-five" Canonical Books of the Old Testament. The judgment of Jerome was formally asserted in the sixth Article. The disputed books were collected and described in the same way in the printed English Bible of 1539 (Cranmer's), and since then there has been no fluctuation as to the application of the word (Smith). See DEUTEROCANONICAL.

II. Biblical Apocrypha.—The collection of books to which this term is popularly applied includes the following. The order given is that in which they stand in the English version.

- I. 1 Esdras.
- II. 2 Esdras.
- III. Tobit.
- IV. Judith.
- V. The rest of the chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee.
- VI. The Wisdom of Solomon.
- VII. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticks.
- VIII. Baruch.
- IX. The Song of the Three Holy Children.
- X. The History of Susanna.
- XI. The History of the Destruction of Bel and the Dragon.
- XII. The Prayer of Manasseh, King of Judah.
- XIII. 1 Maccabees.
- XIV. 2 Maccabees.

The separate books of this collection are treated of in distinct articles. Their relation to the canonical books of the Old Testament is discussed under CANON. We propose here to consider only the history and character of the collection as a whole in its relation to Jewish literature.

Whatever questions may be at issue as to the authority of these books, they have in any case an interest, of which no controversy can deprive them, as connected with the literature, and therefore with the history, of the Jews. They represent the period of transition and decay which followed on the return from Babylon, when the prophets, who were then the teachers of the people, had passed away, and the age of scribes succeeded. Uncertain as may be the dates of individual books, few, if any, can be thrown farther back than the beginning of the third century B.C. The latest, the 2d Book of Esdras, is probably not later than 30 B.C., 2 Esdr. vii, 28 being a subsequent interpolation. The alterations of the Jewish character, the different phases which Judaism presented in Palestine and Alexandria, the good and the evil which were called forth by contact with idolatry in Egypt, and by the struggle against it in Syria, all these present themselves to the reader of the Apocrypha with greater or less distinctness. In the midst of the diversities which we might naturally expect to find in books written by different authors, in different countries, and at considerable intervals of time, it is possible to discern some characteristics which belong to the entire collection. (We quote from Smith, s. v.)

1. The absence of the prophetic element. From first to last the books bear testimony to the assertion of Josephus (Ap. i, 8), that the ἀποβίη ἑταρολογίη of prophets had been broken after the close of the O. T. canon. No one speaks because the word of the Lord had come to him. Sometimes there is a direct confession that the gift of prophecy had departed (1 Macc. ix, 27), or the utterance of a hope that it might one day return (ibid. iv, 46; xiv, 41). Sometimes a teacher asserts in words the perpetuity of the gift (Wisd. vii, 27), and shows in the act of asserting it how different the illumination which he had received was from that bestowed on the prophets of the canonical books. When a writer simulates the prophetic character, he repeats with slight modifications the language of the older prophets, as in Baruch, or makes a mere prediction the text of a dissertation, as in the Epistle of Jeremy, or plays arbitrarily with combinations of dreams and symbols, as in 2 Esdras. Strange and perplexing as the last-named book is, whatever there is in it of genuine feeling indicates a mind not at ease with itself, distracted with its own sufferings and with the problems of the universe, and it is accordingly very far removed from the utterance of a man who speaks as a messenger from God.

2. Connected with this is the almost total disappearance of the power which had shown itself in the poetry of the Old Testament. The Song of the Three Children lays claim to the character of a psalm, and is probably a translation from some liturgical hymn; but, with this exception, the form of poetry is altogether absent. So far as the writers have come under the influence of Greek cultivation, they catch the taste for rhetorical ornament which characterized the literature of Alexandria. Fictitious speeches become almost indispensable additions to the narrative of a historian, and the story of a martyr is not complete unless (as in the later Acta Martyrum of Christian traditions) the sufferer declaims in set terms against the persecutors (Song of the Three Child., 3-22; 2 Macc. vi, vii).

3. The appearance, as part of the current literature of the time, of works of fiction, resting or purporting to rest on a historical foundation. It is possible that this development of the national genius may have been, in part, the result of the Captivity. The Jewish exiles brought with them the reputation of excelling in minstrelsy, and were called on to sing the "songs of Zion" (Psa. cxxxvii). The trial of skill between the three young men in 1 Esd. iii, iv, implies a traditional belief that those who were promoted to places of honor under the Persian kings were conspicuous for gifts of a somewhat similar character. The transition from this to the practice of story-telling was, with the Jews, as afterward with the Arabs, easy and natural enough. The period of the Captivity, with its strange adventures, and the remoteness of the scenes connected with it, offered a wide and attractive field to the imagination of such narrators. Sometimes, as in Bel and the Dragon, the motive of such stories would be the love of the marvellous mingling itself with the feeling of scorn with which the Jew looked on the idolater. In other cases, as in Tobit and Susanna, the story would gain popularity from its ethical tendencies. The singular variations in the text of the former book indicate at once the extent of its circulation and the liberties taken by successive editors. In the narrative of Judith, again, there is probably something more than the interest attaching to the history of the past. There is indeed too little evidence of the truth of the narrative for us to look on it as history at all, and it takes its place in the region of historical romance, written with a political motive. Under the guise of the old Assyrian enemies of Israel the writer is covertly attacking the Syrian invaders, against whom his countrymen were contending, stirring them up, by a story of imagined or traditional heroism, to follow the example of Judith, as she had followed that of Jaël (Ewald, Gesch. Israels, iv, 541). The development of this form of literature is, of course, compatible with a high degree of excellence, but it is true of it at all times, and was especially true of the literature of the ancient world, that it belongs rather to its later and feebler period. It is a special sign of decay in honesty and discernment when such writings are passed off and accepted as belonging to actual history.

4. The free exercise of the imagination within the domain of history led to the growth of a purely legendary literature. The full development of this was indeed reserved for a yet later period. The books of the Apocrypha occupy a middle place between those of the Old Testament in their simplicity and truthfulness and the wild extravagances of the Talmud. As it is, however, we find in them the germs of some of the fabulous traditions which were influencing the minds of the Jews at the time of our Lord's ministry, and have since in some instances incorporated themselves more or less with the popular belief of Christendom. So in 2 Macc. i, ii, we meet with the statements that at the time of the captivity the priests had concealed the sacred fire, and that it was miraculously renewed—that Jeremiah had gone, accompanied by the tabernacle and the ark, "to the mountain where Moses climbed up to see the heritage of God," and had there concealed them in a cave together with the altar of incense. The apparition of the prophet at the close of the same book (xv, 15), as giving to Judas Maccabæus the sword with which, as a "gift from God," he was to "wound the adversaries," shows how prominent a place was occupied by Jeremiah in the traditions and hopes of the people, and prepares us to understand the rumors which followed on our Lord's teaching and working that "Jeremias or one of the prophets" had appeared again (Matt. xvi, 14). So again in 2 Esd. xiii, 40-47, we find the legend of the entire disappearance of the Ten Tribes, which, in spite of direct and indirect testimony on the other side, has given occasion even in our own time to so many wild conjectures. In chap. xiv of the same book we recognize (as has been pointed out already) the tendency to set a higher value on books of an esoteric knowledge than on those in the Hebrew canon; but it deserves notice that this is also another form of the tradition that Ezra dictated from a supernaturally-inspired memory the sacred books which, according to that tradition, had been lost, and that both fables are exaggerations of the part actually taken by him and by "the men of the Great Synagogue" in the work of collecting and arranging them. So also the rhetorical narrative of the Exodus in Wisd. xvi-xix indicates the existence of a traditional, half-legendary history side by side with the canonical. It would seem, indeed, as if the life of Moses had appeared with many different embellishments. The form in which that life appears in Josephus, the facts mentioned in St. Stephen's speech and not found in the Pentateuch, the allusions to Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. iii, 8), to the disputes between Michael and the devil (Jude 9), to the "rock that followed" the Israelites (1 Cor. x, 4), all bear testimony to the wide-spread popularity of this semi-apocryphal history. See EXODU (BOOK OF).

5. As the most marked characteristic of the collection as a whole and of the period to which it belongs, there is the tendency to pass off supposititious books under the cover of illustrious names. The books of *Esdra*s, the additions to Daniel, the letters of Baruch and Jeremiah, and the Wisdom of Solomon, are obviously of this character. It is difficult, perhaps, for us to measure in each instance the degree in which the writers of such books were guilty of actual frauds. In a book like the Wisdom of Solomon, for example, the form may have been adopted as a means of gaining attention by which no one was likely to be deceived, and, as such, it does not go beyond the limits of legitimate personation. The fiction in this case need not diminish our admiration and reverence for the book any more than it would destroy the authority of Ecclesiastes were we to come to the conclusion, from internal or other evidence, that it belonged to a later age than that of Solomon. The habit, however, of writing books under fictitious names is, as the later Jewish history shows, a very dangerous one. The practice becomes almost a trade. Each such work creates a new demand, to be met in its turn by a fresh supply, and thus the prevalence of an apocryphal literature becomes a sure sign of want of truthfulness on one side, and want of discernment on the other.

6. The absence of honesty, and of the power to distinguish truth from falsehood, shows itself in a yet more serious form in the insertion of formal documents purporting to be authentic, but in reality failing altogether to establish any claim to that title. This is obviously the case with the decree of Artaxerxes in Esth. xvi. The letters with which 2 Macc. opens from the Jews at Jerusalem betray their true character by their historical inaccuracy. We can hardly accept as genuine the letter in which the king of the Lacedæmonians (1 Macc. xii, 20, 21) writes to Onias that "the Lacedæmonians and Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham." The letters in 2 Macc. ix and xi, on the other hand, might be authentic so far as their contents go, but the recklessness with which such documents are inserted as embellishments and make-weights throws doubt in a greater or less degree on all of them.

7. The loss of the simplicity and accuracy which characterize the history of the Old Testament is shown also in the errors and anachronisms in which these books abound. Thus, to take a few of the most striking instances, Haman is made a Macedonian, and the purpose of his plot is to transfer the kingdom from the Persians to the Macedonians (Esth. xvi, 10); two contradictory statements are given in the same book of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. i, 15-17; ix, 5-29); Nabuchodonosor is made to dwell at Nineveh as the king of the Assyrians (Judith i, 1).

8. In their relation to the religious and ethical development of Judaism during the period which these books embrace, we find (1.) the influences of the struggle against idolatry under Antiochus, as shown partly in the revival of the old heroic spirit, and in the record of the deeds which it called forth, as in Maccabees, partly again in the tendency of a narrative like Judith, and the protests against idol-worship in Baruch and Wisdom. (2.) The growing hostility of the Jews toward the Samaritans is shown by the confession of the Son of Sirach (Ecclus. i, 25, 26). (3.) The teaching of Tobit illustrates the prominence then and afterward assigned to alms-giving among the duties of a holy life (Tob. iv, 7-11; xii, 9). The classification of the three elements of such a life, prayer, fasting, alms, in xii, 8, illustrates the traditional ethical teaching of the Scribes, which was at once recognised and purified from the errors that had been connected with it in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vi, 1-18). (4.) The same book indicates also the growing belief in the individual guardianship of angels and the germs of a grotesque daemonology, resting in part on the more mysterious phenomena of man's spiritual nature, like the cases of demonic possession in the Gospels, but associating itself only too easily with all the frauds and superstitions of vagabond exorcists. (5.) The great Alexandrian book of the collection, the Wisdom of Solomon, breathes, as we might expect, a strain of higher mood; and though there is absolutely no ground for the patristic tradition that it was written by Philo, the conjecture that it might have been was not without a plausibility which might well commend itself to men like Basil and Jerome. The personification of Wisdom as "the unspotted mirror of the power of God and the image of his goodness" (vii, 26), as the universal teacher of all "holy souls" in "all ages" (vii, 27), as guiding and ruling God's people, approaches the teaching of Philo, and foreshadows that of the Apostle John as to the manifestation of the unseen God through the medium of the Logos and the office of that divine Word as the light that lighteth every man. In relation again to the symbolic character of the Temple as "a resemblance of the holy tabernacle" which God "has prepared from the beginning" (ix, 8), the language of this book connects itself at once with that of Philo and with the teaching of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. But that which is the great characteristic of the book, as of the school from which it emanated, is the writer's apprehension of God's kingdom and the blessings connected with it as eternal, and so as independent of men's conceptions of time. Thus chapters i, ii, contain the strong protest of a righteous man against the materialism which then, in the form of a sensual selfishness, as afterward in the developed system of the Sadducees, was corrupting the old faith of Israel. Against this he asserts that the "souls of the righteous are in the hands of God" (iii, 1); that the blessings which the popular belief connected with length of days were not to be measured by the duration of the years, seeing that "wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age." (6.) In regard to another truth also this book was in advance of the popular belief of the Jews of Palestine. In the midst of its strong protests against idolatry, there is the fullest recognition of God's universal love (xi, 23-26), of the truth that His power is but the instrument of His righteousness (xii, 16), of the difference between those who are the "less to be blamed" as "seeking God and desirous to find Him" (xiii, 6), and the victims of a darker and more debasing idolatry. Here also the unknown writer of the Wisdom of Solomon seems to prepare the way for the higher and wider teaching of the New Testament. See Logos.

III. Spurious and Pseudepigraphal Books, as distinct from Antilegomena or Ecclesiastical.—Among this class are doubtless to be considered the 3d and 4th books of Esdras; and it is no doubt in reference to these that, in his letter to Vigilantius, Athanasius speaks of a work of Esdras which he says that he had never even read. Of the same character are also the book of Enoch, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Assumption of Moses, etc.; which, as well as 3 and 4 Esdras, being by many considered as the fictions of Christians of the second and third centuries, it is doubtful whether they ought to be classed in the Apocrypha of the Old or of the New Testament. Origen, however, believed the New Testament to have contained citations from books of this kind written before the times of the apostles, as is evident from his reference to such in his preface to the Canticles. Then, in his Letter to Apianus, he observes that there were many things kept from the knowledge of the public, but which were preserved in the hidden or apocryphal books, to which he refers the passage (Heb. xi, 37), "They were sawn asunder." Origen probably alludes here to that description of books which the Jews called genuzim, גִּנְזִים, a word of the same signification with apocrypha, and applied to books laid aside, or not permitted to be publicly read or considered, even when divinely inspired, not fit for indiscriminate circulation: among the latter were the first chapter of Genesis, the Song of Solomon, and our last eight chapters of the prophet Ezekiel. The books which we have here enumerated, such as the book of Enoch, etc., which were all known to the ancient fathers, have descended to our times; and, although incontestably spurious, are of considerable value from their antiquity, as throwing light upon the religious and theological opinions of the first centuries. The most curious are the 3d and 4th books of Esdras, and the book of Enoch, which has been but recently discovered, and has acquired peculiar interest from its containing the passage cited by the apostle Jude. See Esocn. Nor are the apocryphal books of the New Testament destitute of interest. Although the spurious Acts extant have no longer any defenders of their genuineness, they are not without their value to the Biblical student, and have been applied with success to illustrate the style and language of the genuine books, to which they bear a close analogy. The American translator of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History terms them "harmless and ingenious fictions, intended either to gratify the fancy or to silence the enemies of Christianity."

Some of the apocryphal books have not been without their defenders in modern times. The Apostolical Canons and Constitutions, and the various Liturgies ascribed to St. Peter, St. Mark, etc., and published by Fabricius in his Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, were considered by the learned and eccentric William Whiston, and the no less learned Grabe, to be of equal authority with any of the confessedly genuine apostolic compositions (see Whiston's Primitive Christianity and Grabe's Spicilegium). They are, however, regarded by most as originally not of an earlier date than the second century, and as containing interpolations which betray the fourth or fifth; they can, therefore, only be considered as evidence of the practice of the Church at the period when they were written. They have generally been appealed to by the learned as having preserved the traditions of the age immediately succeeding the apostolic; and, from the remarkable coincidence which is observable in the most essential parts of the so-called Apostolical Liturgies, it is by no means improbable that, notwithstanding their interpolations, they contain the leading portions of the most ancient Christian forms of worship. Most of the apocryphal Gospels and Acts noticed by the fathers, and condemned in the catalogue of Gelasius, which are generally thought to have been the fictions of heretics in the second century, have long since fallen into oblivion. Of those which remain, although some have been considered by learned men as genuine works of the apostolic age, yet the greater part are universally rejected as spurious, and as written in the second and third centuries. A few are, with great appearance of probability, assigned to Leucius Clarinus, supposed to be the same with Leontius and Seleucus, who was notorious for similar forgeries at the end of the third century. The authorship of the Epistle of Barnabas (q. v.) is still a matter of dispute; and there appears but too much reason to believe that there existed grounds for the charge made by Celsus against the early Christians, that they had interpolated or forged the ancient Sibylline Oracles. In the letter of Pope Innocent I to St. Exuper, bishop of Toulouse, written about the year 405, after giving a catalogue of the books forming the canon of Scripture (which includes five books of Solomon, Tobit, and two books of Maccabees), he observes: "But the others, which are written under the name of Matthias, or of James the Less, or those which were written by one Leucius under the name of Peter and John, or those under the name of Andrew by Xenocheris and Leonidas the philosopher, or under the name of Thomas; or if there be any others, you must know that they are not only to be rejected, but condemned." These sentiments were afterward confirmed by the Roman Council of seventy bishops, held under Pope Gelasius in 494, in the acts of which there is a long list of apocryphal Gospels and Acts, the greater part of which are supposed to have perished. The acts of this council, however, are not generally considered to be genuine. But, whatever authority is to be ascribed to these documents, it cannot be denied that the early Church evinced a high degree of discrimination in the difficult task of distinguishing the genuine from the spurious books, as has been well observed by Jones (New and Full Method, i, 15) and Baxter (Sinai's Rest, p. 2).—KITTO. See CANON.

The following is a list of the genuine writings mentioned in the OLD TEST., but now lost, or generally thought so to be:

- The "Prophecy of Enoch" (Iude 14). But see ENOCH.
- The "Book of the Wars of the Lord" (Num. xxxi, 14).
- The "Book of the Just" (Josh. x, 13; 2 Sam. i, 18). See JASHER.
- The "Book of the Order of the Kingdom," or of the Royal Administration, written by Samuel (1 Sam. x, 25). See KING.
- The "Books of NATHAN and GAD" concerning King David (1 Chron. xxix, 29).
- The "Books of NATHAN, AHIJAH, and IUDAH" concerning King Solomon (2 Chron. ix, 29).
- "SOLOMON'S Parables, Songs, and Treatises on Natural History" (1 Kings iv, 32 &c.). But see PROVERBS; CANTICLES; ECCLESIASTAS.
- The "Book of the Acts of SOLOMON" (1 Kings xi, 41).
- The "Book of SERAIAH" concerning King Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii, 15).
- The "Book of JEHU" concerning Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx, 34).
- The "Book of ISMAEL" concerning King Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 22). But see ISMAEL.
- The "Words of the Seers" to King Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxi, 2).
- The "Book of Lamentations" over King Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv, 25). But see LAMENTATIONS.
- The "Volume of JEREMIAH" burned by Jehudi (Jer. xxxvi, 2, 6, 23). But see JEREMIAH.
- The "Chronicle of the Kings of Judah" (1 Kings xiv, 29; xv, 7). But see CHRONICLES.
- The "Chronicle of the Kings of Israel" (1 Kings xiv, 29). But see CHRONICLES.

The following is a list of pseudepigraphal books relating to the Old Test., still extant (exclusive of those contained in the definitively so called "Apocrypha"), with the language in which ancient copies have been discovered. See each title, or professed author here cited, under its proper head in the body of this Cyclopaedia.

- The "History of ANTOCIUS" Epiphanes (Heb.). This appears to be a garbled Hebrew version of the accounts of that tyrant in the books of the Maccabees (see Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigr. l. 7, t. i, 1165 sq., where a Latin translation is given of it).
- The "History of ASENATH," Joseph's Wife (Lat. Given by Fabricius, ib. i, p. 174 sq.).
- The "Epistle of BARUCH" (Lat. In Fabricius, ib. ii, 147 sq.).
- The "Book of ELIAS" the Prophet (see ib. i, 1670).
- The "Book of ENOCH" (Ethiopic).
- The "Third [Engl. Pfist] Book of ESDRAS" (Gr. and Lat.).
- The "Fourth [Second] Book of ESDRAS" (Lat., Arab., and Heb.).
- The "Ascension of ISMAEL" (Ethiopic).
- The "Book of JASHER" (Heb.).
- The "Book of JEREMIAH" or Creation (Heb.).
- The "Third Book of MACCABEES" (Gr.).
- The "Fourth Book of MACCABEES" (Gr.).
- The "Fifth Book of MACCABEES" (Ar. and Syr.).
- The "Assumption of MOSES" (see Fabricius, i, 825).
- The "Preaching of NOAH" to the Antediluvians, according to the Sibylline Oracles (Fabricius, i, 250).
- The "Testament of the Twelve PATRIARCHS" (Gr. Given by Fabricius, with a Latin translation, Codex Pseudepigr. l. 7, t. i, 519 sq.).
- The "Psalter of SOLOMON" (Gr. Given in like manner, ib. i, 917 sq.).
- The "Book of ZONAR" or Light (Heb.).

The following is a list of all the apocryphal pieces relating to the NEW TEST., not now extant, mentioned by writers in the first four centuries after Christ, with the several writings in which they are (last) cited or noticed. See each name in its alphabetical place.

- (1) The "Acts of ANDREW" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii, 25; Philastr. Heres. 87; Epiphani. Heres. xviii, 1; Isid. i, 1311; 2, Gelasius, in Decret. ap. Concil. Saenct. iv, 1260). But see ANDREW.
- (2) "Books" under the name of ANDREW (Augustine, contr. Adversar. Lea. et Prophet. i, 20; Innocent I, Epist. 3, ad Exuper. Tholos. Epist. 7).
- (3) The "Gospel of ANDREW" (Gelas. in Decret.).
- A "Gospel" under the name of APPELLES (Jerome, Pref. in Comment. in Matt.).
- The "Gospel according to the Twelve APOSTLES" (Origen, Hom. l. in Luc. i, 1; Ambrose, Comment. in Luc. i, 1; Jerome, Pref. in Comment. in Matt.).
- The "Gospel of BARNAJAS" (Gelas. in Decret.).
- (1) The "Gospel of BARTHOLOMEW" (Jerome, Catal. Script. Eccl. in Panten.; Pref. in Comment. in Matt.; Gelas. in Decret.).
- (2) The "Writings of BARTHOLOMEW the Apostle" (Dionys. the Areopagite, De Theol. Myst. i, 1).
- The "Gospel of BASILIDES" (Origen, in Luc. i, 1; Ambrose, in Luc. i, 1; Jerome, Pref. in Comm. in Matt.).
- (1) The "Gospel of CERNISIUS" (Epiphani. Heres. ii, 7).
- (2) The "Revelation of CERNISIUS" (Claus, Presb. Rom., lib. Disput. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii, 28).
- (1) Some "Books" under the name of CHRIST (Augustine, De Consens. Evang. i, 3)
- (2) An "Epistle of CHRIST" produced by the Manichæans (Augustine, contr. Faust. xxviii, 4).
- (3) An "Epistle of CHRIST to Peter and Paul" (Augustine, de Consens. Evang. i, 9, 10).
- (4) A "Hymn of CHRIST'S" taught to his disciples (Episcop. ad Crete. Epist.).
- (1) The "Acts of the Apostles" made use of by the EMONITES (Epiphani. Heres. xxx, 16).

Apollinarians, followers of Apollinaris, or Apollinaris (q. v.).

Apollinaris or Δpollinaris, CLAUDIUS, bishop of Hieropolis in Phrygia, in the second century, an apologist (q. v.) of Christianity, and an opponent of Montanism (q. v.). He was well acquainted with the classic literature of the Greeks, and a prolific writer; but his works, which are mentioned by Eusebius and Photius, are lost; only two fragments of his work on the Passover are extant.—Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv, 27; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vii, 160; Tillemont, Mémoires, t. i, pt. ii.

Apollinaris or Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, the son of Apollinaris the elder, who taught first at Berytus, in Phœnicia, and afterward at Laodicea, where he became a presbyter and married. Both father and son were on terms of intimacy with Epiphanius and Libanius, the Sophists. The bishop of Laodicea, Theolotus, having warned them to renounce this friendship, they were excommunicated, but afterward, upon expressing penitence, they were restored. Julian the Apostate forbade the Christians to read the works of any heathen author, upon which the two Apollinarii (father and son) composed many works in imitation of the style of Homer and other ancient Greek works. Among others, they turned the books of Moses into heroic verse; indeed, Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. v, 18) says, the whole of the Old Testament as far as the account of Saul; they also composed dramatic pieces on scriptural subjects, after the style of Menander (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. iii, 16). The younger Apollinaris is mentioned (in Athanas. Ep. ad Antiochenos, tom. i; Opp. ed. Montfaucon, ii, 776) as orthodox bishop of Laodicea A. D. 362, while Pelagius was bishop of the Arians in that city. He was esteemed by Athanasius, Basil, and other great men of that age, who continued to speak respectfully of his merits even after he was suspected of heresy. Apollinaris distinguished himself especially by polemical and exegetical writings; for instance, by his work on Truth, against the Emperor Julian. He also wrote thirty books against Porphyry, against the Manichæans, Arians, Marcellus, and others. Jerome himself, during his residence at Antioch, A. D. 373 and 374, enjoyed the instructions of Apollinaris, then bishop of Laodicea. The interpretations of Apollinaris, quoted in the commentaries of Jerome, were peculiarly valuable in those days on account of his knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. Basil mentions a work of Apollinaris on the Holy Ghost. In the year 1552 was published at Paris a Metaphrasis Psalmorum of Apollinaris, and re-edited by Sylburg at Heidelberg in 1596; this, and a tragedy on "Christ suffering," in the works of Gregory of Nazianzus, were ascribed to Apollinaris; but it is difficult to say what share in these works belongs to the father, and what to the son.

Late in life, Apollinaris, who had strenuously defended the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity in his youth, himself incurred the reproach of heresy because he taught that the divine Logos occupied in the person of Christ the place of the human rational soul. "The greatest difficulty in the doctrine of the Trinity appeared to him to consist in the union of the divine person of the Logos with a perfect human person. Two perfect wholes could not be united in one whole (Gregory, Antirr. cap. xxxix, p. 323; εὶ ἀνθρώπου τελευτήσιν ἡ ζωὴ τὸ μὴ εἶναι ἀνθρώπου). Setting out from Anthropology, he asserted that the essence of the rational soul consists in its self-determination. If this characteristic were retained in connection with the divine nature, there could be no true personal union, but only such a divine influence on Jesus as might be experienced by any other man. On the other hand, if the soul forfeited this characteristic, it would renounce its essential peculiarity (Ibid. p. 245; φθορὰ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ζῶον τὸ μὴ εἶναι ἀνθρώπου οὐ φθείρεται ἢ ἡ φύσις ὑπὸ τοῦ ποιῆσαντος αὐτήν). On the first point he objected to the school of Origen, that it admitted no true union of the divine and the human, but made instead two Sons of God, the Logos and the man Jesus (L. c. xlii: εἰς μὴν ὁμοῦ υἱὸς θεοῦ, εἰς δὲ θετός). Hence he thought the rational human soul must be excluded from the God-man, and, in this, the old undefined doctrine was on his side. For the human soul he substituted the Logos himself as the νοῦς θεῖος. He developed this doctrine with originality and acuteness. The scheme of human nature which he made use of was the common trichotomous one, of the ψυχὴ λογικὴ (νοητά), αἰσθητός, and the σῶμα. That an animal principle of life, a ψυχὴ αἰσθητός, must be admitted to exist in human nature, he thought might be proved from Paul's Epistles, in the passages where he speaks of the flesh lusting against the Spirit; for the body in itself has no power of lusting, but only the soul that is connected with it. It is not self-determining, but must be determined by the ψυχὴ λογικὴ, which with it ought to govern the body. But this result is frustrated by sin, and, conquered by it, the reason succumbs to the power of the irrational desires. In order to free man from sin, the unchangeable Divine Spirit must be united with a human nature, control the anima, and present a holy human life (contra Apollinarist. t. i, cap. xiii, p. 736). Thus we have in Christ, as man, the three component parts, and can call him the ἀνθρώπος ἰσχωρούμενος, only with this difference, the Divine occupies the place of the human νοῦς? (Neander, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 320). Athanasius wrote against Apollinaris, though not against Apollinaris personally (Epist. ad Epict.; contra Apollinaristas); Gregory of Nazianzus wrote against him also (Ep. i, ii, ad Cledonium; ad Nectarium); and Gregory of Nyssa his Ἀπολλινάριον (in Galland. Bibl. Patr., vi, 517). His heresy became generally known A. D. 371. The accusations of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret against the character of Apollinaris were not plausible. "Of the writings in which he explained his views, only fragments are extant in the works of Gregory of Nyssa, Theodoret, and Leontius Byzantinus (who lived about the year 500); they were the following: περὶ σαρκώσεως λογίου (ἀποδείξις περὶ τῆς ζωῆς ἰσαρκώσεως)—τὸ κατὰ κεφάλαιον βιβλίον—περὶ ἀναστάσεως—περὶ πίστεως λογίου—and some letters (in Gallandii Bibl. PP. xii, 706 sq.; Angelo Mai Class. auct. ix, 495 sq.). Apollinaris objected to the union of the Logos with a rational soul; that the human being thus united to the Logos must either preserve his own free will, in which case there would be no true union of the Divine and the human, or that the human soul had lost its proper liberty by becoming united to the Logos, either of which would be absurd. "He chiefly opposed the τοιπαρία, or the liberty of choice in christology" (Dorner, Person of Christ, per. i, ep. iii, ch. iii). In his opinion, Christ is not only ἀνθρώπος ἐν θεῷ, but the incarnate God. According to the threefold division of man, Apollinaris was willing to ascribe a soul to the Redeemer in so far as he thought it to be a mean between body and spirit. But that which itself determines the soul (τὸ αὐτοκίνητον), and constitutes the higher dignity of man, the νοῦς (the ψυχὴ λογικὴ) of Christ, could not be of human origin, but must be purely divine; for his incarnation did not consist in the Logos becoming νοῦς, but in becoming σῶμα. But the Divine reason supplying the place of the human, there exists a specific difference between Christ and other beings. In their case, every thing had to undergo a process of gradual development, which cannot be brought about without either conflicts or sin (ὅπου γὰρ τέλειος ἀνθρώπος, ἴκει καὶ ἁμαρτία, apud. Athan. i, 2, p. 923; compare c. xxi, p. 939: ἁμαρτία ἐν πύστωσι). But this could not take place in the case of Christ; ἀνεγμία σκηνῆς ἐν Χριστῷ· οὐκ ἄρα νοῦς ἐστὶν ἀνθρώπινος (comp. Gregory of Nyssa, Antirrhēt. ult. Apollin. iv, c. 221). At the same time, Apollinaris supposed the body and soul of Christ to be so completely filled with the higher and divine principle of spiritual life, that he did not hesitate to use expressions such as 'God died, God is born,' etc. He even maintained that, on account of this intimate union, Divine homage is also due to the human nature of Christ (l. c. p. 241, 264). His opponents, therefore, charged him with Patripassianism. But we do not think that Apollinaris ever asserted, as Gregory of Nazianzus would have us believe, that Christ must have possessed an irrational, animal soul, e. g. that of a horse or an ox, because he had not a rational human soul; Gregory himself seems to have drawn such inferences from the premises of Apollinaris. On the other hand, he accused his opponents in a similar manner of believing in two Christs, two Sons of God, etc. (comp. Dorner, l. c., and his Notes 63, 64; Ullmann, Gregory of Naz. p. 401 sq.; Baur, Chr. Lehre v. d. Dreieinigkeit, i, 585 sq.). Athanasius maintained, in opposition to Apollinaris (contra Apollinarist. libri ii, but without mentioning him by name: the book was written after the death of Apollinaris), that it behooved Christ to be our example in every respect, and that his nature, therefore, must resemble ours. Sinfulness, which is empirically connected with the development of man, is not a necessary attribute of human nature, as the Manichæan notions would lead us to suppose. Man, on the contrary, was originally free from sin, and Christ appeared on that very account, viz., in order to show that God is not the author of sin, and to prove that it is possible to live a sinless life (the controversy thus touched upon questions of an anthropological nature). Athanasius distinctly separated the Divine from the human (comp. especially lib. ii), but he did not admit that he taught the existence of two Christs. Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 433; Möhler, Athanasius, ii, 262 sq., compares the doctrine of Apollinaris with that of Luther. Gregory of Nazianzus (Ep. ad Cledon. et orat. 51) equally asserted the necessity of a true and perfect human nature. It was not only necessary, as the medium by which God manifested himself, but Jesus could redeem and sanctify man only by assuming his whole nature, consisting of body and soul. (Similar views had been formerly held by Irenæus, and were afterward more fully developed by Anselm.) Gregory thus strongly maintained the doctrine of the two natures of the Saviour. We must distinguish in Christ ἄλλο καὶ ἄλλο, but not ἄλλος καὶ ἄλλος. Compare the Epist. ad Nectar. sicc. orat. 46, with his 10 anathemas against Apollinaris, and Ullmann, p. 396-413. The work of Gregory of Nyssa, entitled λόγος ἀπολλινάριος πρὸς τὰ Ἀπολλινάριον (which was probably composed between the years 374 and 380), may be found in Zaccagni, Collect. monum. vet., and Gallandii, Bibl. Patr. vi, 517; comp. Gieseler, Ch. History, i, § 83, note 50. He opposed the followers of Apollinaris (Συνουσιασταί, Διμοιρεταί) in his Ep. hor. 77. On the question whether Apollinaris or his disciples ever adopted the Docteric errors respecting the body of Christ, see Möhler, l. c. p. 264 sq." (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doct. § 93). Apollinarism was first condemned at the synod held at Rome A. D. 375, in which the Roman bishop Damasus presided; all mention of the name of Apollinaris was carefully avoided on this occasion. Nevertheless, this condemnation induced Apollinaris to form a separate congregation, over which he ordained the presbyter Vitalis as bishop. Hence the Apollinarists are also called Vitalians. They are also called Διμοιρεταί, because they were accused of dividing the nature of Christ into two parts. Before the death of Apollinaris, which happened between A. D. 382 and 392, the Apollinarists formed in Syria and the adjacent countries several separate congregations, having their own bishops. After his death the Apollinarists were divided into two parties, one of which, under Polemo, or Polemius, and Timotheus, pretended that the divinity and the body of Christ were transformed into one substance, and, consequently, that the flesh was to be worshipped as well as the Logos; these were called Polemians and Synouisiasts, and also συνουσιασταί (σαρκολάτρες, flesh-worshippers); in retaliation, they called the orthodox ανθρωπολάτρες, or men-worshippers. The other party, which adhered to the original doctrine of Apollinaris, were called Valentinians. By imperial command the public worship of the Apollinarists was impeded A. D. 388 and 397, and A. D. 428 in all towns entirely prohibited. The sects of the Apollinarists assimilated, in the fifth century, partly to the orthodox, and partly to the Monophysites. See MONOPHYTES. Apollo (Ἀπόλλων, the destroyer, so called because his shafts, the rays of Phobos or the sun, inflict disease or "the sun-stroke" in (Oriental climates), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, according to Homer (Iliad, i, 21, 316) the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Leto (Latona), and the brother of Artemis or Diana (Hesiod, Theog., 918). He was fabled to be the god who punishes the wicked and insolent, who affords help and wards off evil, particularly from cattle, who presided over the foundation of cities, and especially as the god of music and prophecy (Smith, Dict. of Class. Mythol., s. v.). See ORACLE. In this last office he is indirectly alluded to in the account of the daemoniac damsel cured by Paul (Acts xvi, 16). See PYTHONESS. Josephus mentions an audience of Archelaus held by Tiberius in a splendid temple of Apollo built by him in Rome (Ant. xvii, 11, 1); and he also speaks of a temple of his at Gaza, into which the nobles of the city took refuge from the massacre by Alexander Jannæus (Ant. xiii, 13, 3).

Apollodōtus (Ἀπολλόδοτος, Apollo-given), a general of the inhabitants of Gaza, who made an effectual sally against the Jews besieging the city under Alexander Jannæus, but was at length slain through the treachery of his brother Lysimachus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 3).

Apollonia (Ἀπολλωνία, from Apollo), a city of Macedonia, in the province of Mygdonia (Plin. iv, 17), situated between Amphipolis and Thessalonica, thirty Roman miles from the former, and thirty-six from the latter (Itiner. Antoa. p. 320, 330; Itin. Hieros. p. 605; Tab. Penting.). It was south of the lake Bolbe and north of the Chalcidian mountains (Athen. viii, 334). According to Stephen of Byzantium, it was founded by a colony of Corinthians and Coreyrians. The Apostle Paul passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia on his way to Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 1; see Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i, 320, 321). It must not be confounded with a noted Apollonia in Illyria (see Kypke, Obs. Sacr. ii, 81 sq.). The city here spoken of was situated on the "Egnatian Way" in the interior of the district of Chalcidice (Scylax, p. 27; Xen. Hist. Gr. v, 2). The ruins are called Pollina (Cramer's Anc. Gr. i, 264).

Apollonia (Ἀπολλωνία, a frequent Greek name of cities, probably given in this case by one of the Seleucids), a town of Palestine, between Caesarea and Joppa (Stephen of Byz.; Ptol. v, 16; Pliny, v, 14; Prot. Tab.), one of those on the sea-shore taken by the Jews under Alexander Jannæus (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 15, 4), and afterward repaired by Gabinius (Joseph. Hist. i, 8, 4). It is now Arsuf, a deserted village at the mouth of the Nahr Arsuf (Irby and Mangles, Trav. p. 189; Robinson, Research. iii, 46; Chesney, Expedition, i, 490), a place famous under the Crusaders (Wilken, Kreuzz. ii, 17, 39, 102; iv, 416; vii, 325, 400, 425), by whom it was confounded with Antipatris (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 590).

Apollonia, a martyr of Alexandria, suffered with Metra, Quinta, and Serapion, in the year 249, when she was seized, and some one by a violent blow on the face knocked out many of her teeth; whence, in the Middle Ages, she was held to be the patroness against the toothache. Soon she was brought before the burning pile, and, on being asked to recant, reflected a moment, and then leaped into the fire. She is commemorated in the Roman Church on Feb. 9.—Eusebius, Ch. Hist. vi, 41; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 450.

Apollonia (Ἀπολλωνίαι, from Apollo), the name of several men in the history of the Maccabees and Josephus.

1. The son of a certain Thraseus, and viceroy of the Syrian king Seleucus (IV) Philopator (B.C. 187) over southern Syria and Phœnicia (2 Macc. iii, 5, 7). At the suggestion of Simon, the temple governor, he instigated the king to plunder the Temple at Jerusalem, and generally took the severest measures against the Jews (2 Macc. iv, 4). The writer of the Declaration on the Maccabees, printed among the works of Josephus (De Macc. 4) relates of Apollonius the circumstances which are commonly referred to his emissary Heliodorus (2 Macc. iii, 7 sq.).

2. A son of Menestheus, and ambassador of King Antiochus Epiphanes to the Egyptian king Ptolemy Philometor, B.C. 173 (2 Macc. iv, 21). Perhaps he was the same as the "chief commissioner of tribute" (ἄρχων φορολογίας) for Judæa, who, at the command of Antiochus Epiphanes on his return from Egypt (B.C. 168), committed such bloodshed in Jerusalem (2 Macc. v, 24; comp. 1 Macc. i, 29 sq.); next was governor in Samaria (Joseph. Ant. xii, 7, 1, which Michaelis, on 1 Macc. iii, 10, regards as a misinterpretation), and finally lost his life in an encounter with Judas Maccabæus, B.C. 166 (1 Macc. iii, 10 sq.). An ambassador of the same name was at the head of the embassy which Antiochus sent to Rome (Liv. xlii, 6).

3. A son of one Apollonius Gennæus, and a Syrian governor under Antiochus (V) Eupator (2 Macc. xii, 2). B.C. 163. If, however, we understand the surname as an ironical epithet (γενναῖος, noble), this Apollonius (but whether the father or the son would still be doubtful) may be identical with No 2.

4. Surnamed by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 4, 3) Daïis (Δαῖος, from a people called Dahæ or Dai in Sogdiana), a Syrian viceroy in Cœle-Syria, who, taking sides with the usurper Demetrius (B.C. 147), attacked Jonathan, the ally of Alexander (Balas), but was utterly defeated by him (1 Macc. x, 69 sq.). According to the Greek text in 1 Macc. xvi, 69, he was originally governor of Cœle-Syria under Alexander, from whom he revolted to the party of Demetrius. Josephus only speaks of him as an officer of Alexander, without alluding to his connection with Demetrius (comp. Wernsdorf, De file Maccab. p. 135). There may have been an early error crept into the text of 1 Macc., or the expression in the Heb. original may have been ambiguous (see Grimm, Handb. in loc.). If this Apollonius be the same mentioned by Polybius (xxxii, 21, § 2), as foster-father and confidant of Demetrius I, his interest in the affairs of Demetrius would scarcely admit a doubt.—Wiener, s. v.

5. The son of one Alexander, and one of the ambassadors sent by the Jews to procure an alliance with the Romans in the time of Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 2).

Apollonius, a Roman senator, against whom one of his slaves, called Severus, preferred an accusation of holding the Christian faith, in the time of Commodus, about the year 183 or 186. When cited before the senate to defend himself, he delivered an admirable discourse on the faith, and was condemned to be beheaded. He is commemorated in the Roman Church on the 18th of April. His acts are in Ruinart, p. 83, 84.—Eusebius, Ch. Hist. v, 21; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 452.

Apollonius of Tyana, an impostor and professed magician, born three or four years before the vulgar era, at Tyana, a town in Cappadocia. His life by Philostratus (Ἀπολλωνίου τοῦ Τυανίου βίος, best ed. by Olearius, Lips. 1709. fol.) abounds with fabulous stories, apparently in imitation of the account of Christ's life in the Gospels. [Dupin wrote "The History of Apollonius of Tyana convicted of falsehood and imposture" (Paris, 1705). The life by Philostratus was translated into English by Charles Blount, who added some impious notes (1680). A French translation has recently been published by A. Chassang (Apollonius de Tyana, sa vie, ses voyages, ses prodiges, par Philostrate, Paris, 1861).] It is from this source that our chief knowledge of Apollonius is derived. The following sketch is taken from Farrar (Critical Hist. of Free Thought, lecture ii): Apollonius was a Pythagorean philosopher, born in Cappadocia about four years before the Christian era. After being early educated

In the circle of philosophy, and in the practice of the ascetic discipline of his predecessor Pythagoras, he imitated that philosopher in spending the next portion of his life in travel. Attracted by his mysticism to the farthest East as the source of knowledge, he set out for Persia and India, and in Nineveh, on his route, met Damis, the future chronicler of his actions. Returning from the East instructed in Brahminic lore, he travelled over the Roman world. The remainder of his days was spent in Asia Minor. Statues and temples were erected to his honor. He obtained vast influence, and died with the reputation of sanctity late in the century. Such is the outline of his life, if we omit the numerous legends and prodigies which attach themselves to his name. He was partly a philosopher, partly a magician—half mystic, half impostor. At the distance of a century and a quarter from his death, in the reign of Septimius Severus, at the request of the wife of that emperor, Julia Domna (A.D. 210), the second of the three Philostrati dressed up Damis's narrative of his life in the work named above, and paved the way for the general reception of the story among the cultivated classes of Rome and Greece. It has been thought that Philostratus had a polemical aim against the Christian faith, as the memoir of Apollonius is in so many points a parody on the life of Christ. The announcement of his birth to his mother, the chorus of swans which sang for joy on occasion of it, the casting out devils, the raising the dead, the healing the sick, the sudden disappearance and reappearance of Apollonius, the sacred voice which called him at his death, and his claim to be a teacher with authority to reform the world, form some of the points of similarity. If such was the intention of Philostratus, he was really a controversialist under the form of a writer of romance, employed by those who at that time were laboring to introduce an eclecticism largely borrowed from the East into the region both of philosophy and religion. Without settling this question, it is at least certain that about the beginning of the next century the he then writers adopted this line of argument, and sought to exhibit a rival ideal. One instance is the life of Pythagoras by Iamblichus; another, the attack on Christianity by Hierocles (Ἰστορία φιλαλήθειας πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς), in part of which he used Philostratus's untrustworthy memoir for the purpose of instituting a comparison between Apollonius and Christ. The sceptic who referred religious phenomena to fanaticism would hence avail himself of the comparison as a satisfactory account of the origin of Christianity; while others would adopt the same view as Hierocles, and deprive the Christian miracles of the force of evidence—a line of argument which was reproduced by the English Deist Blount (see above). The work of Hierocles is lost, but an outline of its argument, with extracts, remains in a reply which Eusebius wrote to a portion of it (cont. Hieroclem, ed. Olearius, Lips. 1769). Eusebius states (bk. i) that he refutes only that portion of the work which related to Apollonius of Tyana, referring to Origen's answer to Celsus for a reply to the remainder of it, and discusses only the parallel of Apollonius and Jesus Christ. In bk. i he gives an outline of the argument of his opponent with quotations, and states his own opinion about Apollonius, throwing discredit on the veracity of the sources of the memoirs, and proceeds to criticise the prodigies attributed to him, arguing that the statements are incredible, or borrowed, or materially contradictory. Discussing each book in succession, he replies in bk. i to the statements respecting the early part of Apollonius's life; in bk. ii, to that which concerned the journey into India; in bk. iii, to that which related to his intercourse with the Brahmins; in bk. iv, to his journey in Greece; in bk. v, to his introduction to Vespasian in Egypt; in bks. vi and vii, to his miracles; and in bk. viii to his pretence to foreknowledge. He adds remarks on his death, and on the necessity of faith, and repeats his opinion respecting the character of Apollonius. Lardner and Ritter think that Philostratus did not write with a polemical reference to Christianity. Dean Trench has made a few remarks in reference to this question (Notes to Miracles, p. 62). Baur maintains that Apollonius, as represented in the work of Philostratus, is meant to be the pagan counterpart of Christ. Baur finds in this parallel an opposition to Christianity which sought to claim for paganism what was offered by Christianity. Dr. Rieckher, on the other hand (in Studien der Würtemb. Geisteslchsch., 1847), tries to prove that the picture drawn by Philostratus is not a guileless invention of a pagan personality to match the historical character of the founders of Christianity, but that it was the product of a well-meditated plan, concocted by a circle of educated men, whom the Empress Julia Domna had assembled around herself, and that it was intended not for the usual class of readers of a sophist, but for the mass of the people.

A good biography of Apollonius, with a pretty full literature of the subject, by J. H. Newman, is given at the end of Hind's History of the Early Church, in the Encyclop. Metrop. (and separately, London, 1850, 12mo). See also Mosheim, De cristianitate Apollonii Tyani; Schröder, De Apoll. Tyani (Wittenb. 1723); Zimmermann, *De miraculis Apoll. Apolloph'anes (Ἀπολλοφάνης, Apollo-appearing), a Syrian slain by Judas Maccabæus in a pit near the stronghold Gazara (2 Macc. x, 37).

Ἀπόλλος (Ἀπολλῶς, comp. Sozom. Hist. Ecc. iv, 29, either for Apollonius, as in Codex D, or Apollodorus, see Heumann on Acts xviii, 24), a Jew of Alexandria, described as a learned, or, as some (see Bleek, Br. a. d. Heb. i, 424) understand it, an eloquent man (ὁ ἵσθ λόγιος), well versed in the Scriptures and the Jewish religion (Acts xviii, 24). About A.D. 49 he came to Ephesus, where, in the synagogues, "he spake boldly the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John" (ver. 25); by which we are probably to understand that he knew and taught the doctrine of a Messiah, whose coming John had announced, but knew not that Jesus was the Christ. His fervor, however, attracted the notice of Aquila and Priscilla, whom Paul had left at Ephesus; and they instructed him in this higher doctrine, which he thenceforth taught openly, with great zeal and power (ver. 26). Having heard from his new friends, who were much attached to Paul, of that apostle's proceedings in Achaia, and especially at Corinth, he resolved to go thither, and was encouraged in this design by the brethren at Ephesus, who furnished him with letters of introduction (Acts xviii, 27; xix, 1). On his arrival there he was very useful in watering the seed which Paul had sown, and was instrumental in gaining many new converts from Judaism (1 Cor. ii, 9). (See Sommel, De Apollone, London, 1797; Müller, De eloquentia Apollonis, Schleusing. 1717.) There was perhaps no apostle or apostolical man who so much resembled Paul in attainments and character as Apollus. His immediate disciples became so much attached to him as well-nigh to have produced a schism in the church, some saying "I am of Paul," others, "I am of Apollus;" others, "I am of Cephas" (1 Cor. iii, 4-7, 22). There must indeed have been some difference in their mode of teaching to occasion this; and from the First Epistle to the Corinthians it would appear that Apollus was not prepared to go so far as Paul in abandoning the figments of Judaism, and insisted less on the (to the Jews) obnoxious position that the Gospel was open to the Gentiles. (See Dähne, Die Christuspartei in Korinth, Hal. 1841, p. 32; Goldhorn, in Igen's Zeitschr. 1840, ii, 152 sq.; Neander, Planting and Training, i, 268-271, 302; Plüzer, De Apollone doctore, Altdorf, 1718; Hopf, De Apollone pseudo-doctore, Hag. 1782; Heymann, in the Sächs. evang. Stud. ii, 213.) There was nothing, however, to prevent these two eminent men from being perfectly united in the bonds of Christian affection and brotherhood. When Apollos heard that Paul was again at Ephesus, he went thither to see him; and as he was there when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (A.D. 52), there can be no doubt that the apostle received from him his information concerning the divisions in that church, which he so forcibly reproves (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 13 sq.). It strongly illustrates the character of Apollos and Paul, that the former, doubtless in disgust at those divisions with which his name had been associated, declined to return to Corinth, while the latter, with generous confidence, urged him to do so (1 Cor. xvi, 12). Paul again mentions Apollos kindly in Tit. iii, 13, and recommends him and Zenas the lawyer to the attention of Titus, knowing that they designed to visit Crete, where Titus then was. Jerome is of opinion (Comment. in loc.) that he remained at Crete until he heard that the divisions at Corinth had been healed by means of Paul's letter, and that he then returned to that city, of which he afterward became bishop. This has an air of probability; and the authority on which it rests is better than any we have for the different statements which make him bishop of Duras, of Colophon, of Iconium (in Phrygia), or of Cæsarea (Menolog. Græc. ii, 17). He has been thought by many to have been the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Alford, Comment. iv, Proleg. p. 58 sq.).—Kitto, s. v.

Apoll'yon (Ἀπολλώνιον), the Greek equivalent (Rev. ix, 11) of the Heb. title ΑΒΔΔΟΝ (q. v.).

Apologetics, a branch of theology which has for its object the science of defending Christianity against the assaults of its enemies. A system of Christian doctrines (dogmatics), as such, presupposes the truth of Christianity; the proof of the truth of this presupposition is not a part of the system, and a separate science is needed to establish this proof. Apologetics, as a science, is not identical with apology (q. v.), which is an actual defence of Christianity; but it seeks and teaches the right method of apology; nevertheless, the term is often used in practice to denote the apology itself, as well as the method. The name was first used in German theology (probably by Planck). The scope of apologetics in German theology is nearly the same as that of the evidences (q. v.) of Christianity in English theology, with this difference, that the definition of apologetics lays a greater stress on its position as a separate branch of scientific theology.

1. Relation to Theology.—The true place of apologetics in the circle of theological sciences is not yet definitively settled. Schleiermacher makes it a branch of philosophical theology (Theol. Stud. § 32-42). Tholuck, also, holds that apologetics should be incorporated with systematic theology (Vermischte Schriften, i, 376). There is some reason for the view of other writers, who place it under the head of biblical criticism, as apologetics must show the genuineness and credibility of the Scriptures; but yet this is only part of its function. Pelt gives it the leading place in systematic theology, as the science of first principles (Encyklopädie, § 62, where also a valuable history of apologetics may be found). Kienlen puts it under the head of practical theology (Encyklop. der Theolog. Wissenschaften, § 84). Hagenbach contends that the study of apologetics cannot be pursued before the student has acquired the elements of exegetical and historical theology. He therefore places it in the third branch of theological science, viz., systematic theology (Encyklopädie, § 81). "Apologetics is treated by Prof. Dörner as an integral part of the system of Christian doctrine, as the first part of dogmatic theology. Its ground lies in the claim of Christianity to be eternal truth—lies in Christianity itself. It is the justification of Christianity in its claim to be the final, absolute religion. It is the justification of Christianity to thought; it shows, or tries to show, that there cannot be conceived a more perfect religion. Christian doctrines, it attempts to prove, are to be received not merely as given, but as truth. The energy and convincing power of truth is an axiom of apologetics. It seeks to reconcile the Logos of the first creation with the historical work of the Logos in his absolute Revelation. Apologetics thus conceived differs from Christian apologetics. It started, indeed, with repelling attacks. But these attacks were merely the historical occasion of its existence. It exhibits the Christian religion as self-grounded—self-dependent. It has an offensive as well as defensive work. It seeks to show the inner lack of truth in all thinking which is not Christian. It differs also from a mere philosophy of religion, inasmuch as it draws from historical monuments" (Am. Presb. Eccl. Oct. 1862, p. 680). Sack, whose Apologetik (1819) was one of the first to distinguish between apologetics and apology, considers the science properly to be an apologetical handling of systematic theology. "Dogmatics," he says, "is Christian doctrine set forth for Christian thinkers, who look at it as friends; Apologetics (or more properly Apology) is Christian doctrine set forth for non-Christian thinkers, who look at it as enemies." The English writers, who have not generally been careful of scientific form, but look more directly to practical ends, have generally made apologetics a separate branch of study, under the name of Evidences of Christianity. Thus, Watson (Institutes) divides the whole circle of theological sciences into—1. The Evidences; 2. The Doctrines; 3. The Morals; 4. The Institutions of Christianity; and thus makes apologetics the portal to the whole temple. So also does Hill, Lectures on Divinity (N. Y. 1847, 8vo).

II. Method of Apologetics.—There are two principal methods, the historical and the philosophical. The first method seeks to vindicate Christianity on the grounds (a) of criticism, by showing the genuineness and authenticity of its sacred books; (b) of history, by showing that the great facts of Christianity are part of human history; and (c), having established these points, by arguing the credibility of the sacred books and (d) their divine authority, and hence (e) the binding power on the human intellect of their statements of fact and doctrine. Most English writers on evidence follow the historical method, and divide their material into (1) external evidence (miracles and prophecy); (2) internal evidence (philosophical). A line of evidence called presumptive is formed in this way: admitting the existence and attributes of God, it is unlikely that He would leave His creatures in ignorance and wretchedness; and it is likely, also, that, if He should communicate with them, His revelation would present analogies to His works in nature. This is the line of Butler's Analogy, of Ellis, and of Watson, in the first part of his Evidences. A convenient and scientific method is proposed by Warren (Systematische Theologie, Einleitung, § 4), viz., that the task of the science is to show (1) that Christianity is a fact of history; (2) that Christianity is a divine revelation; (3) that Christianity is the power of God unto salvation. "Instead of attempting to deduce the truth of every part of Christianity from the external evidences alone, we have at last learned to begin with Christianity as an undeniable complex of phenomena, needing for its explanation nothing less than the divine agencies it claims. Thus we reason from the character of Christ, from the superhuman excellence of Christian doctrine, from the supernatural effects of this religion in the individual and in the world; giving the external evidences their due subordinate position as mere proofs that what are claimed to be and to have been phenomena of Christianity are legitimately claimed to be such. Discriminating remarks on the two methods, and the advantages of the new one, may be found in Dr. Bushnell's Nature and the Supernatural, p. 33-35; also Meth. Quar. Rev. July 1862, p. 373-376. The true name for our new treatises on 'The Evidences' is Philosophy of Christianity" (Warren, in Meth. Quar. Rev. Oct. 1863, p. 589). The German writers have followed generally the philosophical method, and of late years the English have also entered more into this field. But there are Anglo-Saxon apologists who do not commence with the historical evidences, and German ones who do not lay the whole stress upon the internal evidences. Indeed, the latest writers in both languages seem to have mutually exchanged the traditional methods of their fathers. Auherlen's Göttliche Offenbarung (1864) would have delighted the heart of even so thoroughly English an apologist as Paley [see APOLOGY]. On the other hand, Coleridge, who disparaged the comparative value of the evidence from miracles and prophecy, dictated to a friend a scheme of evidences of which the outline is as follows: I. Miracles, as precluding the contrary evidence of no miracles; II. the Material of Christianity, its existence and history; III. the Doctrines of Christianity, and the correspondence of human nature with those doctrines; illustrated, first, historically, with reference to the progress of the race; second, individually, with reference to the wants of each human soul, and the capacity of the Christian doctrines to satisfy those wants (Coleridge, Works, N. Y. ed. v, 555). A complete scientific method must unite the two methods (the historical and the philosophical), in order to show that Christianity is not only a religion (among others), but also the religion of humanity. (See Coleridge, Biographia Literaria, 8vo ed. p. 348; and Aids to Reflection, p. 207 sq.; Turretini, Opera, i, 225 sq.; Chalmers, Lectures on Paley, Works, vol. ix; North Brit. Rev., Aug. 1861, art. ii.) The English writers, doubtless, formerly laid too little stress upon the internal and spiritual evidence of Christianity (see Wesley, Works, v, 758, for a passage of remarkable sagacity on this point); while, on the other hand, the Germans have undervalued the external evidence, and thus opened the way for rationalism and infidelity. Farrar states the historical uses of the two methods as follows: "In all ages the purpose of evidences has been conviction; to offer the means of proof either by philosophy or by fact. In arguing with the heathen in the first age, the former plan was adopted—the school of Alexandria trying to lead men to Christianity as the highest philosophy; in the Middle Ages the same method was adopted under the garb of philosophy, but with the alteration that the philosophy was one of form, not matter. In the later Middle Ages the appeal was to the Church; in the early contests with the Deists, to the authority of reason, and to the Bible reached by means of this process; in the later, to the Bible reached through history and fact: in opposing the French infidelity the appeal was chiefly to authority; in the early German the appeal was the same as in England; in the later German it has been a return in spirit to that of the early fathers, or of the English apologists of the eighteenth century, but based on a deeper philosophy; an appeal to feeling or intuition, and not to reflective reason; and through these ultimately to the Bible" (Free Thought, p. 473). Coleridge remarks as follows upon the state of the Evidences for Christianity in the present age: "The result of my own meditations is, that the evidence of the Gospel, taken as a total, is as great for the Christians of the nineteenth century as for those of the apostolic age. I should not be startled if I were told it was greater. But it does not follow that this equally holds good of each component part. An evidence of the most cogent clearness, unknown to the primitive Christians, may compensate for the evanescence of some evidence which they enjoyed. Evidences comparatively dim have waxed into noontid splendor; and the comparative want of others, once effulgent, is more than indemnified by the synopsis τοῦ πνεύματος, which we enjoy, and by the standing miracle of a Christendom commensurate and almost synonymous with the civilized world. I make this remark for the purpose of warning the divinity student against the disposition to over-train particular proofs, or rest the credibility of the Gospel too exclusively on some one favorite point" (Works, N. Y. ed. v, 428). Fisher, in his Supernatural Origin of Christianity (N. Y. 1866), has some excellent remarks on the method of Apologetics (Essays I and XI). See Bishop Butler's admirable discussion of the "particular" evidence for Christianity in his Analogy of Religion, pt. ii, ch. vii; and compare New York Review, ii, 141 sq.; Mansell, in Aids to Faith (Lond. 1861, 8vo), Essay I; Fitzgerald, On the Study of the Evidences (Aids to Faith, Essay II); Princeton Review, xviii, 359; and the whole subject further treated, with special reference to English methods, in this Cyclopædia under EVIDENCES.

III. Of books properly to be called Apologetics, as defined above, there are none in English, though Farrar, Critical History of Free Thought (1863), covers the ground generally. Many manuals of apologetics have been issued in Germany, of which the following are the most important: Stein, Die Apologetik des Christenthums, als Wissenschaft dargestellt (Leipsic, 1824, 8vo); Sack, Christliche Apologetik (Hamburg, 1829, 8vo); Stendel, Grundzüge einer Apologetik für das Christenthum (Tübingen, 1830, 8vo); Drey (Rom. Cath.), Apologetik als wissenschaftliche Nachweisung des Christenthums in seiner Erscheinung (Mainz, 3 vols. 1838-47, 8vo). On the relation of apologetics to other branches of theology, see Lechler, Ueber den Begriff der Apologetik (Studien und Kritiken, 1839, part iii); Kienlen, Die Stellung der Apologetik (Studien und Kritiken, 1846). On the history of apologetics, and on the nature of the Christian evidences, see Tzschirner, Geschichte der Apologetik (Leipsic, 1805); Farrar (as cited above); Hagenbach, Encyclopædie d. theol. Wissenschaften, § 81; Heubner, art. Apologetik, in Ersch und Gruber's Encyclop.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, i, 430; Lechler, Geschichte d. Deismus (1841, 8vo); Pelt, Theol. Encyclopædie; McCosh, The Supernatural in relation to the Natural, ch. iii (Cambridge, 1862, 12mo); Hampden, Introduction to the Philosophical Evidences of Christianity; Conybeare, Lectures on Theology, ch. i; Hill's Divinity, ch. i; Steele, Philosophy of the Evidences (Edinb. 1834, 8vo); Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, bk. ii; Van Senden, Geschichte der Apologetik (transl. from the Dutch, Stuttgart, 2 vols. 1846, 8vo); Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, §§ 28, 29, 117, 157, 238; Beck, Dogmengeschichte, § 32 sq.; Barnes, Reckoning of Christianity (Presb. Quar. Rev. July, 1862). See also APOLOGY; DEISM; EVIDENCES; RATIONALISM.

Apologists. See APOLOGY.

Apology (ἀπολογία, a defence), a discourse, or argument, in defence of some person or doctrine that has been attacked or misrepresented. The use of this term, as applied to religious truth, is to be carefully distinguished from its application in ordinary conversation, in which it generally means an excuse made for some person or thing which deserves censure. Hence, those who are unacquainted with the derivation of the word have ignorantly argued that the existence of apologies for Christianity implies the weakness of the claims of Christianity itself. In the early church, the defences of Christianity presented to heathen emperors by the Christian writers were called Apologies, and the writers themselves are styled Apologists. The same name was afterward given to defences of Christianity against pagan writers and other opponents, and the science of defending Christianity is called Apologetics (q. v.). In this article we propose to give a brief history of the apologies or defences of Christianity from the beginning until the present time. Christianity has had to contend against four classes of opponents—Jews, Pagans, Mohammedans, and Rationalists. These four heads would form a convenient division of the history, if treated according to the parties opposing Christianity; but it will be more convenient here to follow the chronological order, making three periods—the Early Age, the Middle Age, the Modern Age.

1. The Early Age (down to the sixth century).—The Jews, from their affinity to the new religion, seem to have opposed it most bitterly in the beginning. The grounds of their unbelief are stated in the N. T. itself, and are the same now, in substance, as then. The apostles argue apologetically with the Jews when they undertake to show by the prophecies and types of the O. T. that Jesus was Messiah. Later writers in this age are, Justin Martyr (dialogue with Trypho, the Jew) and Origen (against Celsus, who personates a Jewish opponent). The Judaizing teachers in the church had also to be met and answered. See EBIONITES. Rationalism also soon appeared in the spiritualistic theories of the Gnostics. See GNOSTICISM. The pagan attacks, though often borrowing Jewish objections, were founded on the pagan view of God and the world, both as religion and philosophy. They anticipate many of the modern forms of infidelity. "Substantially the same objections are urged by the sceptical mind from age to age, and substantially the same replies are made. Infidelity is the same over and over again—reappearing in new forms, it is true, so that it seems to the time and the church like a new thing under the sun, yet ever remaining identical with itself, it makes very much the same statements, and elicits very much the same replies" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, i, 104). When Christianity first appeared, it was thoroughly antagonistic to the pagan public opinion of the times. The first formal attack in the shape of books appeared in the second century, beginning with Celsus (q. v.), who attacked the whole idea of the supernatural, whether in Judaism or in Christianity. Lucian of Samosata († about 200) attacked Christianity with the shafts of wit and ridicule. He was followed by the Neo-platonists (q. v.), Porphyry (q. v.), and Hierocles (q. v.). The leading arguments against Christianity in the first three centuries, with the replies to them by the Christian apologists, are thus summed up by Dr. Schaff: "1. Against CURIST: his illegitimate birth; his association with poor, unlettered fishermen, and rude publicans; his form of a servant, and his ignominious death. But the opposition to him gradually ceased; while Celsus called him a downright impostor, the Syncretists and Neo-platonists were disposed to regard him as at least a distinguished sage. 2. Against CHRISTIANITY: its novelty; its barbarian origin; its want of a national basis; the alleged absurdity of some of its facts and doctrines, particularly of regeneration and the resurrection; contradictions between the Old and New Testaments, among the Gospels, and between Paul and Peter; the demand for a blind, irrational faith. 3. Against the CHRISTIANS: atheism, or hatred of the gods; the worship of a crucified malefactor; poverty; and want of culture and standing; desire of innovation; division and sectarianism; want of patriotism; gloomy seriousness; superstition and fanaticism; and sometimes even unnatural crimes, like those related in the pagan mythology of (Edipus and his mother Jocaste (concupitus Edipodis), and of Thyestes and Atrous (cupula Thyestea)). Perhaps some Gnostic sects ran into scandalous excesses; but as against the Christians in general, this last charge was so clearly unfounded that it is not noticed even by Celsus and Lucian. The senseless accusation that they worshipped an ass's head may have arisen, as Tertullian already intimates, from a story of Tacitus respecting some Jews who were once directed by a wild ass to fresh water, and thus relieved from the torture of thirst; and it is worth mentioning only to show how passionate and blind was the opposition with which Christianity in this period of persecution had to contend. "The apologetic literature began to appear under the reign of Hadrian, and continued to grow until the end of the fourth century. Most of the church teachers took part in this labor of their day. The first apologies, by Quadratus, Aristides, and Aristo, addressed to the Emperor Hadrian (about A. D. 130), and the similar works of Melito of Sardis, Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Miltiades, who lived under Marcus Aurelius, are either entirely lost, or preserved only in fragments. But the valuable apologetic works of the Greek philosopher and martyr, Justin (166), we possess. After him come, in the Greek Church, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hermias, in the last half of the second century, and Origen, the ablest of all, in the first half of the third. The most important Latin apologists are Tertullian (about 220), Minucius Felix (between 220 and 250; according to some, between 161 and 180), and the elder Arnobius (q. v.) (about 300), all of North Africa. Here at once appears a characteristic difference between the Greek and the Latin minds. The Greek apologies are more learned and philosophical; the Latin more practical and juridical in their matter and style. The former labor to prove the truth of Christianity, and its adaptability to the intellectual wants of man; the latter plead for its legal right to exist, and exhibit mainly its moral excellency and salutary effect upon society. The Latin also are, in general, more rigidly opposed to heathenism, while the Greek recognise in the Grecian philosophy a certain affinity to the Christian religion. The apologies are addressed in some cases to the emperors (Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius) and the provincial governors, in others to the intelligent public. Their first object was to soften the temper of the authorities and people toward Christianity and its professors by refuting the false charges against them. It may be doubted whether they ever reached the hands of the emperors; at all events the persecution continued. Conversion commonly proceeds from the heart and will, and not from the understanding and from knowledge. No doubt, however, these writings contributed to dissipate prejudice among honest and susceptible heathens, and to induce more favorable views of the new religion. Yet the chief service of this literature was to strengthen believers and advance theological knowledge. It brought the church to a deeper and clearer sense of the peculiar nature of the Christian religion, and prepared her thenceforth to vindicate it before the tribunal of reason and philosophy. The apologists did not confine themselves to the defensive, but carried the war aggressively into the territory of Judaism and heathenism" (Methodist Quarterly Review, Oct. 1858, art. viii). Clemens Alexandrinus († 220) is also classed among the apologists (Stromata; Cohortatio). He admits the value of heathen philosophy as a preparation for Christianity, and asserts that Christianity fully satisfies the legitimate demands of the human intellect. Here belong also, in part, at least, Eusebius († 370) of Cæsarea's προπαιδαστηνική and ἀποδείξεις ἐνωρηγελική, Athanasius's λόγος κατά Ἑλλήνων and περὶ τῆς ἐνανθρωπήσεως τοῦ λόγου; and Cyril († 444) of Alexandria's ten books against Julian, in which he gives, as a reason for the late appearance of Christianity, that the progress of revelation had to be parallel with the cultivation of mankind. Augustine's († 430) De civitate Dei is a great attempt to consider Christianity as realizing the idea of a divine plan and order for the world, as containing the immanent idea of the world and its history (Smith's Hagenbach, § 117). Augustine showed the relations of reason and faith, philosophy and religion, with a skill that has never been surpassed (Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 162 sq.). The Communitorium of Vincentius Lirinensis († 450) is also, in part, apologetic. On this period, besides the works already cited, see Reeves, The Apologies of Justin, Tertullian, Minucius Felix, and Vincencius, with Preliminary Discourses (London, 1709, 2 vols. 8vo); Semisch, Life of Justin Martyr, transl. by Ryland (Edinb. 1843, 18mo); Woodham, Tertullian's Liber Apologeticus, with Essay on the early Apologists (Camb. 1843, 8vo); Freppel, Les Apologistes Chrétiens du 2^e Siècle (Paris, 1861, 2 vols. 8vo); Houtteville, La Religion prouvée par des Faits (Paris, 1722); one part of which, translated, is, A Critical and Historical Discourse on the Method of the Authors for and against Christianity (Lond. 1739, 8vo); Bolton, The Evidences of Christianity in the Writings of the Apologists down to Augustine (New York, 1854, 8vo); Kaye, Ecclesiastical History illustrated from Tertullian (Camb. 3d edit. 1845, 8vo); Kaye, Justin Martyr (Lond. 1836, 8vo); Kaye, Clement of Alexandria (1835, 8vo); Lardner, Works (v. ii); Farrar, Crit. Hist. of Free Thought (note 49); Pressensé, Histoire des Trois Premiers Siècles de l'Église (vols. i and ii); Otto, Corpus Apologiarum christianorum seculi seculi, vol. i-viii, containing the works of Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus (Jena, 1847-'61); and other works named under APOLOGETICS.

II. The Middle Age (seventh century to the Reformation).—In this period we find little to note for the first four centuries. In the Dark Ages, the public mind and thought were nominally Christian, or, at least, were not sufficiently educated to admit of doubts that might create a demand for apologetical works. The external conflict now was only with Judaism and Mohammedanism. Against the Jews, Agobard († 840) wrote his treatise De Insolentia Judæorum; at a later period Gislebert, or Gilbert, of Westminster († 1117), wrote Disp. Judæi cum Christiano de fide Christiani, in Anselmi Opera; Abelard († 1142), Dialogus inter Philos. Judæum et Christianum (Rheinwald, Ancedota, Berlin, 1835, t. i). Against the Mohammedans, Euthymius Zigabenus († 1118), Panoplia (in Sylburgii Saracenicis, Heidelb. 1595); Richardi Confutatio (1210, edited by Bibliander); Raimund Martini († 1286), Pugio Fidei; Peter of Clugny, Ad. N. find. Sectam Saracenorum (Martene, Monumenta, ix). See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 144; Farrar, Critical History of Free Thought, p. 387 sq. In the ninth century, Scotus Erigena († 875) treated of the relations of revelation and philosophy in his De Divisione Nature (ed. by Gale, 1661, Oxford, and again in 1838, Munster); but the seeds of Pantheism lay in his teaching. The strife between Nominalism and Realism in the 11th century led to a more thorough discussion of fundamental principles as to the relations between faith and reason, and between God and nature; and the orthodox theologians, especially Anselm of Canterbury († 1109), asserted as a fundamental axiom the precept of St. Augustine, non quero intelligere, ut credam, sed credo, ut intelligam. Aquinas's De veritate fidei contra Gentiles was directed against the Jews and Mohammedans. Abelard, having given to reason a greater share in his arguments, and gone so far as to point out the contradictions contained in the fathers, was persecuted by the church, although he did not, in principle, differ from the scholastics. As to the grounds of Christianity, he distinguished between credere, intelligere, and cognoscere: "through doubt we come to inquiry, by inquiry to truth;" in this anticipating Descartes. Bernard of Clairvaux held that Abelard's rationalism was in contradiction not only with faith, but also with reason. The newly-learned system of Aristotle began, in the Middle Age, to be applied to the sciences, and among them to theology. Alexander de Hailes († 1245) was the first to give regular theological prolegomena, in which he considered the question whether theology can properly be called a science, and how it is contained in the Bible; he ascribed to it experimental, not speculative certainty. The same line was followed by Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus. The latter recognises eight grounds of certainty: pronunciatio prophetica, scripturarum concordia, auctoritas scribentium, diligentia recipientium, rationabilitas contentorum, irrationabilitas singulorum errorum, ecclesie stabilitas, and miraculorum claritas. Among the later scholastics we find Durand de St. Pourcain († 1336); Gerson, who wrote against the Hussites his Propositiones de sensu literali S. Scr. et de causis errantium; Raymond de Sabunde († 1434), who, in his Liber creaturarum seu theologia naturalis, and Valia anime (often reprinted, as, for instance, at Lyons, 1648, 8vo), asserted that the love of God is the highest knowledge. The controversy with the Moslems produced in the 14th century John Cantacuzenus († 1375), Orationes et assertiones pro fide Christiana contra Saracenos et Alcoranum (ed. Rob. Gualter, Basil, 1543, fol.). In the Western Church more important works appeared, such as Nicholas de Cusa's Cribratio Alcorani, in which he sought to prove the divinity of Christ by the Koran itself, and Zelus Christi contra Judæos, Saracenos, et Injudeles, written about 1450 by the Spaniard Petrus de Cavalleria. About the same time appeared a system of Christian philosophy due to the thought of the Middle Age, and which we find already foreshadowed in Anselm and Hugo de St. Victor. Its principal object was to establish the relation and differences between faith and reason, as well as to reconcile them. In the first rank of these, so to say, philosophical apologies, we find the De Christiana religione et fidei pietate (Paris, 1641) of Marsilius Ficinus († 1499), in which the same views originally advanced by Thomas Aquinas in De veritate Catholice fidei contra Gentiles are easily recognised. To the same class belong the Triumphus crucis seu de veritate religionis Christiane of Savonarola († 1498), and the Solutium itineris mei of the same author. A sentence we find in his works may be considered as the distinguishing principle of that whole school of philosophical apologetists: gratia presupponit naturam (Pelt, Theologische Encyclopädie, § 65).

III. From the Reformation to the Present Time.—The era of modern speculation followed the discovery of printing, the revival of letters, and the Reformation. Europe was filled with a spirit of restless inquiry. The Romish corruptions of Christianity led many to doubt Christianity itself. Leo X. himself a sceptic, fortified the pride of letters and of freethinking. Cultivated men seemed likely, on the one hand, to go back to classical paganism, or, on the other, to fall into philosophical pantheism. In the early times of the Reformation the difficulties in the church itself engrossed the attention of the Christian writers. But soon after apologetics received a new impulse from the spirit of free inquiry which became so general. The fundamental questions of Christianity were again examined. This is the time when appeared the clear and comprehensive De veritate Religionis Christiane (1543) of the Spaniard Ludovicus Vives († 1540). Among the Protestants, the evidence derived from the Testimonium Sp. Sancti internum led to a new class of arguments, which we find in Philippe de Morinay du Plessis's Traité de la vérité de la Religion Chrétienne (1567, 1651; and a Latin trans. by Breithaupt, Jena, 1698, 4to), and Hugo Grotius's De veritate Religionis Christiane (1627, etc.; last edit. Amsterdam, 1831). Among Roman Catholic apologetics we notice Melchior Canus († 1560), whose Loci Theologici is more a work on theological logic than dogmatics; it enumerates the different grounds of evidence recognised by his church. The differences between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches led also to apologetic as well as controversial works. Among these, one of the earliest and most important is the Διόκειλος de fundamentalibus doctrinæ Lutheranae et Calvinianæ (Viteb, 1626, etc.; best edit. 1663). In the Romish Church the differences between the Jansenists and the Molinists, and afterward the Jesuits, led Blaise Pascal to write his Pensées, which, although unfinished, is one of the ablest and most complete apologetic works of any time.

In the 17th century arose the so-called deism of England, under the leadership of Herbert of Chembury († 1648) and Hobbes († 1649), contemporaneously with Descartes on the Continent. Spinoza followed with his destructive criticism and with his pantheistic philosophy. These were followed by crowds of less important deists, freethinkers, etc. The grounds, both of attack and defence, were now very different from those of the early ages. Then the advocates of Christianity had to defend it against pagan attacks, and, in turn, to show the absurdity and wickedness of polytheism; now, on the other hand, the deistic unbelievers not only professed to believe in one God, but also sought to show that no special revelation is necessary to man, but that he can learn both God and duty from the light of nature. The English deism passed over into France and Germany, and, coming in aid of the movement in philosophy and criticism led by Descartes and Spinoza, gave origin there to the movement which finally culminated in the so-called Rationalism, Naturalism, and Positivism (see these three heads; see also DEISM). We shall briefly sketch the history of apologetics in this period, first, on the Continent of Europe, leaving the English and American apologetists to the close of this article.

1. German.—In Germany the Wolian philosophy prepared the way for the English deism, which soon took root. The first open infidelity of the period we find in such writers as J. C. Dippel († 1734), author of Democritus Christianus, and J. C. Edelmann († 1767), who rejected all revealed religion to attach himself exclusively to conscience. Between these two extremes appeared Leibnitz, whose attempt at a reconciliation between philosophy and Christianity, by making reason the judge between them, had prepared the way for the Wolian school. Among the German apologetists of that period we find Liliandit (Die gute Sache d. göttl. Offenbarung, 1772-'82), Köppen (Die Bibel als ein Werk d. göttl. Weisheit, 1787, 1837), A. F. W. Sack (Vertheidigter Glaube d. Christen, 1773, 2 vols.), Nösselt (Vertheidigung d. christl. Religion, 4th edit. 1774), Jerusalem, of Wolfenbüttel (Betracht. u. d. Wahrheiten d. chr. Relig. 1776), G. Less (d. Religion, etc., 2d ed. 1786, 2 vols.), and J. G. Töllner († 1774). But the most important of all the German apologetists of that time was Friederich Kleuker, who defended Christianity as the scheme of man's salvation, while the contemporary theologians chiefly defended the doctrines and morals of the Gospel. His principal works are, Wahrheit u. göttl. Ursprung d. Christenthums (Riga, 1787-94); Entersokh. d. Gründe für d. Aechtheit u. Glaubwürdig. u. schriftl. Urkunden d. Christenthums (Hamb, 1797-1800), and Versuch u. d. Sohn Gottes unter d. Menschen (2d ed. 1795). In the German Roman Catholic Church we find the Wolian B. Stattler (1771), P. Opfermann (1779), Beda Mayr (1783), and S. von Storchenau, author of the Philosophie der Religion (1772-89). The German theologians, however, allowed themselves to be led into a sort of Biblical deism, which was opposed by Storr, and especially by J. C. Lavater († 1801), who considered faith as the result of the inward feeling of the power of the Gospel, not to be attained by learned demonstrations. The further development of theology in Germany led to the strife between Rationalism and Supranaturalism, and thus apologetics were merged into polemics, in which the fundamental questions of the Christian faith were freely discussed. This is the time of Reinhard's Ge- ständnisse, and Röhr's anonymous Briefe u. d. Rationalismus (Aix la Chapelle, 1813, 1818); on the other side we find Steudel's Halbbarkeit d. Glaubens (Stuttg. 1814), Zölllich's Briefe u. d. Supranaturalismus (1821), Sartorius's Religion unserer Zeit. d. Grenzen d. Vernunft (Marb. 1822), and similar works by Tittmann (1816). The attempts at conciliation of Kähler, of Königsberg (1818), Klein (1819), Schott (1826), etc., proved unavailing. The number of works published on both sides increased daily. Most of them are, however, forgotten now, and the only ones which have retained any importance are C. L. Nitzsch's De Revelatione religionis externæ cademque publica (1808), and De discrimine verit. Imperatorie et Didactica (1830), in which he separates religion and revelation, and attempts to give a complete theory of the latter, blending, to use C. J. Nitzsch's expression, "formal supranaturalism with material rationalism." In the school of Tübingen a new apologetic method, which we may call scientific, arose under the influence of Storr and of his followers. Its great defect, perhaps, is that it makes a science of faith. Among the principal works in that line we find Peter Erasmus Müller's Kristelig Apologetik (Kopenh. 1810), G. S. Francke's Entwurf einer Apolog. der christl. Religion (Altona, 1817). Next to these must be placed the articles of Heubner, of Wittenberg, in Ersch and Gruber's Allg. Encyclopædie (iv, 451-461), K. W. Stein's Apologetik d. Christenthums als Wissenschaft dargestellt (Lyz. 1824); and, in the Roman Catholic Church, the apologetic works of Stephen Wiest, of Ingolstadt, Patricius Zimmer, of Brenner's Fundamentierung d. katholischen speculative Theologie (Regens. 1837), and, more recently, the works of Klee (q. v.). Conceived in a different spirit, but fully as ingenious and methodical, are K. F. Brescius's, of Berlin, Apologeten (1804), G. J. Planck's Ueber d. Behandlung, etc., d. historischen Beweises f. d. Göttlichkeit d. Christenthums (Gött. 1821), and especially K. H. Stirn's Apologetik d. Christenthums (1836). In most of the writers named, dogmatic teaching is combined with apologetic. This is still more true of the apologetic works of Schleiermacher and his school (see Schleiermacher, Darstellung d. Theol. Stud. § 40-44), and of the works of Staudenmaier and Sebastian von Drey, Apologetik als wissenschaftl. Nachweisung d. Göttlichkeit d. Christenthums, etc. (3 vols., Mainz, 1828-'47). Other German theologians considered apologetics as a scientific exposition of the fundamental principles of Christianity. Among them we find Steudel, in his Grundzüge einer Apologetik (Tübing. 1830); Heinrich Schmid, of Heidelberg, in the Oppositionslehre, f. Theol. u. Philos. ii. 2 (Jena, 1829, p. 55 sq.); Tholuck, Palmer, etc. Most of the introductory works to the study of dogmatics may be considered as apologetic. Such are Daub's Vorlesungen u. d. Prolegomena z. Dogmatik (1835), Baumgarten-Crusius's u. Religion, Offenbarung u. Christenthum (1826), F. Fischer, of Basle's, Religion, Offenbarung, etc. (Tübing. 1828), Tweten, Vorl. u. d. Dogm. (1826, 1838), Staudenmaier's Katholizismus u. d. Neuschlingische Schule (Freiburg, Züsch, f. Theol. 1842, v). Klee also commences his Katholische Dogmatik with a Generale Dogmatik, which is a regular demonstratio Christiana. Strauss himself prefaces his Dogmatik by the "formale Grundbegriffe d. christl. Glaubenslehre."

The life of Jesus by Dr. F. Strauss (1835), who declared the Biblical account of the life of Jesus a myth, and, in his "Christian Doctrine in its Historic Development," attacked even the belief in the personality of God and the immortality of the human soul, called forth a large number of apologetic works, which, more than had been done before, urged the absolute purity and sinlessness of the character of Jesus, and the fact that his personality is unique and without parallel in history, as the strongest argument to be used by the Christian apologetist. The celebrated work of Ullmann (Sündlosigkeit Jesu, Hamburg, 1833) took this ground, and stands at the head of a large class of apologetic literature. In 1863 Renan's Vie de Jésus appeared in France, followed, in Germany, by a new work from Strauss on the same subject, by Schenkel's Charakterbild Jesu, and by Schleiermacher's posthumous "Leben Jesu" (Berlin, 1864). A vast apologetic literature on this subject sprung up in France, Germany, and England, for the literature of which, see JESS. L. Feuerbach, in his work on the "Essence of Christianity" (Wesen des Christenthums, 1841), went even beyond Strauss, to the extreme limit of nihilism. He rejected religion itself as a dream and an illusion, from which, when man awakes, he finds only himself. He became the founder of a new school of materialism, which showed an extraordinary literary productivity, and gained considerable influence. See MATERIALISM. Among the most important apologies of Christianity against this school belong the Letters on Materialism from Fabri (Briefe über den Materialismus), and the works of Böhmer. An "Apology of Christianity from the stand-point of national psychology" was written by R. T. Grau (Semiten und Indogermanen in ihrer Befähigung zur Religion und Wissenschaft. Eine Apologie des Christenthums vom Standpunkte der Völkerpsychologie (Stuttgart, 1864, 8vo) for the purpose of refuting the objections made by Renan, Strauss, and others, to the universal character of the Christian religion on account of its Semitic origin. As Strauss, Renan, Feuerbach, and many other modern opponents denied the possibility of miracles, and made this their chief argument against the truth of supernatural Christianity, a considerable number of works was called forth in defence of miracles, all of which are intended to be more or less apologies of Christianity. See the most important works of this class under MIRACLES.

One of the ablest German apologetic works of modern times is Auberlen's Göttliche Offenbarung (Basil. vol. i, 1861; vol. ii, 1864), which, unfortunately, was left incomplete by the death of the author in 1864. See AUBERLEN. Among the recent works which are more popular than scientific, none has produced a more profound sensation than Guizot's Méditations sur l'Essence de la Religion Chrétienne (Paris, 1864; translated into English, German, and most of the European languages). Guizot undertakes an apology of those fundamental doctrines of Christianity which are common to both evangelical Protestants and Roman Catholics, and he treats, in succession, of creation, revelation, inspiration, the essence of God, the person and the work of Christ, and he particularly dwells on the belief in inspiration. Luthardt's Apologetische Vorträge (Lips. 1864) are ten lectures, held at Leipsic, to show the fundamental difference between the two views of the world (Weltanschauung) which now dispute with each other the control of modern society, and the ability of Christianity alone to furnish a satisfactory solution of the problem of human life with all its mysteries. Similar is a posthumous work by Thom. Wizenmann (died 1787, q. v.). Zur Philosophie und Geschichte der Offenbarung (Basil. 1864). The author was a contemporary of Kant, Jacoby, Hermann, Hamann, and Lavater, by all of whom he was highly esteemed. Auberlen, who published the above edition, called attention to his importance as an apologist in the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie for 1864. Other apologetic works recently published in Germany are Gess and Riggenbach's Apologetische Beiträge (Basil. 1863); a collection of ten lectures by Auberlen, Gess, Preiswerk, Riggenbach, Stähelin, Stockmeyer, under the title Zur Verantwortung des christlichen Glaubens (Basil. 1861, 8vo); Vosen (Rom. Cath.), Das Christenthum und die Einsprüche seiner Gegner (Freiburg, 1864, 8vo); Hettinger (Rom. Cathol.), Apologie des Christenthums (vol. i, Freiburg, 1863, 8vo); Hillen (Rom. Cathol.), Apologie des Christenthums (Warendorf, 1863); Zezschwitz, Zur Apologie des Christenthums nach Geschichte und Lehre (Leips. 1866, 8vo). A new monthly, entitled Beweis des Glaubens, devoted entirely to apologetics, was commenced in 1865 at Gütersloh. It has the services of Andrea, Zöckler, and Grau, the two latter of whom are authors of apologetical works mentioned above.

2. French.—At the head of modern French apologetics, of course, stands Pascal (q. v.); Huet's Démonstration Évangélique (2d ed. 1680) followed; also Houtteville, mentioned above (1722). Among the Roman Catholics, Fénelon, Lettres sur la Religion (1718); Le Vassor (1718); Lamy (1715); D'Aguesseau († 1751); among Protestants, Abbadié (q. v. † 1727); Jacquelot († 1708); in answer to the French encyclopaedists especially, Abbé Guéné, the author of Moïse vengé (1769); Bergier, in his Traité historique et Dogmatique de la vraie Religion (Paris, 2d ed. 1780, 12 vols.; Bamberg, 1813, 12 vols.). F. A. Chateaubriand also sought to prove the heavenly origin of Christianity in his Génése du Christianisme (Paris, 1802; often reprinted and translated), and in his Les Martyrs. The deficiencies of French apologetics are sharply noted by Chassay, Introduction aux Démonstrations Évangéliques (Migne, Paris, 1858, 8vo). The Romanist reactionary school, headed by de Maistre (1753-1821), mingles apologetics with defence of Romanism, and of the absolute authority of the church (see Morell, History of Modern Philosophy, chap. vi, § 2). A school of ultra Rationalists has lately sprung up in France, of which Colani and Réville are types. See RATIONALISM. The Evangelical school, on the other hand, has produced able advocates of Christianity in Vinet (q. v.); Pressensé (see the Revue Chrétienne, passim), and Astic, Les Deux Théologies (Geneva, 1863). Among modern French apologetics we notice the Roman Catholics R. de la Mennais († 1854) and Frayssinous († 1841). They, however, like de Maistre, so identify Christianity with Roman Catholicism that their works are available only for those of their own church. In the Reformed Church, E. Diodati, of Geneva, addresses his Essai sur le Christianisme especially to the will. For the numerous writers in answer to Renan, see the Bibliography under JESS.

The Abbé Migne has published a vast collection of the Christian apologetics in 18 vols., with an introductory volume, and a concluding volume on the present state of apologetic science and of scepticism, making 20 vols. in all. We deem it worth while to give the whole title of this great work, which is a repository of apologetics: DEMONSTRATIONS ÉVANGÉLIQUES de Tertullien, Origène, Eusèbe, S. Augustin, Montaigne, Bacon, Grotius, Descartes, Richelieu, Arnauld, de Choiseul du Plessis-Praslin, Pascal, Fénelon, Nicole, Boyle, Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Locke, Lami, Burnet, Malebranche, Lesley, Leibnitz, la Bruyère, Fénelon, Huet, Clarke, Dugnet, Stanhope, Bayle, Leclerc, du Pin, Jacquelot, Tillotson, de Haller, Sherlock, le Moine, Pope, Leland, Racine, Massillon, Dittton, Derham, d'Aguesseau, de Polignac, Saurin, Butler, Warburton, Tournemine, Bentley, Littleton, Seed, Fabricius, Addison, de Bernis, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Para du Phanjas, Stanislas I, Turgot, Stettler, West, Beauzée, Bergier, Gerbillon, Thomas, Bonnet, de Crillon, Euler, Delamarre, Caraccioli, Jennings, Duhamel, S. Liguori, Butler, Bullet, Vauvenargues, Guénard, Blair, de Pompidan, de Luc, Porteus, Gérard, Diessbach, Jacques, Lamourette, Laharpe, le Coz, Duvoisin, de la Luzerne, Schmitt, Poynter, Moore, Silvio Pellico, Lingard, Brunati, Manzoni, Paley, Perrone, Lambruschini, Dorléans, Campien, Fr. P'érénès, Wiseman, Buckland, Marcel de Serres, Keith, Chalmers, Dupin aîné, Grégoire XVI, Cattet, Milner, Sabatier, Bolgeni, Morris, Chassay, Lombroso et Consoni; contenant les apologies de 117 auteurs, répandus dans 180 vol.; traduites pour la plupart des diverses langues dans lesquelles avaient été écrites; reproduites Intégralement, non par extraits. Ouvrage également nécessaire à ceux qui ne croient pas, à ceux qui doutent et à ceux qui croient; avec INTRODUCTION aux Démonstrations évangéliques, et Conclusion du même ouvrage (20 vols. imp. 8vo. Paris). It is proper to say that the word intégralement in this title is not correct, as passages in the Protestant writers which impugn Romanism are often omitted.

3. English and American.—The English Deists of the 17th century, Herbert, Hobbes, and Blount, were answered by numerous writers; the literature is given in Leland, Deistical Writers (1754, 8vo), and in Lechler, Geschichte des englischen Deismus. See DEISM. Richard Baxter was probably the earliest original writer on Evidences in the English language. His first publication on the subject was The Unreasonableness of Infidelity (1655, 8vo; Works, vol. xx); followed by The Reasons of the Christian Religion (1667, 4to; Works, xx and xxi); More Reasons (1667, in answer to Herbert; Works, xxi). In these books Baxter shows his usual acuteness, and anticipates many of the arguments of later writers. Farrar (Critical Hist. of Free Thought), strangely enough, omits Baxter from his list of writers given in note 49, from which the following statement is chiefly taken. Locke († 1704) wrote The Reasonableness of Christianity (Works, vol. i); Waterland, Reply to Tindal; Boyle (1626-1691) not only wrote himself on the evidences, but founded the Boyle Lectures [see BOYLE], a series which was mainly composed of works written by men of real ability, and contains several treatises of value. Among the series may be named those of Bentley (1692); Kidder (1694); Bishop Williams (1695); Gastrell (1697); Dean Stanhope (1701); Dr. Clarke (1704-5); Derham (1711); Ibbot (1713); Gurdon (1721); Berriman (1720); Worthington (1766); Owen (1769). Other series of lectures in defence of Christianity followed, both in England and on the Continent, viz., the Moyer Lecture (1719); the Leyden (1753); the Warburton (1772); the Basle (1775); the Bampton (1780); the Hague (1785); the Haarlem (1786); the Hulsean (1820); the Congregational (1833). See each of these heads. The Lowell Lecture (Boston) has similar objects. Among separate treatises of this period, Leslie († 1722), Short Method with the Deists; Jenkin's, Reasonableness of Christianity (1721); Foster, Usefulness and Truth of Christianity, against Tindal; Sherlock, Trial of the Witnesses, against Woolston; Lyttelton, on St. Paul's Conversion; Conybeare, Defence of Revelation (1732); Warburton, Divine Legation of Moses; Addison, Evidences (1730); Skelton, Deism Revealed (Works, vol. iv), may be mentioned. The great work of Bishop Butler, The Analogy of Religion, etc., was the recapitulation and condensation of all the arguments that had been previously used, but possessed the largeness of treatment and originality of combination of a mind which had not so much borrowed the thoughts of others as been educated by them. Balguy's Discourses (3d ed., 1790, 2 vols.), and his Tracts, Moral and Theological (1734, 8vo), are very valuable. In the latter half of the century, the historical rather than the moral evidences were developed. First, the religion of nature was proved: at this point the Deist halted, the Christian advanced further. The chasm between it and revealed religion was bridged at first by probability; next by Butler's argument from analogy, put as a dilemma to silence those who objected to revelation, but capable of being used as a direct argument to lead the mind to revelation; thirdly, by the historic method, which asserted that miracles attested a revelation, even without other evidence. The argument in all cases, however, whether philosophical or historical, was an appeal to reason—either evidence of probability or of fact—and was in no case an appeal to the authority of the church. Accordingly, the probability of revelation having been shown, and the attacks on its moral character parried, the question became, in a great degree, historical, and resolved itself into an examination either of the external evidence arising from early testimonies, which could be gathered to corroborate the facts and to vindicate the honesty of the writers, or of the internal critical evidence of undesigned coincidences in their writings. The first of these occupied the attention of Lardner (1684-1768). His Credibility was published 1727-57; the Collection of Ancient Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, 1764-7. The second and third branches occupied the attention of Paley, the one in the Evidences, the other in the Horæ Pauline. Paley's argument has been extended to the Gospels and other parts of Scripture by Blunt, Undesigned Coincidences, etc. (3d ed. 1850; compare also his Essay on Paley, reprinted from the Quarterly Rev. Oct. 1828). Before the close of the century the real danger from Deism had passed, and the natural demand for evidences had therefore, in a great degree, ceased. Consequently, the works which appeared were generally a recapitulation or summary of the whole arguments, often neat and judicious (as is seen at a later time in Van Mildert, Boyle Lectures, vol. ii, 1805; and in Chalmers, Works, vol. i-iv), or in developments of particular subjects, as in Watson's Apology, in reply to Gibbon and Paine, or in Graves on the Pentateuch (1807).

It is only in recent years that a species of eclecticism, rather than positive unbelief, has arisen in England, which is not the legitimate successor of the old deism, but of the speculative thought of the Continent; and only within recent years that writers on evidences have directed their attention to it. In the Bampton Lectures (q. v.), which, as one of the classes of annually recurring volumes of evidences, is supposed to keep pace with contemporary forms of doubt, and may therefore be taken as one means of measuring dates in the corresponding history of unbelief, it is not until about 1852 that the writers showed an acquaintance with these forms of doubt. The first course which touched upon them was that of Mr. Riddle (1852), on the Natural History of Infidelity; and the first especially directed to them was that of Dr. Thomson, On the Atoning Work of Christ (1853, 8vo); which was followed by Mansel, On the Limits of Religious Thought (1858), and by Rawlinson, Hist. Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Records stated anew (1859). It is impossible to cite all the books of Evidences, popular and scientific, published in England and America. But among the most important, besides those already mentioned, are Erskine On Internal Evidence (1821); Buchanan, Modern Atheism (Boston, 1859, 12mo); Shepard, Divine Origin of Christianity (Lond. 1820); Young, The Christ of History (N. Apostasy (ἀποστασία, revolt), a forsaking or renouncing religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration by actions. The Greek term is employed by Paul to designate the "falling away" (ἡ ἀποστασία), which in his time was held in check by some obstacle (τὸ κατέχον, ὃ κατέχον), 2 Thess. ii, 3. It means one of two things; (1) Political defection (Gen. xiv, 4, Sept.; 2 Chron. xiii, 6, Sept.; Acts v, 37); (2) Religious defection (Acts xxi, 21; 1 Tim. iv, 1; Heb. iii, 12). The first is the common classical use of the word. The second is more usual in the N. T.; so St. Ambrose understands it (Comm. in Luc. xx, 2). This ἀποστασία (apostasy) implies ἀποσταται (apostates). An organized religious body being supposed, some of whose members should fall away from the true faith, the persons so falling away would be ἀποσταται, though still formally unsevered from the religious body; and the body itself, while, in respect to its faithful members, it would retain its character and name, might yet, in respect to its other members, be designated an ἀποστασία. It is such a corrupted religious body as this that Paul seems to mean. He elsewhere describes this religious defection by some of its peculiar characteristics. These are seducing spirits, doctrines of demons, hypocritical lying, a seared conscience, a forbidding of marriage and of meats, a form of godliness without the power thereof (1 Tim. iv, 1; 2 Tim. iii, 5). The antitype may be found in the corrupted Church of Christ in so far as it was corrupted. The same body, in so far as it maintained the faith and love, was the bride and the spouse, and in so far as it "fell away" from God, was the ἀποστασία, just as Jerusalem of old was at once Zion the beloved city, and Sodom the bloody city—the Church of God and the Synagogue of Satan. It is of the nature of a religious defection to grow up by degrees. We should not, therefore, be able to lay the finger on any special moment at which it commenced. St. Cyril of Jerusalem considered that it was already existing in his time. "Now," he says, "is the ἀποστασία, for men have fallen away (ἀπίστησαν) from the right faith. This, then, is the ἀποστασία, and we must begin to look out for the enemy; already he has begun to send his forerunners, that the prey may be ready for him at his coming" (Catech. xv, 9). See MAX OF SIN. The primitive Christian Church distinguished several kinds of apostasy; the first, of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who complied so far with the Jews as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without making a formal profession of their religion; thirdly, of those who mingled Judaism and Christianity together; and, fourthly, of those who voluntarily relapsed into paganism. See LIBELLATICI; SACRIFICATI; TRADITORES (FARRAR, s. v.).

At an early period it was held that the church was bound, by the passages of Scripture in which the sin of apostasy is referred to, either entirely to refuse absolution to those excommunicated for it, or at least to defer it until the hour of death. Later, however, this rigor against apostates was modified, and they were restored to the church on condition of certain prescribed penances. Subsequently ecclesiastical usage distinguished between apostasii periculum, inobediens, et irregularitatis. The two latter were reduced in the Roman Church to two species of defection, so that apostasii inobediens was made identical with apostasy from monastic vows (apostasii a monachatu), and apostasii irregularitatis with apostasy from the priesthood (apostasii a clericatu). Both apostasy from monastic vows (when a monk left his monastery without permission of his superior) and apostasy from the priesthood (when a priest returned to the world) were punished by the Council of Chalcedon with the anathema, and later ecclesiastical legislation threatened them with the loss of the privileges of the order and the clerical rank in addition to excommunication, infamy, and irregularity. It required the bishop to imprison such transgressors; but apostates from vows he was required to deliver over to their superiors, that they might be punished according to the laws and customs of their orders. The state governments lent the secular arm to execute these laws. With regard to apostasii from the faith, an ordinance of Boniface III determined that apostates to Judaism should be dealt with as heretics, and this ordinance afterward regulated the treatment not only of such, but of all apostates. Toward apostates to Islamism, or so called renegades, the church exercises this discipline to the present day. Toward the apostates to modern atheism the same discipline could not be exercised, because generally they do not expressly renounce church fellowship. The Roman empire, as early as under the first Christian emperors, regarded apostasy as a civil crime, and punished it with confiscation, inability to give testimony or to bequeath, with infamy, etc. The German empire adopted the provisions of the ecclesiastical legislation, and treated apostasy as heresy. The German criminal practice knew, therefore, nothing of a particular penalty for this crime; and after the criminal code of Charles V abolished the penalty of heresy, the punishment of apostasy generally ceased in the German criminal law. In Protestant Church disciplines no mention is made of apostasy from the Christian religion to Judaism or Islamism, because this kind of apostasy was little to be expected in the provinces for which they were designed. The national churches pursued, however, defection from their communion through the customary stages of church discipline to excommunication. See APOSTATE.

We, in these latter times, may apostatize, though under different circumstances from those above described. The term "apostasy" is perverted when it is applied to a withdrawal from any system of mere polity; it is legitimately used only in connection with a departure from the written truth of God in some form, public or personal.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. vi, s. v. See BACKSLIDING.

Apostate (ἀποστατής, a rebel, renegade), a term used, in its strict sense, by ecclesiastical writers, to designate one who has, either wholly or in part, left the true faith to embrace a false belief, or who has forsaken any holy profession to which he was bound by solemn vows. The term apostate is, in Church history, applied by way of emphasis to the Emperor Julian, who, though he had been nominally Christian when he came to the throne, renounced the Christian religion, and used every means in his power to re-establish paganism in the empire. See HERETIC.

Apostle (ἀπόστολος, from ἀποστέλλω, to send forth). In Attic Greek the term is used to denote a fleet or naval armament. It occurs only once in the Sept. (1 Kings xiv, 6), and there, as uniformly in the New Testament, it signifies a person sent by another, a messenger. It has been asserted that the Jews were accustomed to term the collector of the half shekel which every Israelite paid annually to the Temple an apostle; and we have better authority for asserting that they used the word to denote one who carried about encyclical letters from their rulers. Eusebius states that it is even yet a custom among the Jews to call those who carry about circular letters from their rulers by the name of apostles. To this use of the term Paul has been supposed to refer (Gal. i, 1) when he asserts that he was "an apostle, not of men, neither by men"—an apostle not like those known among the Jews by that name, who derived their authority and received their mission from the chief priests or principal men of their nation. The import of the word is strongly brought out in John xiii, 26, where it occurs along with its correlate, "The servant is not greater than his Lord, neither h' o ho is sent (ἀπόστολος) greater than he who sent him."

It is the opinion of Suicer (The synonym. art. 'Ἀπόστολος) that the appellation "apostle" is in the N. T. employed as a general name for Christian ministers as "sent by God," in a qualified use of that phrase, to preach the word. The word is indeed used in this loose sense by the fathers. Thus we find Archippus, Philemon, Apphia, the seventy disciples (Luke x, 1-17), termed apostles; and even Mary Magdalene is said γενέσθαι τοῖς ἀποστόλοις ἀπόστολος, to become an apostle to the apostles. No evidence, however, can be brought forward of the term being thus used in the N. T. Andronicus and Junia (Rom. xvi, 7) are indeed said to be ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις, "of note among the apostles;" but these words by no means imply that they were apostles, but only that they were well known and esteemed by the apostles. The συνεργοί, the fellow-workers of the apostles, are by Chrysostom denominated συναπόστολοι. The argument founded on 1 Cor. iv, 9, compared with ver. 6, to prove that Apollos is termed an apostle, cannot bear examination. The only instance in which it seems probable that the word, as expressive of an office in the Christian Church, is applied to an individual whose call to that office is not made the subject of special narration, is to be found in Acts xiv, 4, 14, where Barnabas, as well as Paul, is termed an apostle. At the same time, it is by no means absolutely certain that the term apostles, or messengers, does not in this place refer rather to the mission of Paul and Barnabas by the prophets and teachers at Antioch, under the impulse of the Holy Ghost (Acts xiii, 1-4), than to that direct call to the Christian apostleship which we know Paul received, and which if Barnabas had received, we can scarcely persuade ourselves that no trace of so important an event should have been found in the sacred history but a passing hint, which admits, to say the least, of being plausibly accounted for in another way. We know that, on the occasion referred to, "the prophets and teachers, when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, sent them away" (ἀπέλυσαν); so that, in the sense in which we will immediately find the words occurring, they were ἀπόστολοι—prophets and teachers (Vollhagen, De Apost. Ebr. Greifsw. 1704).

In 2 Cor. viii, 23, we meet with the phrase ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν, rendered in our version "the messengers of the churches." Who these were, and why they received this name, is obvious from the context. The churches of Macedonia had made a contribution for the relief of the saints of Judæa, and had not merely requested the apostle "to receive the gift, and take on him the fellowship of ministering to the saints," but at his suggestion had appointed some individuals to accompany him to Jerusalem with their alms. These "apostles or messengers of the churches" were those "who were chosen of the churches to travel with the apostle with this grace [gift], which was administered by him," to the glory of their common Lord (2 Cor. viii, 1-4, 19). With much the same meaning and reference Ephroditus (Phil. ii, 25) is termed ἀπόστολος—a messenger of the Philippian Church—having been employed by them to carry pecuniary assistance to the apostle (Phil. iv, 14-18).

The word "apostle" occurs once in the New Testament (Heb. iii, 1) as a descriptive designation of Jesus Christ: "The apostle of our profession," i. e. the apostle whom we profess or acknowledge. The Jews were in the habit of applying the term מֵשִׁיחַ, from מָשַׁח, to send, to the person who presided over the synagogue, and directed all its officers and affairs. The Church is represented as "the house or family of God," over which he had placed, during the Jewish economy, Moses as the superintendent—over which he has placed, under the Christian economy, Christ Jesus. The import of the term apostle is divinely commissioned superintendent; and of the whole phrase, "the apostle of our profession," the divinely commissioned superintendent whom we Christians acknowledge, in contradistinction to the divinely appointed superintendent Moses, whom the Jews acknowledged.

1. The term apostle, however, is generally employed in the New Testament as the descriptive appellation of a comparatively small class of men, to whom Jesus Christ intrusted the organization of his Church and the dissemination of his religion among mankind. At an early period of his ministry "he ordained twelve" of his disciples "that they should be with him." Their names were: 1. Simon Peter (Cephas, Bar-jona); 2. Andrew; 3. John; 4. Philip; 5. James the Elder; 6. Nathanael (Bartholomew); 7. Thomas (Didymus); 8. Matthew (Levi); 9. Simon Zelotes; 10. Jude (Lebbeus, Judas, Thaddeus); 11. James the Less; 12. Judas Iscariot. (For their names according to Mohammedan traditions, see Thilo, Apoc. i, 152.) "These he named apostles." Some time afterward "he gave to them power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease;" "and he sent them to preach the kingdom of God" (Mark iii, 14; Matt. x, 1-5; Mark vi, 7; Luke vi, 13; ix, 1). To them he gave "the keys of the kingdom of God," and constituted them princes over the spiritual Israel, that "people whom God was to take from among the Gentiles, for his name" (Matt. xvi, 19; xviii, 18; xix, 28; Luke xxii, 30). Previously to his death he promised to them the Holy Spirit, to fit them to be the founders and governors of the Christian Church (John xiv, 16, 17, 26; xv, 26, 27; xvi, 7-15). After his resurrection he solemnly confirmed their call, saying, "As the Father hath sent me, so send I you;" and gave them a commission to "preach the gospel to every creature" (John xx, 21-23; Matt. xxiii, 18-20). After his ascension he, on the day of Pentecost, communicated to them those supernatural gifts which were necessary to the performance of the high functions he had commissioned them to exercise; and in the exercise of these gifts they, in the Gospel history and in their epistles, with the Apocalypse, gave a complete view of the will of their Master in reference to that new order of things of which he was the author. They "had the mind of Christ." They spoke "the wisdom of God in a mystery." That mystery "God revealed to them by his Spirit," and they spoke it, "not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." They were "ambassadors for Christ," and besought men, "in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God." They authoritatively taught the doctrine and the law of their Lord; they organized churches, and required them to "keep the traditions," i. e. the doctrines and ordinances delivered to them" (Acts ii; 1 Cor. ii, 16; ii, 7, 10, 13; 2 Cor. v, 20; 1 Cor. xi, 2). Of the twelve originally ordained to the apostleship, one, Judas Iscariot, "fell from it by transgression," and Matthias, "who had companied" with the other apostles "all the time that the Lord Jesus went out and in among them," was by lot substituted in his place (Acts i, 17-26). Saul of Tarsus, afterward termed Paul, was also miraculously added to the number of these permanent rulers of the Christian society (Acts ix; xx, 4; xxvi, 15-18; 1 Tim. i, 12; ii, 7; 2 Tim. i, 11). See DISCIPLES (Twelve).—Kitto, s. v.

2. The number twelve was probably fixed upon after the analogy of the twelve tribes of the Israelites (Matt. xix, 28; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 323; comp. Tertull. c. Marcion, iv, 415), and was so exact that the apostles are often termed simply "the Twelve" (Matt. xxvi, 14, 47; John vi, 67; xx, 24; 1 Cor. xv, 5). Their general commission was to preach the gospel. (See generally Cave, Hist. of the Apostles, Lond. 1677; Spanheim, De apostolatu, in his Dissert. hist. quaternio, Lugd. B. 1679; Budde Eccles. apost. Jen. 1729; Burmann, Erercit. acad. ii, 104 sq.; Hess, Gesch. u. Schriftl. d. Apostel. Trar. 1821; Planck, Gesch. des Christenth. Gött. 1818; Wilhelm, Christi Apostel, Heitdelb. 1825; Capelli Hist. apost. illustr. Geneva. 1634, Salmur. 1683, Frckf. 1691; Von Einem, Historia Chr. et Apostol. Goett. 1758; Kullmann, De apostolis, Rint. 1789; Stanley, Sermons on the Apostolic Age, Oxf. 1847, 1852; Rénan, Les Apôtres, Paris, 1866.) They were uneducated persons (E. Lami, De eruditione apostolorum, Flor. 1738) taken from common life, mostly Galileans (Matt. xi, 25), and many of them had been disciples of John the Baptist (John i, 35 sq.). Some of them appear to have been relatives of Jesus himself. See BROTHER. Our Lord chose them early in his public career, though some of them had certainly partly attached themselves to him before; but after their call as apostles they appear to have been continuously with him or in his service. They seem to have been all on an equality, both during and after the ministry of Christ on earth; and the prelatical supremacy of Peter, founded by the Romish Church upon Matt. xvi, 18, is nowhere alluded to in the apostolical period. We find one indeed, Peter, from fervor of personal character, usually prominent among them, and distinguished by having the first place assigned him in founding the Jewish and Gentile churches [see PETER]; but we never find the slightest trace in Scripture of any superiority or primacy being in consequence accorded to him. We also find that he and two others, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, are admitted to the inner privacy of our Lord's acts and sufferings on several occasions (Mark v, 37; Matt. xvii, 1 sq.; xxvi, 37); but this is no proof of superiority in rank or office. Early in our Lord's ministry, he sent them out two and two to preach repentance, and perform miracles in his name (Matt. x; Luke ix.). This their mission was of the nature of a solemn call to the children of Israel, to whom it was confined (Matt. x, 5, 6). There is, however, in his charge to the apostles on this occasion not a word of their proclaiming his own mission as the Messiah of the Jewish people; their preaching was at this time strictly of a preparatory kind, resembling that of John the Baptist, the Lord's forerunner.

Jesus early informed the apostles respecting the solemn nature, the hardships, and even positive danger of their vocation (Matt. x, 17), but he never imparted to them any esoteric instruction, nor even initiated them into any special mysteries, since the whole tendency of his teaching was practical; but they constantly accompanied him in his tours of preaching and to the festivals (being unhindered by their domestic relations, comp. Matt. xviii, 14; 1 Cor. ix, 5; see Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii, 20; Schmid, De apostolis uroratis, Helmst. 1704, Viteb. 1734; comp. Deyling, Observ. iii, 469 sq.; Pfaff, De circumductione soror. mulierum apostolica, Tubing. 1751; Schulthess, Newest. theol. Nachricht, 1828, i, 130 sq.), beheld his wonderful acts, listened to his discourses addressed to the multitude (Matt. v, 1 sq.; xxiii, 1 sq.; Luke iv, 13 sq.), or his discussions with learned Jews (Matt. xix, 13 sq.; Luke x, 25 sq.); occasionally (especially the favorite Peter, John, and James the elder) followed him in private (Matt. xvii, 1 sq.), and conversed freely with him, eliciting information (Matt. xv, 15 sq.; xviii, 1 sq.; Luke viii, 9 sq.; xii, 41; xvii, 5; John ix, 2 sq.) on religious subjects, sometimes with respect to the sayings of Jesus, sometimes in general (Matt. xiii, 10 sq.), and were even on one occasion themselves incited to make attempts at the promulgation of the Gospel (Matt. vi, 7 sq.; Luke ix, 6 sq.), and with this view performed cures (Mark vi, 13; Luke ix, 6), although in this last they were not always successful (Matt. xvii, 16). They had, indeed, already acknowledged him (Matt. xvi, 16; Luke ix, 20) as the Messiah ($\bar{\omega}$ Χριστός τοῦ Θεοῦ), endowed with miraculous powers (Luke ix, 54), yet they were slow in apprehending the spiritual doctrine and aim of their Master, being impeded by their weak perception and their national prepossessions (Matt. xv, 16; xvi, 22; xvii, 20 sq.; Luke ix, 54; John xvi, 12), inasmuch that they had to ask him concerning the obvious import of the plainest parables (Luke xii, 41 sq.), and, indeed, they themselves at times confessed their want of faith (Luke xvii, 5); nor even at the departure of Jesus from the earth, when for two or three years they had been his constant and intimate companions (Matt. xvi, 21), were they at all mature (Luke xxiv, 21; comp. John xvi, 12) in the knowledge appropriate to their mission (see Vollborth, De discip. Christi per gradus ad dignitatem et potent. Apostolor. erectis, Gott. 1750; Bagge, De sapientia Christi in electione, institutione et missione Apostolor. Jen. 1754; Ziez, Quomodo notio de Messia in animis Apost. sensim sensimque clarior accepit lucem, Lubec. 1793; Liebe, in Augusti, N. theol. Blatt. II, i, 42 sq.; Ernesti, De proclama. Chr. in Apost. institutionis sapientia, Gott. 1824; Neander, Leb. Jes. p. 229 sq.; comp. also Mahn, De rita qua Apost. Jesu doctrinam dicam. melius perspexerint, Gott. 1809). Even the inauguration with which they were privileged at the last supper with Jesus under so solemn circumstances (Matt. xxvi, 26 sq.; Mark xiv, 22 sq.; Luke xxii, 17 sq.) neither served to awaken their enthusiasm, nor indeed to preserve them from outright faithlessness at the death of their Master (Matt. xvi, 14 sq.; Luke xxiv, 13 sq., 36 sq.; John xx, 9, 25 sq.). One who was but a distant follower of Jesus and a number of females charged themselves with the interment of his body, and it was only his incontestable resurrection that gathered together again his scattered disciples. Yet the most of them returned even after this to their previous occupation (John xxi, 3 sq.), as if in abandonment of him, and it required a fresh command of the Master (Matt. xxviii, 28 sq.) to direct them to their mission, and collect them at Jerusalem (Acts i, 4). Here they awaited in a pious association the advent of the Holy Spirit (John xx, 22), which Jesus had promised them (Acts i, 8) as the Paraclete (John xiv, 26; xvi, 13); and soon after the ascension of their teacher, on the Pentecost established at the founding of the old dispensation, they felt themselves surprised by an extraordinary phenomenon (see Schulthess, De Charismatib. Spir. Sancti, Leipz. 1818; Schulz, Geistesgaben der ersten Christen, Bresl. 1836; Neander, Planting, i, 11 sq.), resulting in an internal influx of the power of that Spirit (Acts ii); and thereupon they immediately began, as soon as the vacancy occasioned by the defection of Judas Iscariot had been filled by the election of Matthias (Acts i, 15 sq.), to publish, as witnesses of the life and resurrection of their Lord, the Gospel in the Holy City with ardor and success (Acts ii, 41). Their course was henceforth decided, and over much that had hitherto been dark to them now beamed a clear light (John ii, 22; xii, 16; see Henke, in Pott's Sylloge, i, 19 sq.).—Wiener, s. v.

3. Under the eyes of the apostles, and not without personal sacrifice on their part, the original Christian membership at Jerusalem erected themselves into a community within the pale of Judaism, although irrespective of its sacred rites, with which, however, they maintained a connection (Acts iii-vii), and the apostolical activity soon disseminated the divine word among the Samaritans likewise (Acts viii, 5 sq., 15), where already Jesus had gained some followers (John iv). In the mother Church at Jerusalem their superior dignity and power were universally acknowledged by the rulers and the people (Acts v, 12 sq.). Even the persecution which arose about Stephen, and put the first check on the spread of the Gospel in Judæa, does not seem to have brought peril to the apostles (Acts viii, 1). Here ends, properly speaking (or rather, perhaps, with the general visitation hinted at in Acts ix, 32), the first period of the apostles' agency, during which its centre is Jerusalem, and the prominent figure is that of Peter. Agreeably to the promise of our Lord to him (Matt. xvi, 18), which we conceive it impossible to understand otherwise than in a personal sense, he among the twelve foundations (Rev. xxi, 14) was the stone on whom the Church was first built; and it was his privilege first to open the doors of the kingdom of heaven to Jews (Acts ii, 14, 42) and to Gentiles (Acts x, 11). The next decisive step was taken by Peter, who, not without misgivings and even disapproval on the part of the primitive body of Christians, had published the Gospel on the sea-coast (Acts x, xi); and this led to the establishment of a second community in the Syrian metropolis Antioch (Acts xi, 21), which kept up a friendly connection with the Church at Jerusalem (Acts xi, 22 sq.), and constitutes the centre of this second period of the apostolical history.

But all that had hitherto taken place was destined to be cast into the shade by the powerful influence of one individual, a Pharisee, who received the apostolate in a most remarkable manner, namely, Paul. Treated at first with suspicion, he soon acquired influence and consideration in the circle of the apostles by his enthusiasm (Acts xiii), but, betaking himself to Antioch, he carried forth thence in every direction the Gospel into distant heathen lands, calling out and employing active associates, and resigning to others (Peter: comp. Gal. ii, 7) the conversion of the Jews. His labors form the third apostolical period. From this time Paul is the central character of the apostolical history: even Peter gradually disappears, and it is only after Paul had retired from Asia Minor that John appears there, but even then laboring in a quiet manner. Thus a man who had probably not personally known Christ, who, at least, was not (originally) designated and consecrated by him to the apostleship, yet accomplished more for Christianity than all the directly-appointed apostles, not only in extent, measuring his activity by the geographical region traversed, but also in intensity, since he especially grasped the comprehensive scope of the Christian remedial system, and sought to harmonize the heavenly doctrine with sound learning. It is not a little remarkable that a Pharisee should thus most successfully comprehend the world-wide spirit of Christianity.

4. Authentic history records nothing concerning the apostles beyond what Luke has afforded respecting Peter, John (Acts viii, 14), and the two James's (Acts xii, 2, 17; xv, 13; xxi, 18). Traditions, derived in part from early times (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii, 1), have come down to us concerning nearly all of them (see the Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, which have been usually ascribed to one Abdias, in Fabricii Cod. Apocryph. i, 402 sq.; and Cave's Antiquitates Apostol. at sup.; also Perionii Vita Apostolorum, Par. 1551, Fref. 1774; comp. Lulewitz, Die Apost. Jes. Quedlinb. 1841; Heringa, De vitis apostolorum, Tielæ, 1844), but they must be cautiously resorted to, as they sometimes conflict with one another, and their gradual growth can often be traced. All that can be gathered with certainty respecting the subsequent history of the apostles is that James (q. v.), after the martyrdom of James the greater (Acts xii, 2), usually remained at Jerusalem as the acknowledged head of the fraternity (comp. Acts xii, 17) and president of the college of the apostles (Acts xv, 13; xxi, 18; Gal. ii, 9); while Peter travelled mostly as missionary among the Jews ("apostle of the Circumcision," Gal. ii, 8), and John (all three are named "pillars" of the Christian community, Gal. ii, 9) eventually strove at Ephesus to extend the kindly practical character of Christianity, which had been endangered by Gnostic tendencies, and to win disciples in this temper. From this period it certainly becomes impossible to determine the sphere of these or the other apostles' activity; but it must ever remain remarkable that precisely touching the evangelical mission of the immediate apostles no more information is extant, and that the memory of the services of most of them survived the very first century only in extremely unreliable stories. We might be even tempted to consider the choice of Jesus as in a great measure a failure, especially since a Judas was among the select; but we must not forget, in the first place, that it was of great importance for Jesus to form as early as possible a narrow circle of disciples, i. e. at a time when there was small opportunity for selection (Matt. ix, 37 sq.); in the second place, that, in making the choice, he could only have regard to moral and intellectual constitution, in which respect the apostles chosen probably compared favorably with his other followers; and finally that, even if (as some infer from John ii, 25) the ultimate results had been clearly foreseen by him, they did not (especially after the new turn given to the Christian enterprise by Paul) strictly depend upon this act of his, since, in fact, the successful issue of the scheme justified his sagacity as to the instrumentalities by which it was on the whole carried forward. Some writers (Neander, Leb. Jes. p. 223 sq.) have made out quite an argument for the selection of the apostles from their various idiosyncracies and marked traits of character (Gregorii Diss. de temperamentis scriptorum N. T. Lips. 1710; comp. Hase, Leb. Jes. p. 112 sq.), and Jesus himself clearly never intended that they should all have an equal career or mission; the founding of the Church in Palestine and its vicinity was their first and chief work, and their services in other countries, however important in themselves, were of secondary interest to this. See generally, respecting single apostles and their activity (especially in the N. T.), Neander's Planting and Training of the Prim. Ch. (Hamb. 3d ed. 1841, Edinb. 1843); D. F. Bacon, Lives of the Apost. (N. Y. 1846).

5. The characteristic features of this highest office in the Christian Church have been very accurately delineated by M'Lean, in his Apostolic Commission. "It was essential to their office—(1.) That they should have seen the Lord, and been eye and ear witnesses of what they testified to the world (John xv, 27). This is laid down as an essential requisite in the choice of one to succeed Judas (Acts i, 21, 22), that he should have been personally acquainted with the whole ministerial course of our Lord, from the baptism of John till the day when He was taken up into heaven. He himself describes them as 'those that had continued with Him in his temptations' (Luke xxii, 28). By this close personal intercourse with Him, they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption; and we gather, from his own words in John xiv, 28; xv, 26, 27; xvi, 13, that an especial bestowal of the Spirit's influence was granted them, by which their memories were quickened, and their power of reproducing that which they had heard from him increased above the ordinary measure of man. Paul is no exception here; for, speaking of those who saw Christ after his resurrection, he adds, 'and last of all he was seen of me' (1 Cor. xv, 8). And this he elsewhere mentions as one of his apostolic qualifications: 'Am I not an apostle? have I not seen the Lord?' (1 Cor. ix, 1). So that his 'seeing that Just One and hearing the word of his mouth' was necessary to his being 'a witness of what he thus saw and heard' (Acts xxii, 14, 15). (2.) They must have been immediately called and chosen to that office by Christ himself. This was the case with every one of them (Luke vi, 13; Gal. i, 1), Matthias not excepted; for, as he had been a chosen disciple of Christ before, so the Lord, by determining the lot, declared his choice, and immediately called him to the office of an apostle (Acts i, 24-26). (3.) Infallible inspiration was also essentially necessary to that office (John xvi, 13; 1 Cor. ii, 10; Gal. i, 11, 12). They had not only to explain the true sense and spirit of the Old Testament (Luke xxiv, 27; Acts xxvi, 22, 23; xxviii, 23), which were hid from the Jewish doctors, but also to give forth the New Testament revelation to the world, which was to be the unalterable standard of faith and practice in all succeeding generations (1 Pet. i, 25; 1 John iv, 6). It was therefore absolutely necessary that they should be secured against all error and mistake by unerring inspiration. Accordingly, Christ bestowed on them the Spirit to 'teach them all things,' to 'bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever he had said to them' (John xiv, 26), to 'guide them into all truth,' and to 'show them things to come' (John xvi, 13). Their word, therefore, must be received, 'not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God' (1 Thess. ii, 13), and as that whereby we are to distinguish 'the spirit of truth from the spirit of error' (1 John iv, 6). (4.) Another qualification was the power of working miracles (Mark xvi, 20; Acts ii, 43), such as speaking with divers tongues, curing the lame, etc. (1 Cor. xii, 8-11). These were the credentials of their divine mission. 'Truly,' says Paul, 'the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds' (2 Cor. xii, 12). Miracles were necessary to confirm their doctrine at its first publication, and to gain credit to it in the world as a revelation from God, and by these 'God bare them witness' (Heb. ii, 4). (5.) To these characteristics may be added the universality of their mission. Their charge was not confined to any particular visible church, like that of ordinary pastors, but, being the oracles of God to men, they had 'the care of all the churches' (2 Cor. xi, 28). They had power to settle their faith and order as a model to future ages, to determine all controversies (Acts xvi, 4), and to exercise the rod of discipline upon all offenders, whether pastors or flock (1 Cor. v, 3-6; 2 Cor. x, 8; xiii, 10)."

6. It must be obvious, from this scriptural account of the apostolical office, that the apostles had, in the strict sense of the term, no successors. Their qualifications were supernatural, and their work, once performed, remains in the infallible record of the New Testament, for the advantage of the Church and the world in all future ages. They are the only authoritative teachers of Christian doctrine and law. All official men in Christian churches can legitimately claim no higher place than expounders of the doctrines and administrators of the laws found in their writings. Few things have been more injurious to the cause of Christianity than the assumption on the part of ordinary office-bearers in the Church of the peculiar prerogatives of "the holy apostles of our Lord Jesus." Much that is said of the latter is not at all applicable to the former; and much that admits of being applied can be so, in truth, only in a very secondary and extenuated sense. See SUCCESSORS.

The apostolical office seems to have been pre-eminently that of founding the churches, and upholding them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders; all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (comp. 1 Cor. ix, 1), being impossible. The ἐπίσκοπος, or "bishop" of the ancient churches coexisted with, and did not in any sense succeed, the apostles; and when it is claimed for bishops or any church officers that they are their successors, it can be understood only chronologically, and not officially. See SUCCESSORS.

7. In the early ecclesiastical writers we find the term ὁ ἀπόστολος, "the apostle," used as the designation of a portion of the canonical books, consisting chiefly of the Pauline Epistles. "The Psalter" and "the Apostle" are often mentioned together. It is also not uncommon with these writers to call Paul "The Apostle," by way of eminence.

The several apostles are usually represented in mediæval pictures with special badges or attributes: St. Peter, with the keys; St. Paul, with a sword; St. Andrew, with a cross; St. James the Less, with a fuller's pole; St. John, with a cup and a winged serpent flying out of it; St. Bartholomew, with a knife; St. Philip, with a long staff, whose upper end is formed into a cross; St. Thomas, with a lance; St. Matthew, with a hatchet; St. Matthias, with a battle-axe; St. James the Greater, with a pilgrim's staff and a gourd-bottle; St. Simon, with a saw; and St. Jude, with a club. (See Lardner, Works, v, 255-vi, 361.)

For the history of the individual apostles, see each name (Mant, Biog. of the Apostles, Lond. 1840).

Apostles' Creed. See CREED.

Apostolic, Apostolical, belonging or relating to the apostles, or traceable to the apostles. Thus we say, the apostolical age, apostolical character, apostolical doctrine, constitutions, traditions, etc. The title, as one of honor, and likely also to imply authority, has been falsely assumed in various ways. Thus the pretended succession of bishops in the prelatial churches has been called Apostolical Succession. See SUCCESSION. The Roman Church calls itself the Apostolical Church (q. v.), and the see of Rome the Apostolical See (sedes apostolica). The pope calls himself the Apostolical Bishop. At an early period of the church every bishop's see was called by courtesy an apostolical see, and the term implied, therefore, no pre-eminence. The first time the term apostolical is attributed to bishops is in a letter of Clovis to the council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not in it expressly denominate them apostolical, but apostolici sede dignissimi, highly worthy of the apostolical see. In 581 Guntram calls the bishops assembled at the council of Maçon apostolical pontiffs. In progress of time, the bishop of Rome increasing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem having fallen into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his church alone. At length, some of the popes, and St. Gregory the Great, not content to hold the title by this tenure, began to insist that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right as the successors of St. Peter. In 1019 the council of Rheims declared that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal church. Hence a great number of apostolicals: apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical chamber, apostolical brief, apostolical vicar, apostolical blessing, etc., in all of which phrases the name apostolical is identical with papal.—See Elliott, Delineation of Romanism, bk. iii, ch. v; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. ii and xvii; Hook, Ch. Dictionary, s. v.

Apostolic Age, that period of church history which extends from the day of Pentecost to the death of the last surviving apostle (John).

With the rise of Rationalism in Germany the authenticity of several books of the New Testament, and consequently the history of the apostolical age, became a matter of doubt, and the subject of critical investigation. The first who undertook to reconstruct the history of the apostolical age was Semler, who, in a number of treatises, insisted on a distinction being made between that which is of permanent value in the primitive history of Christianity and that which is temporary and transitory, and pointed to the great influence which the opposition between Jewish Christianity and the Pauline school had upon the formation of the church. Under the treatment of Semler the early Christian Church was eviscerated of all life, and nothing left but a dry abstraction. The same may be said of the works of Professor Planck, of Göttingen (especially his Geschichte der christlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung), though they are in some respects valuable. From the degradation of the apostolical age by these and many other writers of similar views, it was rescued by the theologians of the new evangelical school, especially Neander (Geschichte der Pflanzung und Leitung der christlichen Kirche durch die Apostel, Hamburg, 1832, 4th edition, which reviews all the works that had been published since the appearance of the first edition), who shows throughout as deep piety as critical acumen. In the mean time, however, an entirely new view of the apostolical age was developed by Professor F. C. Baur and his disciples, the so-called Tübingen School (q. v.), the first and most important manifesto of which was the Life of Jesus by Strauss, while the entire theory was most completely exhibited in Baur's Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi (1845, 8vo), and in Schwegler, Nachapostolisches Zeitalter (Tübingen, 1846, 2 vols.). This school rejected the authenticity of most of the books of the New Testament, and regarded them only as sources of information for the "Post-apostolical Age." The essential points of this new theory are: (1) that, in the minds of Christ and the first apostles, the new religion was only a development or perfection of Judaism, and the same with what was later called Ebionism; (2), that Paul, in opposition to the other apostles, founded Gentile Christianity, quite a distinct system; (3), that Ebionism and Paulinism were reconciled in the 2d century by a number of men of both parties who then wrote Luke's Acts of the Apostles and several of the apostolical epistles; and on the basis of this reconciliation the Christian Church was built. (For an account of it, see Schaff, Apostolic Age, § 36; London Eclectic Review, June, 1853.) See TUBINGEN SCHOOL. The subject called forth a very animated discussion and a numerous literature, and the theologians of Tübingen gradually became more moderate in their destructive criticism. The work of Ritschl on the Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, Bonn, 1850) deserves especial credit in this respect. Among the works on the orthodox side which were called forth by this discussion were those of Baumgarten (Die Apostelgeschichte, Brunswick, 1852, 2 vols.), Trautman (Die apostolische Kirche, 1848), and G. V. Lechler, Die apost. liche und nachapostolische Zeitalter (Stuttgart, 1857, 21 cd.).

As the critics of the Tübingen school greatly differed in their views respecting the authenticity of the several books of the New Testament, the question arose what parts of the history of the apostolical age can be established with certainty by the books of the New Testament considered separately? The Tübingen school did not reject the authenticity of the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians. Its opponents therefore showed that we find in these epistles the basis (1) of the historical appearance and the divine-human nature of Christ, which is more fully developed in the Gospels; (2) of a congregation which the Lord himself collected from Judaism, and the guidance of which was afterward transferred to the apostles, who were fitted out for their office through the Holy Spirit and the appearances of the risen Lord; (3) of the additional vocation of Paul to the apostolic office, and, more specially, to the office of apostle of the Gentiles; (4) of the equal rights of the Gentiles in the Christian Church. The Acts of the Apostles were regarded by the Tübingen school as an untrustworthy novel, invented for the purpose of reconciling the schools of Peter and Paul, and irreconcilable in many of its statements with the epistles of Paul. Those who combated this view showed that the essential points of the book are in the best harmony with the epistles. An important work proving the authenticity of the Acts is Wieseler's Chronologie des apostolischen Zeitalters (Goettingen, 1848). The Johannean (and, in general, apostolic) origin of the Revelation was even denied by men like Lücke and Neander, on the ground that the Revelation and the fourth Gospel could not have proceeded from the same author. Professor Baur and the Tübingen school rejected, on the same ground, the authenticity of the fourth Gospel, while they defended the Johannean origin of the Revelation. The Book of Revelation agrees with John's Gospel in recognising the higher, divine nature of Christ.

The first three Gospels shed but little light on the different tendencies of the apostolic age, though it is generally agreed that the first is of a decidedly Jewish-Christian character, while the third clearly shows the Paulinism of its author. The other books of the New Testament are partly looked upon as leaning on the Pauline tendency (the Epistle to the Hebrews), partly on the Jewish Christians (Epistle of James), and partly on both (Epistles of Peter and Judas). From them, as well as from the earliest apostolical fathers (Barnabas, Clement of Rome, etc.), additional details on the difference of views in the apostolic age were derived.

The apostolic age begins with the time when the apostles themselves began to take an active part in the building of the Christian church; that is, in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost. It coincides, therefore, with the beginning of the Acts. It closes with the cessation of the authority and the immediate influence of the apostles. For the churches in different countries, the apostolic age therefore lasts as long as their immediate guidance through one of the apostles was possible.

The name of apostles is given, 1, to the original twelve, to whom, after the fall of Judas, another was added, to keep up the correspondence with the number of the tribes of Israel; 2, to Paul, and some of his companions. All these had a divine authorization to found congregations and to establish doctrine and institutions. They possessed this authority because they were sent by the Lord himself, not because they were exclusively filled by the Lord with the Spirit, which, on the contrary, was to remain with the church forever.

Gentile and Jewish Christianity must be regarded as two forms of one spirit, which are in inner harmony with each other, and supply each other, and together represent a unity which was consummated in the minds of at least the chief apostles. The union was fully cemented at the apostolical council at Jerusalem, at which the apostles for the Jewish Christians and those for the Gentiles mutually recognised each other. The accounts of this council do not conflict, but supply each other.

The question has been frequently discussed to what extent the arrangements made by the apostles can be ascribed to the Saviour himself. With regard to this point, it is safe to ascribe to him the principle, but not the details of execution. The Spirit whom the Saviour left with his disciples organized the church in the name and the power of Jesus. The primitive church offices and the development of the church constitution are pre-eminently a product of the apostolic age. This subject is ably treated by Ritschl in his work on the Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung der alt katholischen Kirche), with particular reference to the works of Rothe (Anfänge der christlichen Kirche), Baur (Ueber den Ursprung des Episcopats), Bunsen (Ignotius von Antiochien), and Schwegler (Nachapostolisches Zeitalter).

The form of worship was undoubtedly very plain, leaving much to the free choice of individual persons and churches; yet its principal features, with regard to the celebration of the Sabbath, the church festivals, and the sacraments, were fixed, and the entire life of the Christian was surrounded with pious customs, partly of new origin and partly derived from Judaism.

In the doctrine of the apostolic age we already find several tendencies, which, however, do not appear as so many different systems, but as different evolutions of one system. Modern criticism distinguishes three phases of doctrine in this period, viz., the Jewish Christian, springing directly from the teaching of Christ and from the circle of his disciples; secondly, the Pauline, as given in his own Epistles, and, in a developed form, in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and thirdly, that of the Johannean Gospel and Epistles. This subject is thoroughly discussed by Matthai (Religionsglaube der Apostel Jesu), Usteri (Paulinischer Lehrbegriff), Hilgenfeld (Johanneischer Lehrbegriff), and others.

The chief opposing systems, in conflict with which the apostolic age developed both its doctrine and its life, were Ebionitism and Gnosticism, the one teaching a Pharisaic confidence in man's own works, and the other a spiritualistic contempt of all works.

The apostolical age is commonly divided into three periods, one extending from the outpouring of the Holy Spirit until the beginning of the public appearance of Paul (about the year A. D. 41), the second until the death of Paul (about 67), and the third, the Johannean age (until the end of the first century). It must, however, be understood that a tendency begun in a former period continued and was further developed in the subsequent one (Herzog, Real-Encyklop. i, 444).

This very important period has received special attention in the more recent church history. The best books are: Neander, Planting and Training of the Christian Church by the Apostles (trans. by Ryland, Lond. 1851, 2 vols. 12mo); Schaff, History of the Apostolic Church (New York, 1853, 8vo); Stanley, Sermons on the Apostolic Age (Oxford, 1847, 8vo); Davidson, The Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament unfolded (2d edit. Apostolical Church, properly, a church framed upon the principles of the apostles. Of these principles the essential one is the doctrine taught by the apostles; and the principle next in importance the order established by them, so far as it can be gathered from their writings. "The apostolicity of the church is an attribute which belongs to it as a Christian society; for no community can establish its claim to the title of church unless there be a substantial agreement between its doctrines and institutions and those of the inspired men whom Christ commissioned to establish his church upon earth" (Litton, On the Church, bk. iii, ch. i). As to the necessary elements of this agreement with the apostles, the Christian churches differ with each other.

In the primitive Church, the term apostolical was naturally and properly used to designate those particular churches which had been founded by the personal ministry of any one of the apostles, viz., the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome. Not unnaturally, too, it was supposed that these churches had superior culture and Christian knowledge, and it therefore became customary for churches in their neighborhood to refer disputed questions of discipline, etc., to them for advice. From these simple beginnings grew up claims to authority, for which the apostles themselves had laid no foundation, either in their writings or in their personal administration (Mosheim, Commentaries, § 21).

The Church of Rome claims to be exclusively the apostolical church. The Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States claim to be apostolical churches, but not exclusively such, as they admit the "apostolicality" of the Greek and Roman churches, while they deny the title to all non-prelatical churches. The ground of this arrogant assumption is the ecclesiastical theory known as the Apostolical Succession (q. v.). See Dens, Theologia, t. ii, § 78; Palmer, On the Church, pt. i, ch. viii; and, for the refutation, Elliott, Delineation of Romanism, bk. iii, ch. ii, § 8; Litton, On the Church, pt. iii. Apostolical Church Directory (αι διαταχαι αι εν ταις Κλημεντας και κανονες εκκλησιαστικοι των αγιων Αποστολων), a work which originated at the beginning of the 31 century, and is extant in several Ethiopic and Arabic manuscripts, and in one Greek. Although it agrees in many points with the seventh and eighth books of the Apostolical Constitutions, as well as with the Epistle of Barnabas, it is yet independent of both. It seems to have originated in a work connected with the Epistle of Barnabas, and which, at the same time, was probably made use of by the author of the seventh book of the Constitutions. The Church Directory is divided into 35 articles, and contains prescriptions of John, and ecclesiastical rescripts of the other apostles on bishops, elders, readers, deacons, and widows, the duties of laymen, and on the question whether women are to take part in conducting religious services. It concludes with an exhortation of Peter to observe these prescriptions. Bickell (Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843, p. 87 sq.) has been the first to call again attention to this collection, which had almost wholly fallen into oblivion. He has also given (p. 107-132), from a Vienna manuscript, the Greek text with German translation, and added the various readings of the Latin translation of the Ethiopic text (from Hiob Ludolf's Commentarius in historium Æthiopicum, p. 314 sq.), the only one which had heretofore been printed. There are important, although not decisive, reasons for the assumption that the "Διαταχαι of the Apostles," mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. l. iii, ch. xxv), are identical with the Apostolical Church Directory (Bickell, p. 98).—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, i, 452.

Apostolical Council is a title properly applied to the first convention or synod of the Christian Church authorities, an account of which is given in Acts xv, A. D. 47. The conversion of Cornelius having thrown open the church to Gentiles, many uncircumcised persons were soon gathered into the communion formed at Antioch under the labors of Paul and Barnabas; but, on the visit of certain Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, a dispute arose as to the admission of such Gentiles as had not even been proselytes to Judaism, but were brought in directly from paganism. To settle this question, the brotherhood at Antioch deputed Paul and Barnabas, with several others, to lay the matter before a general meeting of the apostles and elders at the mother church at Jerusalem, and obtain their formal and final decision on a point of so vital importance to the progress of the Gospel in all heathen lands. On their arrival and presentation of the subject, a similar opposition (and of a warm character, as we find from the notices in Gal. ii) was made by Christians formerly of the Pharisaic party at the metropolis; so that it was only when, after considerable dispute, Peter had rehearsed his experience with reference to Cornelius, and the signal results of the labors of Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles had been recounted, that James, as president of the council, pronounced in favor of releasing those received into the church from Gentilism without requiring circumcision or the observance of the Mosaic ceremonial law. This conclusion was generally assented to, and promulgated in a regular ecclesiastical form, which was sent as an encyclical letter by Paul and Barnabas back to Antioch, to be thence circulated in all the churches in pagan countries. For an elucidation of the heathen practices forbidden in the same document, see DECREE. For a discussion of the chronological difficulties connected with the subject, see PAUL.—Neander, Planting and Training, i, 123 sq.; Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 212 sq.; Kitto, Daily Bible Illustr. viii, 283 sq. Apostolical Fathers, a name used to designate those Christian writers (of whom any remains are now extant) who were contemporary with any of the apostles; that is to say, who lived and wrote before A.D. 120. Historically, these writers form a link of connection between the apostles and the Apologists (q. v.) of the second century. There are five names usually given as those of the Apostolical Fathers, i. e. there are five men who lived during the age of the apostles, and who did converse, or might have conversed with them, to whom writings still extant have been ascribed, viz. Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, Hermas. The following works are generally counted to these writers: 1. The epistle of Barnabas [see BARNABAS]; 2. Two epistles of Clement, bishop of Rome, to the Corinthians [see CLEMENT of Rome]; 3. Several epistles of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch [see IGNATIUS]; 4. An epistle of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, to the Philippians [see POLYCARP]; 5. The epistle (of an unknown author) to Diognetus [see DIOGNETUS]; 6. The book entitled Pastor Hermas [see HERMAS]. Certain fragments of Papias are also commonly included among the Apostolical Fathers.

Of the writings attributed to these fathers, some at least are of doubtful genuineness (on this point, see the individual titles referred to).

There can be no question of the value of these writings to church history, and even to our knowledge of Scripture, not so much for the facts they contain, for these are of slight importance, or for their critical or doctrinal contents, but on account of the illustrations they afford of the practical religious life of the period, and also on account of the quotations they contain from the N. T. Scriptures. "It has often been remarked that there is no period of the Christian church in regard to which we have so little information as that of above thirty years, reaching from the death of Peter and Paul to that of John. There is no good reason to believe that any of the writings of the apostolical fathers now extant were published during that interval. Those of them that are genuine do not convey to us much information concerning the condition of the church, and add but little to our knowledge upon any subject; and what may be gleaned from later writers concerning this period is very defective, and not much to be depended upon. It is enough that God has given us in His Word every thing necessary to the formation of our opinions and the regulation of our conduct; and we cannot doubt that He has in mercy and wisdom withheld from us what there is too much reason to think would have been greatly abused. As matters stand, we have these two important points established: first, that we have no certain information—nothing on which, as a mere question of evidence, we can place any firm reliance—as to what the inspired apostles taught and ordained but what is contained in or deduced from the canonical Scriptures; and, secondly, that there are no men, except the authors of the books of Scripture, to whom there is any thing like a plausible pretence for calling upon us to look up to as guides or oracles" (Cunningham, Historical Theology, vol. i, ch. iv).

It is obvious that the writings of men so near to the time of the writers of the N. T. must be of great importance for the criticism of the N. T., and for the settlement of the canon. Lardner, after giving lists of the citations and allusions to be found in the Apostolical Fathers severally, sums up as follows: "In these writings there is all the notice taken of the books of the New Testament that could be expected. Barnabas, though so early a writer, appears to have been acquainted with the Gospel of St. Matthew. Clement, writing in the name of the Church of Rome to the Church of Corinth on occasion of some discussion there, desires them to 'take into their hands the epistle of the blessed apostle Paul,' written to them, and refers them particularly to a part of that epistle in which he admonished them against strife and contention. He has likewise, in his epistle, divers clear and undeniable allusions to St. Paul's epistle written to the church over which he presided, and in whose name he wrote, not to mention at present other things. 5. Quotations there could not be, as we have often observed, in the book of Hermas; but allusions there are to the books of the New Testament such as were suitable to his design. 6. Ignatius, writing to the Church of Ephesus, takes notice of the epistle of Paul written to them, in which he 'makes mention of them in Christ Jesus.' 7. Lastly, Polycarp, writing to the Philippians, refers them to the epistle of the 'Blessed and renowned Paul,' written to them, if not also, as I imagine, to the epistles sent to the Thessalonians, Christians of the same province, not to mention now his express quotations of other books of the New Testament, or his numerous and manifest allusions to them. 8. From these particulars here mentioned, it is apparent that they have not omitted to take notice of any book of the New Testament which, as far as we are able to judge, their design led them to mention. Their silence, therefore, about any other books can be no prejudice to their genuineness, if we shall hereafter meet with credible testimonies to them. And we may have good reason to believe that these apostolical fathers were some of those persons from whom succeeding writers received that full and satisfactory evidence which they appear to have had concerning the several books of the New Testament" (Lardner, Works, ii, 113 sq.).

The importance of the subject justifies the insertion here of the following elaborate examination of all the citations from the N. T. made by the apostolic fathers, prepared for this work by the Rev. Wolcott Calkins, of Philadelphia. The second epistle of Clement and the larger recension of Ignatius, being regarded as spurious, are not cited. The text used is Hefele's. The abridgments used are Clem., for First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians; Bar., Cath. Epistle of Barnabas; Ign. Eph., for Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians; Ign. Magn., Ignatius to the Magnesians; Ign. Tral., Ignatius to the Trallians; Ign. Rom., Ignatius to the Romans; Ign. Phil., Ignatius to the Philadelphians; Ign. Smyrn., Ignatius to the Smyrnaeans; Ign. Pol., Ignatius to Polycarp; Pol., for Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians; Her. Vis., the Visions of Hermas; Her. Man., the Commands of Hermas; Her. Sim., the Similitudes of Hermas.

1. These fathers bear direct testimony to three of St. Paul's Epistles.—(1.) Clem. 47: "Take in your hands the epistle of Saint Paul the apostle. What did he write to you when the Gospel first began to be preached? (ἢ ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. Comp. Hefele's Latin version). Truly he was moved of the Spirit to write you concerning himself and Cephas and Apollos, because even then you had begun to form factions. But this faction did not lead you into the worst sins, because you yielded to apostles so illustrious, and to a man approved by them." Here the reference to 1

Cor. i, 12, is unmistakable. Paul's inspiration is also claimed.—(2.) Ign. Eph. 12: "Ye are partakers of the sacred mysteries with Paul, . . . who also, throughout his whole epistle (ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ, not 'every ep.' Credner, Einfalt, i, 395, has no ground to claim that this passage has been interpolated from the larger [spurious] recension), makes mention of you in 'Christ Jesus.'" Here the reference to Eph. i, 9; iii, 3, is very striking.—(3.) Pol. 3: "Neither I, nor any other like me, can attain unto the wisdom of the sainted and illustrious Paul, who, when he was with you in the presence of men then living, taught most fully and forcibly the word of truth; and, when absent from you, wrote a letter (ἐπιστολὴς, plur. for sing.; compare De Wette, Einf. i. d. N. T. p. 7, 3d ed. § 150), by which you may be built up in the faith, if you study it attentively." Compare Phil. i, 27.—Pol. 11: "But I have neither perceived nor heard any thing of the kind among you, with whom St. Paul labored, who are [praised] in the beginning of his epistle." (Hefele endorses the conjecture that "laudati" has been lost from the text, with the loss of the Greek in ch. x, xi, and xii.) Comp. Phil. i, 5.

II. A few passages of the N. T. are distinctly quoted, either as the language of the Lord, the apostles, or of "Scripture."—Bar. 4: "Let us beware, therefore, lest we be found, as it is written, Many are called, few are chosen" (Matt. xx, 16; xxii, 14. The signs of quotation in this and the next instance, scriptum est, inquit, are constantly employed by Barnabas in citing from O. T.).—Bar. 7: "So they, inquit, who desire to see me and be received into my kingdom, must reach me through afflictions and sufferings" (Matt. xvi, 24. Compare Hefele, Seuschreiben des Ap. Barn. p. 66+).—Clem. 34: "For, he says, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man, what things he hath prepared for them that wait for him" (1 Cor. ii, 9, almost exactly; while both Paul and Clement differ in synonymes, arrangement, and every thing but sentiment, from the Sept. of Isa. lxiv, 3, 4, whence Paul quotes).—Clem. 46: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus; for he said, Woe to that man; it had been good for that man if he had not been born (Matt. xxvi, 24); rather than offend one of my elect (Matt. xviii, 6), it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about him, and that he were drowned in the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones" (Mark ix, 42; Luke xvii, 2). Similar examples of citing from various gospels under the general designation of λόγοι τοῦ κυρίου may be found in Clem. Alex. Str. m. iii, 18; also frequently in Irenæus and Justin Martyr.—Pol. 2: "Mindful of what our Lord said when he taught, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged (Matt. vii, 1, lit.); forgive, and ye shall be forgiven (Luke vi, 37); be merciful, that ye may obtain mercy (Luke vi, 36); in what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again (Matt. vii, 2); and blessed are the poor, and those who suffer persecution, for theirs is the kingdom of God'" (Matt. v, 3; Luke vi, 20).—Pol. 7: "The Lord said, 'The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak'" (Mark xiv, 28, lit.).—Pol. xi: "Do we not know that the saints shall judge the world, as St. Paul teaches?" (1 Cor. vi, 2, apparently literal, but the Greek is lost. Credner's ground for suspecting the last clause is singular enough—because Polycarp never gives the name of an author cited! Einf. i. d. N. T. p. 445).—Pol. 12: "As is said in these Scriptures, Be ye angry, and sin not (Psa. iv, 5, quoted by Paul without acknowledgment); and, let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Eph. iv, 26; O, and N. T. blended as "scriptures"). These are believed to be the only examples of explicit citations with marks of quotation, except such as may have been taken from the Sept. or the N. T. Alleged misquotations will be discussed in the sequel.

III. Many passages are cited with substantial accuracy, but without indications of quotation.—Bar. 19: "Give to every one that asketh thee" (Luke vi, 30, lit., if with MSS. B K L, 131-57, εἰ be omitted, and τῷ with B; Matt. v, 42, nearly).—Ign. Rom. 3: "For the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor. iv, 18, lit. But the passage is doubtful; not found in anc. Lat. vers., Syrian fragm., nor Syriacs).—Clem. 2: "Ready for every good work" (Titus iii, 1, εἰς for πρός).—Clem. 36: "Who being the brightness of his majesty (μεγαλοπρέπειος for δόξης), is so much better than the angels, as he has obtained a more excellent name" (Heb. i, 3, 4).—Ign. Rom. 6: "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Matt. xvi, 26, slight change in arrangement).—Pol. 1: "In whom, not having seen, ye believe; and believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable" (1 Pet. i, 8, with slight omission).—Pol. 2: "Believing on him that raised our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead, and gave him glory" (1 Pet. i, 21, slight change in arrangement).—Her. Sim. 8: "They denied the name by which they were called" (Jas. ii, 7, far more exact than appears in Eng. versions; quod super eos erat invocatum = τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐσθ' ἵμας [ἀνταρῆς]).—Her. Man. 12, 5: "If ye resist him, he will lice from you with confusion" (Jas. iv, 7).—Pol. 5: "Lust warreth against the spirit (1 Pet. ii, 11); and neither fornicators, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi, 9, 10: the passage is remarkable, because, while many words in Paul are omitted, παῖδοι and ἀρσενοκοῖται, which had acquired a scandalously technical signification, are retained. Comp. the long list of sins in Clem. 35 and Rom. i, 29-32. The resemblance is remarkable).—Pol. 4: "The love of money is a beginning of all evil. Knowing, therefore, that we brought nothing into this world, but neither can we carry any thing out, let us," etc. (1 Tim. vi, 7, the order of clauses transposed. Compare Pol. 8; 1 Pet. ii, 22, 24).—Pol. 2: "Not rendering evil for evil, nor railing for railing" (1 Pet. iii, 9, lit.).—Pol. 7: "For whoever confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is Antichrist" (1 John iv, 3). The following list embraces accurate quotations and very striking resemblances.

IV. Many extended passages in the Ap. Fathers are close imitations of similar passages in N. T.—Clem. 9-12: The examples of the ancient worthies is adduced on the model of Heb. xi. The list not only corresponds—Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Rahab—but many expressions agree. And the magnificent close of the chapter in Heb. is reproduced with little change in Clem. 45. He then begins ch. 46, like Heb. xii, with a reference to these examples for our encouragement. Heb. xii, 1, is, however, reproduced still more accurately in ch. 19.—Clem. 36 is a close imitation of the beginning of Heb. i.—Her. Sim. ix, 21: A paraphrase of the parable of the sower, Matt. xiii, 5-23. (Comp. Herm. Vis. iii, 6. Also, Sim. ix, 20, and Matt. xiii, 7; six, 23. Also, Vis. iv, 3, and 1 Pet. i, 6, 7.)—Pol. 5: The advice to deacons is a remarkable imitation of Paul's charge to Timothy (ch. iii.).—Clem. 49: The praise of charity, closely imitating 1 Cor. xiii; following also Col. iii, 14; 1 Pet. iv, 8; Jas. v, 20; Gal. i, 4; John iii, 16; 1 John iv, 9, 10. There is not a thought in the whole chapter which is not to be found in N. T.

V. Besides the above, there are many expressions apparently taken from the N. T.: also allusions and references too inexact to be called quotations, which singly might appear insignificant, but occurring on every page are weighty arguments. Westcott (Canon N. T. p. 39, 40, 47) gives many examples of coincidence in language of the PP. App. with the N. T.

- (1) Peculiar to Clement and St. Peter: ἀγαθοποιία, ἀελεφότης, ποιῆμων.
- (2) Peculiar to Clement, St. Peter, and St. Paul: ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις, ἀγισμός, ἐλεγκτήρις, ἐνσέβεια, ἐπιπράξετος, ταπεινοφροσύνη, ὑπακοή, ὑπόφρων, φιλὰαδεια, φιλοξενία, φιλόξενος.
- (3) Peculiar to Clement and St. Paul: ἀμεταμέλητος, ἐγκρατεῖσθα, λειτουργός, λειτουργία, λειτουργεῖν, μακαρισμός, οἰκτρομοί, ποδάτεια, ποδάτειν (Polyc.), σερμῶς, σερμῶση, χρηστεῖομα.
- (4) Peculiar to Ignatius and St. Paul, very numerous, e. g.: ἀκόκμιος, ἀναλίγειν, ἰερέαίσιμος, φρωσῶν, etc.
- (5) Peculiar to Ignatius and St. John: ἀγάπη, ἀγαπᾶν, and ὁ οὐρανός instead of οἱ οὐρανοί (St. Paul and Clement).
- (6) Peculiar to Polycarp and St. Paul: ἀσποπλανᾶν, ἀρβαζόν, ἀφλάγγηρος, τὸ καλόν, μεταβολογία, προνεῖν.

Of the allusions and references no enumerations need be given, as they will be found indicated in the foot-notes of every page of Hefele's edition, and massed together in his index.

VI. In a few instances these fathers appear to make misquotations; i. e. they cite as "words of the Lord," or "of Scripture," what is nowhere to be found in the N. T.—So Bar. 4: "The Son of God says let us resist all iniquity, and hold it in hatred." This is not to be found in the N. T., nor, as far as is known, in any apocryphal gospel. It must have been taken from some tradition, or the mere sentiment may have been cited from Jas. iv, 7, or 2 Tim. ii, 19.—3 πειθήτω ἀπὸ ἀκείας; and Psa. cxix, 163—ἀκούε τὴν ἡμῶσα.—Bar. 6: "Behold, saith the Lord, I will make the last things like the first." This may be a loose quotation of Matt. xx, 16. Comp. Ezek. xxxvi, 11.—Clem. 23: "Far from us be this scripture which saith, Wretched are they who are double minded and doubtful; saying, we have heard these things even from the time of our fathers, and, behold, we have grown old, and none of these things have happened to us." This is supposed by some to be taken from some apocryphal source (Coteler, who, however, fails to indicate the precise source). Others regard it as a careless citation of Jas. i, 8, and 2 Pet. iii, 4. Both explanations are unsatisfactory. It may be a mere blunder of Clement.—Ign. Smyr. 3: "And when he came to those who were with Peter, he said unto them, Take, handle me, and see that I am not a disembodied spirit." Probably this passage would never have been suspected as it has been but for the remark of Eusebius (Hist. Ec. cxvi, 26) that he did not know whence Ignat. cited, and the conjecture of Jerome (De Vir. Ill. Ign. n. 16) that it was from the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Pearson suspects an oral tradition. (Comp. Credner, Beitrage, i, 407.) But the imitation of Luke, xxiv, 39, is quite as close as many unchallenged quotations. But the most remarkable fact about these false citations is yet to be mentioned: they are not confined to the N. T. Thus, Bar. 9: "The Scriptures relate that Abraham circumcised three hundred and eighteen men of his own household." A loose combination of Gen. xvii, 26, 27, and xiv, 14.—Clem. 8: Many sentences not to be found are inserted in quotations from the O. T.—Clem. 46: "For it is written, join yourselves with the saints, because all who adhere to them will be sanctified." (Unscriptural, perhaps; certainly not in Scripture.) And again in another place, "With an innocent man thou shalt be innocent, with the elect thou shalt be elect, and with the froward thou shalt be froward" (Psa. xviii, 26; very loosely).—Bar. 7: Ceremonies are quoted from "the prophet" which are only to be found in tradition. (Comp. Justin. Dial. c. Tryph. n. 40; Tertul. adv. Jud. c. xiv; adv. Marc. iii, 7.) Our conclusions from these facts are: 1st. It is wholly incredible that these citations have been made from any apocryphal books of the N. T. now in existence. Very few of them have been traced with any plausibility to such sources, and these have quite as much resemblance to the genuine as to the apocryphal books. 2d. And yet there is no sufficient evidence that these fathers copied from the MSS. of the N. T. The citations absolutely literal are very few and brief, and of the nature of proverbs or maxims, which could not be readily forgotten or varied. (E. g., 1 Cor. ii, 9; Q. Clem. 84; Matt. vii, 1; Qu. Pol. 2; Mark xiv, 38; Qu. Pol. 7; 1 Pet. iii, 9; Qu. Pol. 2.) Citations are expressly made only from Matt., Luke, 1 Cor., and Eph.; and only sixty out of some one hundred apparent references are close imitations. 3d. But the O. T. is quoted quite as carelessly, in many instances, as the New. Very few books of the O. T. are expressly named. The few literal quotations from the O. T. are also of the nature of proverbs. (E. g., Prov. v, 5; Qu. Clem. 30; Prov. x, 12; Qu. Clem. 49.) More false citations from the O. T. are made than from the New; and all these were, of course, mere blunders, while there must have been "words of the Lord" well known in these times not recorded in the Gospels, as we learn from John xxi, 25. St. Paul himself quotes from these in one instance (Acts xx, 35). In fact, the citations of the fathers from the O. T. are not more inexact than those of the N. T. writers. Our Lord himself often varies, both in synonyms, arrangement, and construction, from the Sept., giving only the sentiment. 4th. In a few instances the O. T. is unquestionably quoted through the medium of the New. Passages wholly differing both from the Heb. and the Sept. are reproduced with surprising accuracy. Important additions to texts are made from the N. T., and the whole designated as "Scripture." This argument is unanswerable. Such citations must have been made from the N. T. 5th. Therefore the conjecture that the books of the N. T. were not known to these fathers, and perhaps not in existence in their time, cannot be entertained by any candid mind. With the possible exception of 2 Pet., Jude, and 2 and 3 John, to which few, if any allusions are made, and no certain references, all the books of the present canon are quoted or referred to repeatedly, and often very accurately. The direct testimony to the epistles of Paul are all the more valuable because they are given incidentally, and for a wholly different purpose. A few years later, about A. D. 150, when the authority of the apostolic writings began to be called in question, a list of them, nearly complete, is given in the Muratorian Fragment. They could not have been challenged nor rivalled by apocryphas in the age of the apostolic fathers. These writers must have possessed the books of our present canon, or nearly all of them; but they seldom, if ever, turned to them at the moment of writing. They could cite from the N. T., as they unquestionably did from the Old, with sufficient accuracy for their purpose, merely from recollection. The unrolling of immense parchments, even if they carried them, was a useless trouble in hurried writing, amid the pressure of missionary journeys. If Strauss had made a candid examination of these facts, it is doubtful whether he would have found it to his purpose to make the following admission: "It would undoubtedly be an argument of decisive weight in favor of the credibility of the biblical history could it be shown that it was written by eye-witnesses, or even by persons nearly contemporaneous with the events narrated." (Leben Jesu, i, § 13.)

to show that many of the citations in the ap. fathers, apparently from Scripture, are from the oldest Liturgies. On the use to be made of the apostolical fathers in the history of Christian doctrine, see Dörner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, period i, ch. i; on their value for the history of the church, see Schaff, History of the Christian Church, § 117; Pressensac, Hist. d. trois Prem. Siècles, vol. i; Mosheim, Commentaries, i, 200 sq.; Elliott, Delimitation of Romanism, bk. i, ch. iii; Hase, Church History, 7th ed. § 39. See also Hagenaeh, History of Doctrines, § 26; Reuss, Histoire du Canon, ch. ii; Conybeare, Bampton Lecture, 1839; Hilgenfeld, Die app. LV., Untersuchungen, etc. (Halle, 1853); Clarke, Succession of Sacred Literature, vol. i; Lecler, Apostol. und nachapostol. Zeitalter, Stuttgart, 1857; Bunsen, Christianity and Manhood, vols. v and vi; Freppel, Les Pères Apostoliques (Paris, 1859); Donaldson, Crit. Hist. of Christ. Life and Doctrine from the Death of the Apostles to the Nicene Council (vol. i, Lond., 1865); Illgen, Zeits. für die hist. Theol. (1866, II. f.); and the prolegomena to the editions named below. The best editions are: 1. By Cotelierus, SS. Patrum, qui temporibus apostolicis floruerunt, Opera (Paris, 1672, 2 vols. fol.); a new edition by Clericus, Amsterdam, 1724, 2 vols. fol.). Cotelierus added to his edition the Pseudo-Clementines and the Vindicie Ignatiane by Pearson. 2. By the Oratorian Gallandius, in his Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum; 3. By Russell (Lond. 1746). 4. By Jacobson (2 vols. Oxf. 1838, 2d ed. 1840, 8vo). This edition does not contain the epistle of Barnabas, the epistle to Diognetus, and the Pastor Hermas. 5. Reithmayr (R. C.) Patrum Apostol. Epistole (Monach. 1814, 8vo). 6. Hefele (R. C.), Patrum Apostol. Opera (Tubing. 1839, 4th ed. 1855, 8vo). 7. Dressel, Patrum Apostol. Opera (Leipz. 1863, 2d ed. 8vo); it includes the Greek Pastor Hermas, and the Epistle of Barnabas from Tischendorf's Sinaitic Codex. There is also an English version of the Ap. Fathers (not according to the latest text) by Wake (latest ed. Oxf. 1841, 12mo). See FATHERS.

Apostolical King or Apostolical Majesty, a title of the kings of Hungary conferred by Pope Sylvester II in 1000 upon Duke Stephen I on account of his zeal for the propagation of the Christian faith. It was renewed in 1756 by Clement XIII for Maria Theresa and her successors on the throne of Austria; abolished in 1848, but reassumed (in the form of "Apostolical Majesty") in 1852.

Apostolical Men, a name often given to the assistants and disciples of the apostles. Those among them who left writings received the name Apostolical Fathers (q. v.).

Apostolical Succession. See SUCCESSION.

Apostolici, or APOSTOLIC BROTHERS, (1.) a sect of heretics mentioned by St. Augustine (De Heres., xl), who says that they arrogated to themselves the title of apostolici, because they refused to admit to their communion all persons using marriage, or having property of their own; not that they were heretical, he says, for abstaining from these things, but because they held that those persons had no hope of salvation who did not do so. They were similar to the Encratites, and were also called Apotactici. (2.) A sect with this name arose in the twelfth century, who condemned marriage and infant baptism, also purgatory, prayer for the dead, the invocation of saints, the power of the pope, etc. Many of them were put to death at Cologne (Mosheim, Ch. Hist., cent. xii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 15). (3.) Another apostolic brotherhood was founded by Gerhard Segarelli, of Parma, about A. D. 1260. This brotherhood Pope Nicolas IV endeavored to suppress by various decrees of 1286 and 1290. No heresy of doctrine was proved against the founder; and his only profession was a desire to restore apostolic simplicity in religion. He was imprisoned and banished, but nevertheless his adherents spread through Italy, Germany, France, and Spain. They went about accompanied by women singing, and preaching especially against the corruptions of the clergy. In 1294 two brothers and two sisters were burnt alive at Parma. Segarelli abjured his heresy, but was burnt in 1300 for having relapsed. From this time Dolcino of Milan became the head of this party, who predicted the sudden downfall of the Romish Church. Dolcino, in 1304, fortified, with 1400 followers, a mountain in the diocese of Novara, and plundered for his support, the adjacent country. In 1306 he fortified the mountain Zebello, in the diocese of Vercelli, and fought against the troops of the bishop until he was compelled by famine to surrender in 1307. Dolcino and his companion, Margaretha of Trent, were burnt, with many of their followers. See DULCINISTS. These Apostolici rejected the authority of the pope, oaths, capital punishments, etc. Some Apostolic Brothers are mentioned, A. D. 1311, near Spoleto, and A. D. 1320, in the south of France. The Synod of Lavaur, 1368, mentions them for the last time. The sect continued in Germany down to the time of Boniface IX. Mosheim published an account of them in three books (Helmstadt, 1746, 4to).—Murd. Mosheim, Church Hist., cent. xiii, ch. v; Landon, Eccles. Dict., i, 455; Hase, Ch. Hist., § 294.

Apostolidis, MICHAEL, a theologian and prelate of the Greek church, born toward the close of the 18th century on the island of Crete, died at Athens on Aug. 2, 1862. He studied theology, philosophy, and languages at the German Universities, and became soon after professor at a Greek school at Trieste. When Prince Otho of Bavaria was designated as king of Greece, Apostolidis was called to Munich to instruct him in Greek. Having arrived with King Otho in Greece, he became lecturer on church history and ethics at an ecclesiastical school at Athens, and, in 1837, professor of theology at the University of Athens. When the independence of the Church of Greece had been declared, Apostolidis was sent to Petersburg to establish a closer connection between the Church of Russia and that of Greece. On his return he was appointed archbishop of Patras. Subsequently he became archbishop of Athens and president of the Synod, which position he retained until his death. Apostolidis wrote, besides several contributions to the Greek periodical Λόγος, Εσπερος, of Vienna, a manual of Christian ethics, entitled Τὴν κατὰ Χριστὸν ἠθικήν πραγματείαν (Athens, 1847), first in the ancient Greek, but subsequently also in modern Greek.—Unsere Zeit, vii, 398, 399.

Apostolicity, a so-called "note of the church." See APOSTOLICAL CHURCH; CHURCH.

Apostolini, or Apostles, an order of monks, who most probably took their origin in the 15th century at Genoa, where the convent of St. Roche belonged to them. It seems that there were many hermits who congregated at Genoa about that time, who, on account of the apostolical life which they professed to lead, and their having assumed St. Barnabas, the apostle, as their patron, took the designation of Apostolini, or "Fathers of St. Barnabas." At first the members of the order were laymen, and bound by no vow; but Pope Alexander VI obliged them to the vow, and to live under the rule of St. Augustine, in 1496. Their dress consisted of a gown and scapulary, over which they wore a cloak of gray cloth, with a little hood. They afterward united with the monks of St. Ambrose ad Vennus, then dissolved the connection, then were reunited by Sixtus V, and finally both were suppressed by Innocent X in 1650.—Helyot, Ord. Monast., t. iv; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 455.

Apostolius, MICHAEL, a learned Greek of the 15th century. He delivered the funeral oration over the body of the Emperor Constantine Palaeologus, who was killed in the storming of the city of Constantinople by the Turks. When the city was taken by the Turks in 1453 he escaped to Italy, where, to please Cardinal Bessarion, he wrote against Theodore of Gaza. But his abuse of Aristotle displeased the cardinal, and Apostolius retired into Crete, where he gained a hard livelihood by copying MSS. and teaching children. He died about 1480 at Venice, leaving many manuscripts, which are still extant in European collections.—Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, t. xi; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génér., ii, 314.

Apostool, SAMUEL, a Mennonite, was born in 1638, and was minister of a church of the Waterlanders (a branch of the Dutch Baptists) at Amsterdam. In 1662 he distinguished himself by his opposition to Galenus Hans, who taught that Christianity is not so much a body of opinions as a practical life. Apostool, on the contrary, insisted on the necessity of doctrine, and also of the especial views of the Mennonites. Galenus was charged with Socinianism and acquitted, and Apostool and his friends had to form a separate church. His followers were called Apostoolians. He lived up to nearly the end of the century.—Schyn, Hist. Mennon. p. 327; Hoefer, Biog. Génér., ii, 914; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xvii, ch. v, § 7. See GALENITES; MENNONITES.

Apotactici or Apotactite (from ἀποτάσσειν, to renounce), an ancient sect, who, affecting to follow the evangelical counsels of poverty and the example of the primitive Christians, renounced all their possessions. They seem to have been the same as the Apotolici or the Tatianites. During the persecution of Diocletian they had many martyrs; and subsequently adopted the errors of the Encratites, who deemed marriage and unchastity to be the same thing. The sixth law in the Theodosian Code joins the Apotactite with the Eumonianians and Arians.—Mosheim, Comm. i, 482; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xxii, ch. i, § 6.

Apothecary (ῥητήρ, roket'ach, seasoning, i. e. with aromatics; Sept. ῥοσφόρος, Exod. xxx, 25; xxxvii, 29; Eccl. x, 1), correctly rendered in the margin "perfumer;" so also in Eccles. xxxviii, 8; xlix, 1: the word means also any thing spiced (1 Chron. ix, 30); hence, ointment, confection (Exod. xxx, 35). The holy oils and ointments were properly prepared by one of the priests who had properly qualified himself in Egypt, when unguents were in great use. See ANOINTING. Roberts (Oriental Illustrations, p. 80) states that in Hindoo temples there is a man called Thile-Káran, whose chief business it is to distil sweet waters from flowers, and to extract oils from wood, flowers, and other substances. From our version having rendered the word "apothecary," it would seem to indicate that the business of a perfumer was not distinguished from that of an apothecary in the time of the translators. Thus Shakspeare, a contemporary writer, says,

"An ounce of civet, good apothecary,
To sweeten mine imagination."

Indeed perfumery is almost inseparable from a drug-gist's stock in trade. Sacred oil appears to have been as copiously used by the heathen nations as it was in the Jewish tabernacle and temple, and during the patriarchal economy; the Sanscrit writers prove its retention in the present religious services of India, and that it was adopted in the more ancient we have the authority of Strabo (lib. xv), where he refers to a ceremony which calls to mind the words of the psalmist, that it ran down upon Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments (Psa. cxxxiii, 2). Sir William Ouseley, also (Trav. in Persia, i, 391), mentions the statue of a man at Shapur, which, according to the Nuzhat al-Colûb, princes went on pilgrimages to visit and anoint with oil. See PERFUME.

Ἀρ'παϊμ (Heb. Arpa'im, אַרְפַּאִים, the nostrils; Sept. Ἀρφαίμ v. r. Ἀρφαίμ), the second named of the two sons of Nadab, and the father of Ishi, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 30, 31). B. C. ante 1658.

Apparel (usually designated in Heb. by בְּשָׂמָה, be'ged, "dress," or some form of כְּשָׂמָה, kesumah, "clothing," ἱστοίη, iparapoc, etc.), ORIENTAL, especially Hebrew. See GARMENT; CLOTHING; RAIMENT, etc. This was usually, as the eastern climate necessitated, wide and flowing (comp. Olear, Reisen, p. 307), but concerning its precise cut we find nothing indicated in the O. T. books, except with regard to that of the priesthood. See PRIEST. But as customs change but little among Orientals, we may probably get a pretty exact idea of the ancient Hebrew fashion from a comparison with modern Eastern, especially Arabic costume (see especially Ar-vieux, Trav. iii, 241 sq.; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 62 sq.). See DRESS. The delineations of dress upon the Oriental monuments (such as the ruins of Babylon, Persepolis, Nineveh, and, to some extent, Egypt) are useful for this purpose, especially for the later period (namely, during the exile, when the Jews wore Chaldean garments, Dan, ii, 21). For the earlier period see the Gemara (Shabbath, xvi, 4). Male and female apparel then, as now, did not essentially differ; but a lady was easily recognised for the most part by single pieces of female attire, and especially by ornaments, and moreover the costliness of material in the head-dresses made a distinction between the sexes sufficient to meet the demands of the law (Deut. xxii, 5) forbidding men to wear women's garments and the reverse. (See, however, Josephus, War. iv, 9, 10. The reason usually assigned for this statute is the prevention of confusion, and especially licentiousness, see Mill, Dissert. p. 203 sq.; Michaëlis, Mos. Rech. iv, 349 sq. Others, as Le Clerc after Maimonides, regard the prohibition as a preventive of certain forms of idolatry which required men to sacrifice in female apparel, and the reverse, see Macrob. Satur. ii, 8, p. 22, ed. Bip.; Philoehori Fragm. ed. Siebelis, p. 19 sq.; comp. Jul. Firmic. De errore profan. rel. c. 4; also Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 24 sq.; and generally Pezold, De promiscua vestium utriusque sexus usurpatione, Lips. 1702, and in Ugolini Theaur. xxix. This interpretation is sustained by a statement of Maimonides, More Nerochim, iii, 27; comp. Meyers, Phœnic. i, 445 sq. Many Jews, however, understand the textual expression כְּלֵי אִישׁ , literally "utensils of a man," to signify male weapons, so Onkelos in loc.; a view which is adopted by Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 43.) The subject of female apparel has been especially treated by Schröder (De vestitu mulier. Heb. Lugd. B. 1745) and Hartmann (Hebræerin am Putzische, Amst. 1849). The manufacture of garments was in all ages the business of the women, especially the females of the family, and even distinguished ladies did not excuse themselves from the employment (1 Sam. ii, 19; Prov. xxxi, 22 sq.). See WIFE. The only legal enactment on the subject was that wool and linen should not be used in the same article of apparel (Lev. xix, 19; Deut. xxii, 11), a prescription probably not designed (as thought by Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 11) to forbid the priests any intermixture of materials, but to be explained after the analogy of the foregoing prohibition of heterogeneity (see Michaëlis, Mos. R. iv, 319 sq.). See DIVERSE.

The articles of clothing common to men and women, then, were: (1.) The under garment, כֵּתוֹנֶת , kettoneth, χιτών , or tunic [see COAT], which was held together by the girdle (q. v.), and besides which a linen shirt, שָׂרְיָן , sadin', is sometimes mentioned (Isa. iii, 23; Judg. xiv, 12; Prov. xxxi, 24). In common language of the ancients, a person who had only this under garment on was called "naked" (1 Sam. xix, 24; Job xxiv, 10; Isa. xx, 2; comp. Virg. Geo. i, 229), a term that is sometimes applied also to one poorly clad (Job xxii, 6; Isa. lviii, 7; 2 Sam. vi, 20; see Gesenius, Theaur. p. 1071). Those in high station or travellers (comp. Joseph. Ant. xxii, 5, 7) sometimes wore two under garments, like a double shirt, the outer (which was always longer than the inner) one being then called מֵייל' , meil', arobe or "upper garment" (1 Sam. xv, 27; xviii, 4; xxiv, 5; Job. i, 20). The Greeks and Romans likewise, as perhaps also the Persians, were acquainted with this habit (comp. Herod. i, 195; Ovid, Fasti, ii, 319; Salmas. al Tertull. pall. p. 71); but the custom appears to have been always regarded by the Jews as luxurious (Matt. x, 10; Luke iii, 11; ix, 3; comp. Lightfoot, p. 330; and Groebel, in the Miscell. Lips. xii, 137 sq.). A Chaldee costume was the פַּטִּישׁ , pattish, or mantle (Dan. ii, 3, 21), probably a flowing under-dress (see Gesenius, Theaur. p. 1101). (2.) An over garment [see ROBE], which was thrown around the person, called מִטְּפָח , mitpach', and מִטְּפָחִית , mitpachith, or cloak, palla, otherwise מַעֲטָפֶה , ma'atpahl', or mentilla (Ruth iii, 15; Isa. iii, 22); also אֲדָמֶת , adde'eth, or wide mantle, pallium (Josh. vii, 21; 1 Kings xix, 13; 2 Kings ii, 13), the last designating a particular kind of very loose and flowing robe, sometimes (Gen. xxv, 26; Zech. xiii, 4) lined with fur, such as the Orientals (Turks) even wear in summer (see Thevenot, Voyages, i, 234; Russel, Alippo, i, 127; Harmer, Observ. iii, 4 sq.). Poor people and travellers also used the outer garment as night clothes. See CORCU. Both sexes made, out of the superabundant folds in front, a pocket or lap, קֶרֶן , keren, or "bosom," sinus (Ruth iii, 15; Psa. lxxix, 12; Prov. xvii, 23; 2 Kings iv, 39; Hag. ii, 12; Luke vi, 38; comp. Liv. xxi, 18; Horace, Serm. ii, 3, 171 sq.; Senec. Ep. 19; Joseph. War. v, 7, 4; vi, 3, 3; see Wetstein, i, 636; Kypre, Observ. i, 238), into which the hand was thrust by the indolent (Psa. lxxiv, 11). Variegated (on the מַלְאָכָה or fine purple and byssus garments of Matt. xi, 8, see Biel, in the Symbol. Fœnisch. i, 79 sq.) and embroidered raiments were reserved for occasions of ceremony (Josh. vii, 21; Judg. v, 50; 2 Sam. i, 24; xiii, 18; Prov. xxxi, 22; Esth. viii, 15; Ezek. xvi, 10; see Harmer, iii, 182 sq.; Rosenmüller, Variegated (on the מַלְאָכָה or fine purple and byssus garments of Matt. xi, 8, see Biel, in the Symbol. Fœnisch. i, 79 sq.) and embroidered raiments were reserved for occasions of ceremony (Josh. vii, 21; Judg. v, 50; 2 Sam. i, 24; xiii, 18; Prov. xxxi, 22; Esth. viii, 15; Ezek. xvi, 10; see Harmer, iii, 182 sq.; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 140), although even children (Gen. xxxvii, 3; comp. Kauwolf, Leisen, p. 89) were habited in them (for so the כְּפֹתֵי פַסִּים, kethō'meth passim', Gen. xxxvii, 23, 32; 2 Sam. xiii, 18, 19, is probably to be understood, with the Sept., Onkelos, Saadiah, and others, rather than a dress with a train or reaching to the ankles, as Josephus explains, Ant. vii, 8, 1; but see Gesenius, Thes. Hebr. p. 1117; on the כְּפֹתֵי פֶתִיגִיל, or broideder jstive garment of Isa. liii, 24, see Gesenius, Thes. p. 1137), and were sometimes part of the prey taken from enemies (Zeph. i, 8). See MERCHANT; WEAVING. White (byssus and linen), however [see PRIEST], was naturally in most esteem for garments (comp. Eccl. ix, 8; 3 Esdras i, 2; vii, 9; 2 Macc. xi, 8; Luke xxiii, 11; Josephus, War. ii, 1, 1; Douglaz Analect. ii, 57; Schmid, De usu vestium albar. in Ugolini Thesaur. xxix). See LINEN; FULLER. Generals especially wore red (scarlet) robes (Judg. viii, 26; Nah. ii, 4; Isa. lxiii, 1; see below). Luxurious apparel was no doubt increasing in fashion under the later kings (Jer. iv, 30; Ezek. xvi, 10 sq.; Zeph. i, 8; Lam. iv, 5), and prevailed among the Jews down to the apostles' times (1 Tim. ii, 9; 1 Pet. iii, 3; see Douglaz Analect. ii, 23 sq.). A form of delicate raiment in use by pious (sanctimonious) persons is mentioned (Luke xx, 46; comp. Matt. xxiii, 5). See SEAM. On rending the garments, see GRIEF; on spreading them along the way, see COURTESY. Shaking the garments in the presence of any one (Acts xviii, 6) was a symbolical declaration that the party would have nothing more to do with him (see Heumann, Parerga, p. 213 sq.). (3.) Priests alone wore drawers [see BREECHES], but they are now in almost universal use in the East by men and women (Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 62, 65; Reisen, i, 158; so also among the ancient Medes and Persians long trousers were worn, Herod. v, 49; Xen. Cyrop. viii, 3, 13; Strabo, ii, 52; and so many understand the כְּפֹתֵי סָרְבִילִים, sarbilim', "coats," of Dan. iii, 21, 27, see Lengerke in loc., while others understand mantles, as being altogether more agreeable to Babylonian usage, see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 969 sq.). (4.) Both sexes covered the head with a turban. See HEAD-DRESS. Women likewise wore net-caps (reticulated hoods), frontlets (forehead bands), and probably veils. See CAUL; BONNET; FRONTLET; VEIL. (5.) On the covering of the feet, see SANDAL; SHOE. Gloves (כְּפֹתֵי יָדַיִם or כְּפֵי) were not unknown, yet they appear not to have been used as a part of the attire, but by workmen as a protection of the hands from injury and soiling (comp. Mishna, Chelim, xvi, 6; xxiv, 15; xxvi, 3; see an essay on the gloves of the Hebrews, in Wiener's Zeitschr. f. Kunst u. Literat. 1827, No. 71 sq.; a man's glove, כְּפֵי יָדַיִם, nartek', is mentioned in the Targum on Ruth iv, 7).

The Orientals are still very fond of changes (q. v.) of raiment, especially of robes of state on holidays or festive occasions (Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 182; Burckhardt, Arab. p. 272; Harmer, ii, 112; iii, 447), hence rich Hebrews had their change-suits of apparel (כְּפֹתֵי חַלְבִּיפּוֹת, like the Greek χάλιβα ἐπιμοῦσα, Odys. viii, 249; χρῖστος ἐπιμοῦσα, xiv, 514), and to a superior residence there always appertained a goodly wardrobe (כְּפֹתֵי מַלְאָכִים, mal'achak', clothes-press, 2 Kings x, 22; see Prov. xxxi, 21; Job xxvii, 16; Luke xv, 22; comp. Bochart, Hieroz. iii, 517; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 349; Jacob, ad Lucian Tozar. p. 150). Especially did kings and nobles possess a stock of state and ceremonial dresses (כְּפֹתֵי מַלְאָכִים, mal'atsoth', costly or festive garments, for special occasions, Isa. liii, 22; Zech. iii, 4) for presents (Gen. xlv, 22; Esth. iv, 4; vi, 8, 11; 1 Sam. xviii, 4; 2 Kings v, 5; x, 22; comp. also Judg. xiv, 12, 19; see Tavernier, i, 207, 272; Harmer, ii, 112; iii, 447; among the Persians head-dresses appear to have been likewise royal presents, Esth. vi, 8; comp. Heeren, Ideen, I, i, 216); hence among the court officers is mentioned a custodian of the wardrobe (שׁוֹמֵר הַבְּגָדִים, shomer' hab-begadim', keeper of the clothes, 2 Chron. xxxiv, 22). See GIFT. Persons changed their clothes for religious reasons, when they had become ceremonially unclean (Lev. vii, 11; xxvii, 11, 25; xv, 13, etc.; comp. Gen. xxxv, 2). Those in eminent stations and females anointed and perfumed their garments (Psa. xlv, 9; Cant. iv, 11). See UNGUENT. Mourning apparel (כְּפֹתֵי סַכְמִים, sakkim', weeds, i. e. sackcloth) were of coarse stuff (as still in the East), narrow and without sleeves. See MORNING; SACKCLOTH. Prophets and ascetics also used this kind of habiliments (Isa. xx, 2; Zech. xiii, 4; Matt. iii, 4; see Gesenius, Comm. v. ub. Jesa. i, 644). Court officers (1 Kings x, 5; Isa. xxii, 21) wore a distinctive dress. See KING; PRIEST. (Comp. generally J. H. Soprani, De re vestiana Hebr. in his Comment. de Davide, Lugd. 1643). See ATTIRE.

The malignant leprosy (כְּפֹתֵי יָדַיִם, tsoraath' mame'rah, fretting scab), which attacked not only clothing, but also skins and leather, consisted of green and reddish spots; but its true character has not yet been explained. It was probably some form of mould engendered by dampness or confinement. Michaelis (Mos. R. iv, 265 sq.) supposed it to be the so-called wool-rot (i. e. wool from diseased sheep; see Hebenstreit, Curæ sanitatis ap. vet. exempla, Lips. 1783, p. 24); others explain it of small insects, not cognizable by the eye, that appear green or red, and corrode the wool (Jahn, I, ii, 163). That also linen stuff (ver. 48, כְּפֹתֵי פִתִּים) might be similarly affected, is improbable (comp. Michaelis, in Berthold's Journ. iv, 365 sq.); and to understand cotton material to be meant is very arbitrary. See LINEN. This subject can only be cleared up by closer investigation in the East itself.

Among Greek and Roman articles of apparel mentioned in the Bible are the χλαμύς, or cloak, a wide overcoat or mantle, which hunters (Lucian, Dial. deor. xi, 3), soldiers, especially horsemen (Böckh, Staatshaush. i, 115), and their officers wore (2 Macc. xii, 35); the σαδύνη or σανδύνη, psuda (Talm. Sabbat.), travelling or rain-cloak (2 Tim. iv, 13), which was worn by the Romans over the tunica (Suet. Ner. 48), and was furnished with a hood for the protection of the head (Cic. Mil. 20; Juven. v, 78; Senec. Ep. 87, p. 329, ed. Bip.; Horace, Ep. i, 11, 18; comp. Wetstein, ii, 566; Stosch, De pulvis Pauli, Lugd. 1709), according to others a portmanteau or book-satchel (see the commentators in loc.); and the military χλαμύς κοκκίνη (chlamys purpurea, Donat.), or purple robe (Matt. xxvii, 28), a woollen scarlet mantle, bordered with purple, which Roman generals and officers (Liv. i, 26; Tac. xii, 56; Hirt. Bell. Afr. 51) wore (Lat. paludamentum) at first (Eutrop. ix, 26).—Wiener, i, 661.

Apparition (ἐπιφανία, 2 Macc. v, 4; ἰνδάλμα, Wisd. xvii, 3; φαντασμα, Wisd. xvii, 15 [14]), the sudden appearance of a "ghost" or the spirit of a departed person (comp. Luke xxiv, 37), or some other preternatural object. See SPECTRE. The belief in such occurrences has always been prevalent in the East; and among the modern Mohammedans the existence and manifestation of effrets is held an undoubted reality (Lane's Mod. Eg. i, 344). See SUPERSTITION. Such a belief, however, has no sanction in the canonical Scriptures beyond the doubtful case of Saul (1 Sam. xxviii, 14). See WITCHCRAFT. The visits of Christ to his disciples after his resurrection come under altogether a different category. See APPEARANCE.

Apparitor, an officer who summons others to appear. Among the Romans this was a general term to comprehend all attendants of judges and magistrates appointed to receive and issue their orders (Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). Similar is the duty of an ecclesiastical apparitor, who serves the process of a spiritual court: summons the clergy to attend visitations, calls over their names on such occasions, and assists the bishop or archdeacon in the business belonging to their respective courts. They seem to have originated in England from the synod of London, 1237. By can. 8 of the Council of London, 1342, under Archbishop Stratford, it was ordered that each bishop should have only one riding apparitor, and each archdeacon one foot apparitor only.

Appeal (appellatio, in Greek ἐπικαλέομαι, Acts xxv, 11, 12, 21, 25), the act by which a party who thinks that he has cause to complain of the judgment passed by an inferior judge demands that his case may be re-examined by a superior court. The right of appeal to superior tribunals has generally been considered an essential concomitant of inferior judicatories. (We quote from Kitto, s. v.)

I. Jewish.—In the patriarchal times, as among the Bedouins, the patriarch or head of the tribe—that is to say, the sheik—administered justice; and as there was no superior power, there could be no appeal from his decisions. The only case of procedure against a criminal which occurs during the patriarchal period is that in which Judah commanded the supposed adulterous Tamar to be brought forth and burnt (Gen. xxxviii, 24). But here the woman was his daughter-in-law, and the power which Judah exercised was that which a man possessed over the females of his own immediate family. If the case had been between man and man, Judah could have given no decision, and the matter would, without doubt, have been referred to Jacob.

In the desert Moses at first judged all causes himself; and when, finding his time and strength unequal to this duty, he, at the suggestion of Jethro, established a series of judicatories in a numerically ascending scale (Exod. xviii, 13-26), he arranged that cases of difficulty should be referred from the inferior to the superior tribunals, and in the last instance to himself. Although not distinctly stated, it appears from various circumstances that the clients had a right of appeal, similar to that which the courts had of reference. When the prospective distribution into towns of the population, which had hitherto remained in one compact body, made other arrangements necessary, it was directed that there should be a similar reference of difficult cases to the metropolitan court or chief magistrate ("the judge that shall be in those days") for the time being (Deut. xvi, 18; xvii, 8-12). Some, indeed, from Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 14, ἀνακαμπήτωσαν, sc. οἱ ἰσχυροὶ) that this was not a proper court of appeal, the local judges and not the litigants being, according to the above language, the appellants; but these words, taken in connection with a former passage in the same chapter (εἰ τις . . . τινὰ αἰτίαν προσέκοι), may be regarded simply in the light of a general direction. According to the above regulation, the appeal lay in the time of the Judges to the judge (1 Judg. iv, 5), and under the monarchy to the king, who appears to have deputed certain persons to inquire into the facts of the case, and record his decision thereon (2 Sam. xv, 3). Jehoshaphat delegated his judicial authority to a court permanently established for the purpose (2 Chron. xix, 8). These courts were re-established by Ezra (Ezr. vii, 25). That there was a concurrent right of appeal appears from the use Absalom made of the delay of justice, which arose from the great number of cases that came before the king his father (2 Sam. xv, 2-4). These were doubtless appeal cases, according to the above direction; and M. Salvador (Institutions de Moïse, ii, 53) is scarcely warranted in deducing from this instance that the clients had the power of bringing their cases directly to the supreme tribunal.

Of the later practice, before and after the time of Christ, we have some clearer knowledge from Josephus and the Talmudists. After the institution of the Sanhedrim the final appeal lay to them, and the various stages through which a case might pass are thus described by the Talmudists—from the local consistory before which the cause was first tried to the consistory that sat in the neighboring town; thence to the courts at Jerusalem, commencing in the court of the 23 that sat in the gate of Shushan, proceeding to the court that sat in the gate of Nicanor, and concluding with the great council of the Sanhedrim that sat in the room Gazith (Carpzov, Appar. p. 571). The Jews themselves trace the origin of these later usages up to the time of Moses: they were, at all events, based on early principles, and therefore reflect back some light upon the intimations respecting the right of appeal which we find in the sacred books (Mishna, De Sinedr. x; Talm. Hieros. xviii; Talm. Bab. iii, x; Maimon. De Sinedr. x; Selden, De Sinedr. iii, 10; Lewis, Origines Hebrææ, i, 6; Pastoret, Législation des Hébreux, x). See TRIAL.

II. Roman.—The most remarkable case of appeal in the New Testament is that of the Apostle Paul from the tribunal of the Roman procurator Festus to that of the emperor, in consequence of which he was sent as a prisoner to Rome (Acts xxv, 10, 11). Such an appeal having been once lodged, the governor had nothing more to do with the case: he could not even dismiss it, although he might be satisfied that the matter was frivolous, and not worth forwarding to Rome. Accordingly, when Paul was again heard by Festus and King Agrippa (merely to obtain materials for a report to the emperor), it was admitted that the apostle might have been liberated if he had not appealed to Caesar (Acts xxvi, 32). Paul might therefore seem to have taken a false step in the matter, did we not consider the important consequences which resulted from his visit to Rome (see Conybeare and Howson, ii, 162). But, as no decision had been given, there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case: the language used (Acts xxv, 9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing either to be tried by the provincial magistrate or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and the Jewish authorities coexisting and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul availed himself of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law. It may easily be seen that a right of appeal which, like this, involved a long and expensive journey, was by no means frequently resorted to. In lodging his appeal Paul exercised one of the high privileges of Roman citizenship which belonged to him by birth (Acts xxii, 28). See CITIZENSHIP.

The right of appeal connected with that privilege originated in the Valerian, Porcian, and Sempronian laws, by which it was enacted that if any magistrate should order flagellation or death to be inflicted upon a Roman citizen, the accused person might appeal to the judgment of the people, and that meanwhile he should suffer nothing at the hands of the magistrate until the people had judged his cause. But what was originally the prerogative of the people had in Paul's time become that of the emperor, and appeal therefore was made to him (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Appellatio, Roman). Hence Pliny (Ep. x, 97) mentions that he had sent to Rome some Christians, who were Roman citizens, and had appealed unto Caesar. This privilege could not be disallowed by any magistrate to any person whom the law entitled to it. Indeed very heavy penalties were attached to any refusal to grant it, or to furnish the party with facilities for going to Rome. See, generally, Krebs, De provocazione Pauli ad Cæsarem (Lips. 1783); Santorocci Diss. de Ecclesiast. ad Cæsarem appellations (Marburg, 1721).

III. Ecclesiastical.—In the early Church all ecclesiastical matters were originally determined by the bishop with his court, from whose decision an appeal lay to the provincial synod (see council of Africa, 418). The case of Apitarius, priest of Sicca, in Mauritania, is supposed to have been about the first instance of an appeal to Rome, on which occasion the African Church resolutely resisted this papal encroachment on her independence. In the Middle Ages it often occurred that those whose doctrines had been censured by the pope appealed from his decision to an œcumenical council. Such, e. g., was the case with Wycliffe. Pius II forbade such appeals, under the penalty of excommunication, in 1459; but a numerous school of Roman Catholic theologians and canonists, who maintain the superiority of an œcumenical council over the pope, have never ceased to advocate them. In England there were no appeals to Rome before the time of King Stephen, when the practice was for the first time introduced by Henry de Blois, bishop of Winchester and papal legate (see Johnson, Eccle. Canons, sub ann. 1143). But by art. 8 of the Constitutions of Clarendon it was declared that, "If appeals arise, they ought to proceed from the archdeacon to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop, and, lastly, to the king (if the archbishop fail in doing justice), so that the controversy be ended in the archbishop's court by a precept from the king, and so that it go no further without the king's consent." These appeals were from time to time further prohibited, but they continued to be practiced until the time of the final rupture with Rome in the reign of Henry VIII, when they were entirely abolished (24 Hen. VIII, cap. 12, and 28 Hen. VIII, cap. 19). The Council of Antioch, A. D. 341, can. 12, and that of Chalcedon, declare that no royal or imperial decree can have any force in ecclesiastical matters against the canons. Such indeed has ever been the discipline of the whole Church.

During the appeal the sentence of the inferior court is suspended; and it is usual for the superior court, at the instance of the appellant, to grant an inhibition to stay the execution of the sentence of the inferior court until the appeal shall be determined (Bingham, Orig. Eccle. bk. ii, ch. xvi, § 16).

In the Methodist Episcopal Church, the right of appeal from lower to higher courts, both for ministers and laymen, is carefully guarded by a constitutional provision (Discipline, pt. i, § 4).

In Presbyterian churches there are formal modes of appeal from a lower to a higher court, or from a session to a presbytery, from it to a synod, and from the synod to the general assembly.

Appearance (ἐφάνη, Mark xvi, 9; ἐφανερώθη, Mark xvi, 12, 14; ὤφθη, Luke xxiv, 34; 1 Cor. xv, 5; ἐφανερώσεν ταυράν, John xxi, 1; παρίστηνεν ταυράν), a term usually applied to the interviews afforded by Christ to his disciples after his resurrection (q. v.).

The circumstances of these instances indicate that his body, although not yet glorified, had already undergone such a change as to give it extraordinary powers of locomotion, even through closed doors, and of becoming visible or invisible at pleasure, while it yet retained the palpable characteristics of matter, and was even capable of taking food in the ordinary way; traits that ally it strongly to the "spiritual body" of the angels (q. v.). Monographs on these occurrences and their peculiarities have been written by Fecht (Rost. 1699), Langsdorf (Viteb. 1710), Alberti (Lips. 1693), Arnoldt (Regiom. 1741-1743), Becker (Rost. 1773), Buddeus (Jen. 1711), Buttstedt (Cobl. 1751), Carпов (Jen. 1755, 1765), Chladenius (Erlang. 1750, 1753), Eichler (Lips. 1787), Feuerlin (Gott. 1750), Gerike (Helmst. 1745), Gärtler (Franq. 1712), Horn (Lubec. 1706), Köppen (Gryph. 1701), Krehl (Lips. 1845), Mayer (Gryph. 1702), Munck (Lond. 1774), Pries (Rost. 1780), Quandt (Regiom. 1715), Zeibich (Ger. 1785). APPEARANCE TO MARY MAGDALEN. There is a difficulty connected with the first of these appearances. The gospel narratives (Matt. xxviii, 1-15; Mark xvi, 2-11; Luke xxiv, 1-12; John xx, 1-18), when carefully adjusted in their several incidents to each other, distinctly indicate that Mary the Magdalene was not among the Galilaean women at the time they were favored with the first sight of their risen Master, she having just then left them to call Peter and John; and that Christ afterward revealed himself to her separately. Mark, however, uses one expression that seems directly to contradict this arrangement: "Jesus . . . appeared FIRST (πρωτον) to Mary Magdalene" (xvi, 9). Several methods of reconciling this discordance have been devised, but they are all untenable, and the best of them (that of Dr. Robinson [after Hengstenberg], in the Bibliotheca Sacra, Feb. 1845, p. 178) is not at all satisfactory (see Davidson, Introd. to the N. T., i, 169), which consists in considering the "first" as put by Mark relatively (q. d. πρωτον), to denote the first of the three appearances related by him simply, the "after that" of verse 12 introducing a second appearance, and the "afterward" of verse 14 serving to mark the last of Mark's series. Any reader, taking the words in their natural construction, would certainly understand Mark as meaning to say absolutely that Christ's first public appearance was made to Mary, and two of his subsequent ones to other persons. Moreover, the question still remains, why does Mark single out this appearance to Mary, rather than the previous one to several women? A closer inspection of the facts will assist to clear up the difficulty. Independently of this "first" of Mark, the incidents may naturally be arranged as in the following scheme (see Strong's Harm. of the Gospels, § 138-141).

A. M.	Occurrences.	Matt. xxviii	Mark xvi.	Luke xxiv.	John xv.
h. 00.
4 00	Earthquake and Resurrection	2-4	9
4 15	The women set out for the sepulchre.	1	2, 3	1	1
4 20	They arrive; Mary the Magdalene returns.	4	2	2
4 25	Their interview with two angels.	5-7	5-7	3-8
4 45	Mary the Magdalene reaches Peter and John's house.	2
4 45	The other women flee from the sepulchre.	8	8	9
4 50	Peter, John, and Mary the Magdalene set out for it.	12	3
4 50	The other women meet Jesus.	9, 10
4 55	The soldiers report their dis-aster.	11-15
4 57	John arrives at the sepulchre.	12	4, 5
5 00	Peter arrives there; their observations.	6, 9
5 05	They both return home.	12	10
5 05	Mary the Magdalene arrives at the sepulchre.	11
5 05	The other women report their interview with Christ to the other apostles.	9-11
5 07	Mary the Magdalene sees the two ang ls.	12, 13
5 10	She meets with Christ.	9	14-17
5 30	She reports to the disciples.	10, 11	11	18

By this it is seen that Christ's appearance to the other women could not well have preceded that to Mary by more than twenty minutes; and if the time for the other women's return be so lengthened as to make the appearance to Mary precede that to them, the interval in this direction cannot be made to exceed fifteen minutes, as any one may see by making the corresponding changes in the above table. Mark, in speaking in this general way of Christ's visits, would not be likely to distinguish between two appearances so nearly coincident; the very parties who witnessed them, or heard them reported, would not themselves have noticed so slight a priority without instituting some such calculation as the above, which they were in no condition of mind at the time to make, nor likely to concern themselves about afterward. In the verse under consideration, therefore, Mark designs to refer to both these appearances as one, and he mentions Mary's name particularly because of her prominence in the whole matter, just as he places her first in the list in verse 1 (comp. Matt. xxvii, 56, 61; xxviii, 1; and see on John xx, 17). This identification is confirmed by the fact that none of the evangelists mention both of these appearances, Matthew and Luke narrating the events just as if Mary had been with the other women at the time of their meeting with Christ, while Mark and John speak of the appearance to her only; yet they all obviously embrace in their accounts the twofold appearance. Luke also explicitly includes Mary among the women who brought the tidings to the apostles (verse 10), evidently not distinguishing her subsequent report from that of the others with whom she at first went out. This idea is, in fact, the key to the whole plan of the gospel accounts of this matter, the design of the writers being, not to furnish each a complete narrative of all the incidents in their exact order, but to show that these Galilean women were, as a company, the first witnesses of Christ's resurrection.

According to the astronomical formula, the duration of distinct twilight at that time of the year in the latitude of Jerusalem (supposing there were no unusual refracting influences in the atmosphere) is 1 hour 40 minutes, which would make extreme daybreak occur about four o'clock, as it was near the time of the vernal equinox. The light of the full moon would enable the women to see their way even before dawn. Mark says "early" (πρωῖ, xvi, 9), and in the visit of the women he says "very early" (λίαν πρωῖ, xvi, 2); but the descent of the angel must have occurred first, because the women found the stone rolled away on their arrival. The guard had probably just before been relieved (i. e. at the "dawn-watch," which began at this time of the year about three o'clock A.M., and corresponds in its Greek title to the term here used by Mark), so that they had time to recover from their fright sufficiently to report their disaster without being surprised in their plight by the arrival of a relay. See GUARD. The distance the women had to go was not great. See MARY MAGDALENE.

Appellant (1.), a legal term, denoting one who requests the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior court, when he thinks himself aggrieved by the sentence of the inferior judge. See APPEAL.

(2.) The word appellant is particularly applied to those among the French clergy who appealed from the bull Unigenitus, issued by Pope Clement in 1713, either to the pope "better informed," or to a general council. The whole body of the French clergy and the several monasteries were divided into Appellants and Non-Appellants; a signal instance of the unity of the Romish Church! See UNIGENITUS; BULL.

Apphia (pron. Af'fīa, Ἀπφία, prob. for Ἀππία, the Greek form of the Lat. name Appia), the name of a female affectionately saluted by Paul (A. D. 57) as a Christian at Colossæ (Philemon 2); supposed by Chrysostom and Theodoret to have been the wife of Philemon, with whom, according to tradition, she suffered martyrdom. See PHILEMON.

Apphus (pron. Af'fūs, Ἀπφῶς [and so Josephus, Ant. xii, 6, 1] v. r. Σαφφῶς or Σαφφῶς), the surname (1 Macc. ii, 5) of Jonathan Maccabæus (see Ewald, Gesch. Isr. III, ii, 353), apparently (Frankel, Vorstud. zur LXX, p. 96) from the Syro-Chald. ܘܫܦܘܫ, chappus, crafty (Grimm, Handb. in loc.).

Ap'pii-for'um (Ἀππιῶν ὄριον, for the Lat. Ap'pii Forum, "market-place of Appius"), a market-town

(with a so-called mansio) in Italy, 43 Roman miles from Rome (Itiner. Anton. p. 107, ed. Wessel; Itin. Hieros. p. 611), on the great road (i. e. Appia) from Rome to Brundisium, constructed by Appius Claudius (Suet. Tib. 2), and leading from Rome (by the Porta Capena) through the Pontine marshes (Hor. Sat. i, 5, 3; Cic. Att. ii, 10; Plin. iii, 9; xiv, 8). The remains of an ancient town, supposed to be Appii-Forum, are still preserved at a place called Casarillo di Santa Maria, on the border of the Pontine marshes (comp. Strabo, v, 233; and the 43d milestone is still extant (Chamny, Maison d'Horace, iii, 387-452; Pratilli, Via Appia, p. 99, 100). Its vicinity to the marshes accounts for the badness of the water, as mentioned by Horace (Sat. i, 5, 7), who describes it as full of taverns and boatmen. This arose from the circumstance that it was at the northern end of a canal which ran parallel with the road through a considerable part of the Pontine marshes. When Paul was taken to Italy, some of the Christians of Rome, being apprised of his approach, journeyed to meet him as far as "Appii-Forum and the Three Taverns" (Acts xxviii, 15). The "Three Taverns" were eight or ten miles nearer to Rome than Appii-Forum (Antonin. Itin.). The probability is that some of the Christians remained at the "Three Taverns," where it was known the advancing party would rest, while some others went on as far as Appii-Forum to meet Paul on the road (Conybeare and Howson, ii, 359). The journey was undoubtedly along the Appian Way, remains of which are still extant. The "Three Taverns" (q. v.) was certainly a place for rest and refreshment (Cic. Attic. ii, 11, 13), perhaps on account of the bad water at Appii-Forum. It must be understood that Tres Tabernæ was, in fact, the name of a town (comp. Theol. Annal. 1818, p. 886 sq.); for in the time of Constantine, Felix, bishop of Tres Tabernæ, was one of the nineteen bishops who were appointed to decide the controversy between Donatus and Caecilianus (Optat. de Schism. Donat. i, 26). As to the tabernæ themselves, from which the place took its name, it is probable that they were shops ("tabernæ deversoria," Plaut. Trucul. iii, 2, 29) for the sale of all kinds of refreshments, rather than inns or places of entertainment for travellers. See generally Schwarz, De foro Appii et trib. tabernis (Aldorf, 1746). —Kitto, s. v. See PAUL.

Apple is the translation in the Auth. Vers. of the Heb. תפוח (tappu'ach, so called from its fragrance), which is mentioned chiefly in the Canticles, ii, 3, "as the apple-tree among the trees of the wood;" ver. 5, "Comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love;" ver. 8, "The smell of thy nose like apples;" so in viii, 5. Again, in Prov. xxv, 11, "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver." In Joel i, 12, it is enumerated with the vine, the fig-tree, the palm, and pomegranate, as among the most valuable trees of Palestine. Tappuah (q. v.) also occurs as the name of two places (Josh. xii, 13; xv, 34; xvi, 8), probably from the abundance of the fruit in the vicinity.

It is a difficult matter to say with any degree of certainty what is the specific tree denoted by the Hebrew word tappuach. The Sept. and Vulg. afford no clue, as the terms μύρον, molton, have a wide signification, being used by the Greeks and Romans to represent almost any kind of tree-fruit; at any rate, the use of the word is certainly generic. Many interpreters (after Celsus, Hierobot. i, 255) have supposed the citron (citrus medica), some the ordinary orange-tree (Credner, Joel, p. 136), to be meant, as each of these were celebrated favorites among the ancients, and have many qualities agreeing with the Scriptural notices. The citron was the "Median apple" of the ancients, the citromela of the Romans (Theophr. Hist. 4), and was cultivated even in Europe (Bauhin, Pinnac.). That it was well known to the Hebrews appears from the fact mentioned by Josephus, that at the Festival of Tabernacles Alexander Jannæus was pelted with citrons, which the Jews had in their hands; for, as he says, "the law required that at that feast every one should have branches of the palm-tree and citron-tree" (Ant. xiii, 13, 5). It is still found in Palestine (Kitto, Phys. Hist. p. cexiii). As, however, the Sept. and Vulg. both seem to understand the apple (μήλον, malum), and the Arabs still call this fruit by the same name (teffich), which, according to the Talmud (Mishna, Kel. i, 4; Massek. i, 4) and Josephus (Ant. xviii, 7), was anciently cultivated in Palestine, as it still is to some extent (Robinson, i, 355; ii, 356, 716; iii, 295), and was celebrated in antiquity for its agreeable smell (Ovid, Met. viii, 675), it seems more likely to be the tree designated rather than the citron, which is a small, comparatively rare tree, with a hard, inedible fruit (Thomson, Laud and Book, ii, 328, 329). See CITRON.

On the other hand, Celsius (Herob. i, 255) asserts that the quince-tree (Pyrus cydonia) was very often called by the Greek and Roman writers malus, as being, from the esteem in which it was held ("primaria malorum species"), the malus, or μήλον κατ' ἔξοχον. Some, therefore (Rosemüller, Alterth. IV, i, 308; Ray, Hist. of Plants, II, iii, 1453), have endeavored to show that the toppouch denotes the quince; and certainly this opinion has some plausible arguments in its favor. The fragrance of the quince was held in high esteem by the ancients; and the fruit "was placed on the heads of those images in the sleeping apartments which were reckoned among the household gods" (Rosemüller, Botany of Bible, in the Bib. Cab. p. 314; Voss, On Virgil, Eclog. ii, 51). The Arabians make especial allusion to the restorative properties of this fruit; and Celsius (p. 261) quotes Abu'l Fadli in illustration of Cant. ii, 5. "Its scent," says the Arabic author, "cheers my soul, renews my strength, and restores my breath." Phylarchus (Histor. lib. vi), Rabbi Salomon (in Cant. ii, 5), Pliny (H. N. xv, 11), who uses the words odoris prestantissimi, bear similar testimony to the delicious fragrance of the quince. It is well known that among the ancients the quince was sacred to the goddess of love, whence statues of Venus sometimes represent her with the fruit of this tree in her hand, the quince being the ill-fated "apple of discord" which Paris appropriately enough presented to that deity. Hence the act expressed by the term μηλοβοδάνειν (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. p. 180; Theocr. Id. iii, 10, v. 88, etc.; Virg. Ecl. iii. 64) was a token of love. For numerous testimonies, see Celsius, Herob. i, 255. See BOTANY.

Although it is so usual to speak of the forbidden fruit of paradise as an "apple," we need hardly say that there is nothing in Scripture to indicate what kind of tree was "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." But in the fabled "apples of discord," and in the golden apple which Paris gave to the goddess of love, thereby kindling the Trojan war, it is possible that the primeval tradition reappears of

"The fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our woe."

See TREE.

The Heb. for the "apple" of the eye is ישון (ishon, mannikin, pupil, Deut. xxxii, 10; Prov. vii, 2), otherwise בַּתַּב (batub, hole, gate, Zech. ii, 12), or בַּת (bath, daughter, i. e. by an idiomatic use, the pupil, Psa. xvii, 8). The same figure occurs in the Apocrypha (Wisd. Ecclus. xvii, 22 [17]). It is curious to observe how common the image ("pupil of the eye") is in the languages of different nations. Gesenius (Thes. p. 86) quotes from the Arabic, the Syriac, the Ethiopic, the Coptic, the Persian, in all of which tongues an expression similar to the English "pupil of the eye" is found. See EYE.

APPLES OF SODOM is a phrase associated with the Dead Sea, as the name of a species of fruit extremely beautiful to the eye, but bitter to the taste and full of dust. Tacitus (Hist. v, 7) alludes to this singular fact, but in language so brief and ambiguous that no light can be derived from his description: "Black and empty, they vanish as it were in ashes." Josephus also, speaking of the conflagration of the plain, and the yet remaining tokens of the divine fire, remarks, "There are still to be seen ashes reproduced in the fruits, which indeed resemble edible fruits in color, but on being plucked with the hands are dissolved into smoke and ashes" (War. iv, 8, 4). The supposed fruit has furnished many moralists with allusions; and also Milton, in whose infernal regions

"A grove sprung up—laden with fair fruit—
—greedily they plucked
The fruitage, fair to sight, like that which grew Near that bituminous lake where Sodom flamed.
This, more delusive, not the touch, but taste Deceived. They, fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit
Cherish'd bitter ashes, which the offended taste
With spattering noise rejected."

Some travellers, unable to discover this singular production, have considered it merely as a figure of speech, depicting the deceitful nature of all vicious enjoyments; but Kitto (Phys. Hist. of Palest. p. cexc sq.) adduces the definite testimony of many modern travellers to show that these allusions are based upon truth, especially the statements of Setzeen (in Zach's Monatl. Corresp. xviii, 412) and Burckhardt (Syria, p. 392), whose accounts of the fruit of the Oslair (prob. Asclepias gigantea) remarkably coincide with the ancient descriptions. This plant is figured and described by Prosper Alpinus under the name Beil el-Ossar (Hist. Nat. Egypte, Lugd. Bat. 1735, pt. i, 43). See also Irby and Mangles (Travels, ch. viii). Hasselquist, however, finds the "apples of Sodom" in the Solanum Sodomense, which he identifies with the Solanum melongena, or mad-apple, growing in great abundance in the plain of the Jordan (Reise, p. 151). But Dr. Robinson thinks the other the most probable plant. His description of it is as follows: "We saw here [on the shore of the Dead Sea] several trees of the kind, the trunks of which were 6 or 8 inches in diameter, and the whole height from 10 to 15 feet. It has a grayish, cork-like bark, with long oval leaves, and in its general appearance and character it might be taken for a gigantic perennial species of the milk-weed or silk-weed found in the northern parts of the American states. Its leaves and flowers are very similar to those of the latter plant, and when broken off it in like manner discharges copiously a milky fluid. The fruit greatly resembles externally a large smooth apple or orange, hanging in clusters of three or four together, and when ripe is of a yellow color. It was now fair and delicious to the eye, and soft to the touch; but on being pressed or struck it explodes with a puff, like a bladder or puff-ball, leaving in the hand only the shreds of the thin rind and a few fibres. It is, indeed, filled chiefly with air like a bladder, which gives it the round form; while in the centre a small slender pod runs through it from the stem, and is connected by thin filaments with the rind. The pod contains a small quantity of fine silk with seeds, precisely like the pod of the silk-weed, though very much smaller, being indeed scarcely the tenth part as large. The Arabs collect the silk and twist it into matches for their guns, preferring it to the common match, because it requires no sulphur to render it combustible. In the accounts of Tacitus and Josephus, after a due allowance for the marvellous in all popular reports, I find nothing which does not apply almost literally to the fruit of the Osher, as we saw it. It must be plucked and handled with great care in order to preserve it from bursting. We attempted to carry some of the boughs and fruit with us to Jerusalem, but without success. Hasselquist's apples of Sodom (the fruit of the Salsolium melongra) are much smaller than those of the Osher, and when ripe are full of small black grains. There is here, however, nothing like explosion, nothing like 'smoke and ashes,' except occasionally, as the same naturalist remarks, 'when the fruit is punctured by an insect (Tenthredo), which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without any loss of color.' We saw the Salsolium and the Osher growing side by side; the former presenting nothing remarkable in its appearance, and being found in other parts of the country, while the latter immediately arrested our attention by its singular accordance with the ancient story, and is, moreover, peculiar in Palestine to the shores of the Dead Sea" (Bib. Researches, ii, 236 sq.; comp. Wilson, Bible Lands, i, 8 sq.). See SODOM.

It should be observed that the Bible speaks only of the "VINE of Sodom," and that metaphorically (Deut. xxxii, 32), as a synonym of a poisonous berry. See HEMLOCK.

Appleton, Jesse, D.D., president of Bowdoin College, was born at New Ipswich, New Hampshire, Nov. 17, 1772, and was graduated at Dartmouth College in 1792. Having spent two years in teaching at Dover and Amherst, he studied theology under Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield, and in February, 1797, was ordained pastor at Hampton, New Hampshire. His religious sentiments at this period were Arminian. By his faithful, affectionate services he was very much endeared to his people. At his suggestion the Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine was published, to which he contributed valuable essays, with the signature of Leighton. In 1807 he was chosen president of Bowdoin College, in which office he served faithfully until his death, Nov. 12, 1819. In health he was sometimes anxious, in a high degree, in regard to the college; but in his sickness he said, in cheerful confidence, "God has taken care of the college, and God will take care of it." Among his last expressions were heard the words, "Glory to God in the highest! the whole earth shall be filled with his glory." In 1820 a volume of his addresses was published, with a sketch of his character, by Rev. Dr. Nichols, of Portland. In 1822 his lectures and occasional sermons were published, with a memoir, by Rev. B. Tappan. These and other writings are collected in "The Works of Jesse Appleton, D.D.," with memoir (Andover, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo).—Bibl. Repository, Jan. 1836, p. 19; Sprague, Annals, ii, 382.

Appleton, Nathaniel, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Ipswich, Mass., Dec. 9, 1693, graduated at Harvard in 1712, ordained at Cambridge in 1717, in which year he was also elected a fellow of Harvard, which 54 years afterward conferred upon him the second degree it had ever granted of Doctor of Divinity, Increase Mather, 80 years before, being the first admitted to that honor. He took a colleague in 1783, and died in 1784. He published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i, 301.

Approbation of books, the act by which books were recommended or declared harmless by persons authorized to judge of them. The Council of Trent (sess. 4) forbids, on penalty of excommunication, the publication of books without the approbation of the bishop of the diocese. In England the right of approbation formerly belonged to those who were appointed to grant licenses and imprimaturs. By an act of Charles II, long since expired, books were subjected to a licenser in England, and the practice itself ceased with the introduction of the principles of the Revolution of 1688. See INDEX.

Appropriation, in the canon law, is the setting apart of an ecclesiastical benefice to the peculiar and permanent use of some religious body. Appropriations sprung originally from the monastic orders, who purchased all the advowsons within their reach, and then appropriated the larger proportion of the proceeds of such benefices to the use of their own corporations, which they contended were not only institutions for pious purposes, but religious bodies; leaving the small remainder for the support of the incumbent. The appropriations now annexed to bishoprics, prebends, etc., in England, had all of them the above origin, if traced to their source; and at one period similar appropriations were made to religious houses, nunneries, and certain military orders, which were regarded as spiritual corporations.—Blackstone, vol. i.

Apries. See HOPURA.

Apron stands in one passage of the Auth. Vers. for the Heb. חֲגוֹרָה (chagorah), a girdle, as usually), the fig-leaf bands which our first parents made to hide their shame (Gen. iii, 7); also for the Greek επιζώνιον (Acts xix, 12), a term borrowed from the Lat. semicinctum, i. e. half-girdle or belt covering half the person, an article of apparel worn by artisans and servants. See ATTIRE; NAPKIN.

Apse or Apsis (ἀψίς, Lat. apsis, prob. for ἀψίς, a junction or vaulted arch), is a term used by ecclesiastical writers to designate (1.) that part of the interior of ancient churches where the bishop and clergy had their seats. The form of the apsis was hemispherical, and it consisted of two parts: one, the choir or presbytery; the other, the sanctuary. The choir always terminated toward the east in a semicircle, round which were the seats of the clergy, having in the middle the throne of the bishop or superior, which was raised above the others. The term came into use in the 8th century to denote the deepest recess behind the altar in the Eastern Churches. (2.) It was also commonly used for the bishop's throne, called apsis gradata, being raised by means of steps. (3.) The word at other times denotes the case in which the relics of saints were kept, which was round or arched at the top, and commonly placed on the altar: it was usually of wood, sometimes also of gold and silver, and occasionally beautifully sculptured. (4.) In later church architecture, it is used to denote any semicircular or polygonal termination of the choir, or other portion of a church.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii, ch. iii; Lenoir, Architect. Monast. (Paris, 1852).

Apthorp, EAST, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born at Boston in 1733, died in England in 1816. Having been educated at Cambridge, he was settled as missionary at Cambridge, Mass. in 1761. Four years after he returned to England, and was appointed to the vicarage of Croydon, afterward receiving high dignities in the Church, and even an offer of the bishopric of Kildare. About 1793 he retired to Cambridge, where he spent the remaining years of his life. Dr. Apthorp published a Letter on the Prevalence of Christianity before its civil Establishment, with Observations on a late History of the Decline of the Roman Empire (Lond. 1778); Discourses on Prophecy (2 vols. 1786); and several other writings, chiefly sermons, which show him to have been a man of vigorous intellect and sound scholarship.—Sprague, Annals, v. 174; Gentleman's Magazine, 1816.

Aquarii, a sect of the third century, so called because they refused to offer any thing but water at the Eucharist, and pretended to consecrate with water only. Also in Africa the name was given to some who, during times of persecution, forbore to use wine at the Eucharist in the morning, lest the smell should discover them. Epiphanius calls them Eucratites, and Theodoret (De fib. her. i, 20) Tatianites.—Epiphanius, Hereses, xlvi; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xv, ch. ii, § 7.

Aquaviva, CLAUDIO, the fourth general of the Jesuits, was born Sept. 14, 1543, joined the Jesuits in 1568, and was elected, in 1581, their general. The order considerably gained, under his administration, in influence and extension. He wrote Epistole XVI, and Industria ad curandos animæ morbos (Ven. 1606). He also ordered and superintended the compilation of the "ratio studiorum" and the "directorium exercitiorum St. Ignatii," which have ever since been regarded as standard works of the order. See JESUITS.

Aquila (Ἀκίλιας, for Lat. aquila, an eagle, see Simon, Onomast. O. T. p. 588 sq.), a Jew with whom Paul met on his first visit to Corinth; a native of Pontus, and by occupation a tent-maker (Acts xviii). Wolf, Curæ, on Acts xviii, 2, shows the name not to have any Hebrew origin, and to have been adopted as a Latin name, like Paulus by Saul. He is there described as a Pontian by birth (Ἰωντικὸς τῷ γένει), from the connection of which description with the fact that we find more than one Pontian Aquila in the Pontian gens at Rome in the days of the Republic (see Cic. ad Fam. x, 33; Suet. Cæs. 78), it has been imagined that he may have been a freedman of a Pontian Aquila, and that his being a Pontian by birth may have been merely an inference from his name. But besides that this is a point on which Luke could hardly be ignorant, Aquila, the translator of the O. T. into Greek, was also a native of Pontus. At the time when Paul found Aquila at Corinth, he had fled, with his wife Priscilla, from Rome, in consequence of an order of Claudius commanding all Jews to leave Rome (Suet. Claud. 25—"Judeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit:" see CHAERUS). He became acquainted with Paul, and they abode together, and wrought at their common trade of making the Cilician tent or hair-cloth. See PAUL. This decree was made, not by the senate, but the emperor (A.D. 50 or 51), and lasted only during his life, if even so long. Comp. Neander, Planting and Training, i, 231; Lardner, Testimonies of Heathen Authors, ch. viii. Whether Aquila and Priscilla were at that time converts to the Christian faith cannot be positively determined; Luke's expression, "came unto them" (προσηλύτην αὐτοῖς), Acts xviii, 2, rather implies that Paul sought their society on grounds of friendship than for the purpose of persuading them to embrace Christianity. On the other hand, if we suppose that they were already Christians, Paul's "joining himself to them" is highly probable; while, if they were still adherents to Judaism, they would have been less disposed than even unconverted Gentiles to form an intimacy with the apostle. But if Aquila had been converted by his first meeting with Paul, the word μαθητής, "disciple," would hardly have been omitted. At all events, they had embraced Christianity before Paul left Corinth; for on his departure from Corinth, a year and six months after, Priscilla and Aquila accompanied him to Ephesus on his way to Syria. There they remained; and when Apollos came to Ephesus, who "knew only the baptism of John," they "instructed him in the way of God more perfectly" (Acts xviii, 25, 26). From that time they appear to have been zealous promoters of the Christian cause in that city (1 Cor. xvi, 19). Paul styles them his "helpers in Christ Jesus," and intimates that they had exposed themselves to imminent danger on his account ("who have for my life laid down their own necks," Rom. xvi, 3, 4), though of the time and place of this transaction we have no information. At the time of writing 1 Cor., Aquila and his wife were still in Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi, 19); but in Rom. xvi, 3 sq., we find them again at Rome, and their house a place of assembly for the Christians. Some years after they appear to have returned to Ephesus, for Paul sends salutations to them during his second imprisonment at Rome (2 Tim. iv, 19), as being with Timothy. Their occupation as tent-makers probably rendered it necessary for them to keep a number of workmen constantly resident in their family, and to these (to such of them, at least, as had embraced the Christian faith) may refer the remarkable expression, "the church that is in their house," τὴν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν (see Biscoe, quoted in Lardner's Credibility, ii, 11). Origen's explanation of these words is very similar (In Ep. ad Rom. Comment. x; Opera, vii, 431, Berol. 1837). Neander suggests that, as Aquila would require extensive premises for his manufactory, he perhaps set apart one room for the use of a section of the Church in whatever place he fixed his residence, and that, as his superior Christian knowledge and piety qualified him for the office of a "teacher" (διδάσκων), he gave religious instruction to this small assembly. The salutations to individuals which follow the expression in Rom. xvi, 5, show that they were not referred to in it, and are quite inconsistent with the supposition that the whole Church met in Aquila's house. Nor is it probable that the collective body of Christians in Rome or elsewhere would alter their place of meeting on Aquila's return (see Neander, Gesch. d. Chr. Rel. u. Kirche, I, ii, 402, 503; comp. Justin Martyr's Opera, Append. ii, p. 586, Par. 1742). Tradition reports that he and his wife were beheaded. The Greek Church call Aquila bishop and apostle, and honor him on July 12 (Menolog. Grec. ii, 185). The festival of Aquila and Priscilla is placed in the Roman Calendar, where he is denoted bishop of Heraclea, on July 8 (Martyrol. Roman.). See PRISCILLA.

Aquila, author of a Greek version of the O. T., was originally a heathen, born at Sinope, a city of Pontus. Having seen the professors of the Christian religion work many miracles, he became a convert to it, probably on the same ground with Simon Magus. Refusing to quit the practice of magic and judicial as-tology, he was excommunicated by the Christians, on which he went over to the Jewish religion, became a proselyte, and was circumcised. Being admitted into the school of Rabbi Akiba, he made such great proficiency in Jewish learning that he was deemed well qualified to make a new translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, to take the place of the Septuagint. This version he made so strictly literal that Jerome said it was a good Uelourary to give the genuine meaning of the Hebrew words. He finished and published his work in the twelfth year of the reign of Adrian, A.D. 128. He afterward revised and published another edition of it. It appears from Irenæus, iii, 24, that the Ebionites used the translation of Aquila in order to support their Judaizing tenets. The remains of this translation have been edited by Montfaucon and others in the "Hexapla" of Origen.—Clarke, Succession of Sac. Lit. i, 44; Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 128; Smith, Dict. of Biog. s. v. See YENSTON.

Aquila, CASPAR, one of the Reformers, was born at Augsburg, Aug. 17, 1488. After the ordinary classical training of the gymnasium of his native city, he spent his early manhood in travel and study, chiefly in Italy and Switzerland. After a brief stay as pastor in Berne, and in 1514 in Leipzig, in 1515 he became chaplain to Franz von Sickingen. In 1516 he became pastor at Jenga, near Augsburg, and soon after married, and openly professed Lutheranism. Arrested by order of the bishop of Augsburg (Stadion), he was condemned to death, but during his imprisonment (at Dillingen, 1519-20) the queen of Hungary interceded for him, and he was released, but banished. He went at once to Wittenberg, and became A.M. of the University in 1521. For two years he was tutor to Sickingen's children. In 1524 he became tutor in Hebrew at Wittenberg, and was employed by Luther to aid in the translation of the Bible. In 1527 he became pastor at Saalfeldt. In 1547 he wrote violently against the Interim (q. v.), and a price was set upon his head by Charles V. He died Nov. 12, 1560. His life was written by Avenarius, Lebensbeschreibung Aquila (Meiningen, 1719, 8vo); Schlege, Leben Aquila (Leipzig, 1737, 4to); and by Gensler, Vita Aquila (Jena, 1816), who enumerates twenty writings of his.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, s. v.; Hofer, *Nouv. Aquileia, a town in Italy 15 miles northeast of Venice, formerly so important in ecclesiastical matters as to be called a second Rome. (I.) The bishops of Aquileia assumed the patriarchal dignity from the 5th century, and the title was granted by Pope Honorius I simply to save the appearance of supremacy. Serenas, patriarch of Aquileia in the time of Pope Gregory II, renounced the schism; upon which that pope, while he refused to give him the title of patriarch, permitted him (A.D. 729) to act as metropolitan over the empire of the Lombards; but the patriarchs of Aquileia continued to hold that title, which was soon recognised by the court of Rome. The patriarchs of Aquileia had metropolitan authority over the states of Venice, Istria, and the neighboring provinces; and their diocese was of large extent, including besides a great part of Friuli, Carniola, Goritz, and part of Carinthia and Styria. As a great part of the diocese was in the states of Austria, the queen of Hungary claimed the right of nominating alternately with Venice; and such disputes arose from the circumstance that in 1751 the patriarchate was suppressed, and the two archbishoprics of Udine and Goritz erected in its stead. The church, which was the cathedral, is dedicated in the name of the Assumption. (See De Rubéis, Monumenta Ecclesiæ Aquilensis (1740, fol.).)

(II.) Several COUNCILS or synods were held at Aquileia: in 381, against Palladius and Secundianus, the Arian bishops (Labbe, ii, 978); in 556, against the 5th Œcumenical council; in 698, on the "Three Chapter" question (q. v.); at the same time the schism from Rome was ended (Labbe, vi); in 791, by Paulinus the metropolitan, fourteen canons were published; in 1184, against incendiaries and sacrilegious persons (Labbe, x); in 1409, by the antipope Gregory XII, who here excommunicated his rivals Benedict and Alexander V (Labbe, ii, 2012).—Landon, Manual of Councils; Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

Aquinas, ST. THOMAS, called the Anglicol Doctor, the most conspicuous of the theological philosophers of the Middle Age, was born at Aquino, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1224 or 1226, of a noble family. (In Roman Catholic writers, and generally on the continent of Europe, his name appears as St. Thomas; but as the name Aquinas is more commonly used by English writers, we place this article under that title.) His parents sent him, when only five years old, to be educated in the monastery of Monte Cassino. In 1241 he took the habit of the Dominicans in the monastery of the order at Naples without the knowledge of his parents. "His mother, distressed by this act, set out in search of him, seized him on the road, and had him closely confined in the castle of Rocca-sicca. Here he entirely devoted himself to the study of Holy Scripture, and neither tears, nor entreaties, nor threats could persuade him to renounce the step he had taken. In this state of confinement he was kept for two years, when he escaped through a window and fled to Naples, and thence to Rome. In 1244 he went to Cologne, and placed himself under Albert the Great, whom he followed to Paris, and finished his studies under him. In 1248 he taught philosophy, the Holy Scriptures, and the Master of the Sentences at Cologne; in 1252 he taught at Paris, and in 1255 was made Doctor of Theology in that university, on the same day with Bonaventura." He subsequently taught in most of the Italian universities, and at last took up his abode at Naples, where he received a pension from King Charles, and spent the remainder of his life in teaching; entirely indifferent about worldly cares and honors, he declined many ecclesiastical dignities, and, among others, the archbishopric of Naples, which was offered to him by Clement IV. "As rector of the university, during a very active life, and often travelling, he wrote in twenty years the greater part of his works, which treat of a vast variety of subjects. It is said of him that he could dictate compositions on different subjects at the same time. It characterizes his theological speculations that he read daily some edifying books, for, as he expressed it, we should take care that nothing one-sided arise in our speculations. He used to begin his lectures and writings with prayer; and when in any inquiry he could find no solution, he would fall on his knees and pray for illumination. While the originality and deep philosophy of his lectures brought a great multitude of hearers to him at Paris and Naples, his sermons were so simple that the most uneducated could understand them. King Louis IX of France used to ask his advice in affairs of state. On one occasion he invited him against his will to dinner, when he was occupied with a very difficult inquiry. During the meal he became quite abstracted, and all at once cried out, 'Now at last I have found it!' His prior reminded him that he was seated at the king's table; but the king immediately allowed a secretary to come and write down his thoughts. Aquinas was distinguished among the schoolmen for clearness of development, and the harmony between his thoughts and their expression" (Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 543). "In the year 1274 Pope Gregory X called him to attend the Council of Lyons, in order that he might read to the assembly the book which he had composed, at the command of Pope Urban, against the claims of the Greek Church; but he was taken ill and died on the way, near Terracina, March 7, 1274. He was canonized in 1323 by John XXI, and the rank of fifth DOCTOR OF THE CHURCH was assigned to him. His writings at once assumed, and have continued to maintain, an immense authority; the popes have repeatedly declared his works to be perfect, without any error (Landon, Eecl. Diet. i, 475).

Of his theological writings, the most famous is his "Summa Theologicæ" (best ed. Antwerp, 1675, 3 vols. 4to), which is still a favorite authority in the Catholic Church. The Summa Theologicæ is one of the grandest attempts at a complete science of theology ever planned by a human intellect; and, as such, it deserves here a brief analysis, which we give from Hardwick (Ch. Hist. of the Middle Age, 1853, 8vo). The Summa is divided into three great parts: (1) the Natural. (2) the Moral, (3) the Sacramental. In the first of these the writer ascertains the nature and the limits of theology, which he esteems a proper science, based upon a supernatural revelation, the contents of which, though far transcending all the powers of human thought, are, when communicated, subjects for devout inquiry, and admit of argumentative defence. Accordingly, the writer next discusses the existence and the attributes of God, endeavoring to elucidate the nature of his will, his providence, the ground of his predestination, and the constitution of the blessed Trinity in unity—a doctrine which, although he deems it incapable of a priori demonstration, finds an echo and a counterpart in man. Descending from the cause to the effects, he analyzes the constituent parts of the creation, angels, the material world, and men, enlarging more especially upon the functions of the human soul, its close relation to the body, and the state of both before the fall. The second part is subdivided into the Prima Secundæ and the Secunda Secundæ. The former carries on the general subject, viewing men no longer from the heavenly, but the earthly side, as moral and responsible agents gifted with a vast complexity of passions, sentiments, and faculties. The way in which these powers would naturally operate, if acting by themselves, is first considered, and the author then proceeds to show how they are modified by supernatural agencies or coexistent gifts of grace. This leads him to compare the state or position of mankind in reference to the systems (or economies) in grace and nature, and, as the immediate consequence, to treat of our original righteousness, free-will, original sin, justification, and the original rules of life. In the Secunda Secundæ, the several virtues are discussed in turn, as they exist under the operation of divine grace, or that of nature only. They are seven in number. Three of them are "theological," or supernaturally infused and nourished—viz., faith, hope, and love—while the remainder are the four cardinal virtues of justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance, and are "ethical," or purely human. The discussion of these virtues forms an admirable work on Christian morals. The third part of the Summa is devoted to an exposition of the mysteries of the Incarnation, and the efficacy of the sacraments—a class of topics which, according to the principles of all the mediæval writers, are essentially akin. Aquinas traces every supernatural influence to the Person of the Word made flesh, who, by the union of our nature with the Godhead, has become the Reconstructor of humanity and the Dispenser of new life. This life, together with the aliment by which it is sustained, descends to man through certain outward media, or the sacramental ordinances of the church; their number being seven, viz., Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penitence, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. In the last division of the work, which develops "the complex philosophy of expiation, under the representations of it contained in the doctrines and ritual of the Church of Rome," and in which the Aristotelian philosophy is made to justify all the traditional teachings of that church, we find the grounds of the mighty influence of Aquinas in determining the scientific form of certain doctrines which afterward threatened to obtain complete ascendancy in all the Western churches.

But with all the learning, the piety, and the dialectic skill of Aquinas, he did not avoid the puerilities of the so-called scholastic spirit. Some of the questions treated in the Summa are trifling, others scandalous; e. g. Quare Christus non assumpit faveum secum, and others even worse.

The following summary of the doctrines of Aquinas is chiefly condensed from Neander, History of Dogmas, vol. ii. (1) As to the necessity of revelation, Aquinas inferred it from the super-terrestrial destiny of man, which goes beyond the limits of human reason. He denied any contradiction between philosophical and theological truth; the truths of natural reason cannot be at variance with those given by revelation, since God is also the author of reason. What opposes reason cannot proceed from God. If we admit such a contradiction, it would follow that something false might be the object of faith, which would be an absurdity. In his inquiries respecting the relation of faith to knowledge, he says: A faith of authority resting on human opinion is the weakest of all things; but it is otherwise with divine revelation. Yet theology makes use of human reason, not, indeed, to prove the truths of revelation, but to deduce other truths from it. As other sciences obtain their principles from other sources, and then draw inferences from them, so theology proceeds from those which are made known by a higher light. But since grace does not nullify nature, but perfects it, and as the natural inclinations of the will serve the divine principle of the Christian life, so also will reason serve the truths of faith. (2) As to the knowledge of God, he asserts that it is, in a certain confused manner, implanted in all men (sub quadam confusione est nobis naturaliter insertum). Since man is so created that he finds in God his highest good, so, in striving after happiness, striving after God is at the foundation; but all men do not attain to this consciousness. The fool can say in his heart that there is no God. (3) In anthropology, Aquinas held that man was created with pure natural powers, which, from their very destiny, turned toward God, and thus man acquired the grace of justitia originalis. This is the Romish doctrine of superadded grace, as necessary to the original perfection of human nature. As to original sin, he combated the view of the Traducians, according to which sin was transferred by propagation, for this would not explain the participation in guilt. Mankind must be regarded as an ethical person, and so far Adam's sin was the sin of all men. In original sin Aquinas recognized two elements, one privative, the other positive. The first was the loss of the harmony of original righteousness; the second consisted in an inordinata dispositio, a discordance which took place between reason and sensuousness, and in a languor nature. He maintained, in opposition to the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, that the Virgin Mary was not without original sin, inasmuch as she, as well as other mortals, needed redemption and salvation through Christ (Summa, p. 111, q. 27, art. 1). (4) As to redemption, he could see proof of its relative, but not of its absolute necessity. Since redemption proceeded from the free will of God, it suffices to prove that this method was not impossible, and that it was suitable. Supposing that man had been redeemed by an angel, his perfect restoration could not have been effected, for man would have remained dependent on a creature. The visible appearance of God was necessary, in order that man might be led from the visible to the knowledge and love of the invisible. Setting out from the contemplation of the divine Omnipotence, other possible modes of redemption might be imagined, but this method must have ever been the most suitable. On the other hand, if regard be had to man's stand-point, no other method was possible than that which was chosen by God, since man by himself alone could render no satisfaction. If the relations to God and man are combined, it must be allowed that another method of redemption was possible, but none so suitable as this. The union of God with man must give man the strongest assurance of attaining the highest happiness, which consists in immediate union with God. But, since redemption has been effected, men have acquired a new consciousness of the dignity of their nature. In these ends Aquinas found the importance of the work of redemption. As he here joins his own ideas with those of Anselm, he agrees also with him in the opinion that the satisfaction rendered by Christ furnished what was requisite from its intrinsic worth. Like Anselm, he proceeds on the principle that for an injury something must be given which the injured party would value as high as, or higher than what had been lost by the injury. Christ's satisfaction is not only sufficiens, but superabundans. Aquinas was perhaps the first to raise the question "afterward so earnestly discussed in the Calvinistic and Arminian controversies of the 17th century—the question, namely, whether Christ did not earn for the believer a title to eternal life, as of freedom from condemnation to eternal death. Aquinas answers this question in the affirmative, and makes the technical distinction between the satisfaction which Christ made by his sufferings to justice, and the merit of his obedience to the law, by virtue of which the redeemed are entitled to the rewards of eternity. In other words, we find in the theory of Aquinas an anticipation of the later distinction between the 'active' and 'passive' righteousness of Christ" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 310). If we find elsewhere the various instrumentalities of grace scattered, such as the offices of Lawgiver, Priest, and King, all these are united in Christ, the fountain of all grace. He is the Mediator between God and men, as far as he communicates what is divine to them, intercedes for them, and makes satisfaction for their sins. Christ is the mystical head of the members which belong to him, inasmuch as what he has done is for their benefit (unio mystica). (5) As to justification, the Schoolmen, after Augustin, conceived of it not as objective, but a subjective sanctification, of which faith is the instrument, and which is realized in love. Aquinas thought the infusio gratiæ justificantis (infusion of justifying grace) necessary for the forgiveness of sins on the part of God, and allowed successive steps in justification: first of all the communication of grace—then the tendency of the free will to God—then that by which it departs from sin, and upon this the forgiveness of sins. He thus confounds, to a certain extent, justification with sanctification, as all the later Romanists do. In the act of faith is contained the admission that man is made righteous by the redemption of Christ. As to the relation of faith to justification, he admitted it, but vitiated it by adopting the scholastic distinction between condignum and congruum, or merit from desert and merit from fitness. This distinction is thus defined by Aquinas, with his usual acuteness and clearness: "A meritorious work of man may be considered in two aspects; first, as proceeding from the free will of man, and, secondly, as proceeding from the grace of the Holy Spirit. If it be considered from the first point of view, there can be in it no merit of condignity or absolute desert, because of the inequality between man and God, whereby it is impossible for the creature to bring the Creator under absolute obligation. But if it be considered from the second point of view as proceeding from the influence of the Holy Spirit, the work of man may have the merit of congruity or fitness, because it is fitting that God should reward his own grace as a thing excellent in itself" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 239). (6) As to the sacraments, he taught that they are the necessary media of the application of Christ's merits to men. He endeavors to prove the necessity of the seven sacraments on the principle that the whole life should be consecrated to God's grace; its gradual development from birth to death was surrounded by the sacraments.

(i) The birth of the spiritual life takes place in baptism; (ii) the growth to maturity is through confirmation; (iii) the nourishment of the spiritual life is through the Lord's Supper. If man were bodily and spiritually sound throughout, he needs nothing more; but for the healing of his sickly state he requires (iv) penance; (v) the promotion of his recovery by certain means is signified by extreme unction. (7) As to the future state of man, he goes into details on the resurrection body. According to quest. 81 (Suavina, pt. iii), those who are raised from the dead will be in the ætas juvenilis, quæ inter decrementum et incrementum instituitur. The difference of sexes will continue to exist, but without sensual appetites. All the organs of sense will still be active, with the exception of the sense of taste. It is however possible that even the latter may be rendered more perfect, and fitted for adequate functions and enjoyments. Hair and nails are one of the ornaments of man, and are therefore quite as necessary as blood and other fluids. The resurrection bodies will be exceedingly fine, and be delivered from the heavy weight which is now so burdensome to them; nevertheless they will be tangible, as the body of Christ could be touched after his resurrection. But this is true only in reference to the bodies of the blessed. The bodies of the damned are ugly and deformed; they are incorruptible, but capable of suffering, which is not the case with the bodies of the saints" (Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 204).

The scholastic philosophy reached its culmination in Aquinas. He rendered real service to the Aristotelian philosophy by the pains he took to effect a translation of the works in which it was contained, and by his commentaries on them. He was a Realist, inasmuch as he maintained that the ideas of things after the pattern of which the world was made pre-existed eternally in the Divine mind (although not independent of God), and regarded them as the proper objects of knowledge, and as the forms which determine the nature and properties of all things. This system he endeavored to place on a firmer basis by extending the theory of thought propounded by Aristotle, to which he superadded some ideas of the system of Plato and of the Alexandrians. With this is connected his explanation of the conceptions of matter and form, as elements of compound substances, as also his explanation of the principle of individuation. The rational soul, the nature of which he discusses after Aristotle's system, is the substantial form of man, immaterial and indestructible. The aim of Aquinas, as a Christian philosopher, was to prove the reasonableness of Christianity, which he attempted to accomplish by showing, 1st, that it contains a portion of truth; 2d, that it falls under the cognizance of reason; and, 3d, that it contains nothing contradictory to reason. In connection with the latter argument he starts from the assumption that the truths of reason are essentially one with Divine truth, because reason is derived from God. Philosophy consists, according to him, in science searching for truth with the instrument of human reason; but he maintains that it was necessary for the salvation of man that Divine revelation should disclose to him certain things transcending the grasp of human reason. He regarded theology, therefore, as the offspring of the union of philosophy and religion (Tennemann, Hist. of Philosophy).

The Dominican monks, especially, naturally proud of their greatest doctor, have always maintained Thomism, as the doctrines of Aquinas have been named. The Franciscans, on the other hand, have always opposed Thomism; one of their greatest doctors, Bonaventura (q. v., doct. seraphicus, † 1274), opposed Aquinas on mystical grounds, and Duns Scotus (q. v., doctor subtilis, † 1308) on dialectical grounds; they were enrolled in solid body against it. The Thomists were Aristotelians, generally Realists; followed Augustine as to sin, grace, etc.; opposed the immaculate conception, and held that the sacraments convey grace physically. The Scotists were Nominalists, were opposed to Augustine's doctrines of grace and predestination, maintained the immaculate conception, and held that the sacraments produce grace as moral causes, not as physical. The Roman see naturally inclined to favor the doctrines of the Scotists, but the prestige of Aquinas was so great that the Thomists, to a great extent, ruled the theology of the church up to the time of the controversy between the Molinists (q. v.) and the Jansenists, when the views of the Scotists substantially prevailed.

The collected writings of St. Thomas fill twenty-three folio volumes. The following is the list of them, as given by Cave: 1. Expositio in Aristotelis libros, etc. (Venice, 1496).—2. Comment. in Lib. Sent. P. Lombardi (Basle, 1492; and often).—3. Questiones disputatæ, 10, de Potentia Dei; 16, de Moribus, etc.; 29, de Veritate.—4. Questiones Quodlibeticæ 12 (Cologne, 1471, 1491, etc.).—5. Summa Catholica sive contra Gentiles (Rome, 1476; Venice, 1484), fol., with notes by Fran. de Sylvestris; Lyons, 1566, fol., with comm. by Francisus Ferrariensis, Paris, 1612, 2 vols. fol.).—6. Expositio in lib. B. Dionysii de Divinis Nominibus.—7. Summa Theologiae (Cologne, 1604; Douai, 1611; Antwerp, 1624; Paris, 1633; Bologna, with comm. of Cajetan, 1514; with that of Caponus, Cajetan, and Javellus, Venice, 1596, 5 vols. fol.).—8. Expositio in Lib. B. Jobi.—9. Expositio in 51vum Psalmum Davidis (Lyons, 1520, 8vo).—10. Expositio in Canticum Cantaburium (1543, 8vo; Paris, 1634, 4to).—11. Expositio in Esaium Proph..—12. Expositio in Jeremiam Proph. (Lyons, 1531, 8vo).—13. Expositio in Theodosius Jeremie (attributed by some to Thomas, an Englishman). The last three published together in fol. at Venice in 1527.—14. Expositio in Evang. S. Joannis.—15. Catech. Aurei in 4. Evang. (Lyons, 1530, 8vo; Antwerp, 1578).—16. Expositio in Pauli Epistolâs (Basle, 1475; with comm. of Cajetan, Bologna, 1481, fol.).—17. Sermones (Rome, 1571, 8vo).—18. Opuscula 73. Of these, many are doubtful. All the above were collected and published at Rome, 1568 and 1570, in 17 vols.; Venice, 1587 and 1594; Douai, 1633; Antwerp, 1612; Paris, 1631, 1655, 1660, in 23 vols. In some of the latter of these editions another vol. was added, containing, 19. Comment. in Genesis.—20. Comment. in Lib. Maccab..—21. Comment. in omnes Epistolâs Canonicas.—22. Comment. in Apoclypsen.—23. Comment. in Danielem Proph..—24. Comment. in B. Athanasii libros de Consolâtionem Philosophiæ. The chief part of the six works last mentioned are, according to Cave, to be attributed to Thomas Anglus (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 398, cited by Landon, ii, 477). The best edition of the works of Aquinas is the editio Veneti altera, containing his life by Ehard, and commentaries by Rubéis (28 vols. 4to, Venet. 1775). Of his most important work, the Summa Theologiae, many editions have been printed. His Catech. Aurei, translated into English, was published at Oxford, 1845 (7 parts 8vo). The best recent books on Aquinas are Werner, Thomas von Aquino (Ratisbon, 1858-61, 3 vols.); Kling, Description des Sommes T. Aquinâs (Bonn, 1846); Rietter, Moral d. heiligen Thomas (Munich, 1853, 2 vols.); Goudin, Philos. juxta Thomæ dogmata (Par. 1861); Jourdain, Le Philos. de St. Thomas d'Aquin (Par. 1858, 2 vols.); Hampden, Life of Thomas Aquinas (Lond. 1848). See also Haureau, Philos. Scholast. vol. ii, cap. xx; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 421; Mozley, On Predestination, p. 260 sq.; Tenemann, Moral Hist. Phil. § 266; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1255; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 542 et al.; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctr.; Shedd, Hist. of Doctr.; Herzog, Real-Encycl. xvi, 60; Dupin, Écl. Writers, cent. xiii.

Aquino, PHILIP OF, a learned rabbin, whose real name was Mardochai. He was born at Carpentras; but, on his expressing a desire to embrace Christianity, he found it necessary to leave France, and went to Naples, and was baptized at Aquino, whence his name. He died at Paris in 1650, where he had been made royal professor of Hebrew at the College de France. He assisted Le Jay in his Polyglot, and published Dictionaryum Heb. Chald. Talm. Rabbinicum (Paris, 1629, fol.); Radices Lingue Sancte (Paris, 1620, 16mo); Rabbinical Comm. on the Pentateuch and Psalms (Latin; Paris, 1620, 4to); with other works of less importance, and several still in MS., among them a version of the N. T. in Hebrew, with notes. His son Louis translated into Latin the Comm. of Levi Ben Gerson on Job and Esther (Par. 1622, 4to).—Hofer, Novæ Biog. Gênerale, ii, 946.

Ar (Heb. id. אֶרֶץ i. q. אֶרֶץ, a city; Sept. Ἀρ [v. r. Ἡρ in Num. xxi, 15], Deut. ii, 29; fully Ar-Moab, Num. xxii, 28; Isa. xv, 1; also city of Moab, Num. xxii, 36; prob. also for Moabitis or the whole country, Deut. ii, 9, 18), the capital city of the Moabites (Num. xxi, 28; Deut. ii, 9, 18, 29), near (south of) the river Arnon (Deut. ii, 18, 24; Num. xxi, 13-15). It appears to have been burnt by King Sihon (Num. xxi, 28), and Isaiah, in describing the future calamities of the Moabites, says, "In the night Ar of Moab is laid waste and brought to silence" (Isa. xv, 1). In his comment on this passage, Jerome states that in his youth there was a great earthquake, by which Ar was destroyed in the night-time. This he evidently regards as a fulfilment of the prediction, which, however, had probably some less remote reference. Latterly the name of the city was Grecized Areopolis (Ἀρεόπολις, q. d. "city of Mars"). It was an episcopal city of the Third Palestine (Reland, Palest. p. 577 sq.). According to Theodoret (Comment. in Isa. xv, xxix), it was sometimes called Ariel. This city was also called Rabbah or Rabbath, and, to distinguish it from Rabbath of Ammon, Rabbath-Moab. Ptolemy calls it Rabmathom; Steph. Byzantinus, Rabathmona; and Abulfeda (Tab. Syr. p. 90), Rabbath, and also Mab. Hengstenberg (Bileam, p. 236) thinks it is the modern Mehaleh el-Hajj, near the Arnon (Burekhardt, iii, 636); but it is usually identified with the site that still bears the name of Rabba, visited and described by Seetzen, Burekhardt, Legh, Macmichael, and Irby and Mangles. It is about 17 miles east of the Dead Sea, 10 miles south of the Arnon (Mojeb), and about the same distance north of Kerak (Robinson, Researches, ii, 569). The ruins of Rabbah are situated on a low hill, which commands the whole plain. They present nothing of interest except two old Roman temples and some tanks. Irby and Mangles (Letters, p. 457) remark, with surprise, that the whole circuit of the town does not seem to have exceeded a mile. Burekhardt says, "half an hour in circuit," and that no trace of walls could be found; but it is obvious from the descriptions that the city whose ruins they saw was a comparatively modern town, less important and extensive than the ancient metropolis of Moab (Syria, p. 374, 377).—Kitto, s. v. See MOAB.

Ar'a (Heb. אֲרָא, אֲרָא, perhaps lion; Sept. Ἀρά), the last named of the three sons of Jether of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. viii, 38); apparently the same with the ULLA whose three sons are named in the ensuing verse. B. C. ante 1017.

Ar'ab (Heb. אֲרָב, אֲרָב, ambush; Sept. Ἐπίβ v. r. Αἰόβ), a city in the mountains of Judah, mentioned in connection with Golan and Dumah (Josh. xv, 52), whence probably the Gentile ARABITE (2 Sam. xxiii, 35). According to Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ereb) it lay south of Daroma, and was then called Eremitytha (Euseb. Ἐρεμίθηθα). Schwarz (Palest. p. 105) says it is the village al-Arab, situated on a mountain four English miles south-east of Hebron; but other authorities make no mention of such a place, and the associated names require a locality rather to the west of Hebron (Keil, Comment. on Josh. in loc.), possibly the ruined site el-Haab at the foot of a hill south-west of Dura (Robinson, Researches, iii, 5). See JUDAH.

Arāba (Ἀραβία, prob. for Arabah), a city mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) as lying near Diocæsarea (now Sefurieh), apparently the same mentioned by Josephus (Life, 51, where the text now has Ἰσάρα instead of Ἀραβία, by a conjecture of Ireland, Palest. p. 1021; see Robinson, new ed. of Res-arches, iii, 83) as lying 20 stadia from Sogane; now the village Arrabih, about four hours north of Nazareth (Schultz, in Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 768), containing Jewish graves, with other remains of antiquity (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 287).

Ar'abah (Heb. Arabah', אֲרָבָה, desert; Sept. ἔρημος, also ἀβάτος, ἀπειρος, and γῆ ἰψώσα, but in Josh. xviii, 18, Βαζάρηδα; Auth. Vers. elsewhere "plain"), the name of a region or tract and of a town.

1. This word, with the article (אֲרָבָה הַ, the Arabah), is applied directly (Deut. i, 1; ii, 8; iii, 17; iv, 49; Josh. iii, 16; xii, 1, 3; 2 Kings xiv, 25; Am. vi, 14) as the proper name of the great valley in its whole extent lying between the Dead Sea and the gulf of Akabah. Indeed it may be said to reach, with a partial interruption, or rather contraction, from Bamias, at the foot of Mount Hermon, to the Red Sea. It thus includes toward the north the lake of Tiberias; and the Arboth (plains) of Jericho and Moab form parts of it. The surface of the Arabah proper is said to be almost uninterruptedly a frightful desert. The northern continuation is watered by the Jordan, which, during its course, expands into the lakes el-Huleh and Tiberias, and is at length lost in the bitter waters of the Dead Sea; this latter occupying the middle point of the great valley nearly equidistant from its two extremities. The Scriptures distinctly connect the Arabah with the Red Sea and Elath; the Dead Sea itself is called the sea of the Arabah. In the Auth. Vers. it is rendered "plain." The Greek name of this tract was Ἀβιάρα, Abulra, described by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) as extending from Lebanon to the desert of Paran. Abulfeda speaks of it under the name el-Ghor, and says correctly that it stretches between the lake of Tiberias and Ailah or Akabah (Tab. Syr. p. 8, 9). At the present day the name el-Ghor is applied to the northern part, from the lake of Tiberias to an offset or line of cliffs just south of the Dead Sea; while the southern part, quite to the Red Sea, is called Wady el-Arabah, the ancient Hebrew name. The extension of this valley to the Dead Sea appears to have been unknown to ancient geographers, and in modern times was first discovered by Burckhardt (Travels in Syria, p. 441; Robinson's Palest. ii, 594-600). The importance of this great medial valley to the topography and natural features of Palestine (q. v.), as well as in the history of the Exode (q. v.), requires a full discussion of its peculiar designation and characteristics. See TOPOGRAPHICAL TERMS.

1. Name.—1. If the derivation of Gesenius (Thes. p. 1066) is to be accepted, the fundamental meaning of the term is "arid" or "waste," and thence "sterile," and in accordance with this idea it is employed in various poetical parts of Scripture to designate generally a barren, uninhabitable district, "a desolation, a dry land, and a desert, a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby" (Jer. li, 43; see a striking remark in Martineau, p. 395; and, among other passages, Job xxiv, 5; xxxix, 6; Isa. xxxiii, 9; xxxv, 1). See DESERT.

2. But within this general signification it is plain, from even a casual examination of the topographical records in the earlier books of the Bible, that the word has also a more special and local force. In these cases it is found with the definite article (אֲרָבָה הַ, ha-Arabah), "the Arabah," and is also so mentioned as clearly to refer to some spot or district familiar to the then inhabitants of Palestine. This district, although nowhere expressly so defined in the Bible, and although the peculiar force of the word "Arabah" appears to have been disregarded by even the earliest commentators and interpreters of the Sacred Books, has within our own times been identified with the deep-sunken valley or trench which forms the most striking among the many striking natural features of Palestine, and which extends with great uniformity of formation from the slopes of Hermon to the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea; the most remarkable depression known to exist on the surface of the globe (Humboldt, Cosmos, i, 150, ed. Bohn; also p. 301). Through the northern portion of this extraordinary fissure the Jordan rushes through the lakes of Huleh and Gennesareth down its tortuous course to the deep chasm of the Dead Sea. This portion, about 150 miles in length, is known among the Arabs by the name of el-Ghor (the depression), an appellation which it has borne certainly since the days of Abulfeda. The southern boundary of the Ghor has been fixed by Robinson to be the wall of cliffs which crosses the valley about 10 miles south of the Dead Sea. Down to the foot of these cliffs the Ghor extends; from their summits, southward to the gulf of Akabah, the valley changes its name, or, it would be more accurate to say, retains its old name of Wady el-Arabah.

Looking to the indications of the Sacred Text, there can be no doubt that in the times of the conquest and the monarchy the name "Arabah" was applied to the valley in the entire length of both its southern and northern portions. Thus in Deut. i, 1, probably, and in Deut. ii, 8, certainly (Auth. Vers. "plain" in both cases), the allusion is to the southern portion, while the other passages in which the name occurs point with certainty—now that the identification has been suggested—to the northern portion. In Deut. iii, 17; iv, 49; Josh. iii, 16; xi, 2; xii, 3; and 2 Kings xiv, 25, both the Dead Sea and the sea of Cinneroth (Gennesareth) are named in close connection with the Arabah. The allusions in Deut. xi, 30; Josh. viii, 14; xii, 1; xviii, 18; 2 Sam. ii, 29; iv, 7; 2 Kings xxv, 4; Jer. xxxix, 4; lii, 7, become at once intelligible when the meaning of the Arabah is known, however puzzling they may have been to former commentators. In Josh. xi, 16, and xii, 8, the Arabah takes its place with "the mountain," "the lowland" plains of Philistia and Esdraelon, "the south" and "the valley" of Coele-Syria, as one of the great natural divisions of the conquered country. See PLAIN.

3. But farther, the word is found in the plural and without the article (אֲרָבוֹת, Arboth), always in connection with either Jericho or Moab, and therefore doubtless denoting the portion of the Arabah near Jericho; in the former case on the west, and in the latter on the east side of the Jordan; the Arboth-Moab being always distinguished from the Sedeh-Moab—the bare and burnt-up soil of the sunken valley from the cultivated pasture or corn-fields of the downs on the upper level—with all the precision which would naturally follow from the essential difference of the two spots. (See Num. xxii, 1; xxvi, 3, 63; xxxi, 12; xxxiii, 48-50; xxxv, 1; xxxvi, 13; Deut. xxxiv, 1, 8; Josh. iv, 13; v. 10; xiii, 32; 2 Sam. xv, 28; xvii, 16; 2 Kings xxv, 5; Jer. xxxix, 5; lii, 8.) See JERICHO.

4. The word Arabah does not appear in the Bible until the book of Numbers. In the allusions to the valley of the Jordan in Gen. xiii, 10, etc., the curious term Ciccar is employed. This word and the other words used in reference to the Jordan valley, as well as the peculiarities and topography of that region—in fact, of the whole of the Ghor—will be more appropriately considered under the word JORDAN. At present our attention may be confined to the southern division, to that portion of this singular valley which has from the most remote date borne, as it still continues to bear, the name of "Arabah." See CHAMPAGNE. For a map of the region, see EXODE.

II. Description.—The direction of the Ghor is nearly due north and south. The Arabah, however, slightly changes its direction to about N.N.E. and S.S.W. (Robinson, i, 240). But it preserves the straightness of its course, and the general character of the region is not dissimilar to that of the Ghor (Irby, p. 134) except that the soil is more sandy, and that, from the absence of the central river and the absolutely desert character of the highland on its western side (owing to which the wady's bring down no fertilizing streams in summer, and nothing but raging torrents in winter), there are very few of those lines and "circles" of verdure which form so great a relief to the torrid climate of the Ghor. The whole length of the Arabah proper, from the cliffs south of the Dead Sea to the head of the gulf of Akabah, appears to be rather more than 100 miles (Kiepert's Map). In breadth it varies. North of Petra—that is, about 60 miles from the gulf of Akabah—it is at its widest, being perhaps from 10 to 12 miles across; but it contracts gradually to the south till at the gulf the opening to the sea is but 4, or, according to some travellers, 2 miles wide (Robinson, i, 240; Martineau, p. 392).

The mountains which form the walls of this vast valley or trench are the legitimate successors of those which shut in the Ghor, only in every way grander and more desert-like. On the west are the long horizontal lines of the limestone ranges of the Tih, "always faithful to their tabular outline and blanched desolation" (Stanley, p. 7; and see Laborde, p. 262), mounting up from the valley by huge steps with level barren tracts on the top of each (Robinson, ii, 508), and crowned by the vast plateau of the "Wilderness of the Wanderings." This western wall ranges in height from 1500 to 1800 feet above the floor of the Arabah (Robinson, i, 240), and through it break in the wady's and passes from the desert above—unimportant toward the south, but farther north larger and of a more permanent character. The chief of these wady's is the W. el-Jerafeh, which emerges about sixty miles from Akabah, and leads its waters, when any are flowing, into the W. el-Jeib (Robinson, ii, 500, 508), and through it to the marshy ground under the cliffs south of the Dead Sea. Two principal passes occur in this range. First, the very steep and difficult ascent close to the Akabah, by which the road of the Mecca pilgrims between the Akabah and Suez mounts from the valley to the level of the plateau of the Tih. It bears apparently no other name than en-Nukh, "the Pass" (Robinson, i, 257). The second—es-Sufah—has a more direct connection with the Bible history, being probably that at which the Israelites were repulsed by the Canaanites (Deut. i, 44; Num. xiv, 43-45). It is on the road from Petra to Hebron, above Ain el-Weibeh, and is not, like the former, from the Arabah to the plateau, but from the plateau itself to a higher level 1000 feet above it. See the descriptions of Robinson (ii, 587), Lindsay (ii, 46), Stanley (p. 113). The eastern wall is formed by the granite and basaltic (Schubert, in Ritter, Erdk. xiv, 1013) mountains of Edom, which are in every respect a contrast to the range opposite to them. At the base are low hills of limestone and argillaceous rock like promontories jutting into the sea, in some places thickly strewn with blocks of porphyry; then the lofty masses of dark porphyry constituting the body of the mountain; above these sandstone broken into irregular ridges and grotesque groups or cliffs, and farther back and higher than all long elevated ridges of limestone without precipices (Robinson, ii, 505, 551; Laborde, p. 209, 210, 262; Lindsay, ii, 43), rising to a height of 2000 to 2300 feet, and in Mount Hor reaching an elevation of not less than 5000 feet (Ritter, Erdk. xiv, 1139, 1140). Unlike the sterile and desolate ranges of the Tih, these mountains are covered with vegetation, in many parts extensively cultivated and yielding good crops; abounding in "the fatness of the earth" and the "plenty of corn and wine" which were promised to the fore-father of the Edomites as a compensation for the loss of his birthright (Robinson, ii, 552; Laborde, p. 203, 263). In these mountains there is a plateau of great elevation, from which again rise the mountains—or rather the downs (Stanley, p. 87)—of es-Sheriah. Though this district is now deserted, yet the ruins of towns and villages with which it abounds show that at one time it must have been densely inhabited (Burckhardt, p. 435, 436). The numerous wady's which at once drain and give access to the interior of these mountains are in strong contrast with those on the west, partaking of the fertile character of the mountains from which they descend. In almost all cases they contain streams which, although in the heat of summer small, and losing themselves in their own beds or in the sand of the Arabah "in a few paces" after they forsake the shadow of their native ravines (Laborde, p. 141), are yet sufficient to keep alive a certain amount of vegetation, rushes, tamarisks, palms, and even oleanders, lilies, and anemones, while they form the resort of the numerous tribes of the children of Esau, who still "dwell" (Stanley, p. 87; Laborde, p. 141; Martineau, p. 396) in Mount Seir, which is Edom" (Gen. xxxvi, 8). The most important of these wady's are the W. Ithm and the W. Abū Kusheibeh. The former enters the mountains close above Akabah, and leads by the back of the range to Petra, and thence by Shobeik and Tufi'eh to the country east of the Dead Sea. Traces of a Roman road exist along this route (Laborde, p. 203; Robinson, ii, 161); by it Laborde returned from Petra, and there can be little doubt that it was the route by which the Israelites took their leave of the Arabah when they went to "compass the land of Edom" (Num. xxi, 4). The second, the W. Abū Kusheibeh, is the most direct access from the Arabah to Petra, and is that up which Laborde and Stanley appear to have gone to the city. Besides these are Wady Tubal, in which the traveller from the south gains his first glimpse of the red sandstone of Edom, and W. Ghüründel, not to be confounded with those of the same name north of Petra and west of Sinai.

To Dr. Robinson is due the credit of having first ascertained the spot which forms at once the southern limit of the Ghor and the northern limit of the Arabah. This boundary is the line of chalk cliffs which sweep across the valley at about six miles below the south-west corner of the Dead Sea. They are from 50 to 150 feet in height; the Ghor ends with the marshy ground at their feet, and level with their tops the Arabah begins (Robinson, ii, 494, 498, 501). Thus the cliffs act as a retaining wall or buttress supporting the higher level of the Arabah, and the whole forms what in geological language might be called a "fault" in the floor of the great valley. Through this wall breaks in the embouchure of the great main drain of the Arabah—the Wady el-Jeib—in itself a very large and deep water-course, which collects and transmits to their outlet at this point the torrents which the numerous wady's from both sides of the Arabah pour along it in the winter season (Robinson, ii, 497, 500, 507). The farthest point south to which this drainage is known to reach is the southern Wady Ghüründel (Robinson, ii, 508), which debouches from the eastern mountains about 40 miles from Akabah and 60 from the cliffs just spoken of. The Wady el-Jeib also forms the most direct road for penetrating into the valley from the north. On its west bank, and crossed by the road from Wady Musa (Petra) to Hebron, are the springs of Ain el-Weibeh, maintained by Robinson to be Kadesh (Res. ii, 582; but see Stanley, p. 34). Of the substructure of the floor of the Arabah very little is known. In his progress southward along the Wady el-Jeib, which is, during part of its course, over 100 feet in depth, Dr. Robinson (ii, 498) notes that the sides are "of chalky earth or marl," but beyond this there is no information. The surface is dreary and desolate in the extreme. According to Dr. Robinsn

(ii, 502), "A lone shrub of the ghūdāh is almost the only trace of vegetation." This was at the ascent from the Wady el-Jeib to the floor of the great valley itself. Farther south, near Ain el-Weibeh, it is a rolling gravelly desert, with round naked hills of considerable elevation (ii, 580). At Wady Ghurundel it is "an expanse of shifting sands, broken by innumerable undulations and low hills" (Burckhardt, p. 442), and "countersected by a hundred water-courses" (Stanley, p. 87). The southern portion has a considerable general slope from east to west quite apart from the undulations of the surface (Stanley, p. 85), a slope which extends as far north as Petra (Ritter, xiv, 1097). Nor is the heat less terrible than the desolation, and travellers, almost without exception, bear testimony to the difficulties of journeying in a region where the sirocco appears to blow almost without intermission (Ritter, xiv, 1016; Burckh. p. 444; Martineau, p. 394; Robinson, ii, 505). However, in spite of this heat and desolation, there is a certain amount of vegetation, even in the open Arabah, in the driest parts of the year. Schubert in March found the Arta (Calligonum com.), the Anthia variegata, and the Coloquinta (Ritter, xiv, 1014), also tamarisk-bushes (tarfia) lying thick in a torrent bed (p. 1016); and on Stanley's road "the shrubs at times had almost the appearance of a jungle," though it is true that they were so thin as to disappear when the "waste of sand" was overlooked from an elevation (p. 85; and see Robinson, i, 240, 258). See ARABIA.

It is not surprising that after the discovery by Burckhardt in 1812 of the prolongation of the Jordan valley in the Arabah, it should have been assumed that this had in former times formed the outlet for the Jordan to the Red Sea. Lately, however, the levels of the Jordan and the Dead Sea have been taken, imperfectly, but still with sufficient accuracy to disprove the possibility of such a theory; and in addition there is the universal testimony of the Arabs that at least half of the district drains northward to the Dead Sea—a testimony fully confirmed by all the recorded observations of the conformation of the ground. A series of accurate levels from the Akabah to the Dead Sea, up the Arabah, are necessary before the question can be set at rest, but in the mean time the following may be taken as an approximation to the real state of the case. (See the profiles on Petermann's Map.)

(1.) The waters of the Red Sea and of the Mediterranean are very nearly at one level. See DEAD SEA.

(2.) The depression of the surface of the Sea of Galilee is 652 feet, and of the Dead Sea 1316 feet, below the level of the Mediterranean, and therefore of the Red Sea. Therefore the waters of the Jordan can never in historical times have flowed into the gulf of Akabah, even if the formation of the ground between the Dead Sea and the gulf would admit of it. But,

(3.) All testimony goes to show that the drainage of the northern portion of the Arabah is toward the Dead Sea, and therefore that the land rises southward from the latter. Also that the south portion drains to the gulf, and therefore that the land rises northward from the gulf to some point between it and the Dead Sea. The water-shed is said by the Arabs to be a long ridge of hills running across the valley at two and a half days, or say forty miles, from Akabah (Stanley, p. 85), and it is probable that this is not far wrong. By M. de Bertou it is fixed as opposite the entrance to the Wady Talh, apparently the same spot.—Smith, s. v.

2. A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 18), elsewhere (Josh. xv, 61; xviii, 22) called more fully ARABATTENE (q. v.).

Arabattinè (1 Macc. v, 3). See ARABATTENE. Arābā (Heb. Arab'), אַרְבֵּי, 2 Chron. ix, 14; Isa. xxi, 13; Jer. xxv, 24; Ezek. xxvii, 21; אַרְבֵּי, Gal. i, 17; iv, 23; also 2 Esdr. xv, 29; 1 Macc. xi, 16; 2 Macc. xii, 11), the name of an extensive region occupying the south-western extremity of Asia, having on the west the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea (called from it the Arabian Gulf), which separate it from Africa; on the south the Indian Ocean; and on the east the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates. The boundary to the north has never been well defined, for in that direction it spreads out into interminable deserts, which meet those of Palestine and Syria on the west, and those of Irāk-Arabi (i. e. Babylonia) and Mesopotamia on the east; and hence some geographers include that entire wilderness in Arabia. The form of the peninsula is that of a trapezoid, whose superficial area is estimated at four times the extent of France. It is one of the few countries of the south where the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants have neither been extirpated nor expelled by northern invaders. They have not only retained possession of their ancestral homes, but have sent forth colonies to all the adjacent regions, and even to more distant lands, both in Africa and Asia (Ritter, Erdkunde, ii, 172).

With the history of no country save that of Palestine are there connected so many hallowed and impressive associations as with that of Arabia. Here lived and suffered the holy patriarch Job; here Moses, "when a stranger and a shepherd," saw the burning, unconsuming bush; here Elijah found shelter from the rage of persecution; here was the scene of all the marvellous displays of Divine power and mercy that followed the deliverance of Israel from the Egyptian yoke, and accompanied their journeyings to the promised land; and here Jehovah manifested himself in visible glory to his people. From the influence of these associations, combined with its proximity to Palestine, and the close affinity in blood, manners, and customs between the northern portion of its inhabitants and the Jews, Arabia is a region of peculiar interest to the student of the Bible; and it is chiefly in its relation to subjects of Bible study that we are now to consider it. See ASIA.

1. Namus.—1. In early times the Hebrews included a part of what we call Arabia among the countries they vaguely designated as אֲרָבִים, Ke'dem, "the East," the inhabitants being numbered among the Beneh-Ke'dem, "Sons of the East," i. e. Orientals. But there is no evidence to show (as is asserted by Rosenmüller and some other Bible geographers) that these phrases are ever applied to the whole of the country known to us as Arabia. They appear to have been commonly used in speaking of those parts which lay due east of Palestine, or on the north-east and south-east; though occasionally they do seem to point to tracts which lay indeed to the south and south-west of that country, but to the east and south-east of Egypt. Accordingly we find that whenever the expression kedem has obviously a reference to Arabia, it invariably points to its northern division only. Thus in Gen. xxv, 6, Abraham is said to have sent away the sons of Hagar and Keturah to the E'rets-Ke'dem—Ke'dmah, i. e. the "East country, eastward;" and none of them, so far as we know, were located in peninsular Arabia; for the story which represents Ishmael as settling at Mecca is an unsupported native tradition. The patriarch Job is described (Job i, 3) as "the greatest of all the men of the east," and though opinions differ as to the precise locality of the land of Uz, all are agreed that it was in some part of Arabia, but certainly not in Arabia Felix. In the Book of Judges (vi, 3; vii, 12; viii, 10) among the allies of the Midianites and Amalekites (tribes of the north) are mentioned the "Bene-Kedem," which Josephus translates by Ἀραβῶν, the Arabs. In Isa. xi, 14, the parallelism requires that by "sons of the east" we understand the nomades of Desert Arabia, as corresponding to the Philistines "on the west;" and with these are conjoined the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, who were all northern Arabians. The command was given (Jer. xlix, 28) to the Babylonians "to smite the Bene-Kedem," who are there classed with the Kedarenes, descendants of Ishmael (comp. 1 Kings iv, 30). In more modern times a name of similar import was applied to the Arabs generally; they were called Saracens (Sharakiyun, i. e. Orientals), from the word shark, "the east," whence also is derived the term sirocco, the east wind. The name of Saracens came into use in the West in a vague and undefined sense after the Roman conquest of Palestine, but does not seem to have been adopted as a general designation till about the eighth century. It is to be remarked here that though in Scripture Kedem most commonly denotes Northern Arabia, it is also used of countries farther east, e. g. of the native country of Abraham (Isa. xli, 2; comp. Gen. xxix, 1), of Balaam (Num. xxiii, 7), and even of Cyrus (Isa. xlvi, 11); and, therefore, though the Magi who came to Jerusalem (Matt. ii, 1) were ἀπὸ ἀραρακῶν, "from the east," it does not thence follow that they were natives of Arabia. See BENE-KEDEM.

2. We find the name אַרְבִּי, Arbi', first beginning to occur about the time of Solomon. It designated a portion of the country, an inhabitant being called Arabi, an Arabian (Isa. xlii, 20), or, in later Hebrew, אַרְבִּי, Arbi' (Neh. ii, 19), the plural of which was Arbim' (2 Chron. xxi, 16), אַרְבִּיִּם, or Arbim' (אַרְבִּיִּם, Arabians) (2 Chron. xvii, 11). In some places these names seem to be given to the nomadic tribes generally (Isa. xlii, 20; Jer. iii, 2) and their country (Isa. xxi, 13). The kings of Arabia from whom Solomon (2 Chron. ix, 14) and Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 11) received gifts were probably Bedouin chiefs; though in the place parallel to the former text (1 Kings x, 15), instead of Arab we find אַרְבִּי or אַרְבִּי, E'arb, rendered in Jer. xxv, 20, 24, "mingled people," but which Gesenius, following the Chaldee, understands to mean "foreign allies." It is to be remarked, however, that in all the passages where the word Arab occurs it designates only a small portion of the territory known to us as Arabia. Thus, in the account given by Ezekiel (xxvii, 21) of the Arabian tribes that traded with Tyre, mention is specially made of Arab (comp. Jer. xxv, 24). In 2 Chron. xxi, 16; xxii, 1; xxvi, 7; Neh. iv, 7, we find the Arabians associated with the Philistines, the Ethiopians (i. e. the Asiatic Cushites, of whom they are said to have been neighbors), the Mehuim, the Ammonites, and Ashdodites. At what period this name Arab was extended to the whole region it is impossible to ascertain. From it the Greeks formed the word Ἀραβία, which occurs twice in the New Testament; in Gal. i, 17, in reference probably to the tract adjacent to Damascene Syria, and in Gal. iv, 25, in reference to the peninsula of Mount Sinai. Among the strangers assembled at Jerusalem at the Pentecost there were Ἀραβῆες, Arabs (Acts ii, 11), the singular being Ἀραβῆς.

3. The modern name, Jezirat el-Arab, i. e. "the peninsula of the Arabs," applies to the southern part of the region only. Another native appellation is Belad el-Arab, i. e. "the land of the Arabs;" the Persians and Turks call it Arabistan. Mr. Lane informs us that in Egypt the term Arab is now generally limited to the Bedouins, or people of the desert; but formerly it was used to designate the towns-people and villagers of Arabian origin, while those of the desert were called Arab; the former now call themselves Qudud el-Arab, or sons of the Arabs.

II. Geography.—1. The early Greek geographers, such as Eratosthenes and Strabo, mention only two divisions of this vast region, Happy and Desert Arabia. But after the city of Petra, in Idumæa, had become celebrated as the metropolis of a commercial people, the Nabathæans, it gave name to a third division, viz. Arabia Petraea (improperly translated Stony Arabia); and this thirdfold division, which first occurs in the geographer Ptolemy, who flourished in the second century, has obtained throughout Europe ever since.

It is unknown, however, to native or other Eastern geographers, who reckon Arabia Deserta as chiefly belonging to Syria and to Irak-Arabi, or Babylonia, while they include a great part of what we call Arabia Petraea in Egypt.

a. ARABIA FELIX (in Gr. Ἀραβία ἡ Ἐὐδαίμων, the Arabia Eudæmon of Pliny), i. e. Happy Arabia. The name has commonly been supposed to owe its origin to the variety and richness of the natural productions of this portion of the country, compared with those of the other two divisions. Some, however, regard the epithet "happy" as a translation of its Arabic name Yemen, which, though primarily denoting the land of the right hand, or south, also bears the secondary sense of "happy, prosperous." This part of Arabia lies between the Red Sea on the west and the Persian Gulf on the east, the boundary to the north being an imaginary line drawn between their respective northern extremities, Akabah and Basra or Bussora. It thus embraces by far the greater portion of the country known to us as Arabia, which, however, is very much a terra incognita; for the accessible districts have been but imperfectly explored, and but little of the interior has been as yet visited by any European traveller.

b. ARABIA DESERTA, called by the Greeks Σαυίτις Ἀραβία, or ἡ Ἐρημος Ἀραβία, and by the Arabs El-Badich, i. e. the Desert. This takes in that portion of the country which lies north of Arabia Felix, and is bounded on the north-east by the Euphrates, on the north-west by Syria, and on the west by Palestine and Arabia Petraea. The Arabs divide this "great wilderness" into three parts, so called from their proximity to the respective countries, viz. Badich esh-Shem (Syria), Dalich el-Jeshrah (the peninsula, i. e. Arabia), and Badich el-Irak (Babylonia). From this word Badich comes the name of the nomadic tribes by whom it is traversed, viz. Bedawees (better known to us by the French corruption of Bedouins), who are not, however, confined to this portion of Arabia, but range throughout the entire region. So far as it has yet been explored, Desert Arabia appears to be one continuous, elevated, interminable steppe, occasionally intersected by ranges of hills. Sand and salt are the chief elements of the soil, which in many places is entirely bare, but elsewhere yields stunted and thorny shrubs or thinly-scattered saline plants. That part of the wilderness called El-Hammad lies on the Syrian frontier, extending from the Hauran to the Euphrates, and is one immense dead and dreary level, very scantily supplied with water, except near the banks of the river, where the fields are irrigated by wheels and other artificial contrivances. The sky in these deserts is generally cloudless, but the burning heat of the sun is moderated by cooling winds, which, however, raise fearful tempests of sand and dust. Here, too, as in other regions of the East, occasionally prevails the burning, suffocating south-east wind, called by the Arabs El-Hurâr (the Hot), but more commonly Samiûm, and by the Turks Samiyeli (both words meaning "the Poisonous"), the effects of which, however, have by some travellers been greatly exaggerated. This is probably "the east wind" and the "wind from the desert" spoken of in Scripture. Another phenomenon, which is not peculiar, indeed, to Desert Arabia, but is seen there in greatest frequency and perfection, is what the French call the mirage, the delusive appearance of an expanse of water, created by the tremulous, undulatory movement of the vapors raised by the excessive heat of a meridian sun. It is called in Arabic serab, and is no doubt the Hebrew sharab of Isa. xxxv, 7, which our translators have rendered "the parched ground." See MIRAGE.

c. ARABIA PETRÆA (Gr. Περραία) appears to have derived its name from its chief town Petra (i. e. a rock), in Heb. Sela; although (as is remarked by Burckhardt) the epithet is also appropriate on account of the rocky mountains and stony plains which compose its surface. It embraces all the north-western portion of the country; being bounded on the east by Desert and Happy Arabia, on the north by Palestine and the Mediterranean, on the west by Egypt, and on the south by the Red Sea. This division of Arabia has been of late years visited by a great many travelers from Europe, and is consequently much better known than the other portions of the country. Confining ourselves at present to a general outline, we refer for details to the articles SINAI, EDOM, MOAB, etc. Beginning at the northern frontier, there meets the elevated plain of Belka, to the east of the Dead Sea, the district of Kerak (Kir), the ancient territory of the Moabites, their kinsmen of Ammon having settled to the north of this, in Arabia Deserta. The north border of Moab was the brook Arnon, now the Wady-el-Möjeb; to the south of Moab, separated from it by the Wady-el-Ashy, lay Mount Seir, the dominion of the Edomites, or Ibhmra, reaching as far as to Elath on the Red Sea. The great valley which runs from the Dead Sea to that point consists, first, of El-Ghor, which is comparatively low, but gradually rises by a succession of limestone cliffs into the more elevated plain of El-Arabah above mentioned. "We were now," says Dr. Robinson (Biblical Researches, ii, 502), "upon the plain, or rather the rolling desert, of the Arabah; the surface was in general loose gravel and stones, everywhere furrowed and torn with the beds of torrents. A more frightful desert it had hardly been our lot to behold. The mountains beyond presented a most uninviting and hideous aspect; precipices and naked conical peaks of chalky and gravelly formation rising one above another without a sign of life or vegetation." This mountainous region is divided into two districts: that to the north is called Jebel (i. e. mountains, the Gebal of Psa. lxxxiii, 7); that to the south Esh-Sherah, which has erroneously been supposed to be allied to the Hebrew "Seir;" whereas the latter (written with a τ) means "hairy," the former denotes "a tract or region." To the district of Esh-Sherah belongs Mount Hior, the burial-place of Aaron, towering above the Wady Mousa (valley of Moses), where are the celebrated ruins of Petra (the ancient capital of the Nabathæo-Idumæans), brought to light by Seetzen and Burckhardt, and now familiar to English readers by the illustrations of Irby and Mangles, Laborde, etc. As for the mountainous tract immediately west of the Arabah, Dr. Robinson describes it as a desert limestone region, full of precipitous ridges, through which no travelled road has ever passed. See ARABIA. To the west of Idumæa extends the "great and terrible wilderness" of E-Tih, i. e. "the Wandering," so called from being the scene of the wanderings of the children of Israel. It consists of vast interminable plains, a hard gravelly soil, and irregular ridges of limestone hills. The researches of Robinson and Smith furnish new and important information respecting the geography of this part of Arabia and the adjacent peninsula of Sinai. It appears that the middle of this desert is occupied by a long central basin, extending from Jebel-et-Tih (i. e. the mountain of the wandering, a chain pretty far south) to the shores of the Mediterranean. This basin descends toward the north with a rapid slope, and is drained through all its length by Wady-el-Arish, which enters the sea near the place of the same name on the borders of Egypt. The soil of the Sinaitic peninsula is in general very unproductive, yielding only palm-trees, acacias, tamarisks (from which exudes the gum called mannâ), coluquintida, and dwarfish, thorny shrubs. Among the animals may be mentioned the mountain-goat (the beden of the Arabs), gazelles, leopards, a kind of marmot called waber, the sheeb, supposed by Col. Hamilton Smith to be a species of wild wolf-dog, etc.: of birds there are eagles, partridges, pigeons, the katta, a species of quail, etc. There are serpents, as in ancient times (Num. xxi, 4, 6), and travellers speak of a large lizard called dhob, common in the desert, but of unusually frequent occurrence here. The peninsula is inhabited by Bedouin Arabs, and its entire population was estimated by Burckhardt at not more than 4000 souls. Though this part of Arabia must ever be memorable as the scene of the journeying of the Israelites from Egypt to the Promised Land, yet very few of the spots mentioned in Scripture have been identified; nor after the lapse of so many centuries ought that to be occasion of surprise.—Kitto, s. v. See EXODE.

2. Modern geographers find it more convenient to divide the country, agreeably to the natural features and the native nomenclature, into Arabia Proper, or Jezirat el-Arab, containing the whole peninsula as far as the limits of the northern deserts; Northern Arabia, or El-Badieh, bounded by the peninsula, the Euphrates, Syria, and the desert of Petra, constituting properly Arabia Deserta, or the great desert of Arabia; and Western Arabia, the desert of Petra and the peninsula of Sinai, or the country that has been called Arabia Petraea, bounded by Egypt, Palestine, Northern Arabia, and the Red Sea. (For further geographical details, see the Penny Cyclopæd. s. v.; M'Culloch's Gaz. s. v.; on Aden, see Wilson, Bible Lands, i. 9 sq.).

its most elevated portions being the chain of mountains running nearly parallel to the Red Sea, and the territory east of the southern part of this chain. The high land is encircled from Akabah to the head of the Persian Gulf by a belt of low littoral country; on the west and south-west the mountains fall abruptly to this low region; on the opposite side of the peninsula the fall is generally gradual. So far as the interior has been explored, it consists of mountainous and desert tracts, relieved by large districts under cultivation, well peopled, watered by wells and streams, and enjoying periodical rains. The water-shed, as the conformation of the country indicates, stretches from the high land of the Yemen to the Persian Gulf. From this descend the torrents that irrigate the western provinces, while several considerable streams—there are no navigable rivers—reach the sea in the opposite direction: two of these traverse Oman; and another, the principal river of the peninsula, enters the Persian Gulf on the coast of El-Bahreïn, and is known to traverse the inland province called Yemâneh. The geological formation is in part volcanic; and the mountains are basalt, schist, granite, as well as limestone, etc.; the volcanic action being especially observable about El-Medînah on the north-west, and in the districts bordering the Indian Ocean. The most fertile tracts are those on the south-west and south. The modern Yemen is especially productive, and at the same time, from its mountainous character, picturesque. The settled regions of the interior also appear to be more fertile than is generally believed to be the case; and the deserts afford pasturage after the rains. The principal products of the soil are date-palms, tamarind-trees, vines, fig-trees, tamarisks, acacias, the banana, etc., and a great variety of thorny shrubs, which, with others, afford pasture for the camels; the chief kinds of pulse and cereals (except oats), coffee, spices, drugs, gums and resins, cotton and sugar. Among the metallic and mineral products are lead, iron, silver (in small quantities), sulphur, the emerald, onyx, etc. The products mentioned in the Bible as coming from Arabia will be found described under their respective heads. They seem to refer, in many instances, to merchandise of Ethiopia and India, carried to Palestine by Arab and other traders. Gold, however, was perhaps found in small quantities in the beds of torrents (comp. Diod. Sic. ii, 93; iii, 45, 47); and the spices, incense, and precious stones brought from Arabia (1 Kings x, 2, 10, 15; 2 Chron. ix, 1, 9, 14; Isa. lx, 6; Jer. vi, 20; Ezek. xxxvii, 22) probably were the products of the southern provinces, still celebrated for spices, frankincense, ambergris, etc., as well as for the onyx and other precious stones. Among the more remarkable of the wild animals of Arabia, besides the usual domestic kinds, and, of course, the camel and the horse, for both of which it is famous, are the wild ass, the musk-deer, wild goat, wild sheep, several varieties of the antelope, the hare, monkeys (in the south, and especially in the Yemen) the bear, leopard, wolf, jackal, hyena, fox; the eagle, vulture, several kinds of hawk, the pheasant, red-legged partridge (in the peninsula of Sinai), sand-grouse (throughout the country), the ostrich (abundantly in central Arabia, where it is hunted by Arab tribes); the tortoise, serpents, locusts, etc. Lions were formerly numerous, as the names of places testify. The sperm-whale is found off the coasts bordering the Indian Ocean. Greek and Roman writers (Herod., Agatharch. ap. Müller, Strab., Diod. Sic., Q. Curt., Dion. Perieg., Heliol. Ethiop., and Plin.) mention most of the Biblical and modern products, and the animals above enumerated, with some others (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.).

Arabia Proper may be subdivided into five principal provinces: the Yemen; the districts of Hadramaut, Mahreh, and Oman, on the Indian Ocean and the entrance of the Persian Gulf; El-Bahreïn, toward the head of the gulf just named; the great central country of Nejd and Yemameh; and the Hejaz and Tehameh on the Red Sea. The Arabs also have five divisions, according to the opinion most worthy of credit (Marâsid, ed. Junyholi, s. v. Hejaz; comp. Strabo): Tehameh, the Hejaz, Nejd, El-Arid (the provinces lying toward the head of the Persian Gulf, including Yemameh), and the Yemen (including Oman and the intervening tracts). They have, however, never agreed either as to the limits or the number of the divisions. It will be necessary to state in some detail the positions of these provinces, in order to the right understanding of the identifications of Biblical with Arab names of places and tribes.

[1.] The Yemen embraced originally the most fertile districts of Arabia, and the frankincense and spice country. Its name, signifying "the right hand" (and therefore "south," comp. Matt. xii, 42), is supposed to have given rise to the appellation εὐχαίμων (Felix), which the Greeks applied to a much more extensive region. At present it is bounded by the Hejaz on the north and Hadramaut on the east, with the sea-board of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean; but formerly, as Fresnel remarks (comp. Sale, Prelim. Disc.), it appears to have extended at least so as to include Hadramaut and Mahreh (Yakût's Mushtarak, ed. Wüstenfeld, and Marâsid, passim). In this wider acceptance it embraced the region of the first settlements of the Joktanites. Its modern limits include, on the north, the district of Khaulan (not, as Niebuhr supposes, two distinct districts, named after Khaulan (Kâmoos) the Joktanite (Marâsid, s. v., and Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'Hist. des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, i, 113); and that of Nejran, with the city of that name founded by Nejran the Joktanite (Caussin, i, 60, and 113 sq.), which is, according to the soundest opinion, the Negra of Ælius Gallus (Strab. xvi, 782; see Jomard, Études géogr. et hist. sur l'Arabie, appended to Mengin, Hist. de l'Égypte, etc., iii, 385-386).

[2.] Hadramaut, on the coast east of the Yemen, is a cultivated tract contiguous to the sandy deserts called El-Ahkaf, which are said to be the original seats of the tribe of Ad. It was celebrated for its frankincense, which it still exports (El-Idrisi, ed. Jaubert, i, 54), and formerly it carried on a considerable trade, its principal port being Zafari, between Mirbat and Ras Sajir, which is now composed of a series of villages (Fresnel, 4^e Lettre, Journ. Asiat. iii^e série, v, 521). To the east of Hadramaut are the districts of Shihir, which exported ambergris (Marâsid, s. v.), and Mahreh (so called after a tribe of Kudaah [Id. s. v.], and therefore Joktanite), extending from Seihût to Karwan (Fresnel, 4^e Lettre, p. 510). Oman forms the easternmost corner of the south coast, lying at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It presents the same natural characteristics as the preceding districts, being partly desert with large fertile tracts. It also contains some considerable lead-mines.

[3.] The highest province on the Persian Gulf is El-Bahrein, between Oman and the head of the gulf, of which the chief town is Hejer—according to some, the name of the province also (Kâmoos; Marâsid, s. v.). It contains the towns (and districts) of Katif and El-Ahsa (El-Idrisi, i, 371; Marâsid, s. v.; Mushtarak, s. v. El-Ahsa), the latter not being a province, as has been erroneously supposed. The inhabitants of El-Bahrein dwelling on the coast are principally fishermen and pearl-divers. The district of El-Ahsa abounds in wells, and possesses excellent pastures, which are frequented by tribes of other parts.

[4.] The great central province of Nejd, and that of Yemameh, which bounds it on the south, are little known from the accounts of travellers. Nejd signifies "high land," and hence its limits are very doubtfully laid down by the Arabs themselves. It consists of cultivated table-land, with numerous wells, and is celebrated for its pastures; but it is intersected by extensive deserts. Yemameh appears to be generally very similar to Nejd. On the south lies the great desert called Er-Ruba el-Khali, uninhabitable in the summer, but yielding pasturage in the winter after the rains. The camels of the tribes inhabiting Nejd are highly esteemed in Arabia, and the breed of horses is the most famous in the world. In this province are said to be remains of very ancient structures, similar to those east of the Jordan.

[5.] The Hejaz and Tehameh (or El-Ghor, the "low land") are bounded by Nejd, the Yemen, the Red Sea, and the desert of Petra, the northern limit of the Hejaz being Eileh (El-Makrizi's Khîtat, s. v. Eileh). The Hejaz is the holy land of Arabia, its chief cities being Mekkeh and El-Medinah; and it was also the first seat of the Ishmaelites in the peninsula. The northern portion is in general sterile and rocky; toward the south it gradually merges into the Yemen, or the district called El-Asir, which is but little noticed by either eastern or western geographers (see Jomard, 245 sq.). The province of Tehameh extends between the mountain chain of the Hejaz and the shore of the Red Sea; and is sometimes divided into Tehameh of the Hejaz and Tehameh of the Yemen. It is a parched, sandy tract, with little rain, and fewer pasturages and cultivated portions than the mountainous country.

(2.) Northern Arabia, or the Arabian Desert, is divided by the Arabs (who do not consider it as strictly belonging to their country) into Badiet esh-Shem, "the Desert of Syria," Badiet el-Jezireh, "the Desert of Mesopotamia" (not "— of Arabia," as some suppose), and Badiet el-Irak, "the Desert of El-Irak." It is, so far as it is known to us, a high, undulating, parched plain, of which the Euphrates forms the natural boundary from the Persian Gulf to the frontier of Syria, whence it is bounded by the latter country and the desert of Petra on the north-west and west, the peninsula of Arabia forming its southern limit. It has few oases, the water of the wells is generally either brackish or unpotable, and it is visited by the sand-wind called Samoom, of which, however, the terrors have been much exaggerated. The Arabs find pasture for their flocks and herds after the rains, and in the more depressed plains; and the desert generally produces prickly shrubs, etc., on which the camels feed. The inhabitants were known to the ancients as σκηπται, "dwellers in tents," or perhaps so called from their town at Σκῆραι (Strab. xvi, 747, 767; Diod. Sic. ii, 24; Amm. Marc. xxiii, 6; comp. Isa. xiii, 20; Jer. xlix, 31; Ezek. xxxviii, 11) and they extended from Babylonia on the east (comp. Num. xxiii, 7; 2 Chron. xxi, 16; Isa. ii, 6; xiii, 20) to the borders of Egypt on the west (Strab. xvi, 748; Plin. v, 12; Amm. Marc. xiv, 4; xxii, 15). These tribes, principally descended from Ishmael and from Keturah, have always led a wandering and pastoral life. Their predatory habits are several times mentioned in the O. T. (2 Chron. xxi, 16, 17; xxvi, 7; Job i, 15; Jer. iii, 2). They also conducted a considerable trade of merchandise of Arabia and India from the shores of the Persian Gulf (Ezek. xxvii, 20-24), whence a chain of oases still forms caravan-stations (Burckhardt, Arabia, Appendix vi); and they likewise traded from the western portions of the peninsula. The latter traffic appears to be frequently mentioned in connection with Ishmaelites, Keturabites, and other Arabian peoples (Gen. xxxvii, 25, 28; 1 Kings x, 15, 25; 2 Chron. ix, 14, 24; Isa. lx, 6; Jer. vi, 20), and probably consisted of the products of Southern Arabia and of the opposite shores of Ethiopia; it seems, however, to have been chiefly in the hands of the inhabitants of Idumæa; but it is difficult to distinguish between the references to the latter people and to the tribes of Northern Arabia in the passages relating to this traffic. That certain of these tribes brought tribute to Jehoshaphat appears from 2 Chron. xvii, 11; and elsewhere there are indications of such tribute (comp. the passages referred to above).

(3.) Western Arabia includes the peninsula of Sinai (q. v.) and the desert of Petra, corresponding generally with the limits of Arabia Petraea. The latter name is probably derived from that of its chief city; not from its stony character. It was in the earliest times inhabited by a people whose genealogy is not mentioned in the Bible, the Horites, or Horim (Gen. xiv, 6; xxxvi, 20, 21; Deut. ii, 12, 22; xxxvii, 20-22). See HORITE. Its later inhabitants were in part the same as those of the preceding division of Arabia, as indeed the boundary of the two countries is arbitrary and unsettled; but it was mostly peopled by descendants of Esau, and was generally known as the land of Edom, or Idumæa (q. v.), as well as by its older appellation, the desert of Seir, or Mount Seir (q. v.). The common origin of the Idumæans from Esau and Ishmael is found in the marriage of the former with a daughter of the latter (Gen. xxviii, 9; xxxvi, 3). The Nabathæans succeeded to the Idumæans, and Idumæa is mentioned only as a geographical designation after the time of Josephus. The Nabathæans have always been identified with Nebaioth, son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv, 13; Isa. lx, 7), until Quatremère (Mémoire sur les Nabathéens) advanced the theory that they were of another race, and a people of Mesopotamia. See NEBAIOTH. Petra was in the great route of the western caravan-traffic of Arabia, and of the merchandise brought up the Eranitic Gulf.—Smith, s. v. See ELATH; EZIONGEBER; PETRA, etc.

III. Inhabitants.—1. Scriptural Account.—There is a prevalent notion that the Arabs, both of the south and north, are descended from Ishmael; and the passage in Gen. xvi, 12, "he (Ishmael) shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren," is often cited as if it were a prediction of that national independence which, upon the whole, the Arabs have maintained more than any other people. But this supposition (in so far as the true meaning of the text quoted is concerned) is founded on a misconception of the original Hebrew, which runs literally, "he shall dwell before the faces of all his brethren," i. e. (according to the idiom above explained, in which "before the face" denotes the east), the habitation of his posterity shall be "to the east" of the settlements of Abraham's other descendants. This seems also to be the import of Gen. xxv, 18, where, in reference to Ishmael, it is said in our version, "he died in the presence of all his brethren;" but the true sense is, "the lot of his inheritance fell to him before the faces (i. e. to the east) of all his brethren." These prophecies found their accomplishment in the fact of the sons of Ishmael being located, generally speaking, to the east of the other descendants of Abraham, whether by Sarah or by Keturah. But the idea of the southern Arabs being of the posterity of Ishmael is entirely without foundation, and seems to have originated in the tradition invented by Arab vanity that they, as well as the Jews, are of the seed of Abraham—a vanity which, besides disfiguring and falsifying the whole history of the patriarch and his son Ishmael, has transferred the scene of it from Palestine to Mecca. If we go to the most authentic source of ancient ethnography, the book of Genesis, we there find that the vast tracts of country known to us under the name of Arabia gradually became peopled by a variety of tribes of different lineage, though it is now impossible to determine the precise limits within which they fixed their permanent or nomadic abode. See ETYMOLOGY.

a. HAMITES, i. e. the posterity of Cush, Ham's eldest son, whose descendants appear to have settled in the south of Arabia, and to have sent colonies across the Red Sea to the opposite coast of Africa; and hence Cush became a general name for "the south," and specially for Arabian and African Ethiopia. The sons of Cush (Gen. x, 7) were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah or Ragma (his sons Sheba and Dedan), and Sabtecah. See CUSH.

b. SHEMITES, including the following:

(a) Joktanites, i. e. the descendants of Joktan (called by the Arabs Kahtan), the second son of Eber, Shem's great-grandson (Gen. x, 25, 26). According to Arab tradition, Kahtan (whom they also regard as a son of Eber), after the confusion of tongues and dispersion at Babel, settled in Yemen, where he reigned as king. Ptolemy speaks of an Arab tribe called Katanites, who may have derived their name from him; and the richest Bedouins of the southern plains are the Kahtan tribe on the frontiers of Yemen. Joktan had thirteen sons, some of whose names may be obscurely traced in the designations of certain districts in Arabia Felix. Their names were Almodad, Sheleph, Hazaramaveth (preserved in the name of the province of Hadramaut, the Hebrew and Arabic letters being the same), Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal (believed by the Arabs to have been the founder of Sanaa in Yemen), Diklah, Ohal, Abimael, Sheba (father of the Sabæans, whose chieftown was Mariaba or Mareb; their queen, Balkis, supposed to be the queen who visited Solomon), Ophir (who gave name to the district that became so famous for its gold), Havilah, and Jobab.

(b) Abrahamites, divided into:

[1.] Hagarites or Hagrites, so called from Hagar the mother, otherwise termed Ishmaelites from her son; and yet in course of time these names appear to have been applied to different tribes, for in Psalm lxxxiii, 6, the Hagarites are expressly distinguished from the Ishmaelites (comp. 1 Chron. v, 10, 19, 22, and the apocryphal book of Baruch i, 35; iii, 23). The twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv, 13-15), who gave names to separate tribes, were Nebaioth (the Nabathæans in Arabia Petraea), Kedar (the Kedarenes, sometimes also used as a designation of the Bedouins generally, and hence the Jewish rabbins call the Arabic language "the Kedarene"), Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadad or Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish (the Itureans and Naphisheans near the tribe of Gad; 1 Chron. v, 19, 20), and Kedemah. They appear to have been for the most part located near Palestine on the east and south-east.

[2.] Keturahites, i. e. the descendants of Abraham and his concubine Keturah, by whom he had six sons (Gen. xxv, 2): Zimram, Jokshan (who, like Raamah, son of Cush, was also the father of two sons, Sheba and Dedan), Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Among these the posterity of Midian became the best known. Their principal seat appears to have been in the neighborhood of the Moabites, but a branch of them must have settled in the peninsula of Sinai, for Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a priest of Midian (Exod. iii, 1; xviii, 5; Num. x, 29). To the posterity of Shuah belonged Bildad, one of the friends of Job.

[3.] Edomites, i. e. the descendants of Esau, who possessed Mount Seir and the adjacent region, called from them Idumæa. They and the Nabathæans formed in later times a flourishing commercial state, the capital of which was the remarkable city called Petra.

(c) Nahorites, the descendants of Nahor, Abraham's brother, who seem to have peopled the land of Uz, the country of Job, and of Buz, the country of his friend Eliphaz the Buzite, these being the names of Nahor's sons (Gen. xxii, 21).

(d) Lolites, viz.:

[1.] Moabites, who occupied the northern portion of Arabia Petraea, as above described, and their kinsmen, the [2.] Ammonites, who lived north of them, in Arabia Deserta.

c. Besides these the Bible mentions various other tribes who resided within the bounds of Arabia, but whose descent is unknown, e. g. the Amalekites, the Kenites, the Horites, the inhabitants of Maon, Hazor, Vedan, and Javan-Meuzal (Ezek. xxvii, 19), where the English version has, "Dan also and Javan going to and fro."

In process of time some of these tribes were perhaps wholly extirpated (as seems to have been the case with the Amalekites), but the rest were more or less mingled together by intermarriages, by military conquests, political revolutions, and other causes of which history has preserved no record; and, thus amalgamated, they became known to the rest of the world as the "ARABS," a people whose physical and mental characteristics are very strongly and distinctly marked. In both respects they rank very high among the nations; so much so that some have regarded them as furnishing the prototype—the primitive model form—the standard figure of the human species. This was the opinion of the famous Baron de Larrey, surgeon-general of Napoleon's army in Egypt, who, in speaking of the Arabs on the east side of the Red Sea, says (in a Memoir for the Use of the Scientific Commission to Algiers, Paris, 1828), "They have a physiognomy and character which are quite peculiar, and which distinguish them generally from all those which appear in other regions of the globe." In his dissections he found "their physical structure in all respects more perfect than that of Europeans; their organs of sense exquisitely acute; their size above the average of men in general; their figure robust and elegant (the color brown); their intelligence proportionate to that physical perfection, and, without doubt, superior, other things being equal, to that of other nations."—Kitto, s. v.

2. Native History.—The Arabs, like every other ancient nation of any celebrity, have traditions representing their country as originally inhabited by races which became extinct at a very remote period. These were the tribes of Ad, Thamud, Umeiyim, Abil, Tasm, Jedis, Emlik (Amalek), Jurhum (the first of this name), and Webari: some omit the fourth and the last two, but add Jasm. The majority of their historians derive these tribes from Shem; but some from Ham, though not through Cush. Their earliest traditions that have any obvious relation to the Bible refer the origin of the existing nation in the first instance to Kahtan, whom they and most European scholars identify with Joktan; and secondly to Ishmael, whom they assert to have married a descendant of Kahtan, though they only carry up their genealogies to Adnan (said to be of the 21st generation before Mohammed). They are silent respecting Cushite settlements in Arabia; but modern research, we think, proves that Cushites were among its early inhabitants. Although Cush in the Bible usually corresponds to Ethiopia, certain passages seem to indicate Cushite peoples in Arabia; and the series of the sons of Cush should, according to recent discoveries, be sought for in order along the southern coast, exclusive of Seba (Meroe), occupying one extreme of their settlements, and Nimrod the other. The great ruins of Mareb or Seba, and of other places in the Yemen and Hadramaut, are not those of a Semitic people; and farther to the east, the existing language of Mahreb, the remnant of that of the inscriptions found on the ancient remains just mentioned, is in so great a degree apparently African as to be called by some scholars Cushite; while the settlements of Raamah and those of his sons Sheon and Dedan, are probably to be looked for toward the head of the Persian Gulf, bordered on the north by the descendants of Keturah, bearing the same names as the two latter. In Babylonia also independent proofs of this immigration of Cushites from Ethiopia have, it is thought, been lately obtained. The ancient cities and buildings of Southern Arabia, in their architecture, the inscriptions they contain, and the native traditions respecting them, are of the utmost value in aiding a student of this portion of primeval history. Indeed they are the only important archaic monuments of the country; and they illustrate both its earliest people and its greatest kingdoms. Mareb, or Seba (the Mariaba of the Greek geographers), is one of the most interesting of these sites (see Michaelis's Questions, No. 94, etc., in Niebuhr's Arabia). It was founded, according to the general agreement of tradition, by Abd-esh-Shems Seba, grandson of Yaarub the Kahtanite (Mushtarak, in loc.; Abulfeda, Hist. antieq. ed. Fleischer, p. 114); and the Dike of El-Arim, which was situate near the city, and the rupture of which (A.D. 150-170, according to De Sacy; 120, according to Caussin de Perceval) formed an era in Arabian history, is generally ascribed to Lukman the Greater, the Adite, who founded the dynasty of the second Ad (Hn-el-Wardee, MS.; Haanza Ispahanensis, op. Schultens, p. 24, 25; El-Mesudi, cited by De Sacy, Mém. de l'Acad. xlviii, 484 sq.; and Hn Khaldun in Caussin's Essai, i, 16). Adites (in conjunction with Cushites) were probably the founders of this and similar structures, and were succeeded by a predominantly Joktanite people, the Biblical Seba, whose name is preserved in the Arabian Seba, and in the Sabei of the Greeks. It has been argued (Caussin, Essai, i, 42 sq.; Rénan, Langues Scythiques, i, 300) that the Adites were the Cushite Seba; but this hypothesis, which involves the question of the settlements of the eldest son of Cush, and that of the descent of the Adites, rests solely on the existence of Cushite settlements in Southern Arabia, and of the name of Seba in the Yemen (by these writers inferentially identified with 𐩦𐩣𐩪; by the Arabs, unanimously, with Seba the Kahtanite, or 𐩦𐩣𐩪; the Hebrew skin being, in by far the greater number of instances, sin in Arabic); and it necessitates the existence of the two Biblical kingdoms of Seba and Sheba in a circumscribed province of Southern Arabia, a result which we think is irreconcilable with a careful comparison of the passages in the Bible bearing on this subject. See CUSH; SEBA; SHEBA. Neither is there evidence to indicate the identity of Ad and the other extinct tribes with any Semitic or Hamitic people: they must, in the present state of knowledge, be classed with the Rephaim and other peoples whose genealogies are not known to us. See ADITES. The only one that can possibly be identified with a scriptural name is Amalek, whose supposed descent from the grandson of Esau seems inconsistent with Gen. xiv, 7, and Num. xxiv, 20. See AMALEK.

The several nations that have inhabited the country are divided by the Arabs into extinct and existing tribes, and these are again distinguished as, 1. El-Arab el-Arîbeh ("Arab of the Arabs;" comp. Paul's phrase, "Hebrew of the Hebrews," Phil. iii, 5), the pure or genuine Arabs; 2. El-Arab el-Mutaarîbeh; and, 3. El-Arab el-Mustaarîbeh, the insidious or naturalized Arabs. Of many conflicting opinions respecting these races, two only are worthy of note. According to the first of these, El-Arab el-Arîbeh denotes the extinct tribes, with whom some conjoin Kahtan; while the other two, as synonymous appellations, belong to the descendants of Ishmael. According to the second, El-Arab el-Arîbeh denotes the extinct tribes; El-Arab el-Mutaarîbeh the unmixed descendants of Kahtan; and El-Arab el-Mustaarîbeh the descendants of Ishmael by the daughter of Mudad the Joktanite. That the descendants of Joktan occupied the principal portions of the south and south-west of the peninsula, with colonies in the interior, is attested by the Arabs, and fully confirmed by historical and philological researches. It is also asserted that they have been gradually absorbed into the Ishmaelite immigrants, though not without leaving strong traces of their former existence. Fresnel, however (1^{re} Lettre, p. 24), says that they were quite distinct, at least in Mohammed's time, and it is not unlikely that the Ishmaelite element has been exaggerated by Mohammedan influence.

Respecting the Joktanite settlers we have some certain evidence. In Genesis (x, 30) it is said, "and their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east [Kedem]." The position of Mesha is very uncertain; it is most reasonably supposed to be the western limit of the first settlers [see MESHAN]: Sephar is undoubtedly Dhafari, or Zafari, of the Arabs (probably pronounced in ancient times without the final vowel, as it is at the present day), a name not uncommon in the peninsula, but especially that of two celebrated towns—one being the seaport on the south coast near Mirlat, the other, now in ruins, near Sana, and said to be the ancient residence of the Himyarite kings (Mushtarak, s. v.; Marisid, ib.; El-Idrisi, i, 148). Fresnel (4^e Lettre, p. 516 sq.) prefers the seaport, as the Himyarite capital, and is followed by Jomard (Ethiops, p. 367). He informs us that the inhabitants call this town "Isfor." Considering the position of the Joktanite races, this is probably Sephar; it is situated near a thuriferous mountain (Marisid, s. v.), and exports the best frankincense (Niebuhr, p. 148); Zafari in the Yemen, however, is also among mountains. See SEPHAR. In the district indicated above are distinct and undoubted traces of the names of the sons of Joktan mentioned in Genesis, such as Hadramaut for Hazarmaveth, Azal for Uzal, Seba for Sheba, etc. Their remains are found in the existing inhabitants of (at least) its eastern portion, and their records in the numerous Himyarite ruins and inscriptions.

The principal Joktanite kingdom, and the chief state of ancient Arabia, was that of the Yemen, founded (according to the Arabs) by Yaarub, the son (or descendant) of Kahtan (Joktan). Its most ancient capital was probably Sana, formerly called Azal, after Azal, son of Joktan (Yakut, ut sup.). See UZAL. The other capitals were Mareb, or Seba, and Zafari. This was the Biblical kingdom of Sheba. Its rulers, and most of its people, were descendants of Seba (= Sheba), whence the classical Sabæi (Diod. Sic. iii, 38, 46). Among its rulers was probably the queen of Sheba who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon (2 Kings x, 2). The Arabs call her Balkis, a queen of the later Himyarites; and their traditions respecting her are otherwise not worthy of credit. See SHEBA. The dominant family was apparently that of Himyer, son (or descendant) of Seba. A member of this family founded the more modern kingdom of the Himyarites. The testimony of the Bible and of the classical writers, as well as native tradition, seems to prove that the latter appellation superseded the former only shortly before the Christian era; i. e. after the foundation of the later kingdom. "Himyarite," however, is now very vaguely used. Himyer, it may be observed, is perhaps "red," and several places in Arabia whose soil is reddish derive their names from Anfar, "reddish." This may identify Himyer (the red man?) with Ophir, respecting whose settlements, and the position of the country called Ophir, the opinion of the learned is widely divided. See OPHIR. The similarity of signification with φαινῆ and ῥοδόχρος lends weight to the tradition that the Phœnicians came from the Erythraean Sea (Herod. vii, 89). The maritime nations of the Mediterranean who had an affinity with the Egyptians—such as the Philistines, and probably the primitive Cretans and Carians—appear to have been an offshoot of an early immigration from Southern Arabia which moved northward, partly through Egypt. See CARUROR. It is noticeable that the Shepherd invaders of Egypt are said to have been Phœnicians; but Manetho, who seems to have held this opinion, also tells us that some said they were Arabs (Manetho, ap. Cory, Anc. Fragments, 2d ed. p. 171), and the hieroglyphic name has been supposed to correspond to the common appellation of the Arabs, Shasu, the "camel-riding Shasu" (Select Papyri, pl. liii), an identification entirely in accordance with the Egyptian historian's account of their invasion and polity. In the opposite direction, an early Arab domination of Chaldaea is mentioned by Berosus (Cory, p. 60), as preceding the Assyrian dynasty. All these indications, slight as they are, must be borne in mind in attempting a reconstruction of the history of Southern Arabia. The early kings of the Yemen were at continual feud with the descendants of Kahlan (brother of Himyer) until the fifteenth in descent (according to the majority of native historians) from Himyer united the kingdom. This king was the first Tubbaa, a title also distinctive of his successors, whose dynasty represents the proper kingdom of Himyer, whence the Homerite (Ptol. vi, 7; Plin. vi, 28). Their rule probably extended over the modern Yemen, Hadramaut, and Mahreh. The fifth Tubbaa, Dhu-l-Adhar, or Zu-l-Azar, is supposed (Caussin, i, 73) to be the Ilasarus of Ælius Gallus (B. C. 24). The kingdom of Himyer lasted until A. D. 525, when it fell before an Abyssinian invasion. Already, about the middle of the fourth century, the kings of Axum appear to have become masters of part of the Yemen (Caussin, Essai, i, 114; Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch., vii, 17 sq.; xi, 338 sq.), adding to their titles the names of places in Arabia belonging to Himyer. After four reigns they were succeeded by Himyarite princes, vassals of Persia, the last of whom submitted to Mohammed. Kings of Hadramaut (the people of this district are the classical Chatramotite, Plin. vi, 28; comp. Adramite) are also enumerated by the Arabs (Ibn-Khaldûn, op. Caussin, i, 135 sq.), and distinguished from the descendants of Yaarub, an indication, as is remarked by Caussin (i. c.), of their separate descent from Hazarmaveth (q. v.). The Greek geographers mention a fourth people in conjunction with the Sabæi, Homerite, and Chatramotite—the Minei (Strab. xvi, 768; Ptol. v, 7, § 23; Plin. vi, 32; Diod. Sic. iii, 42), who have not been identified with any Biblical or modern name. Some place them as high as Mekkeh, and derive their name from Mina (the sacred valley north-east of that city), or from the goddess Minah, worshipped in the district between Mekkeh and El-Medinah. Fresnel, however, places them in the Wady Doan in Hadramaut, arguing that the Yemen anciently included this tract, that the Minei were probably the same as the Rhabanite or Rhamanite (Ptol. vi, 7, § 24; Strab. xvi, 782), and that Ῥαμανιτῶν was a copyist's error for Ἰεμανιτῶν.

The other chief Joktanite kingdom was that of the Hejaz, founded by Jurhum, the brother of Yaarub, who left the Yemen and settled in the neighborhood of Mekkeh. The Arab lists of its kings are inextricably confused; but the name of their leader and that of two of his successors was Mudad (or El-Mudad), who probably represents Almodad (q. v.). Ishmael, according to the Arabs, married a daughter of the first Mudad, whence sprang Adnan the ancestor of Mohammed. This kingdom, situate in a less fertile district than the Yemen, and engaged in conflict with aboriginal tribes, never attained the importance of that of the south. It merged, by intermarriage and conquest, into the tribes of Ishmael. (Kutb-ed-Din, ed. Wâstenfeld, p. 35 and 39 sq.; comp. authorities quoted by Caussin.) Fresnel cites an Arab author who identifies Jurhum with Hadoram (q. v.).

Although these were the principal Joktanite kingdoms, others were founded beyond the limits of the peninsula. The most celebrated of these were that of El-Hireh in El-Irak, and that of Ghassan on the confines of Syria; both originated by emigrants after the Flood of El-Arim. El-Hireh soon became Ishmaelite; Ghassan long maintained its original stock. Among its rulers were many named El-Harith. Respecting the presumed identity of some of these with kings called by the Greeks and Romans Arctas, and with the Aretas mentioned by Paul (2 Cor. xi, 32), see ARETAS.

The Ishmaelites appear to have entered the peninsula from the north-west. That they have spread over the whole of it (with the exception of one or two districts on the south coast which are said to be still inhabited by unmixed Joktanite peoples), and that the modern nation is predominantly Ishmaelite, is asserted by the Arabs. They do not, however, carry up their genealogies higher than Adnan (as we have already said), and they have lost the names of most of Ishmael's immediate and near descendants. Such as have been identified with existing names will be found under the several articles bearing their names. See also HAGARENE. They extended northward from the Hejaz into the Arabian desert, where they mixed with Keturahites and other Abrahamitic peoples; and westward to Idumæa, where they mixed with Edomites, etc. The tribes sprung from Ishmael have always been governed by petty chiefs or heads of families (sheiks and emirs); they have generally followed a patriarchal life, and have not originated kingdoms, though they have in some instances succeeded to those of Joktanites, the principal one of these being that of El-Hireh. With reference to the Ishmaelites generally, we may observe, in continuation of a former remark, that although their first settlements in the Hejaz, and their spreading over a great part of the northern portions of the peninsula, are sufficiently proved, there is doubt as to the wide extension given to them by Arab tradition. Mohammed derived from the Jews whatever tradition he pleased, and silenced any contrary, by the Koran or his own dicta. This religious element, which does not directly affect the tribes of Joktan (whose settlements are otherwise unquestionably identified), has a great influence over those of Ishmael. They, therefore, cannot be certainly proved to have spread over the peninsula, notwithstanding the almost universal adoption of their language (which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called), and the concurrent testimony of the Arabs; but from these and other considerations it becomes at the same time highly probable that they now form the predominant element of the Arab nation.

Of the descendants of Keturah the Arabs say little. They appear to have settled chiefly north of the peninsula in Desert Arabia, from Palestine to the Persian Gulf; and the passages in the Bible in which mention is made of Dedan (except those relating to the Cushite Dedan, Gen. x, 7) refer apparently to the tribe sprung from this race (Isa. xxi, 13; Jer. xxv, 23; Ezek. xxvii, 20), perhaps with an admixture of the Cushite Dedan, who seems to have passed up the western shores of the Persian Gulf. Some traces of Keturahites, indeed, are asserted to exist in the south of the peninsula, where a king of Himyar is said to have been a Midianite (El-Mesudi, op. Schultens, p. 158-9); and where one dialect is said to be of Midian, and another of Jokshan son of Keturah (Moqjam); but these traditions must be ascribed to the rabulical influence in Arab history. Native writers are almost wholly silent on this subject; and the dialects mentioned above are not, so far as they are known to us, of the tribes of Keturah. See KETURAH, etc.

In Northern and Western Arabia are other peoples which, from their geographical position and mode of life, are sometimes classed with the Arabs. Of these are AMALEK, the descendants of ESAU, etc.

Arabia, in ancient times, generally preserved its independence, unaffected by those great events which changed the destiny of the surrounding nations; and in the sixth century of our era, the decline of the Roman empire and the corruptions and distractions of the Eastern Church favored the impulse given by a wild and warlike fanaticism. Mohammed arose, and succeeded in gathering around his standard the nomadic tribes of Central Arabia; and in less than fifty years that standard waved triumphant from the straits of Gibraltar to the hitherto unconquered regions beyond the Oxus. The caliphs transferred the seat of government successively to Damascus, Kufa, and Bagdad; but amid the distractions of their foreign wars, the chiefs of the interior of Arabia gradually shook off their feeble allegiance, and resumed their ancient habits of independence, which, notwithstanding the revolutions that have since occurred, they for the most part retain (Crichton, Hist. of Arabia, Lond. 1852).

3. Religion.—The most ancient idolatry of the Arabs we must conclude to have been fetishism, of which there are striking proofs in the sacred trees and stones of historical times, and in the worship of the heavenly bodies, or Sabæism. With the latter were perhaps connected the temples (or palace-temples) of which there are either remains or traditions in the Himyarite kingdom; such as Beit Ghumdan in Sana, and those of Reidan, Beinuneh, Ru'cin, Eincin, and Biam. To the worship of the heavenly bodies we find allusions in Job (xxxi, 26-28), and to the belief in the influence of the stars to give rain (xxxviii, 31), where the Pleiades give rain, and Orion withhold it; and again in Judges (v, 20, 21), where the stars fight against the host of Sisera. The names of the objects of the earlier fetishism, the stone-worship, tree-worship, etc., of various tribes, are too numerous to mention. One, that of Manah, the goddess worshipped between Mekkeh and El-Medinah has been compared with Meni (Isa. lxxv, 11), which is rendered in the A. V. "number." See MENI. Magianism, an importation from Chaldaea and Persia, must be reckoned among the religions of the pagan Arabs; but it never had very numerous followers. Christianity was introduced into Southern Arabia toward the close of the 2d century, and about a century later it had made great progress (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi, 19, 33, 37). It flourished chiefly in the Yemen, where many churches were built (see Philostorg. Hist. Eccl. iii; Sozomen, vi; Evagr. vi). It also rapidly advanced in other portions of Arabia, through the kingdom of Hireh and the contiguous countries, Glassan, and other parts. The persecutions of the Christians, and more particularly of those of Nejran by the Tubbaa Zu-n-Nuwass, brought about the fall of the Himyarite dynasty by the invasion of the Christian ruler of Abyssinia. See ARABIA, CHURCH OF. Judaism was propagated in Arabia, principally by Karaites, at the captivity, but it was introduced before that time; it became very prevalent in the Yemen, and in the Hejaz, especially at Kheibar and El-Medinah, where there are said to be still tribes of Jewish extraction. In the period immediately preceding the birth of Mohammed another class had sprung up, who, disbelieving the idolatry of the greater number of their countrymen, and not yet believers in Judaism, or in the corrupt Christianity with which alone they were acquainted, looked to a revival of what they called the "religion of Abraham" (see Sprenger's Life of Mohammed, i, Calcutta, 1856). The promulgation of the Mohammedan imposture overthrew paganism, but crushed while it assumed to lead the movement which had been one of the cause of its success, and almost wholly superseded the religions of the Bible in Arabia (see Krehl, Relig. d. vorislamischen Arabern, Lpz. 1863). See MOHAMMED.

4. Language.—Arabic, the language of Arabia, is the most developed and the richest of the Semitic languages, and the only one of which we have an extensive literature; it is, therefore, of great importance to the study of Hebrew. Of its early phases we know nothing; while we have archaic monuments of the Himyaritic (the ancient language of Southern Arabia), though we cannot fix their precise ages. Of the existence of Hebrew and Chaldaea (or Aramaic) in the time of Jacob there is evidence in Gen. (xxxii, 47); and probably Jacob and Laban understood each other, the one speaking Hebrew and the other Challee. It seems also (Judg. vii, 9-15) that Gideon, or Phurah, or both, understood the conversation of the "Midianites, and the Amalekites, and all the children of the East." It is probable, therefore, that down to the 13th century B.C. the Semitic languages differed much less than in after times. But it appears from 2 Kings xviii, 26, that in the 8th century B.C. only the educated classes among the Jews understood Aramaic. With these evidences before us, and making a due distinction between the archaic and the known phases of the Aramaic and the Arabic, we think that the Himyaritic is to be regarded as a sister of the Hebrew, and the Arabic (commonly so called) as a sister of the Hebrew and the Aramaic, or, in its classical phase, as a descendant of a sister of these two, but that the Himyaritic is mixed with an African language, and that the other dialects of Arabia are in like manner, though in a much less degree, mixed with an African language. The inferred differences between the older and later phases of the Aramaic, and the presumed difference between those of the Arabic, are amply confirmed by comparative philology. The division of the Ishmaelite language into many dialects is to be attributed chiefly to the separation of tribes by uninhabitable tracts of desert, and the subsequent amalgamation of those dialects to the pilgrimage and the annual meetings of Okaz, a fair in which literary contests took place, and where it was of the first importance that the contending poets should deliver themselves in a language perfectly intelligible to the mass of the people congregated, in order that it might be critically judged by them; for many of the meanest of the Arabs, utterly ignorant of reading and writing, were of the highest of the authorities consulted by the lexicologists when the corruption of the language had commenced, i. e. when the Arabs, as Mohammedans, had begun to spread among foreigners. See ARABIC LANGUAGE.

Respecting the Himyaritic until lately little was known; but monuments bearing inscriptions in this language have been discovered in the southern parts of the peninsula, principally in Hadramaut and the Yemen, and some of the inscriptions have been published by Fresnel, Arnaud, Wellsted, and Cruttenden; while Fresnel has found a dialect still spoken in the district of Mahreh, and westward as far as Kishin, that of the neighborhood of Zafari and Mirbat being the purest, and called "Ekhilli;" and this is supposed with reason to be the modern phasis of the old Himyaritic (3^e Lettre). Fresnel's alphabet has been accepted by the learned. The dates found in the inscriptions range from 30 (on the dike of Mareh) to 604 at Hish Ghorab, but what era these represent is uncertain. Ewald (Ueber die Himyarische Sprache in Höfer's Zeitschrift, i, 295 sq.) thinks that they are years of the Rupture of the Dike, while acknowledging their apparent high antiquity; but the difficulty of supposing such inscriptions on a ruined dike, and the fact that some of them would thus be brought later than the time of Mohammed, make it probable that they belong rather to an earlier era, perhaps that of the Himyarite empire, though what point marks its commencement is not determined. The Himyaritic in its earliest phasis probably represents the first Semitic language spoken in Arabia.—Smith, s. v. See HIMYARITE; SEMITIC LANGUAGES.

5. The manners and customs of the Arabs are of great value in illustrating the Bible; but supposed parallels between the patriarchal life of the Scriptures and the state of the modern Arabs must not be hastily drawn. It should be remembered that this people are in a degraded condition; that they have been influenced by Jewish contact, especially by the adoption through Mohammed of parts of the ceremonial law and of rabbinical observances; and that they are not of the race of Israel. The inhabitants of Arabia have, from remote antiquity, been divided into two great classes, viz. the townsmen (including villagers), and the men of the desert, such being, as we remarked, the meaning of the word "Bedavees" or Bedouins, the designation given to the "dwellers in the wilderness." From the nature of their country, the latter are necessitated to lead the life of nomades, or wandering shepherds; and since the days of the patriarchs (who were themselves of that occupation) the extensive steppes, which form so large a portion of Arabia, have been traversed by a pastoral but warlike people, who, in their mode of life, their food, their dress, their dwellings, their manners, customs, and government, have always continued, and still continue, almost unalterably the same. They consist of a great many separate tribes, who are collected into different encampments dispersed through the territory which they claim as their own; and they move from one spot to another (commonly in the neighborhood of pools or wells) as soon as the stunted pasture is exhausted by their cattle. It is only here and there that the ground is susceptible of cultivation, and the tillage of it is commonly left to peasants, who are often the vassals of the Bedouins, and whom (as well as all "townsmen") they regard with contempt as an inferior race. Having constantly to shift their residence, they live in movable tents (comp. Isa. xiii, 20; Jer. xlix, 29), from which circumstance they received from the Greeks the name of Σκίπται, i. e. dwellers in tents (Strabo, xvi, 747; Diod. Sic. p. 254; Ammian. Marcell. xxiii, 6). The tents are of an oblong figure, not more than six or eight feet high, twenty to thirty long, and ten broad; they are made of goat's or camel's hair, and are of a brown or black color (such were the tents of Kedar, Cant. i, 5), differing in this respect from those of the Turcomans, which are white. Each tent is divided by a curtain or carpet into two apartments, one of which is appropriated to the women, who are not, however, subject to so much restraint and seclusion as among other Mohammedans. The tents are arranged in an irregular circle, the space within serving as a fold to the cattle at night. The heads of tribes are called shuiks, a word of various import, but used in this case as a title of honor; the government is hereditary in the family of each sheik, but elective as to the particular individual appointed. Their allegiance, however, consists more in following his example as a leader than in obeying his commands; and, if dissatisfied with his government, they will depose or abandon him. As the independent lords of their own deserts, the Bedouins have from time immemorial demanded tribute or presents from all travellers or caravans (Isa. xxi, 13) passing through their country; the transition from which to robbery is so natural that they attach to the latter no disgrace, plundering without mercy all who are unable to resist them, or who have not secured the protection of their tribe. Their watching for travellers "in the ways," i. e. the frequented routes through the desert, is alluded to Jer. iii, 2; Ezra viii, 31; and the fleetness of their horses in carrying them into the "depths of the wilderness," beyond the reach of their pursuers, seems what is referred to in Isa. lxiii, 13, 14. Their warlike incursions into more settled districts are often noticed (e. g. Job i, 15; 2 Chron. xxi, 16; xxvi, 7). The acuteness of their bodily senses is very remarkable, and is exemplified in their astonishing sagacity in tracing and distinguishing the footsteps of men and cattle, a faculty which is known by the name of athar. The law of thar, or blood-revenge (q. v.), sows the seeds of perpetual feuds; and what was predicted (Gen. xvi, 12) of the posterity of Ishmael, the "wild-ass man" (a term most graphically descriptive of a Bedouin), holds true of the whole people. Yet the very dread of the consequences of shedding blood prevents their frequent conflicts from being very sanguinary; they show bravery in repel-ling a public enemy, but when they fight for plunder they behave like cowards. Their bodily frame is spare, but athletic and active, inured to fatigue and capable of undergoing great privations; their minds are acute and inquisitive; and, though their manners are somewhat grave and formal, they are of a lively and social disposition. Of their moral virtues it is necessary to speak with caution. They were long held up as models of good faith, incorruptible integrity, and the most generous hospitality to strangers; but many recent travellers deny them the possession of these qualities; and it is certain that whatever they may have been once, the Bedouins, like all the unsophisticated "children of nature," have been much corrupted by the influx of foreigners, and the national character is in every point of view lowest where they are most exposed to the continual passage of strangers.—Kitto, s. v. See ISHMAELITE.

The Bedouins acknowledge that their ancient excellence has greatly declined since the time of Mohammed, and there cannot be a doubt that this decline had commenced much earlier. Though each tribe boasts of its unadulterated blood and pure language, their learned men candidly admit the depreciation of national character. Scriptural customs still found among them must therefore be generally regarded rather as indications of former practices than as being identical with them. Furthermore, the Bible always draws a strong contrast between the character of the Israelites and that of the descendants of Ishmael, whom the Bedouins mostly represent. Yet they are, by comparison with other nations, an essentially unchangeable people, retaining a primitive, pastoral life, and many customs strikingly illustrating the Bible. They are not so much affected by their religion as might be supposed; many tribes disregard religious observances, and even retain some pagan rites. The Wahhâbîs, or modern Arab reformers, found great difficulty in suppressing, by persuasion, and even by force of arms, such rites; and where they succeeded, the suppression was, in most cases, only temporary. Incest, sacrifices to sacred objects, etc., were among these relics of paganism (see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins and Wahhâbys). The less changed a tribe, however, the more difficulty is there in obtaining information respecting it: such a one is very jealous of intercourse with strangers even of its own nation. In Southern Arabia, for instance, is a tribe which will not allow a guest to stay within its encampments beyond the three days demanded by the laws of hospitality. This exclusion undoubtedly tends to preserve the language from corruption, and the people from foreign influence; but it probably does not improve the national character.

To the settled Arabs these remarks apply with the difference that the primitive mode of life is in a great degree lost, and the Jewish practices are much more observable; while intermixture with foreigners, especially with Abyssinian and negro concubines in the Yemen and the Hejaz, has tended to destroy their purity of blood. A Bedouin will scarcely marry out of his tribe, and is not addicted to concubinage; he considers himself, and is, quite distinct from a townsman, in habits, in mode of thought, and in national feeling. Again, a distinction should be made between the people of Northern and those of Southern Arabia; the former being chiefly of Ishmaelite, the latter of Joktanite descent, and in other respects than settlement and intermarriage with foreigners farther removed from the patriarchal character.

Regarded in the light we have indicated, Arab manners and customs, whether those of the Bedouins or of the townspeople, afford valuable help to the student of the Bible, and testimony to the truth and vigor of the scriptural narrative. No one can mix with this people without being constantly and forcibly reminded either of the early patriarchs or of the settled Israelites. We may instance their pastoral life, their hospitality—that most remarkable of desert virtues [see HOSPITALITY]—their universal respect for age (comp. Lev. xix, 32), their familiar deference (comp. 2 Kings v, 13), their superstitious regard for the beard. On the signet-ring, which is worn on the little finger of the right hand, is usually inscribed a sentence expressive of submission to God, or of his perfection, etc., explaining Exod. xxxix, 30, "the engraving of a signet, Holiness to the Lord," and the saying of our Lord (John iii, 33), "He . . . hath set to his seal that God is true." As a mark of trust this ring is given to another person (as in Gen. xli, 42). The inkhorn worn in the girdle is also very ancient (Ezek. ix, 2, 3, 11), as well as the veil. (For these, and many other illustrations, see Lane's Modern Egyptians, Index.) A man has a right to claim his cousin in marriage, and he relinquishes this right by taking off his shoe, as the kinsman of Ruth did to Boaz (Ruth iv, 7, 8; see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins and Wahhâbys, i, 113).—Smith, s. v. See JON.

6. The commerce of Arabia especially connected with the Bible has been referred to in the sections on Western and Northern Arabia, and incidentally in mentioning the products of the peninsula. Direct mention of the commerce of the south does not appear to be made in the Bible, but it seems to have passed to Palestine principally through the northern tribes. So early as the days of Jacob (Gen. xxxvii, 28) we read of a mixed caravan of Arab merchants (Ishmaelites and Midianites) who were engaged in the conveyance of various foreign articles to Egypt, and made no scruple to add Joseph, "a slave," to their other purchases. The Arabs were doubtless the first navigators of their own seas, and the great carriers of the produce of India, Abyssinia, and other remote countries, to Western Asia and Egypt. Various Indian productions thus obtained were common among the Hebrews at an early period of their history (Exod. xxx, 23, 25). The traffic of the Red Sea was to Solomon a source of great profit; and the extensive commerce of Sabaa (Sheba, now Yemen) is mentioned by profane writers as well as alluded to in Scripture (1 Kings x, 10-15). In the description of the foreign trade of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii, 19-24) various Arab tribes are introduced (comp. Isa. lx, 6; Jer. vi, 20; 2 Chron. ix, 14). The Nabathæans became a great trading people, their capital being Petra (q. v.). The Joktanite people of Southern Arabia have always been, in contradistinction to the Ishmaelite tribes, addicted to a seafaring life. The latter were caravan-merchants; the former the chief traders of the Red Sea, carrying their commerce to the shores of India, as well as to the nearer coasts of Africa. Their own writers describe these voyages; since the Christian era especially, as we might expect from the modern character of their literature. (See the curious Accounts of India and China by two Mohammedan Travellers of the ninth Cent., trans. by Renaudot, and amply illustrated in Mr. Lane's notes to his translation of the Thousand and One Nights.) The classical writers also make frequent mention of the commerce of Southern Arabia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog.). It was evidently carried on with Palestine by the two great caravan routes from the head of the Red Sea and from that of the Persian Gulf; the former especially taking with it African produce, the latter Indian. It should be observed that the wandering propensities of the Arabs, of whatever descent, do not date from the promulgation of Islamism. All testimony goes to show that from the earliest ages the peoples of Arabia formed colonies in distant lands, and have not been actuated solely either by the desire of conquest or by religious impulse in their foreign expeditions, but rather by restlessness and commercial activity. The transit-trade from India continued to enrich Arabia until the discovery of the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope; but the invention of steam navigation has now restored the ancient route for travellers by the Red Sea. See COMMERCE.

IV. Literature.—The principal European authorities for the history of Arabia are, Schultens' Hist. Imp. Vetus. Joctanidarum (Harl. Gel. 1786), containing extracts from various Arab authors; and his Monumenta Vetusiora Arabie (Lug. Bat. 1740); Eichhorn's Monumenta Antiquiss. Hist. Arabum, chiefly extracted from Ibn-Kuteibeh, with his notes (Goth. 1775); Fresnel, Lettres sur l'Hist. des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, published in the Journal Asiatique, 1838-53; Quatremère, Mémoire sur les Nabathéens; Caussin, Essai sur l'Hist. des Arabes avant l'Islamisme (Paris, 1817-8); for the geography, Niebuhr's Description de l'Arabie (Amst. 1774); Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia (Lond. 1839); Wellsted, Narrative of a Journey to the ruins of Nakeb-al-Hajar, in Journ. of R. G. S. vii, 20; his copy of inscription, in Journ. of Asiat. Soc. of Bengal, iii, 1834; and his Journal (Lond. 1838); Cruttenden, Narrative of a Journey from Mohá to Siná'a; Jomard, Études géogr. et hist. appended to Mengin, Hist. de l'Égypte, vol. iii (Paris, 1839); and for Arabia Petraea and Sinai, Robinson's Biblical Researches; Stanley's Sinai and Palestine; Tuch's Essay on the Sinaitic Inscriptions in the Journal of the German Oriental Soc. xiv, 129 sq. Compare Chesney's Expedition to the Euphrates (Lond. 1850), and Ritter, Erkunde, pt. xiv; also Palgrave, Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia (Lond. 1865, 2 vols. 8vo). For the manners and customs of the Arabs, see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins and Wahabys (8vo, 1831); Lane's Notes on the Thousand and One Nights (ed. 1838); and his Modern Egyptians (ed. 1861). See also Weil, Gesch. d. r. Khalifen (3 vols. 8vo, Mannh. 1846-61); Forster, Historical Geog. of Arabia (2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1844).

The most important native works are, with two exceptions, still untranslated, and but few of them are edited. Abulfeda's Hist. Antislamica has been edited and translated by Fleischer (Lips. 1831); and El-Idrisi's Geography translated by Jauhert, and published in the Recueil de Voyages et de Mémoires, by the Geogr. Soc. of Paris (1836); of those which have been, or are in the course of being edited, are Yácut's Homonymous Geographical Dictionary, entitled El-Musharak wa'Can, wa-l-Muftarak Sa'Kan (ed. Wüstenfeld, Got. 1845); the Marsid el-Hiláa, probably an abridgment by an unknown hand of his larger geogr. dict. called the Mojam (ed. Juyrboll, Lug. Bat. 1852-4); the Histories of Mekkeh, ed. Wüstenfeld, and now published by the German Oriental Society; and Ibn-Khaldun's Prolegomena, ed. Quatremère, i (Paris, 1858). Of those in MS., besides the indispensable works of the Arab lexicographers, we would especially mention Ibn-Khaldun's History of the Arabs; the Kharidat el-Ajáb of Ibn-El-Waril; the Mir'at ez-Zemín of Ibn-El-Józi; the Murooj ed-Dihab of El-Mesudi; Yácut's Mojam el-Buldán; the Kitáb-el-Ighám of El-Isfaháni; and the Ikd of El-Kurtubi. For a copious view of Arabic and kindred literature, see Zenker's Bibliotheca Orientalis (Lpz. 1846 sq.). Compare ARABIA.

ARABIA, CHURCH OF. The Apostle Paul, on his conversion, retired into Arabia for some two years (Gal. i. 27), but whether this time was spent in preaching or in private exercises is doubtful; nor is there any authentic record of the fruits of his labors if expended there. Several other apostles, as Peter, Thomas, Bartholomew, Judas Thaddæus, are mentioned by tradition as having preached there (see Wilsch, i, 21 sq.). It is certain that Arabia received Christianity early. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 19), an Arab ruler sent to Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, in the beginning of the 3d century, asking for Origen as a teacher. Between 247 and 250 a synod was held, under the presidency of Origen, for the condemnation of a certain heresy. Arabia was originally a province of the patriarchate of Antioch, having Bostra for its metropolitan see; but it was separated from the Oriental diocese and added to that of Jerusalem, according to William of Tyre (De Bello Sacro, xiv, 14), in the 5th (Œcumenical Council. Metropolitans of Bostra, and bishops of Philadelphia and Ebus are still mentioned about the middle of the seventh century. The conversion of a Himyarite king occurred in the fourth century, and that of two kings of Hira in the sixth century. Among the Saracens and Bedouins numerous conversions took place in the fifth century. Several important bodies, as the Bahrites, Taunchites, Taglebites, and others were entirely Christian, and Cosmas Indicopleustes reported in the sixth century that he found everywhere in Arabia Christian churches. Both Nestorianism and Monophysitism found numerous adherents in Arabia; the former principally in the north and north-west, the latter in the south. The Jacobites of Arabia have been under the rule of the Maphrians since the time of the Maphrian Marutas, i. e. since about 629, and contained two bishoprics, viz.: one of Arabia, so called, of which the see was at Akula; the other of the Taalabensin Semite Arabians, of which the see was at Hirta Naamanis. But Christianity in Arabia was nearly, if not quite, destroyed by Mohammedanism; nor has it risen since in that country to any extent. The only place where it has gained a firm footing is Aden, which, in 1839, was ceded to the English. Here both a Protestant and a Roman Catholic congregation has been collected; the membership of the latter is given by the missionaries as about 1000 (Schem, Eccles. Year-book for 1839, p. 18, 19). In fact, Christianity in Arabia had become very early corrupted by an admixture of Sabæan idolatry and Persian dualism, so that Origen, in the middle of the 3d century, declared Arabia to be a "country most fruitful in heresy." The tribes which professed Christianity when Mohammed first began to promulgate Islamism appear to have paid as much attention to rabbinical legends and monkish fables as to the Scriptures. It is indeed pretty certain that the Koran contains a tolerably fair representation of the religious belief of the Arabian Christians in Mohammed's age, and from this it appears that the idle stories in the apocryphal gospels were received with as much reverence as the books of the evangelists; it is even doubtful whether they possessed any translation of the canonical books of the Bible, and this may serve to explain the facility with which they received the creed of Mohammed.—Wilsch, Handbook of the Geogr. and Statistics of the Church, transl. J. Leitch (Lond. 1859, vol. i, 8vo). See MOHAMMED.

ARABIA, COUNCIL OF [CONCILIUM ARABICUM], was held in 247(?) against the Elkesaites (q. v.), who held that the soul, dying with the body, was to be raised with it at the resurrection. Origen was invited to this council, and boldly combated the Psychopannichites (Hypnopsychites), Eus. vi, c. 37; tom. i, conc. p. 650.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.; Landon, Manual of Councils.

Arab'ian (Heb. Arabi', אַרַבִּי, Isa. xiii, 20; Jer. iii, 2; or Arabi', אַרַבִּי, 2 Chron. xvii, 11; xxi, 16; xxii, 1; xxvi, 7; Neh. ii, 19; iv, 7 [1]; vi, 1; Gr. Ἀραβ, 1 Macc. v, 39; xi, 17, 39; xii, 31; 2 Macc. v, 8; xii, 10), the national designation of an inhabitant of that general district denominated Arabia, i. e. the nomadic tribes inhabiting the country to the east and south of Palestine, who in the early times of Hebrew history were known as Ishmaelites and descendants of Keturah. Their roving pastoral life in the desert is alluded to in Is. xiii, 20; Jer. iii, 2; 2 Macc. xii, 11; their country is associated with the country of the Dedanim, the travelling merchants (Is. xxi, 13), with Dedan, Tema, and Buz (Jer. xxx, 24), and with Dedan and Kedar (Ez. xxvii, 21), all of which are supposed to have occupied the northern part of the peninsula later known as Arabia. During the prosperous reign of Jehoshaphat, the Arabians, in conjunction with the Philistines, were tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xvii, 11), but in the reign of his successor they revolted, ravaged the country, plundered the royal palace, slew all the king's sons with the exception of the youngest, and carried off the royal harem (2 Chr. xxi, 16; xxii, 1). The Arabians of Gur-baal were again subdued by Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi, 7). During the Captivity they appear to have spread over the country of Palestine, for on the return from Babylon they were among the foremost in hindering Nehemiah in his work of restoration, and plotted with the Ammonites and others for that end (Neh. iv, 7). Geshem, or Gashmu, one of the leaders of the opposition, was of this race (Neh. ii, 19; vii, 1). In later times the Arabians served under Timotheus in his struggle with Judas Maccabæus, but were defeated (1 Macc. v, 39; 2 Macc. xii, 30). The Zabadaeans, an Arab tribe, were routed by Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas (1 Macc. xii, 31). The chieftain or king of the Arabians bore the name of Aretas as far back as the time of Antiochus Epiphanes and Jason the high-priest (2 Macc. v, 8; comp. 2 Cor. xi, 32). Zabdiel, the assassin of Alexander Balas (1 Macc. xi, 17), and Simalcæ, who brought up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander (1 Macc. xi, 39), afterward Antiochus VI, were both Arabians. In the time of the N. T. the term appears to have been used in the same manner (Acts ii, 11).—Smith, Append. s. v. See ARABIA.

Arabians or Arabici, a sect of heretics who sprung up in the third century in Arabia during the reign of the Emperor Severus. They held that the soul of man dies with the body, and will be resuscitated with it in the day of resurrection. Origen confuted this opinion in a council held in the year 217, called "the council of Arabia."—Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi, 37; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 242.

Arabic Language, the most perfectly formed, most copious in vocabulary, most extensively spoken, and most perfectly preserved of all the Shemitic family of languages. It therefore presents peculiar points of interest to Biblical scholars. See SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.

1. Distribution and Dialects.—Originating in Arabia, the Arabic language spread itself, by the conquests of the Arabs [see MOHAMMED], in the sixth and seventh centuries, so extensively as to become not only prevalent in the countries adjoining Arabia, but even the religious and learned language of Irak, Cyprus, Palestine, Egypt, and Northern Africa, where, by the influence of Islamism and the supreme authority of the Koran, it has finally supplanted the original languages of those countries, and become the mother tongue of the inhabitants. It has even penetrated to the interior of Africa, as well as insinuated itself, in part at least, throughout Turkey and Central Asia. In Malta, Spain, and Sicily, dialects of it were for a time spoken, and have not yet become entirely extinct. Through the intercourse of Europeans during the Crusades, and especially during the temporary residence of the Saracens in Spain, many Arabic words have crept into Occidental languages, not excepting the English; while the scientific researches of the mediæval Arabs caused many technical terms to be introduced into general literature. The ciphers in use among all Christian nations are but modified forms of those used in Arabic notation.

Long before the Mohammedan æra, two dialects were prevalent in Arabia: 1, the Hingariitic, which was spoken in Yemen, or Arabia Felix, and had its closest affinities partly with the Hebrew or Aramaean languages (q. v.), and partly with the Amharic (q. v.); 2, the Koreishitic, or pure Arabic, as found in the Koran, and through its influence preserved from all vulgarity and provincialisms, as the language of state and literature; in other words, the spoken differed somewhat from the written language. The Arabic had attained its flourishing period after the composition of the Koran. With the restoration of Arabic literature under the Abbasid caliphs, scientific prose took the place of the earlier poetry, and the language was philologically illustrated and protected from oblivion; but at the same time it gradually became deteriorated in respect to flexibility and variety, and circumlocutions were employed instead of idiomatic formations. Since the fourteenth or fifteenth century the Arabic language has undergone no change. There still prevail, however, certain dialects with considerable variations; e. g. the Moorish, or that of Morocco (see Bombay, Grammat. linguæ Mauro-Arabicæ, Vienna, 1800), the altogether peculiar Mãtèse (Gesenius, Versuch über d. maltesisch. Sprach. Lpz. 1810), the Malindan, Maypulan, and others. In Aleppo, Arabic is spoken in the softest and purest form.

II. Elements and Structure.—The letters of the alphabet are twenty-eight, and, as in Hebrew, they are all consonants, and read from right to left. They differ, however, entirely in form from the Heb., more closely resembling the Syriac, and their order is almost wholly different from either of those languages. The form, too, of most of them undergoes a considerable change when connected with a preceding or following letter, or when final. Several of them differ from each other only by the addition of a diacritical point (as آ from أ). Their peculiar power is such that many of them can hardly be accurately represented either by the Heb. or by English characters; the sound of some of them, indeed, is described as altogether foreign to European tongues. The letters are also often compounded in writing into ligatures. The "weak letters" (corresponding to X , y , and z) are also used to prolong a vowel sound, or (as in Syriac) to form a diphthong. The vowel points are far more simple than in Heb., but this is fully made up, in point of difficulty to the learner, by the peculiar marks or signs frequently employed in connection with certain letters, or in certain positions, to indicate an implied, developed, prolonged, or connected sound. In ordinary writing (and printing) this whole system of vocalization is omitted. Several of the letters (called "solar") are doubled in pronouncing when initial after the article, the final letter of which is then silent (like the dagesh forte of the Heb. after א). A similar system of prefixes and suffixes (for prepositions, pronouns, particles, etc.) exists to that in Heb., but with somewhat more variety in application. Vay "conversive," however, disappears in the Arabic, as in the Chaldee. Numbers are expressed by peculiar characters for the digits, or the ordinary letters, as in Gr. and Heb., may be used with a numerical value. The accent is never written, but s mds. in dissyllables, upon the penult, in polysyllables upon the antepenult, unless the penult has a long vowel, which then takes the tone. An extended system of prosody and versification belongs to the language, and forms a marked contrast with the simple poetry of the Hebrew.

The Arabic is rich in grammatical forms. In nouns, as well as pronouns and verbs, the dual is customary; and for the plural the noun has a large store of collective forms. The singular has three (so-called) cases, distinguished chiefly by the pointing, and corresponding to the nominative, genitive, and dative (besides forms for the accusative, and the interjective mark of the vocative), together with the "nunation;" the dual and plural only two (the nominative and objective). To the verbs (which, as in Heb., afford triliteral roots of all the words) belong thirteen forms or conjugations, somewhat answering to those of the Heb.; which either have a factive, reciprocal, passive, and desiderative force, or else modify the ground-meaning of the root. Each of these, except the ninth and eleventh, has a passive as well as an active voice. The tenses, properly so called, are the same in number, use, and method of formation, as in Heb. Other relations of time are expressed by employing the substantive verb as an auxiliary. A nearly like series of weak or defective verbs is found as in the Heb. Apocopated, paragogic, and intensified forms of the tenses exist, almost having the force of moods. Verbal nouns are used as infinitives, and verbal adjectives as participles; or these forms may be regarded as the regular infinitives and participles of the several conjugations and voices. There are various inflections to express gender, place, instrumentality, authorship, diminutiveness, etc. The comparative and superlative have appropriate forms.

The formation of sentences is simple, but syntactical. A terse vigor is characteristic of the language; yet the style of Arabic writers is various: in some, for example the more ancient, extremely natural and plain; in those of later date, more artificial and ornate. The language of the common people (vulgar Arabic) differs from the written in the omission of the final vowels of words, in certain ungrammatical flexions and constructions, and in the use of some conventional terms. (On the pronunciation of the Palestinian Arabs, see Dr. E. Smith's appendix to the first ed. of Robinson's Bib. Researches, vol. iii.)

III. Relations to Hebrew.—"The close affinity, and consequently the incalculable philological use of the Arabic with regard to the Hebrew language and its other sisters, may be considered partly as a question of theory, and partly as one of fact. 1. The following are the theoretical grounds: First, the Arabs of Yemen are derived from Kahtân, the Jektan of Gen. x, 25, whom the Arabs make the son of Eber (Pococke's Specimen Hist. Arab. p. 39 sq.). These form the pure Arabs. Then Ishmael intermarried with a descendant of the line of Kahtân, and became the progenitor of the tribes of Hejâz. These are the insidious Arabs. These two roots of the nation correspond with the two great dialects into which the language was once divided: that of Yemen, under the name of the Himyaritic, of which all that has come down to us (except what may have been preserved in the Ethiopic) is a few inscriptions; and that of Hejâz, under that of the dialect of Mudhar, or, descending a few generations in the same line, of Khoreish—the dialect of the Koran and of all their literature. Next, Abraham sent away his sons by Keturah, and they also became the founders of Arabic tribes. Also, the circumstance of Esau's settling in Mount Seir, where the Idumeans descended from his loins, may be considered as a still later medium by which the idioms of Palestine and Arabia preserved their harmony. See ARABIA. Secondly, Olaus Celsius (in his Hist. Ling. et Erudit. Arab.) cites the fact of the sons of Jacob conversing with the Ishmaelite caravan (Gen. xxxvii, 28), and that of Moses with his father-in-law the Midianite (Exod. iv, 18). To these, however, Scheiling (in his Abhandl. v. d. Gebrauch. der Arab. Sprache, p. 14) objects that they are not conclusive, as the Ishmaelites, being merchants, might have acquired the idiom of the nations they traded with, and as Moses might owe an acquaintance with Arabic to his residence in Egypt. Nevertheless, one of Celsius's inferences derives considerable probability from the only instance of mutual intelligibility which Michaelis has adduced (Bearbeitung der Mittel die ausgestorbene Hebr. Sprache zu verstehen, p. 156), namely, that Gideon and his servant went down by night to the camp of "Midian, Amalek, and all the Bene Kedem," to overhear their conversation with each other, and understood what they heard (Judg. viii, 9-14). Lastly, Schlutens (Oratio de Reg. Sabaor, in his Opp. Mnora) labors to show that the visit of the queen of Sheba to Solomon is a strong proof of the degree of proximity in which the two dialects then stood to each other. These late traces of resemblance, moreover, are rendered more striking by the notice of the early diversity between Hebrew and Aramaic (Gen. xxxi, 47). The instance of the Ethiopian chamberlain in Acts viii, 28, may not be considered an evidence, if Heinrichs, in his note ad loc. in Nor. Test. edit. Kopp., is right in asserting that he was reading the Septuagint version, and that Philip the deacon was a Hellenist. Thus springing from the same root as the Hebrew, and possessing such traces of affinity to so late a period as the time of Solomon, this dialect was further enabled, by several circumstances in the social state of the nation, to retain its native resemblance of type until the date of the earliest extant written documents. These circumstances were the almost insular position of the country, which prevented conquest or commerce from debasing the language of its inhabitants; the fact that so large a portion of the nation adhered to a mode of life in which every impression was, as it were, stereotyped, and knew no variation for ages (a cause to which we may also in part ascribe the comparatively unimportant changes which the language has undergone during the 1400 years in which we can follow its history); and the great and just pride which they felt in the purity of their language, which, according to Burckhardt, is still a characteristic of the Bedouins (Notes on the Bedouins, p. 211). These causes preserved the language from foreign influences at a time when, as the Koran and a national literature had not yet given it its full stature, such influences would have been most able to destroy its integrity. During this interval, nevertheless, the language received a peculiarly ample development in a certain direction. The limited incidents of a desert life still allowed valor, love, generosity, and satire to occupy the keen sensibilities of the chivalrous Bedouin. These feelings found their vent in ready verse and eloquent prose; and thus, when Islam first called the Arabs into the more varied activity and more perilous collision with foreign nations, which resulted from the union of their tribes under a common interest to hold the same faith and to propagate it by the sword, the language had already received all the development which it could derive from the pre-eminently creative and refining impulses of poetry and eloquence.

2. "But great as may be the amount of resemblance between Arabic and Hebrew which a due estimate of all the theoretical grounds for the affinity and for the diversity between them would entitle us to assume, it is certain that a comparison of the actual state of both in their purest form evinces a degree of proximity which exceeds expectation. Not only may two thirds of the Hebrew roots (to take the assertion of Aurivillius, in his Dissertationes, p. 11, ed. Michaelis) be found in Arabic under the corresponding letters, and either in the same or a very kindred sense; but, if we allow for the changes of the weak and cognate letters, we shall be able to discover a still greater proportion. To this great fundamental agreement in the vocabulary (the wonder of which is somewhat diminished by a right estimate of the immense disproportion between the two languages as to the number of roots) are to be added those resemblances which relate to the mode of inflexion and construction. Thus, in the verb, its two wide tenses, the mode by which the persons are denoted at the end in the past, and at the beginning (with the accessory distinctions at the end) in the future tense, its capability of expressing the gender in the second and third persons, and the system on which the conjugations are formed; and in the noun, the correspondence in formations, in the use of the two genders, and in all the essential characteristics of construction; the possession of the definite article; the independent and affixed pronouns; and the same system of separable and attached particles—all these form so broad a basis of community and harmony between the two dialects as could hardly be anticipated, when we consider the many centuries which separate the earliest written extant documents of each. The diversities between them, which consist almost entirely of fuller developments on the side of the Arabic, may be summed up under the following heads: A much more extensive system of conjugations in the verb, the dual in both tenses, and four forms of the future (three of which, however, exist potentially in the ordinary future, the jussive, and the cohortative of the Hebrew; see Ewald's Hebr. Gram. § 290, 293); the full series of infinitives; the use of auxiliary verbs; in the noun, the formations of the plural called broken or internal plurals, and the flexion by means of terminations analogous to three of our cases; and a perfectly defined system of metre. The most important of these differences consists in that final vowel after the last radical, by which some of the forms of the future and the several cases in the noun are indicated, which has been too hastily ascribed to an attempt of the grammarians to introduce Greek inflexions into Arabic (Hasse, Magazin für Biblisch-Orientalische Literatur, i, 230; Gesenius, Geschich. d. Hebr. Spr. p. 95). The Arabic alphabet also presents some remarkable differences. As a representation of sounds, it contains all the Hebrew letters; but, in consequence of the greater extent of the nation as a source of dialectal varieties of pronunciation, and also in consequence of the more developed and refined state of the language, the value of some of them is not exactly the same, and the characters that correspond to פ ט צ ז ב ה are used in a double capacity, and represent both halves of those sounds which exist unseparated in the Hebrew. The present order of the letters also is different, although there are evidences in their numerical value when so used, and in the memorial words (given in Ewald's Grammatica Critica Ling. Arab. § 67), that the arrangement was once the same in both. In a palaeographical point of view, the characters have undergone many changes. The earliest form was that in the Himyritic alphabet. The first specimens of this character (which Arabic writers call al-Mussnad, i. e. stilet, co'annut) were given by Seetzen in the Fundgruben des Orients. Since then Professor Rödiger has produced others, and illustrated them in a valuable paper in the Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes, i, 332. The letters of this alphabet have a striking resemblance to those of the Ethiopic, which were derived from them. In Northern Arabia, on the other hand, and not very long before the time of Mohammed, the Syrian character called Estrangelo became the model on which the Arabic alphabet called the Kufic was formed. This heavy, angular Kufic character was the one in which the early copies of the Koran were written; and it is also found in the ancient Mohammedan coinage as late as the seventh century of the Hegira. From this, at length, was derived the light, neat character called Nishi, the one in which the Arabs continue to write at the present day, and which is represented in our printed books. The introduction of this character is ascribed to Ibn Mukla, who died in the year 327 of the Hegira. See ALPHABET. Lastly, it is worthy of notice that all the letters of the Arabic alphabet are only consonants; that, in an unpointed text, the long vowels are denoted by the use of Alif, Waw, and Ya, as matres lectionis; and that the short vowels are not denoted at all, but are left to be supplied according to the sense in which the reader takes the words; whereas, in a pointed text, three points only suffice to represent the whole vocalization, the equivalents to which, according to the way in which they are usually expressed, are a, i, u, pronounced as in Italian.

"The many uses of the Arabic language in Biblical philology (exclusive of the advantages it affords for comparing the Arabic versions) may in part be gathered from, the degree of its affinity to the Hebrew; and, indeed, chiefly to the Hebrew before the exile, after which period the Aramaic is the most fruitful means of illustration (Malm, Darstellung der Lexicographie, p. 391). But there are some peculiarities in the relative position of the two dialects which considerably enhance the value of the aid to be derived from the Arabic. The Hebrew language of the Old Testament has preserved to us but a small fragment of literature. In the limited number of its roots (some of which even do not occur in the primary sense), in the rarity of some formations, and in the antique rudimentary mode in which some of its constructions are denoted, are contained those difficulties which cannot receive any other illustration than that which the sister dialects, and most especially the Arabic, afford. For this purpose, the resemblances between them are as useful as the diversities. The former enable us to feel certain on points which were liable to doubt; they confirm and establish an intelligent conviction that the larger portion of our knowledge of the meaning of words, and of the force of constructions in Hebrew, is on a sure foundation, because we recognise the same in a kindred form, and in a literature so voluminous as to afford us frequent opportunities of testing our notions by every variety of experience. The diversities, on the other hand (according to a mode of observation very frequent in comparative anatomy), show us what exists potentially in the rudimentary state by enabling us to see how a language of the same genius has, in the farther progress of its development, felt the necessity of denoting externally those relations of formation and construction which were only dimly perceived in its antique and uncultivated form. Thus, to adduce a single illustration from the Arabic enses in the noun: The precise relation of the words mouth and life, in the common Hebrew phrases, "I call my mouth," and "he smote him his life" (Ewald's Hebr. Gram. § 482), is easily intelligible to one whom Arabic has familiarized with the perpetual use of the so-called accusative to denote the accessory descriptions of state. Another important advantage to be derived from the study of Arabic is the opportunity of seeing the grammar of a Syro-Arabian language explained by native scholars. Hebrew grammar has suffered much injury from the mistaken notions of men who, understanding the sense of the written documents by the aid of the versions, have been exempted from obtaining any independent and inward feeling of the genius of the language, and have therefore not hesitated to accommodate it to the grammar of our Indo-Germanic idioms. In Arabic, however, we have a language, every branch of the philosophical study of which has been successfully cultivated by the Arabs themselves. Their own lexicographers, grammarians, and scholiasts (to whom the Jews also are indebted for teaching them the grammatical treatment of Hebrew) have placed the language before us with such elaborate explanation of its entire character, that Arabic is not only by far the best understood of the Syro-Arabian dialects, but may even challenge comparison, as to the possession of these advantages, with the Greek itself" (Kitto).

IV. Literature.—The native works in Arabic are exceedingly numerous and varied, embracing philology, philosophy, natural science, poetry, history, etc. Many are still unpublished. A compendious view of the literary productions of Arabic authors may be found in Pierer's Universal Lexikon (Altenb. 1857 sq.), s. v. "Arabische Literatur;" also in Appleton's New American Encyclopedia, s. v. "Arabic Language and Literature." Comp. also an article on the "Arab. Lang. and Lit." by Prof. Packard, in the Am. Bib. Repos. Oct. 1836, p. 429-448. Zenker's Bibliotheca Orientalis (Lpz. 1846-62, 2 vols. 8vo) gives a full list of Arabic books hitherto issued.

European works expressly on the history and usage of the Arabic language are by the following authors: Pococke (Oxf. 1661), Celsius (in Barkey's Bibl. Evem. iv, 1, 2, 3), Hyde (in his Synagog. Diss. ii, 450), Schulzen (in his Orig. Heb. Lugd. B. 1761, p. 615), De Jenisch (Vien. 1780), Eichhorn (introd. to Richardson's Abh. üb. morgenländ. Völkern, Lpz. 1779), Hottinger (in his Analekt. hist. theol. Tigr. 1652), Schelling (Stuttg. 1771), Schurrer (in Eichhorn's Biblioth. iii, 951 sq.), Tingstad (Upsal. 1794), Humbert (Genève, 1824). Arabic grammars are by the following: Erpenius (Leyd. 1613, and often since, abridged, etc., by Schultens, Michaelis, and others), Lakemacher (Helmst. 1718), Hirt (Jen. 1770), Vriemoot (Franceq. 1783), Hezel (Jen. 1776, etc.), id. (Lpz. 1784), Wahl (Halle, 1789), Paulus (Jen. 1790), Hasse (Jen. 1793), Tyschen (Rost. 1792), Jahn (Wien. 1796), Sylvestre de Sacy (Par. 1810 and since), Von Lamsden (Calc. 1813), Koorda (2d ed. Leyd. 1858-9, 8vo), Von Oberleitner (Vien. 1822), Rosenmüller (Lips. 1818), Tyschen (Gött. 1823), Ewald (Lips. 1831, etc.), Vullers (Bonne, 1832), Pettermann (Berol. 1840), Caspari (Leipz. 1848, 1850, an excellent manual), Glaire (Paris, 1861), Beaumont (Lond. 1861), Winckler (Lpz. 1862), Forbes (Lond. 1863), Göschel (Vien. 1864), Wright (Grammar of the Arabian Language, from Caspari, with additions, 2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1839-62, the best for English readers); on the new or vulgar Arabic, by Hertler (Par. 1803), Causin de Perceval (2d ed. Paris, 1833), Savary (Paris, 1813), Bellamare (1850), Florian-Pharaon and E. L. Bertherand (Par. 1859), Wahrmund (Lpz. 1860 sq.). Native lexicons are those of the historian Fakr ed-Daulah (947-993); Elias bar-Sina el-Jaulari (d. post 1200), El-Silah, in Turkish, by Van Kuli (Const. 1728), and Persic (Calc. 1812); Firuzaladi's Kamis (Scutari, 1815 sq.); by Europeans, those of Giggejus (Mediol. 1632), Golius (Lugd. Bat. 1653), Mesquien Meninski (Vien. 1780-1801), Selhied (Lugd. B. 1769, etc.), Willmet (Roterd. 1784), Freytag (Hal. 1830-1836, abridged, ib. 1838), Kazimirovi (1848), Catafago (Arabic and English Dict. Lond. 1858, 8vo, a convenient manual), Lane (Arabic Lexicon, Lond. 1863, sq. 4to, the best in English); for the vulgar Arabic, the lexicons of Cañes (1781), De Perceval (Paris, 1828, 2 vols.), De la Grange (Paris, 1828), De Passo (Alg. 1846). Christianities are by Jahn (1802), De Sacy (Par. 1806, 1826, 3 vols.), Kosegarten (Lpz. 1824, 1828), Rosenmüller (Lpz. 1814), Von Humbert (Par. 1834), Freytag (Bonn, 1834), Arnold (Lond. 1856, the most convenient for English); but Tauchnitz's splendid ed. of the Koran (Lips. 1841, 2d ster. ed., small 4to) furnishes a sufficient reading-book; for the modern dialect is the work of Brenier (Alg. 1845). Beginners in English may make use of Arabic Reading-Lessons by Davis and Davidson (published by Bagster, Lond. 1850).

Arabic Versions. The following is a conspectus of those hitherto published (also the treatise De versionibus Arabicis, in Walton's Polyglott, i, 93 sq.; Pococke, Var. Lect. Arab. V. T., ib. vi); Biblia Arabica V. T. in Walton's Polyglott; Bib. Ar., ed. Risius (3 vols. fol., Rom. 1671, said by Michaelis to be altered from the Latin); Arabic Bible, ed. Carlyle (Newcastle, 1811 and 1816, 4to); Bible (Lond. 1831, 8vo); Bible, a new version for the "Society for promoting Chr. Knowledge" (Lond. 1857 sq., 8vo); Bible, a new version for the "Am. Bible Soc.," ed. Dr. Vanduyke (now [1865] stereotyping at N. Y. in various forms); V. T. Arab. interpr. Tuki (unfinished, Rom. 1752 sq.); Pentateuch by Saadias Gaon (in Walton's Polyglott); N. T. Arabic, ed. Erpenius (Leyd. 1616, 4to; altered to suit the Greek, Lond. 1727, 4to); New Test. by Sahab (Calcutta, 1816, 8vo; London, 1825, 8vo; revised, Calcutta, 1826, 8vo; Lond. 1850, 8vo; in Syriac characters, Paris, 1822, 8vo); Quatuor Evangelia, ed. Raymund (Rom. 1590, fol.).

Early Versions.—Inasmuch as Christianity never attained any extensive or permanent influence among the Arabs as a nation, no entire nor publicly sanctioned Arabic version of the Bible has been discovered. But, as political events at length made the Arabic language the common vehicle of instruction in the East, and that to Jews, Samaritans, and Christians, independent versions of single books were often undertaken, according to the zeal of private persons, or the interests of small communities. The following is a classified list of only the most important among them. (See the Einleitungen of Eichhorn, Bertholdt, and De Wette.)

I. Arabic versions formed immediately on the original texts.

a. Rabbi Saadyah Haggæon (usually called Saadyah), a native of Fayûm, and rector of the academy at Sora, who died A. D. 942, is the author of a version of some portions of the Old Testament. Erpenius and Pococke, indeed, affirm that he translated the whole (Walton's Prolegomena, ed. Wraugham, ii, 546); but subsequent inquirers have not hitherto been able, with any certainty, to assign to him more than a version of the Pentateuch, of Isaiah, of Job, and of a portion of Hosea.

(1) That of the Pentateuch first appeared, in Hebrew characters, in the folio Tetraglot Pentateuch of Constantinople, in the year 1546. The exact title of this exceedingly rare book is not given by Wolf, by Masch, nor by De Rossi (it is said to be found in Adler's Biblich-kritische Reise, p. 221); but, according to the title of it which Tychsen cites from Rabbi Shabtai (in Eichhorn's Repertorium, x, 96), Saadyah's name is expressly mentioned there as the author of that Arabic version. Nearly a century later an Arabic version of the Pentateuch was printed in the Polyglot of Paris, from a MS. belonging to F. Savary de Breves; and the text thus obtained was then reprinted in the London Polyglot, with a collection of the various readings of the Constantinopolitan text, and of another MS. in the appendix. For it was admitted that Saadyah was the author of the Constantinopolitan version; and the identity of that text with that of the Paris Polyglot was maintained by Pococke (who nevertheless acknowledged frequent interpolations in the latter), and had been confirmed even by the collation which Hottinger had instituted to establish their diversity. The identity of all these texts was thus considered a settled point, and long remained so, until Michaelis published (in his Orient. Bibl. ix, 155 sq.) a copy of a Latin note which Jos. Ascarî had prefixed to the very MS. of De Breves, from which the Paris Polyglot had derived its Arabic version. That note ascribed the version to "Saidus Fajumensis, Monachus Coptites;" and thus Saadyah's claim to be considered the author of the version in the Polyglots was again liable to question. At length, however, Schmurrer (in his Dissertat. de Pentat. Arab. Polygl. in his Dissert. Philologico-critica) printed the Arabic preface of that MS., proved that there was no foundation for the "Monachus Coptites," and endeavored to show that Saïd was the Arabic equivalent to the Hebrew Saadyah, and to re-establish the ancient opinion of the identity of the two texts. The results which he obtained appear (with the exception of a feeble attempt of Tychsen to ascribe the version to Abu Sa'ûl in the Repertorium) to have convinced most modern critics; and, indeed, they have received much confirmation by the appearance of the version of Isaiah. This version of the Pentateuch, which is an honorable monument of the rabbinical Biblical philology of the tenth century, possesses, in the independence of its tone and in some peculiarities of interpretation, the marks of having been formed on the original text. It leans, of course, to Jewish exegetical authorities generally, but often follows the Sept., and as often appears to express views peculiar to its author. Carpov has given numerous examples of its mode of interpretation in his Crit. Sacr. p. 646 sq. It is also marked by a certain loose and paraphrastic style of rendering, which makes it more useful in an exegetical than in a critical point of view. It is difficult, however, to determine how much of this diffuseness is due to Saadyah himself. For, not only is the printed text of his version more faulty in this respect than a Florentine MS., some of the readings of which Adler has given in Eichhorn's Einleit. ins A. T. ii, 245, but it has suffered a systematic interpolation. A comparison of the Constantinopolitan text with that of the Polyglots shows that where the former retains those terms of the Hebrew in which action or passion is ascribed to God—the so-called ἀφροπροπαθεῖα—the latter has the "Angel of God," or some other mode of evading direct expressions. These interpolations are ascribed by Eichhorn to a Samaritan source; for Morinus and Hottinger assert that the custom of omitting or evading the anthropomorphisms of the Hebrew text is a characteristic of the Samaritan versions. (2) A version of Isaiah, which in the original MS. is ascribed to Saadyah, with several extrinsic evidences of truth, and without the opposition of a single critic, appeared under the title, R. Saadye Phjūmensis Versio Jesaie Arabica e MS. Bodley, edidit atque Glossar. instruxit, H. E. G. Paulus (fasc. ii, Jena, 1791, 8vo). The text was copied from a MS. written in Hebrew characters, and the difficulty of always discovering the equivalent Arabic letters into which it was to be transposed has been one source of the inaccuracies observable in the work. Gesenius (in his Jesaias, i, 88 sq.) has given a summary view of the characteristics of this version, and has shown the great general agreement between them and those of the version of the Pentateuch in a manner altogether confirmatory of the belief in the identity of the authors of both. (3) Saadyah's version of Job exists in MS. at Oxford, where Gesenius took a copy of it (Jesaias, p. x). (4) That of Hosea is only known from the citation of ch. vi, 9, by Kimchi (Pococke's Theolog. Works, ii, 280).

b. The version of Joshua which is printed in the Paris and London Polyglots, the author and date of which are unknown.

c. The version of the whole passage from 1 Kings xii to 2 Kings xii, 16, inclusive, which is also found in the same Polyglots. Professor Rödiger has collected the critical evidences which prove that this whole interval is translated from the Hebrew; and ascribes the version to an unknown Damascene Jew of the eleventh century. Likewise, the passage in Nehemiah, from i to ix, 27, inclusive, as it exists in both Polyglots, which he asserts to be the translation of a Jew (resembling that of Joshua in style), and with subsequent interpolations by a Syrian Christian. (See his work De Origine Arabice Libror. V. T. Historic. Interpretationis, Halle, 1829, 4to.)

d. The very close and almost slavish version of the Pentateuch, by some Mauritanian Jew of the thirteenth century, which Erpenius published at Leyden in 1622—the so-called Arabs Erpenii.

e. The Samaritan Arabic version of Abu Sa'ûd. According to the author's preface affixed to the Paris MS. of this version (No. 4), the original of which is given in Eichhorn's Bibl. Biblioth. iii, 6, Abu Sa'ûd was induced to undertake it, partly by seeing the corrupt state to which ignorant copyists had reduced the version then used by the Samaritans, and partly by discovering that the version which they used, under the belief that it was that of Abu'l Hasan of Tyre, was in reality none other than that of Saadyah Haggæon. His national prejudice being thus excited against an accursed Jew, and the "manifest impiety" of some of his interpretations, he applied himself to this translation, and accompanied it with notes, in order to justify his renderings, to explain difficulties, and to dispute with the Jews. His version is characterized by extreme fidelity to the Samaritan text (i. e. in other words, to the Hebrew text with the differences which distinguish the Samaritan recension of it), retaining even the order of the words, and often sacrificing the proprieties of the Arabic idiom to the preservation of the very terms of the original. It is certainly not formed on the Samaritan version, although it sometimes agrees with it; and it has such a resemblance to the version of Saadyah as implies familiarity with it, or a designed use of its assistance; and it exceeds both these in the constant avoidance of all anthropomorphic expressions. Its date is unknown, but it must have been executed between the tenth and thirteenth centuries, because it was necessarily posterior to Saadyah's version, and because the Barberini copy of it was written A.D. 1227. It is to be regretted that this version, although it would be chiefly available in determining the readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch, is still unpublished. It exists in MS. at Oxford (one of the copies there being the one cited by Castell in the Appendix to the London Polyglot), at Paris, Leyden, and at Rome, in the celebrated Barberini Triglot (the best description of which is in De Rossi's Specimen Var. Lect. et Chall. Estheris Additamenta, Tübingen, 1783). Portions only have been written: the earliest by Hottinger, in his Promtuarium, p. 98; and the longest two by De Saey, with an interesting dissertation, in Eichhorn's Bibl. Biblioth. x, and by Van Vloten, in his Specim. Philol. g. continens descrip. cod. MS. Biblioth. Lugd.-Bat. Partemque Vers. Sam. Arab. Pentat. (Leidæ, 1805).

f. A version of the Gospels, which was first printed at Rome in 1590, then in the Arabic New Testament of Erpenius in 1616, and afterward in the Paris Polyglot (the text of which last is the one copied in that of London). The first two of these editions are derived from MSS., and the variations which distinguish the text of Paris from that of Rome are also supposed to have been obtained from a MS. The agreement and the diversity of all these texts are equally remarkable. The agreement is so great as to prove that they all represent only one and the same version, and that one based immediately on the Greek. The diversities (exclusive of errors of copyists) consist in the irregular changes which have been made in every one of these MSS., separately, to adapt it indiscriminately to the Peshito or Coptic versions. This surprising amalgamation is thus accounted for by Hug: When the prevalence of the Arabic language had rendered the Syriac and Coptic obsolete, the Syrians and Copts were obliged to use an Arabic version. They therefore took some translation in that language, but first adapted it to the Peshito and Memphitic versions respectively. As the Peshito and Coptic versions still continued to be read first in their churches, and the Arabic translation immediately afterward, as a kind of Targum, it became usual to write their national versions and this amended Arabic version in parallel columns. This mere juxtaposition led to a further adulteration in each case. Afterward, two of these MSS., which had thus suffered different adaptations, were brought together by some means, and mutually corrupted each other—by which a third text, the hybrid one of our Arabic version, was produced. The age of the original Arabic text is uncertain; but the circumstance of its adoption by the Syrians and Copts places it near the seventh century (Berthold's Eindeit. i, 692 sq.).

g. The version of the Acts, of the Epistles of Paul, of the Catholic Epistles, and of the Apocalypse, which is found in both the Polyglots. The author is unknown, but he is supposed to have been a native of Cyrene, and the date to be the eighth or ninth century (Berthold, ibid.).

h. Arabic versions founded on the Sept.

a. The Polyglot version of the Prophets, which is expressly said in the inscription in the Paris MS. to have been made from the Greek by an Alexandrian priest. Its date is probably later than the tenth century.

b. That of the Psalms (according to the Syrian recension) which is printed in Justiniani's Psalt. Octaplum. (Genoa, 1516), and in Liber. Psalmsor. a Gabr. Sionita et Viet. S. Galac. (Rome, 1614).

c. That version of the Psalms which is in use by the Malkites, or Orthodox Oriental Christians, made by 'Abdallah ben al-Fadhl, before the twelfth century. It has been printed at Aleppo in 1706, in London in 1725, and elsewhere.

d. The version of the Psalms (according to the Egyptian recension) found in both the Polyglots.

111. Arabic versions formed on the Peshito.

a. The Polyglot version of Job, of Chronicles, and (according to Rödiger, who ascribes them to Christian translators in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries) that of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, 1 Kings i to xi, and 2 Kings xii, 17, to xxv.

b. The version of the Psalms printed at Kashaya, near Mount Lebanon, in 1610.—Kittó, s. v.

A'rad' (Heb. Arad', אֲרָד, perh. flight), the name of a city and of a man.

1. (Sept. Ἀράδ, but in Josh. Ἀρέδ.) An ancient city (so called perhaps from wild asses in the vicinity, comp. אֲרָד, ouager) on the southernmost borders of Palestine, whose inhabitants drove back the Israelites as they attempted to penetrate from Kadesh into Canaan (Num. xxi, 1; xxxiii, 40, where the Auth. Vers. has "King Arad," instead of "King of Arad"), but were eventually subdued by Joshua, along with the other southern Canaanites (Josh. xii, 14; also Judg. i, 16). It lay within the original limits of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xii, 14) north (north-west) of the desert of Judah (Judg. i, 16). Eusebius (Ἀραρά) and Jerome place Arad twenty Roman miles from Hebron, and four from Malatha, in the neighborhood of the desert of Kadesh (see Reland, Palast. p. 481, 501, 573). This accords well with the situation of a hill called Tell Arad, which Dr. Robinson observed on the road from Petra to Hebron. He describes it as "a barren-looking eminence rising above the country around." He did not examine the spot, but the Arabs said there were no ruins upon or near it, but only a cavern (Researches, ii, 472, 622). The same identification is proposed by Schwarz (Palest. p. 86). See HORMATH. According to Van de Velde (Narrat. ii, 83-85) there are fragments of pottery on the top of the Tell, and a ruined reservoir on its south side. It was an episcopal city in Jerome's time (Ritter, Erdk. xiv, 121).

2. (Sept. Ἀράδ v. r. Ἀραρά.) One of the "sons" of Beriah of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 15), B.C. apparently 536.

Arad. See WILD ASS.

Ar'adus (Ἀραάδος), a city included in the list of places to which the decree of Lucius the consul, protecting the Jews under Simon the high-priest, was addressed (1 Macc. xv, 23). It is no doubt the Arad (q. v.) of Scripture (Gen. x, 17).

A'rah (Heb. Arach', אֲרָח, prob. for אֲרָחַף, way-faring), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀράχ.) The first named of the three sons of Ulla of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 39). B.C. apparently 1017.

2. (Sept. Ἀράχ, Ἡρά.) An Israelite whose posterity (variously stated as 775 and 652 in number) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 5; Neh. vii, 10). B.C. ante 536. He is probably the same with the Arah (Sept. 'Hodé) whose son Shechaniah was father-in-law of Tobiah (Neh. vi, 18).

A'ram (Heb. Aram', אַרַם, prob. from אַרַם, high, q. d. highlands; Sept. and N. T. Aráp: see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 151; Forbiger, Alté Geogr. ii, 641, Ann.), the name of a nation or country, with that of its founder and two or three other men. See also BETH-ARAM. Comp. Cuneiform Inscriptions.

1. ARAMEA (Sept. and later versions SYRIA) was the name given by the Hebrews to the tract of country lying between Phœnicia on the west, Palestine on the south, Arabia Deserta and the River Tigris on the east, and the mountain range of Taurus on the north. Many parts of this extensive territory have a much lower level than Palestine; but it might receive the designation of "highlands," because it does rise to a greater elevation than that country at most points of immediate contact, and especially on the side of Lebanon. Aram, or Aramea, seems to have corresponded generally to the Syria (q. v.) and Mesopotamia (q. v.) of the Greeks and Romans. We find the following divisions expressly noticed in Scripture. See CANAAN.

1. ARAM'-DAMME'SEK, אַרַם דַּמְשֶׁק, the "Syria of Damascus" conquered by David, 2 Sam. viii, 5, 6, where it denotes only the territory around Damascus; but elsewhere "Aram," in connection with its capital "Damascus," appears to be used in a wider sense for Syria Proper (Isa. vii, 1, 8; xvii, 3; Amos 1, 5). At a later period Damascus gave name to a district, the Syria Damascena of Pliny (v, 13). To this part of Aram the "land of Hadrach" seems to have belonged (Zech. ix, 1). See DAMASCUS.

2. ARAM'-MAAKAH, אַרַם מַאכָה, (1 Chron. xix, 6), or simply Maakah (2 Sam. x, 6, 8), which, if formed from אַדְדָה, to "press together," would describe a country enclosed and hemmed in by mountains, in contradistinction to the next division, Aram-beth-Rehob, i. e. Syria the wide or broad, אַרַם בֵּית רְהוֹב being used in Syria for a "district of country." Aram-Maachah was not far from the northern border of the Israelites on the east of the Jordan (comp. Deut. iii, 14, with Josh. xiii, 11, 13). In 2 Sam. x, 6, the text has "King Maachah," but it is to be corrected from the parallel passage in 1 Chron. xix, 7, "king of Maachah." See MAACHAH.

3. ARAM'-BEYTH-REHOB', אַרַם בֵּית רְהוֹב, the meaning of which may be that given above, but the precise locality cannot with certainty be determined (2 Sam. x, 6). Some connect it with the Beth-rehob of Judg. xviii, 28, which Rosenmüller identifies with the Rehob of Num. xiii, 21, situated "as men come to Hamath," and supposes the district to be that now known as the Arth el-Hhale at the foot of Anti-Libanus, near the sources of the Jordan. A place called Rehob is also mentioned in Judg. i, 31; Josh. xix, 28, 30; xxi, 31; but it is doubtful if it be the same. Michaelis thinks of the Rechoboth-han-Nahar (lit. streets, i. e. the village or town on the River Euphrates) of Gen. xxxvi, 37; but still more improbable is the idea of Bellermand and Jahn that Aram-beth-Rehob was beyond the Tigris in Assyria. See REHOB.

4. ARAM'-TSOBAB', אַרַם צֹבָב, or, in the Syriac form, אַרַם צְבָבָ, Tsoba (2 Sam. x, 6). Jewish tradition has placed Zobah at Aleppo (see the Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela), whereas Syrian tradition identifies it with Nisibis, a city in the north-east of Mesopotamia. Though the latter opinion long obtained currency under the authority of Michaelis (in his Dissert. de Syria Sobara, to be found in the Comment. Soc. Gotting. 1769), yet the former seems a much nearer approximation to the truth. We may gather from 2 Sam. viii, 3; x, 16, that the eastern boundary of Aram-Zobah was the Euphrates, but Nisibis was far beyond that river; besides that in the title of the sixtieth Psalm (supposing it genuine) Aram-Zobah is clearly distinguished from Aram-Naharaim, or Mesopotamia. It is true, indeed, that in 2 Sam. x, 16, it is said that Hadadrezzer, king of Zobah, brought against David "Aramites from beyond the river," but these were auxiliaries, and not his own subjects. The people of Zobah are uniformly spoken of as near neighbors of the Israelites, the Danæscenes, and other Syrians; and in one place (2 Chron. viii, 3) Hamath is called Hamath-Zobah, as pertaining to that district. We therefore conclude that Aram-Zobah extended from the Euphrates westward, perhaps as far north as to Aleppo. It was long the most powerful of the petty kingdoms of Aramea, its princes commonly bearing the name of Hadadrezzer or Hadadrezzer. See ZOBAB.

5. ARAM'-NAHARA'YIM, אַרַם נַהַרַיִם, i. e. Aram of the Two Rivers, called in Syriac "Beth-Nahrin," i. e. "the land of the rivers," following the analogy by which the Greeks formed the name Mesopotamia, "the country between the rivers." For that Mesopotamia is here designated is admitted universally. The rivers which enclose Mesopotamia are the Euphrates on the west and the Tigris on the east; but it is doubtful whether the Aram-Naharaim of Scripture embraces the whole of that tract or only the northern portion of it (Gen. xxiv, 10; Deut. xxiii, 4; Judg. iii, 8; 1 Chron. xix, 6; Psa. lx, title). A part of this region of Aram is also called Paddan'-aram', אַרַם פַּדְדָן, the plain of Aram (Gen. xxxv, 20; xxviii, 2, 6, 7; xxxi, 18; xxxiii, 18), and once simply Paddan (Gen. xlviii, 7), also Sekel'-Aram', אַרַם שֶׁקֶל, the field of Aram (Hos. xii, 13), whence the "Campi Mesopotamici" of Quintus Curtius (iii, 2, 3; iii, 8, 1; iv, 9, 6). See PADAN; SADEIL. But that the whole of Aram-Naharaim did not belong to the flat country of Mesopotamia appears from the circumstance that Balaam, who (Deut. xxiii, 4) is called a native of Aram-Naharaim, says (Num. xxiii, 7) that he was brought "from Aram, out of the mountains of the east." The Septuagint, in some of these places, has Mesopotamia Syriacæ, and in others Syria Interamni, which the Latins rendered by Syria Interamnia. See MESOPOTAMIA.

6. But though the districts now enumerated be the only ones expressly named in the Bible as belonging to Aram, there is no doubt that many more territories were included in that extensive region, e. g. Geshur, Hul, Arpad, Riblah, Hamath, Helbon, Betheden, Berthai, Tadmor, Hauran, Abilene, etc., though some of them may have formed part of the divisions already specified. See ISU-ROB.

A native of Aram was called אַרַםִי, Arami', an Aramean, used of a Syrian (2 Kings v, 20), and of a Mesopotamian (Gen. xxv, 20). The feminine was אַרַםִיָּה, Arami'yah, an Aramites (1 Chron. vii, 14), and the plural אַרַםִיָּם, Aramim' (2 Kings xvii, 29), once (2 Chron. xxii, 5) in a shortened form אַרַםִי, Rammim'. See ARAMEAN LANGUAGE. Traces of the name of the Arameans are to be found in the Ἀραμῶν and Ἀραμῆϊοι of the Greeks (Strabo, xiii, 4, 6; xvi, 4, 27; comp. Homer's Iliad, ii, 783; Hesiod. Theog. 304). See ASSYRIA. The religion of the Syrians was a worship of the powers of nature (Judg. x, 6; 2 Chron. xxviii, 23; see Cruizer, Symbol. ii, 55 sq.). They were so noted for idolatry, that in the language of the later Jews אַרַםִיָּם was used as synonymous with heathenism (see the Mischna of Surenhusius, ii, 401; Onkelos on Levit. xxv, 47). Castell, in his Lexic. Heptaglott. col. 229, says the same form of speech prevails in Syriac and Ethiopic. The Hebrew letters א, resh, and ד, dath, are so alike, that they were often mistaken by transcribers; and hence, in the Old Testament, אֲרָם, Aram, is sometimes found instead of אֲדָם, Edom, and vice versa. Thus in 2 Kings xvi, 6, according to the text, the Arameans are spoken of as possessing Elath on the Red Sea; but the Masoretic marginal reading has "the Edomites," which is also found in many manuscripts, in the Septuagint and Vulgate, and it is obviously the correct reading (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. s. v.).

It appears from the ethnographic table in the tenth chapter of Genesis (ver. 22, 23) that Aram was a son of Shem, and that his own sons were Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash. If these gave names to districts, Uz was in the north of Arabia Deserta, unless its name was derived rather from Huz, son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii, 21). Hul was probably Coele-Syria; Mash, the Mons Masius north of Nisibis in Mesopotamia; Gether is unknown. Another Aram is mentioned (Gen. xxii, 21) as the grand-son of Nahor and son of Kennel, but he is not to be thought of here. The descent of the Arameans from a son of Shem is confirmed by their language, which was one of the branches of the Semitic family, and nearly allied to the Hebrew. Many writers, who have copied without acknowledgment the words of Calmet, maintain that the Arameans came from Kir, appealing to Amos ix, 7; but while that passage is not free from obscurity, it seems evidently to point, not to the aboriginal abode of the people, but to the country whence God would recover them when banished. The prophet had said (Amos i, 5) that the people of Aram should go into captivity to Kir (probably the country on the River Kur or Cyrus), a prediction of which we read the accomplishment in 2 Kings xvi, 9; and the allusion here is to their subsequent restoration. Hartmann thinks Armenia obtained its name from Aram. (See generally Michaelis, Spiegel, ii, 121 sq.; Wahl, Alt. u. N. Asien, i, 290 sq.; Gatterer, Handb. i, 248; Rosenmüller, Alth. eth. i, 1, 232 sq.; Ritter, Erdkunde, x, 16; Lengerke, Kanaan, i, 218 sq.)—KITTO. See SYRIA.

2. The first named son of Kennel and grand-son of Nahor (Gen. xxii, 21), B.C. cir. 2000. He is incorrectly thought by many to have given name to Syria, hence the Sept. translates Συοοι. By some he is regarded as same with RAM of Job xxxii, 2.

3. The last named of the four sons of Shamer or Shomer of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 34), B.C. cir. 1618.

4. The Greek form among the ancestors of Christ (Matt. i, 3, 4; Luke iii, 33) of the Heb. RAM (q. v.), the son of Hezron and father of Aminadab (1 Chron. ii, 9, 10).

Aramean Language (Heb. Aramith, אַרְמִית, 2 Kings xviii, 26; Ezra iv, 7; Isa. xxxvi, 11; Dan. ii, 4; Sept. Συοαρι, Vulg. Syricee) is the northern and least developed branch of the Syro-Arabian family of tongues, being a general term for the whole, of which the Chaldee and Syriac dialects form the parts, these last differing very slightly, except in the forms of the characters in which they are now written (see the Intro. to Winer's Chaldee Grammar, r. ed. tr. by Prof. Hackett, N. Y. 1851). See CHALDEE LANGUAGE. Its cradle was probably on the banks of the Cyrus, according to the best interpretation of Amos ix, 7; but Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Syria form what may be considered its home and proper domain. Political events, however, subsequently caused it to supplant Hebrew in Palestine, and then it became the prevailing form of speech from the Tigris to the shore of the Mediterranean, and, in a transverse direction, from Armenia down to the confines of Arabia. After obtaining such a wide dominion, it was forced, from the ninth century onward, to give way before the encroaching ascendancy of Arabic; and it now only survives as a living tongue among the Syrian Christians in the neighborhood of Mosul. According to historical records which trace the migrations of the Syro-Arabbians from the east to the south-west, and also according to the comparatively ruder form of the Aramean language itself, we might suppose that it represents, even in the state in which we have it, some image of that aboriginal type which the Hebrews and Arabians, under more favorable social and climatical influences, subsequently developed into fulness of sound and structure. But it is difficult for us now to discern the particular vestiges of this archaic form; for, not only did the Aramaic not work out its own development of the original elements common to the whole Syro-Arabian sisterhood of languages, but it was pre-eminently exposed, both by neighborhood and by conquest, to harsh collision with languages of an utterly different family. Moreover, it is the only one of the three great Syro-Arabian branches which has no fruits of a purely national literature to boast of. We possess no monument whatever of its own genius; not any work which may be considered the product of the political and religious culture of the nation, and characteristic of it—as is so emphatically the case both with the Hebrews and the Arabs. The first time we see the language it is used by Jews as the vehicle of Jewish thought; and although, when we next meet it, it is employed by native authors, yet they write under the literary impulses of Christianity, and under the Greek influence on thought and language which necessarily accompanied that religion. These two modifications, which constitute and define the so-called Chaldee and Syriac dialects, are the only forms in which the normal and standard Aramaic has been preserved to us. It is evident, from these circumstances, that up to a certain period the Aramaic language has no other history than that of its relations to Hebrew. The earliest notice we have of its separate existence is in Gen. xxxi, 47, where Laban, in giving his own name to the memorial heap, employs words which are genuine Aramaic both in form and use. The next instance is in 2 Kings xviii, 26, where it appears that the educated Jews understood Aramaic, but that the common people did not. A striking illustration of its prevalence is found in the circumstance that it is employed as the language of official communication in the edict addressed by the Persian court to its subjects in Palestine (Ezra iv, 17). The later relations of Aramaic to Hebrew consist entirely of gradual encroachments on the part of the former. The Hebrew language was indeed always exposed, particularly in the north of Palestine, to Aramaic influences; whence the Aramaisms of the book of Judges and of some others are derived. It also had always a closer conjunction, both by origin and by intercourse, with Aramaic than with Arabic. But in later times great political events secured to Aramaic the complete ascendancy; for, on the one hand, after the deportation of the ten tribes, the re-peopling their country with colonists chiefly of Syrian origin generated a mixed Aramaic and Hebrew dialect (the Samaritan) in central Palestine; and on the other the exile of the remaining two tribes exposed them to a considerable, although generally overrated, Aramaic influence in Babylon, and their restoration, by placing them in contact with the Samaritans, tended still further to dispossess them of their vernacular Hebrew. The subsequent dominion of the Seleucidae, under which the Jews formed a portion of a Syrian kingdom, appears to have completed the series of events by which the Aramaic supplanted the Hebrew language entirely.

The chief characteristics in form and flexion which distinguish the Aramaic from the Hebrew language are the following: As to the consonants, the great diversity between the forms of the same root as it exists in both languages arises principally from the Aramaic having a tendency to avoid the sibilants. Thus, where ש , ז , and ז are found in Hebrew, Aramaic often uses ז , ז , and ז ; and even ז for ז . Letters of the same organ are also frequently interchanged, and generally so that the Aramaic, consistently with its characteristic roughness, prefers the harder sounds. The number of vowel-sounds generally is much smaller; the verb is reduced to a monosyllable, as are also the segolate forms of nouns. This deprives the language of some distinct forms which are marked in Hebrew, but the number and variety of nominal formations is also in other respects much more limited. The verb possesses no vestige of the conjugation Niphāl, but forms all its passives by the prefix פֿ. The third person plural of the perfect has two forms to mark the difference of gender. The use of l'ar as "conversive" is unknown. There is an imperative mood in all the passives. All the active conjugations (like Kal in Heb.) possess two participles, one of which has a passive signification. The participle is used with the personal pronoun to form a kind of present tense. The classes of verbs פֿ and נֿ, and other weak forms, are almost indistinguishable. In the noun, again, a word is rendered definite by appending נֿ to the end (the so-called emphatic state); but thereby the distinction between simple feminine and definite masculine is lost in the singular. The plural masculine ends in פֿ. The relation of genitive is most frequently expressed by the prefix פֿ, and that of the object by the preposition פֿ.

The Aramean introduced and spoken in Palestine has also been, and is still, often called the Syro-Chaldaic, because it was probably in some degree a mixture of both the eastern and western dialects; or perhaps the distinction between the two had not yet arisen in the age of our Lord and his apostles. So long as the Jewish nation maintained its political independence in Palestine, Hebrew continued to be the common language of the country, and, so far as we can judge from the remains of it which are still extant, although not entirely pure, it was yet free from any important changes in those elements and forms by which it was distinguished from other languages. But at the period when the Assyrian and Chaldean rulers of Babylon subdued Palestine, every thing assumed another shape. The Jews of Palestine lost with their political independence the independence of their language also, which they had till then asserted. The Babylonish Aramean dialect supplanted the Hebrew, and became by degrees the prevailing language of the people, until this in its turn was in some measure, though not entirely, supplanted by the Greek. See HELLENIST. Josephus (De Antic. 16) and the New Testament (Acts xxvi, 14) call it the Hebrew (ἡ Ἑβραϊκή διάλεκτος). Old as this appellation is, however, it has one important defect, namely, that it is too indefinite, and may mislead those who are unacquainted with the subject to confound the ancient Hebrew and the Aramean, which took the place of the Hebrew after the Babylonish captivity, and was the current language of Palestine in the time of Christ and the apostles, as is evinced by the occurrence of proper names of places (e. g. Bethesda, Acelmana) and persons (e. g. Boanerges, Bar-jona), and even common terms (e. g. Taltia cuni, Ephphatha, Sabachthani) in this mixed dialect. (See generally the copious treatise of Pfankuche on the history and elements of the Aramean language, translated, with introductory remarks by the editor, in the Am. Bib. Repos. April, 1831, p. 317-363; comp. Nagel, De Lingua Aramea, Altdorf, 1739; Etheridge, Aramean Dialects, Lond. 1843).

The following may be specified as the different Aramean dialects in detail:

1. THE EASTERN ARAMAIC OR CHALDEE.—This is not to be confounded with "the language of the Chaldees" (Dan. i, 4), which was probably a Medo-Persic dialect; but is what is denominated Aramaic (אֲרָמַיִת) in Dan. ii, 4. This was properly the language of Babylonia, and was acquired by the Jews during the exile, and carried back with them on their return to their own land. See CHALDEAN.

The existence of this language, as distinct from the Western Aramaic or Syriac, has been denied by many scholars of eminence (Michaelis, Abhandl. von der Syr. Spr. § 2; Jahn, Aramäische Sprachlehre, § 1; Hupfeld, Theol. Stud. und Krit. 1830, p. 299 sq.; De Wette, Eind. § 32; Fürst, Lehrgeb. der Aram. Id'ome, p. 5), who think that in what is called the Chaldee we have only the Syriac with an infusion of Hebraisms. The answer to this, however, is that some of the peculiarities of the Chaldee are such as are not Hebraistic, so that it cannot have derived them from this source. Thus the preformative in the future of the third person masc. sing. and of the third pers. masc. and fem. plur. in Chaldee is פֿ, while in Syriac it is פֿ; and in Heb. the last is פֿ; the pron. this in Chaldee is פֿ and פֿ, while the Syr. has פֿ and the Heb. פֿ; the Chaldee has the status emphaticus plur. in פֿ, while the Syr. has a simple נֿ; and to these may be added the use of peculiar words, such as פֿ, פֿ (Dan. v. 7, 16), פֿ (Ezra iv. 8; v. 9, 11; vi, 13), פֿ (Ezra iv, 10, 11, etc.), פֿ (Dan. v, 2, 23); the use of פֿ for פֿ in such words as פֿ, etc. There are other differences between the Chaldee and Syriac, such as the absence from the former of otiant consonants and diphthongs, the use of dagesh-forte in the former and not in the latter, the formation of the infin. without the prefixing of פֿ except in Peal; but as these are common to the Chaldee with the Hebrew, they cannot be used as proofs that the Chaldee was a dialect independent of the Hebrew, and not the Syriac modified by the Hebrew; and the same may be said of the difference of pronunciation between the Syriac and Chaldee, such as the prevalence of an a sound in the latter where the former has the o sound, etc. It may be added, however, to the evidence above adduced, as a general remark, that when we consider the wide range of the Aramaic language from east to west, it is in the highest degree probable that the dialect of the people using it at the one extremity should differ considerably from that of those using it at the other. It may be further added that not only are the alphabetical characters of the Chaldee different from those of the Syriac, but there is a much greater prevalence of the scriptio plena in the former than in the latter. As, however, the Chaldee has come down to us only through the medium of Jewish channels, it is not probable that we have it in the pure form in which it was spoken by the Semitic Babylonians. The rule of the Persians, and subsequently of the Greeks in Babylonia, could not fail also to infuse into the language a foreign element borrowed from both these sources. (See Aurivillius, Dissert. ad Sac. Literas et Philol. Orient. pertinentes, p. 107 sq.; Hoffmann, Grammatik Syr., Proleg., p. 11; Dietrich, De Serm. Chald. proprietate, Lips. 1839; Hävernick, General Introduction, p. 91 sq.; Bleek, Einh. in das A. T., p. 53; Winer, Chaldische Grammatik, p. 5.)

The Chaldee, as we have it preserved in the Bible (Ezra iv, 8, 18; vii, 12-26; Dan. ii, 4-vii, 28; Jer. x, 11) and in the Targums, has been, as respects linguistic character, divided into three grades: 1. As it appears in the Targum of Onkelos, where it possesses most of a peculiar and independent character; 2. As it appears in the biblical sections, where it is less free from Hebraisms; and, 3. As it appears in the other Targums, in which, with the exception to some extent of that of Jonathan ben-Uzziel on the Prophets, the language is greatly corrupted by foreign infusions (Winer, De Onkeloso ejusque Psephora, Chald., Lips. 1819; Luzzato, De Onkelosi Chald. Pent. versione, Vien. 1830; Hirt, De Chaldisimo Biblico, Jen. 1751). See TARGUM.

The language which is denominated in the N. T. Hebræe, and of which a few specimens are there given, seems, so far as can be judged from the scanty materials preserved, to have been substantially the same as the Chaldee of the Targums (Pfannkuche, On the Language of Palestine in the Age of Christ and his Apostles, translated in the Bib. Repository, Apr. 1831, and reprinted in the Bib. Cabinet, vol. ii). In this language some of the apocryphal books were written (Jerome, Pref. in Tobit Judth, 1 Macc.), the work of Josephus on the Jewish war (De Bellis Jud., pref. § 1), and, as some suppose, the original Gospel by Matthew. It is designated by Jerome the Syro-Chaldee (contr. Pelag. iii, J), and by this name it is now commonly known. The Talmudists intend this when they speak of the Syriac or Aramaic (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. v, 18). See HEBREW LANGUAGE.

The Chaldee is written in the square character in which the Hebrew now appears. This seems to have been the proper Chaldee character, and to have superseded the old Hebrew or Samaritan character after the exile. The Palmyrean and the Egypto-Aramaic letters [see ALPHABET] much more closely resemble the square character than the ancient Hebrew of the coins (Kopp, Bibler und Schriften, ii, 164 sq.). See CHALDEE LANGUAGE.

2. THE WESTERN ARAMAIC or SYRIAC.—Of this in its ancient form no specimens remain. As it is known to us, it is the dialect of a Christianized people, and its oldest document is the translation of the N. T., which was probably made in the second century. See SYRIAC VERSIONS.

As compared with the Arabic, and even with the Hebrew, the Syriac is a poor language; it is also harsher and flatter than the Hebrew. As it is now extant, it abounds in foreign adulterations, having received words successively from the Persian, the Greek, the Latin, the Arabic, and even, in its more recent state, from the Crusaders.

The Syriac of the early times is said to have had dialects. This is confirmed by what has come down to us. The Syriac of the sacred books differs from that preserved in the Palmyrene inscriptions, so far as those can be said to convey to us any information on this point, and the later Syriac of the Maronites and of the Nestorians differs considerably from that of an older date. What Adler has called the Hierosolymitan dialect is a rude and harsh dialect, full of foreign words, and more akin to the Chaldee than to the Syriac. The Syriac is written in two different characters, the Estrangelo and the Peshito. Of these the Estrangelo is the more ancient; indeed, it is more ancient apparently than the characters of the Palmyrene and the Egypto-Aramaic inscriptions. Assemani derives the word from the Greek προγγύλος, round (Bibl. Orient. iii, pt. ii, p. 378); but this does not correspond with the character itself, which is angular rather than round. The most probable derivation is from the Arabic est, writing, and anjil, gospel. The Peshito is that commonly in use, and is simply the Estrangelo reduced to a more readable form. See SYRIAC LANGUAGE.

3. THE SAMARITAN.—This is a mixture of Aramaic and Hebrew. It is marked by frequent permutations of the gutturals. The character used is the most ancient of the Semitic characters, which the Samaritans retained when the Hebrews adopted the square character. Few remains of this dialect are extant. Besides the translation of the Pentateuch [see SAMARITAN VERSIONS], only some liturgical hymns used by Castell, and cited by him as Liturgia Damascenorum, and the poems collected and edited by Gesenius (Carmena Samaritana) in the first fasciculus of his Anecdota Orientalia, remain. (Morinus, Opuscula Hebræo-Samaritana, 1657; Cellarius, Horæ Samaritanæ, Jenæ, 1703; Uhlemann, Institut. Ling. Samaritanæ, Lips. 1837.) See SAMARITAN LANGUAGE.

4. THE SABLIAN or NAZOREAN.—This is the language of a sect on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris who took to themselves (at least in part) the name of Mendecites (Gnostics) or Nazoreans, but were called Sabians by the Arabians. Some of their religious writings are extant in the libraries at Paris and Oxford. Their great book (ܣܒܝܐܢܐ ܟܬܘܒܐ), the Liber Adami, has been edited with a Latin translation by Matthias Norberg, Prof. at Lund, who died in 1826, under the title Codex Nasaræus, Liber Adami Appellatus (3 parts 4to, Lund, 1815-16); this was followed by a Lexicon (1816) and an Onomasticon (1817) on the book by the same. The language is a jargon between Syriac and Chaldee; it uses great freedom with the gutturals, and indulges in frequent commutations of other letters; and in general is harsh and irregular, with many grammatical improprieties, and a large infusion of Persian words. The MSS. are written in a peculiar character; the letters are formed like those of the Nestorian Syriac, and the vowels are inserted as letters in the text.

5. THE PALMYRENE.—On the ruins of the ancient city of Palmyra or Tadmor have been found many inscriptions, of which a great part are bilingual, Greek, and Aramaic. A collection of these was made by Robert Wood, and published by him in a work entitled The Ruins of Palmyra (Lond. 1753); they were soon afterward made the object of learned examination by Barthélemy at Paris and Swinton at Oxford, especially the latter (Explication of the Inscriptions in the Palmyrene Language, in the 48th vol. of the Philosophical Transactions, p. 690-756). These inscriptions are of the first, second, and third centuries; they are of little intrinsic importance. The language closely resembles the Syriac, and is written in a character akin to the square character, but a little inclining to a cursive mode of writing.

6. THE EGYPTO-ARAMAIC.—This is found on some ancient Egyptian monuments, preceding probably from Jews who had come from Palestine to Babylonia. Among these is the famous Carpentras inscription, so called from its present location in the south of France; this, Gesenius thinks, is the production of a Syrian from the Seleucidian empire residing in Egypt; but this is less probable than that it is the production of a Jew inclining to the Egyptian worship. Some MSS. on papyrus also belong to this head (see Gesenius, Monumenta Phan. i, 226-245). The language is Aramaic, chiefly resembling the Chaldee, but with a Hebrew infusion.—Kitto, s. v.

A'ramitess (Heb. Aramniyah, אַרַמִּיתָא, Sept. ἡ Σίρα, 1 Chron. vii, 14), a female Syrian, as the word is elsewhere rendered. See ARAM.

A'ram-nahara'im (Heb. Aram' Nahara'yim, אַרַמִּי נַהֲרָאִי, Sept. Μεσοποταμία Συρία, Psal. ix, title), the region between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, i. e. Mesopotamia, as it is elsewhere rendered. See ARAM.

Aram-Zobah. See ARAM.

A'ran (Heb. Aram', אַרַם, wild goat; Sept. Ἀράρ, v. r. Ἀράρ, the second named of the two sons of Dishan, and grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi, 28; 1 Chron. i, 42). B.C. cir. 1963.

A'rarat (Heb. Ararat', אַרְרָט, accord. to Bohlen and Benfey from Sanscrit aryavata, "sacred land;" Sept. Ἀραράτ; v. r. in 2 Kings xix, 37, Ἀραράτ; in Isa. xxxvii, 38, Ἀρρατία; v. r. in Jer. li, 27, Ἀραράτ, Ἀραράτ, etc.), occurs nowhere in Scripture as the name of a mountain, but only as the name of a country, upon the "mountains" of which the ark rested during the subsidence of the flood (Gen. viii, 4). In 2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38 (in both which it is rendered "Armenia"), it is spoken of as the country whither the sons of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, fled, after they had murdered their father. The apocryphal book of Tobit (i, 21) says it was ἐκ τῶν ὄρων Ἀραράτ, "to the mountains of Ararat." This points to a territory which did not form part of the immediate dominion of Assyria, and yet might not be far off from it. The description is quite applicable to Armenia, and the tradition of that country bears that Sennacherib's sons were kindly received by King Paroyr, who allotted them portions of land bordering on Assyria, and that in course of time their posterity also established an independent kingdom, called Vaspurakan (Advall's Transl. of Chamich's Hist. of Armenia, i, 33, 34). The only other Scripture text where the word occurs (Jer. li, 27) mentions Ararat, along with Minni and Ashkenaz, as kingdoms summoned to arm themselves against Babylon. In the parallel place in Isa. xliii, 2-4, the invaders of Babylonia are described as "issuing from the mountains;" and if by Minni we understand the Monyis in Armenia, mentioned by Nicholas of Damascus (Josephus, Ant. i, 3, 6), and by Ashkenaz some country on the Euxine Sea, which may have had its original name, Arcenos, from Ashkenaz, a son of Gomer, the progenitor of the Cimmerians (Gen. x, 2, 3), then we arrive at the same conclusion, viz. that Ararat was a mountainous region north of Assyria, and in all probability in Armenia. In Ezek. xxxviii, 6, we find Togarmah, another part of Armenia, connected with Gomer, and in Ezek. xxvii, 14, with Meshech and Tubal, all tribes of the north. With this agree the traditions of the Jewish and Christian churches (Josephus, Ant. i, 3, 5; Euseb. Prop. Evang. ix, 12, 19; Jerome on Isa. l. c.), and likewise the accounts of the native Armenian writers, who inform us that Ararat was the name of one of the ancient provinces of their country, supposed to correspond to the modern pachalies of Kars and Bayazid, and part of Kurdistan. According to the tradition preserved in Moses of Choren (in his Histor. Armen. p. 361, ed. Whiston, Lond. 1736), the name of Ararat was derived from Ara, the eighth of the native princes, who was killed in a battle with the Babylonians about B.C. 1750; in memory of which the whole province was called Aray-arat, i. e. the ruin of Ara. (See Michaelis, Suppl. i, 130 sq.; Tuch, Gen. p. 170 sq.) Rev. E. Smith, who made an exploring tour in Persia and Armenia in 1830 and 1831, remarks in the Biblical Repository, 1832, p. 202, "The name of Ararat occurs but twice in the Old Testament (Gen. viii, 1, and Jer. li, 27), and both times as the name of a country, which in the last passage is said to have a king. It is well known that this was the name of one of the fifteen provinces of Armenia. It was situated nearly in the centre of the kingdom; was very extensive, reaching from a point above seven or eight miles east of the modern Erzurum, to within thirty or forty miles of Nakhchewan; yielded to none in fertility, being watered from one extremity to the other by the Araxes, which divided it into two nearly equal parts; and contained some eight or ten cities, which were successively the residences of the kings, princes, or governors of Armenia from the commencement of its political existence, about 2000 years B.C. according to Armenian tradition, until the extinction of the Pagan dynasty, about the middle of the eleventh century; with the exception of about 250 years at the commencement of the Arsacian dynasty, when Nisibis and Orta were the capitals. It is therefore not unnatural that this name should be substituted for that of the whole kingdom, and thus become known to foreign nations, and that the king of Armenia should be called the king of Ararat." See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

But though it may be concluded with tolerable certainty that the land which has thus become intimately connected with the name Ararat is to be identified with a portion of Armenia, we possess no historical data for fixing on any one mountain in that country as the resting-place of the ark. It probably grounded on some of the lower peaks of the chain of mountains encircling that region. This supposition best accords with the nature of the circumstances, and does not conflict with the language of the text when properly weighed. See DELUGE. If our supposition be correct, then, for any thing that appears to the contrary, the ark did not touch the earth until the waters were abated to a level with the lower valleys or plains, and, consequently, the inmates were not left upon a dreary elevation of 16,000 or 17,000 feet, never till of late deemed accessible to human footsteps, and their safe descent from which, along with all the "living creatures" committed to their care, would have been a greater miracle than their deliverance from the flood. By this explanation also we obviate the geological objection against the mountain, now called Ararat, having been submerged, which would imply a universal deluge, whereas by the "mountains of Ararat" may be understood some lower chain in Armenia, whose height would not be incompatible with the notion of a partial flood. Finally, we on this hypothesis solve the question: If the descendants of Noah settled near the resting-place of the ark in Armenia, how could they be said to approach the plain of Shinar (Gen. xi, 2), or Babylonia, from the East? For, as we read the narrative, the precise resting-place of the ark is nowhere mentioned; and though for a time stationary "over" the mountains of Ararat, it may, before the final subsidence of the waters, have been carried considerably to the east of them. (See Kaumer, in the Hertha, 1829, xiii, 333 sq.; comp. Hoff, Gesch. d. Erdbeschichte, Gotha, 1834, iii, 363.) See ARK.

The ancients, however, attached a peculiar sacredness to the tops of high mountains, and hence the belief was early propagated that the ark must have rested on some such lofty eminence. The earliest tradition fixed on one of the chain of mountains which separate Armenia on the south from Mesopotamia, and which, as they also enclose Kurdistan, the land of the Kurds, obtained the name of the Kardū or Carduchian range, corrupted into Gordiæan and Cordyæan. This opinion prevailed among the Chaldeans, if we may rely on the testimony of Berosus as quoted by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 6): "It is said there is still some part of this ship in Armenia, at the mountain of the Cordyæans [Κορδυάων = Koords], and that people carry off pieces of the bitumen, which they use as amulets." (See Orëlli, Suppl. not. ad Nicol. Damasc. p. 58; Ritter, Erll. x, 359 sq.) The same is reported by Abydenus (in Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix, 4), who says they employed the wood of the vessel against diseases. Hence we are prepared to find the tradition adopted by the Chaldee paraphrasts, as well as by the Syriac translators and commentators, and all the Syrian churches. In the three texts where "Ararat" occurs, the Targum of Onkelos has קָרְדוּ, Kardu; and, according to Buxtorf, the term "Kardyan" was in Chaldeæ synonymous with "Armenian." At Gen. viii, 4, the Arabic of Erpenius has Jebel A-Karud (the Mountain of the Kurds), which is likewise found in the "Book of Adam" of the Zabæans. For other proofs that this was the prevalent opinion among the Eastern Churches, the reader may consult Eutyehius (Anab.) and Epiphanius (Hæres. 18). It was no doubt from this source that it was borrowed by Mohammed, who in his Koran (xi, 46) says: "The ark rested on the mountain Al-Judi." That name was probably a corruption of Giordi, i. e. Gordiæan (the designation given to the entire range), but afterward applied to the special locality where the ark was supposed to have rested. This is on a mountain a little to the east of Jezirah ibn Omar (the ancient Bezabde) on the Tigris. At the foot of the mountain there was a village called Karya Thaminin, i. e. the Village of the Eighty—that being the number (and not eight) saved from the flood according to the Mohammedan belief (Abulfeda, Antislam. p. 17). The historian Elmacin mentions that the Emperor Heraclius went up, and visited this as "the place of the ark." Here, or in the neighborhood, was once a famous Nestorian monastery—"the Monastery of the Ark," destroyed by lightning in A. D. 776 (see Asseman, Bibl. Or. ii, 113). The credulous Jew, Benjamin of Tudela, says that a mosque was built at Mount Judi, "of the remains of the ark," by the Caliph Omar. Kinneir, in describing his journey from Jezirah along the left bank of the Tigris to Nahr Van, says (Trav. p. 453), "We had a chain of mountains running parallel with the road on the left hand. This range is called the Juda Dag (i. e. mountain) by the Turks, and one of the inhabitants of Nahr Van assured me that he had frequently seen the remains of Noah's ark on a lofty peak behind that village." (Comp. Rich's Kurdistan, ii, 124.) A French savant, Eugene Boré, who visited those parts, says the Mohammedan dervishes still maintain here a perpetually burning lamp in an oratory (Revue Française, vol. xii; or the Seneur of October 2, 1839). The selection of this range was natural to an inhabitant of the Mesopotamian plain; for it presents an apparently insurmountable barrier on that side, hemming in the valley of the Tigris with abrupt declivities so closely that only during the summer months is any passage afforded between the mountain and river (Ainsworth's Travels in track of the Ten Thousand, p. 154). Josephus also quotes Nicolaus Damascenus to the effect that a mountain named Baris, beyond Minyas, was the spot. This has been identified with Paraz, a mountain mentioned by St. Martin (Mém. sur l'Arménie, i, 265) as rising to the north of Lake Van; but the only important mountain in the position indicated is described by recent travellers under the name Seiban Tugh; and we are therefore inclined to accept the emendation of Schroeder, who proposes to read Mâsis, the indigenous name of Mount Ararat, for Βάρης. After the disappearance of the Nestorian monastery, the tradition which fixed the site of the ark on Mount Judi appears to have declined in credit, or been chiefly confined to Mohammedans, and gave place (at least among the Christians of the West) to that which now obtains, and according to which the ark rested on a great mountain in the north of Armenia—to which (so strongly did the idea take hold of the popular belief) was, in course of time, given the very name of Ararat, as if no doubt could be entertained that it was the Ararat of Scripture. We have seen, however, that in the Bible Ararat is nowhere the name of a mountain, and by the native Armenians the mountain in question was never so designated; it is by them called Mâsis, and by the Turks Aghur-dagh, i. e. "The Heavy or Great Mountain" (see Kämpfer, Amen. ii, 428 sq.). The Fulgate and Jerome, indeed, render Ararat by "Armenia," but they do not particularize any one mountain. Still there is no doubt of the antiquity of the tradition of this being (as it is sometimes termed) the "Mother of the World." The Persians call it Kuh-i-Nuh, "Noah's Mountain." The Armenian etymology of the name of the city of Nakhchevan (which lies east of it) is said to be "first place of descent or lodging," being regarded as the place where Noah resided after descending from the mount. It is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 5) under a Greek name of similar import, viz. Ἀποβάρτηπος ("landing-place"), and by Ptolemy (v. 13, § 12) as Naxama (Ναζώμα, see Chesney, Expéd. to the Euphrat. i, 145).

1. The mountain thus known to Europeans as Ararat consists of two immense conical elevations (one peak considerably lower than the other), towering in massive and majestic grandeur from the valley of the Aras, the ancient Araxes. Smith and Dwight give its position north 57° west of Nakhchevan, and south

25° west of Erivan (Researches in Armenia, p. 267); and remark, in describing it before the recent earthquake, that in no part of the world had they seen any mountain whose imposing appearance could plead half so powerfully as this a claim to the honor of having once been the stepping-stone between the old world and the new. "It appeared," says Ker Porter, "as if the highest mountains of the world had been piled upon each other to form this one sublime immensity of earth, and rocks, and snow. The icy peaks of its double heads rose majestically into the clear and cloudless heavens; the sun blazed bright upon them, and the reflection sent forth a dazzling radiance equal to other suns. My eye, not able to rest for any length of time upon the blinding glory of its summits, wandered down the apparently interminable sides, till I could no longer trace their vast lines in the mists of the horizon; when an irrepressible impulse immediately carrying my eye upward again fixed my gaze upon the awful glare of Ararat" (Trav., i, 182 sq.; ii, 636 sq.). To the same effect Morier writes: "Nothing can be more beautiful than its shape, more awful than its height. All the surrounding mountains sink into insignificance when compared to it. It is perfect in all its parts; no hard rugged feature, no unnatural prominences; every thing is in harmony, and all combines to render it one of the sublimest objects in nature" (Journey, c. xvi; Second Journey, p. 312). Several attempts had been made to reach the top of Ararat, but few persons had got beyond the limit of perpetual snow. The French traveller Tournefort, in the year 1700, long persevered in the face of many difficulties, but was foiled in the end. About a century later the Pacha of Bayazid undertook the ascent with no better success. The honor was reserved to a German, Dr. Parrot, in the employment of Russia, who (in his Reise zum Ararat, Berl. 1834; translated by W. T. Cooley, Lond. and N. Y.) gives the following particulars: "The summit of the Great Ararat is in 39° 42' north lat., and 61° 55' east long. from Ferro. Its perpendicular height is 16,254 Paris feet above the level of the sea, and 13,350 above the plain of the Araxes. The Little Ararat is 12,284 Paris feet above the sea, and 9561 above the plain of the Araxes." After he and his party had failed in two attempts to ascend, the third was successful, and on the 27th of September (O. S.), 1829, they stood on the summit of Mount Ararat. It was a slightly convex, almost circular platform, about 200 Paris feet in diameter, composed of eternal ice, unbroken by a rock or stone; on account of the great distances, nothing could be seen distinctly. The observations effected by Parrot have been fully confirmed by another Russian traveller, H. Abich, who, with six companions, reached the top of the Great Ararat without difficulty, July 29, 1845. He reports that, from the valley between the two peaks, nearly 8000 feet above the level of the sea, the ascent can with facility be accomplished. It would appear even that the ascent is easier than that of Mont Blanc; and the best period for the enterprise is the end of July or beginning of August, when there is annually a period of atmospheric quiet, and a clear unclouded sky. Another Russian, M. Antonomoff, has also ascended to the top; and an Englishman, named Seymour, accompanied by a guide to tourists named Orvione, and escorted by four Cossacks and three Armenians, claims likewise to have ascended the mountain, and to have reached the level summit of the highest peak on the 17th September, 1846. (See extract from a letter in the Caucase, a St. Petersburg Journal, Athenæum, No. 1035, p. 914.) That the mountain is of volcanic origin is evidenced by the immense masses of lava, cinders, and porphyry with which the middle region is covered; a deep cleft on its northern side has been regarded as the site of its crater, and this cleft has been the scene of a terrible catastrophe. An earthquake, which in a few moments changed the entire aspect of the country, commenced on July 2, 1840, and continued, at intervals, until the 1st of September. Traces of fissures and landslips have been left on the surface of the earth, which the eye of the scientific observer will recognise after many ages. Clouds of reddish smoke and a strong smell of sulphur, which pervaded the neighborhood after the earthquake, seem to indicate that the volcanic powers of the mountain are not altogether dormant. The destruction of houses and other property in a wide tract of country around was very great; fortunately, the earthquake having happened during the day, the loss of lives did not exceed fifty. The scene of greatest devastation was in the narrow valley of Akorli, where the masses of rock, ice, and snow, detached from the summit of Ararat and its lateral points, were thrown at one single bound from a height of 6000 feet to the bottom of the valley, where they lay scattered over an extent of several miles. (See Major Voskoboinkof's Report, in the Athenæum for 1841, p. 157.) Parrot describes the secondary summit about 400 yards distant from the highest point, and on the gentle depression which connects the two eminences he surmises that the ark rested (Journey to Ararat, p. 179). The région immediately below the limits of perpetual snow is barren, and unvisited by beast or bird. Wagner (Reise, p. 185) describes the silence and solitude that reign there as quite overpowering. Arguri, the only village known to have been built on its slopes, was the spot where, according to tradition, Noah planted his vineyard. Lower down, in the plain of Araxes, is Nakhechevan, where the patriarch is reputed to have been buried (see Am. Lib. Repos. April, 1836, p. 390-416).—Kittó, s. v. See NOAH.

2. Returning to the broader signification we have assigned to the term "the mountains of Ararat," as co-extensive with the Armenian plateau from the base of Ararat in the north to the range of Kurdistan in the south, we notice the following characteristics of that region as illustrating the Bible narrative: (1.) Its elevation. It rises as a rocky island out of a sea of plain to a height of from 6000 to 7000 feet above the level of the sea, presenting a surface of extensive plains, whence, as from a fresh base, spring important and lofty mountain-ranges, having a generally parallel direction from east to west, and connected with each other by transverse ridges of moderate height. (2.) Its geographical position. The Armenian plateau stands equidistant from the Euxine and the Caspian seas on the north, and between the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean on the south. With the first it is connected by the Acampsis, with the second by the Araxes, with the third by the Tigris and Euphrates, the latter of which also serves as an outlet toward the countries on the Mediterranean coast. These seas were the high roads of primitive colonization, and the plains watered by these rivers were the seats of the most powerful nations of antiquity, the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Medes, and the Colchians. Viewed with reference to the dispersion of the nations, Armenia is the true centre (ἡμικέντρον) of the world; and it is a significant fact that at the present day Ararat is the great boundary-stone between the empires of Russia, Turkey, and Persia. (3.) Its physical formation. The Armenian plateau is the result of volcanic agencies: the plains as well as the mountains supply evidence of this. Armenia, however, differs materially from other regions of similar geological formation, as, for instance, the neighboring range of Caucasus, inasmuch as it does not rise to a sharp, well-defined central crest, but expands into plains or steppes, separated by a graduated series of subordinate ranges. Wagner (Reise, p. 263) attributes this peculiarity to the longer period during which the volcanic powers were at work, and the room afforded for the expansion of the molten masses into the surrounding districts. The result of this expansion is that Armenia is far more accessible, both from without and within its own limits, than other districts of similar elevation: the passes, though high, are comparatively easy, and there is no district which is shut out from communication with its neighbors. The fall of the ground in the centre of the plateau is not decided in any direction, as is demonstrated by the early courses of the rivers—the Araxes, which flows into the Caspian, rising westward of either branch of the Euphrates, and taking at first a northerly direction—the Euphrates, which flows to the south, rising northward of the Araxes, and taking a westerly direction. (4.) The climate is severe. Winter lasts from October to May, and is succeeded by a brief spring and a summer of intense heat. The contrast between the plateau and the adjacent countries is striking: in April, when the Mesopotamian plains are scorched with heat, and on the Euxine shore the azalea and rhododendron are in bloom, the Armenian plains are still covered with snow; and in the early part of September it freezes keenly at night. (5.) The vegetation is more varied and productive than the climate would lead us to expect. Trees are not found on the plateau itself, but grass grows luxuriantly, and furnishes abundant pasture during the summer months to the flocks of the nomad Kurds. Wheat and barley ripen at far higher altitudes than on the Alps and the Pyrenees: the volcanic nature of the soil, the abundance of water, and the extreme heat of the short summer bring the harvest to maturity with wonderful speed. At Erzurum, more than 6000 feet above the level of the sea, the crops appear above ground in the middle of June, and are ready for the sickle before the end of August (Wagner, p. 255). The vine ripens at about 5000 feet, while in Europe its limit, even south of the Alps, is about 2650 feet. See ARMENIA.

The general result of these observations as bearing upon the Biblical narrative would be to show that, while the elevation of the Armenian plateau constituted it the natural resting-place of the ark after the Deluge, its geographical position and its physical character secured an impartial distribution of the families of mankind to the various quarters of the world. The climate furnished a powerful inducement to seek the more tempering regions on all sides of it. At the same time, the character of the vegetation was remarkably adapted to the nomad state in which we may conceive the early generations of Noah's descendants to have lived.—Smith, s. v. See ETHNOLOGY.

Ar'arath (Ἀραράτ v. r. Ἀραράτ), another form (Tolot i, 21) of the name ARARAT (q. v.).

Arātus (Ἀρατος), the author of two astronomical poems in Greek, about B.C. 270, fragments and Latin translations of which are alone extant (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iv, 87; Schaubach, Gesch. d. griech. Astronomie, p. 215; Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Ancienne). (For an account of his works and their editions, see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) From the opening of one of these poems, entitled Phænomena (φανόμενα), the Apostle Paul is thought to have made the quotation indicated in his speech at Athens (Acts xvii, 28). "As certain also of your own poets have said, 'For we are also his offspring;'" since the words precisely agree (Τὸ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἑμεῖς). Others, however (see Kuinöl, Comment. in loc.), adduce similar sentiments from Cleanthes (Ἐκ τοῦ γὰρ γένος ἑμεῖς, Ἦμνα. in Joræn. 5) and Pindar (Ἐν ἑξῶν γένος, Nem. 6). A few brief and casual quotations of this kind have been made the foundation of the hasty conclusion that Paul was well read in classic poetry; but this, from his Jewish education, is extremely improbable. See PAUL. In this, the most direct instance, he appears rather to refer to the general sentiment of the Greek mythology, of which the passages adduced (alluded to in a general way by Paul, as if taken second-hand and by recollection merely) are the frequent expression (note the plur. "poets"). See Schmid, De Arato (Jen, 1691).

Arau'nah (Heb. Ararnah', אַרְאִנָּה, 2 Sam. xxiv, 16-24 [ver. 16 אַרְאִנָּה, ver. 18 אַרְאִנָּה], perhaps another form of Ornan; Sept. Ὀρνά or Ὀρ'ναν (Heb. Ornan', אֲרָנָה, nimble; 1 Chron. xxi, 2; 2 Chron. iii, 1; Sept. Ὀρνά, a man of the Jebusite nation, which possessed Jerusalem before it was taken by the Israelites. The angel of pestilence, sent to punish King David for his presumptuous vanity in taking a census of the people, was stayed in the work of death near a plot of ground belonging to this person, used as a threshing-floor, and situated on Mount Moriah; and when he understood it was required for the site of the Temple, he liberally offered the ground to David as a free gift; but the king insisted on paying the full value for it (50 shekels of silver according to 2 Sam. xxiv, 18, but 600 shekels of gold according to 1 Chron. xxi, 18). B.C. cir. 1017. See DAVID. Josephus, who calls him Oronana (Ὀρόνα, Ant. vii, 13, 4), adds that he was a wealthy man among the Jebusites, whom David spared in the capture of the city on account of his good-will toward the Hebrews (Ant. vii, 3, 5). See MORIAH.

Ar'ba (Heb. Arba', אַרְבָּה, four, but see Simonis Onom. J. T. p. 312 sq.; Sept. Ἀρβάκ v. r. Ἀρβάβ), a giant, father of Anak (q. v.), from whom Hebron (q. v.) derived its early name of KIRJATH-ARBA, i. e. city of Arba (Josh. xiv, 15; xv, 13; xxi, 11). B.C. ante 1618. See GIANT.

Ar'bathite (Heb. Arbathi', אַרְבָּתִּי; Sept. Ἀραβωθίτης, but in Chron. Σαραβωθῆτι v. r. Γαραβαθῆτι), an epithet of Abiel, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 31; 1 Chron. xi, 32), probably as being an inhabitant of ARABAH (Josh. xv, 61; xxiii, 22).

Arbat'tis (only in the dat. plur. Ἀρβάττιοις, with many var. readings, see Grimm, Handb. in loc.), a city or region named in connection with Galilee as being despoiled by Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac. v, 23). Ewald (Isr. Gesch. iv, 359 note) thinks (from the Syriac reading Ar'd Bot) that the district now called Ar'd el-Batbah, north of the sea of Galilee, is intended, and others have conjectured the Arabah, Arabia, etc.; but the most probable supposition is that of Reland (Palest. p. 192), that the name is a corruption (comp. 2 Mac. v, 3) of that of the toponym called by Josephus (War. iii, 3, 4 and 5) ACARABATTINE (q. v.).

Ar'bel. See BETH-ARBEL.

Arbe'la (Ἄρβηλα), mentioned in 1 Mac. ix, 2, as defining the situation of Masaloth, a place besieged and taken by Bacchides and Alcimus at the opening of the campaign in which Judas Maccabæus was killed. According to Josephus (Ant. xii, 11, 2) this was at Arbela of Galilee (Ἄρ' Ἀρβήλοισ), a place which he elsewhere states to be near Sepphoris, on the lake of Genesareth, and remarkable for certain impregnable caves, the resort of robbers and insurgents, and the scene of more than one desperate encounter (comp. Ant. xiv, 15, 4 and 5; War. i, 16, 2 and 3; ii, 20, 6; Lit. 37). These topographical requirements are fully met by the existing Irbid, a site with a few ruins, west of Mejdai, on the south-east side of the Wady Hamân, in a small plain at the foot of the hill of Kurûn Hattin. The caverns are in the opposite face of the ravine, and bear the name of Kulat Ibn Maân (Robinson, ii, 398; Burekh. 331; Irby, 91). As to the change in the name, the Arbela of Alexander the Great is called Irbi by the Arabic historians (Robinson, ii, 399). Moreover, the present Irbid is undoubtedly mentioned in the Talmud as Arbel (see Schwarz, Palest. 189; Reland, Palest. 358; Robinson, iii, 343 note). There seems, therefore, no reason to doubt the soundness of this identification (first suggested in the Munch. Gel. Anzeige, Nov. 1836). The army of Bacchides was from its total from Antioch to the land of Judæa (γῆν Ἰουδαία), which they were approaching "by the way that leadeth to Galgala" (Gilgal), that is, by the valley of the Jordan in the direct line to which Irbid lies. Ewald, however (Gesch. Isr. iv, 370 note), insists, in opposition to Josephus, that the engagements of this campaign were confined to Judæa proper, a theory which drives him to consider "Galgala" as the Jiljilia north of Gophna. See GILGAL. But he admits that no trace of an Arbela in that direction has yet come to light. Arbela is probably the BETH-ARBEL (q. v.) of Ilos, x, 14.—Smith.

Arbēla (Αρβηλά), another city mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) as situated beyond Jordan, near Pella; doubtless the present Irbid, a large village with extensive ruins near Wady Sheleleh, visited by several travellers (Ritter, Erld. xv, 1054 sq.).

Ar'bite (Heb. ארבי, ארבי, Sept. Ἀρβί), an epithet of Paarai or Naarai, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 35; comp. 1 Chron. xi, 37), probably as being a native of the town ARAB (Josh. xv, 52). In the list of Chronicles it is given as Ben-Ezbaï, by a change in letters not infrequently occurring. See EZBAI. (See Kennicott, Dissert. on 2 Sam. xxiii, p. 210.)

Arbo'nei (Gr. Ἀρβωνίαι, Ἀρβωνίαι v. Ἀρβωνίαι, see Fritzsche, Comment. in loc.), a stream, as it would seem, in Mesopotamia, having several considerable cities on its banks which were destroyed by Holofernes (Judith ii, 24). Some regard it as being the same with the Ihabor (q. v.) or Chaboras of Scripture (2 Kings xvii, 16). But it is probably a false rendering of a bungling translator for the original Heb. אֲרָבָה עֲבָרָה, beyond the river, i. e. Euphrates (see Movers, in the Bonner Zeitschr. xiii, 38).

Arbrissel or Arbrisselles, ROBERT D', the founder of the order of Fontevrault, was born in 1047 at Arbrissel or Arbresses, a village in the diocese of Rennes, and died Feb. 25, 1117. In 1085 he was appointed vicar-general of the bi-hop of Rennes, in which diocese he labored successfully for the restoration of church discipline. In 1089 he became professor of theology at Angers; but after two years he retired to the forest of Craon, on the frontier of Anjou and Bretagne. There soon a number of hermits gathered around him, and Robert founded the first establishment of the order of Fontevrault, the celebrated abbey DE ROMA. Robert himself was appointed its first prior at the Council of Tours in 1096, where he preached the same year. The number of the followers of Robert rapidly increased, and he established several monasteries; the most important was the celebrated abbey of Fontevrault, near Poitiers, after which the entire order was named. The abbey consisted of two different monasteries, one for men and one for women, which together counted soon more than 2000 inmates. According to the letters of Marbod, bishop of Rennes (cited by P. de la Mainferme, Clippus, t. i, p. 69), and Geoffroy, abbot of Verdun (Cercueil des Lettres de l'Abbé Geoffroy, publiées par le P. Sirmont in 1610), Robert, to crucify his flesh, had recourse to the most immoral kind of mortification; he used, for instance, to sleep in the cells of the nuns. These facts, denied or excused by some, and affirmed or censured by others, were the subject of the most lively controversy among the Roman Catholic theologians of France in the 17th and 18th centuries. A monk of Fontevrault, P. de la Mainferme, wrote a large work, entitled Clippus nascentis ordinis Fontevrauldensis, in defence of the founder of the order. Robert, in 1104, was present at the Councils of Beaugency and Paris, at the latter of which he prevailed upon Bertrade to separate from King Philip. He died in the monastery of Orsan. His remains were, in 1633, placed in a magnificent marble tomb, made by order of Louise of Bourbon, abbess of Fontevrault.—Mainferme, Dissertationes in Epistolam contra Bertradem de Arbrissello (Saumur, 1682); Hoefler, Nov. Biographie Générale, iii, 23.

Arbuthnot, ALEXANDER, a Scotch divine, was born in 1538. He was educated in the University of St. Andrew's, and then went to France and prosecuted his studies under Cujacius. Being declared licentiate of laws, he came home in 1566 to follow that profession; but he soon left the bar for the pulpit. In 1568 he was made principal of the University of Aberdeen. He took an active part in the various controversies of the time, and was employed in the preparation of the "Book of Discipline." In 1583 he received a presentation to one of the churches of St. Andrew's, but was prohibited by a royal warrant, or "horning," from accepting it. The cause of the royal indignation against him is not exactly known; but while the controversy as to his appointment was pending he died, October 17, 1583. He left behind him the character of a moderate and honest man, a man of learning, and a poet.—McCrie's Life of Melville, i, 114; Eng. Britannica.

Arcade. In church architecture, a series of arches supported by pillars or shafts, whether belonging to the construction or used in relieving large surfaces of masonry; the present observations will be confined to the latter, that is, to ornamental arcades. These were introduced early in the Norman style, and were used very largely to its close, the whole base story of exterior and interior alike, and the upper portions of towers and high walls, being often quite covered with them. They were either of simple or of intersecting arches; it is needless to say that the latter are the most elaborate in work, and the most ornamental; they are accordingly reserved in general for the richer portions of the fabric. There is, moreover, another, and perhaps more effective way of complicating the arcade, by placing an arcade within and behind another, so that the wall is doubly recessed, and the play of light and shadow greatly increased. The decorations of the transitional, until very late in the style, are so nearly those of the Norman, that we need not particularize the semi-Norman arcade. In the next style the simple arcade is, of course, most frequent. This, like the Norman, often covers very large surfaces. Foil arches are often introduced at this period, and greatly vary the effect. The reduplication of arcades is now managed differently from the former style. Two arcades, perfect in all their parts, are set the one behind the other, but the shaft of the outer is opposite to the arch of the inner series, the outer series is also more lofty in its proportions, and the two are often of differently constructed arches, as at Lincoln, where the outer series is of trifoliate, the inner of simple arches, or vice versa, the two always being different. The effect of this is extremely beautiful. But the most exquisite arches are those of the Geometrical period, where each arch is often surmounted by a crocketed pediment, and the higher efforts of sculpture are tasked for their enrichment, as in the glorious chajtr-houses of Salisbury, Southwell, and York: these are, however, usually confined to the interior. In the Decorated period partially, and in the Perpendicular entirely, the arcade gave place to panelling, greatly to the loss of effect, for no delicacy or intricacy of pattern can compensate for the bright light and deep shadows of the Norman and early English arcades (Hook, Church Dictionary, s. v.).

Arçæ Custodes, keepers of the chest, a name occasionally given in the early church to the archdeacons (q. v.). The bishop was not required to care personally for the widows, orphans, and strangers, but to commit them to his archdeacon, who had the keys of the church's treasures, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people. The ordinary deacons were the actual dispensers of the money; but from the archdeacon, who was the chief manager, they received their instructions and orders.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. xxi, § 5; Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Arcani Disciplina (discipline of the mysteries, or system of secret instruction), a term first introduced by Meier in his De Recondita vit. Eccles. Theologia (1677), to denote the practice of the early church of concealing from unbelievers, and even from catechumens, certain parts of divine worship, especially of the sacraments. The subject is curious in itself, and receives additional importance from the use made of it by the Romanists (see below). The disciplina arcani is not to be confounded with the system of reserve, or concealment in theology (scientia arcani, μυστηριουσοφία), which sprang up in Egypt in the second century, viz. the system adopted by certain teachers of not communicating certain parts of Christian knowledge (γνώσις) to Christian people generally, but only secretly to such as they deemed capable and worthy. Clement of Alexandria is the first to mention this system, and he pretends that it was instituted by Christ himself (Stromat. lib. i, c. 1; see Mosheim, Historical Commentaries, cent. ii, § 34). But the arcani disciplina proper referred to worship rather than to doctrine. It is fully treated by Bingham, from whom the following statement is condensed.

1. Tertullian († 220) is the first writer who mentions the practice of this mystery, and blames the heretics for not observing it (De Præscript. c. de. Her. cap. 41). From him, and from later writers, it appears that the secret system at first covered only Baptism and the Lord's Supper (i. e. the forms and ritual of the sacraments, not the doctrine concerning them). At a later period, confirmation, ordination, and unction were also made matters of concealment; and parts of the prayers of the church were enjoyed only by the "faithful," while unbelievers and catechumens were excluded from them. The system seems to have reached its height during the fourth century. At that time catechumens were taught the Ten Commandments, a creed, or summary confession of faith, and the Lord's Prayer, with suitable expositions; but, prior to baptism, the nature of the sacraments was carefully concealed. Even the time and place were not on any account to be divulged. To relate the manner in which the sacrament was administered, to mention the words used in the administration, to describe the simple elements in which it consisted, were themes on which the initiated were as strictly forbidden to touch as if they had been laid under an oath of secrecy. Even the ministers, when they were led in their public discourses to speak of the sacraments or the higher doctrines of faith, contented themselves with remote allusions, and dismissed the subject by saying Ἰσθαι αἱ μυστήρια, The initiated know what is meant.

So also of confirmation. Basil (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27) says that the "holy oil used in this ceremony is not to be looked upon by the uninitiated." As to the public prayers of the church, all those which had reference to the communion service were confined to the fileles. The highest class of penitents, called consistentes, or co-standers, were allowed to be present at the communion prayers, and see the oblation offered and received by the faithful, though they might not partake with them. But catechumens of all ranks were wholly excluded from all this. They were always dismissed before these prayers began, and the doors of the church were locked and guarded by proper officers, to the intent that no uninitiated person should indiscreetly rush in upon them. We shut the doors, says Chrysostom (Hom. xxiii. in Matt.), when we celebrate the holy mysteries, and drive away all uninitiated persons. This was one of the secrets of the church, as we heard St. Austin before (in Psalm. ciii) speak of it; one of the things which a catechumen might not look upon, according to St. Basil (De Spirit. Sancto, c. 27). Therefore the author of the Apostolical Constitution (lib. ii, c. 57; viii, c. 11) makes it a part of the deacon's office not only to command their absence, but also to keep the doors, that none might come in during the time of the oblation. Epiphanius (Hæres. 42, n. 3) and St. Jerome (Comm. in Galat. c. vi) bring it as a charge against the Marcionites that they despised this discipline, and admitted catechumens indiscriminately with the faithful to all their mysteries. And Palladius (Vita Chrysost. c. 9) forms a like charge against the enemies of Chrysostom, that in the tumult they raised against him, they gave occasion to the uninitiated to break into the church, and see those things which it was not lawful for them to set their eyes upon. Nay, so strict was the church then in the observation of this discipline, that Athanasius convicted the Meletians of false witness against him when they pretended to prove by the testimony of some catechumens that Macarius, one of his presbyters, had overturned the communion table in the time of the oblation; he argued that this could not be so, because (Athanasius, Apol. 2), if the catechumens were present, there could then be no oblation.—(Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. x, ch. v.)

2. The disciplina arcani gradually fell into disuse; no precise date of its end can be given. Rothe (Iconog. Real-Encyclopædie, i, 471) remarks that so long, on the one hand, as the church stood in the midst of a heathen world, and as long, on the other hand, as, within the church, delay of baptism (the procrastinatio baptismi) to an advanced age, or even to the dying hour, was practised, the arcani disciplina might have been a useful system; but just in proportion as infant baptism became more general, and the pagan world was christianized, the secret discipline lost its significance; for, in consequence of these changes, the class of persons for whom it had been instituted no longer existed. In a general way, we may name the end of the sixth century as the period when it passed away. The Western Church gradually stripped its liturgy of all secret usages; and Bona (Ver. Liturgicar. l. 1, 16, 6) asserts that about 700 the catechumenal system was entirely gone. The Eastern Church, however, holds on to her antiquated formulas, by which the catechumens are dismissed from divine worship, notwithstanding that church has no catechumens, and practises infant communion.

3. The original grounds for the adoption of the arcani disciplina cannot be known; but conjectures, and even plausible sources, are not wanting. The reasons for it were, according to Bingham, first, that the plainness and simplicity of the Christian rites might not be contemned by the catechumens, or give scandal or offence to them, before they were thoroughly instructed about the nature of the mysteries; secondly, to conciliate a reverence in the minds of men for the mysteries so concealed; and, thirdly, to make the catechumens more desirous to know them, or to excite their curiosity. Augustine says, "Though the sacraments are not disclosed to the catechumens, it is not because they cannot bear them, but that they may so much the more ardently desire them, by how much they are more honorably hidden from them" (Rom. in Joh. 96). Rothe goes into an elaborate inquiry on the subject in the article above cited (and also in his treatise De Disciplina Arcani Origine (Heidel. 1841, 4to), of which the following is the substance. Casaubon (De reb. sacris Exerc. xvi, Genev. 1654, 4to) traces the origin of it to a desire, on the part of Christians, to have mysteries of their own, and so not to be outdone by heathenism, which set great store by them. Rothe disputes this, on the ground of the bitter opposition of the Anti-Nicene Christians to all heathen ideas and usages. But he forgets that mysteries are congenial to human nature in all ages; a spirit akin to that which preserves Free-masonry could very well have existed in the early church. With less probability, certain writers, e. g. Frommann (De Disciplina Arcani, Jena, 1835), find the origin of the secret system in Judaism, which did not admit proselytes at once to all sacred services. Had this been so, we should find traces of it in the N. T. and in the apostolic age; but the whole system is quite foreign to apostolic usage, which practised the utmost openness. Moreover, during that early period of Christianity when the church borrowed from Judaism, the disciplina arcani did not yet exist; and besides, the Jewish custom appears to be of so late an origin that it may itself be an imitation of a Christian institution. Augusti (Handb. d. christl. Archæologie, i, 93 sq.; Denkwürdigkeiten, iv, 197) thinks that the early Christians adopted the secret discipline because their public worship was forbidden by law, and that this compulsory secrecy grew into a usage. But if this were true, all parts of worship would have shared in the secrecy, whereas only certain portions were made mysteries of. Credner (Jen. Literar. Zeitung, 1846, Nos. 164 and 165) traces the origin of the secret discipline back to the apostolic age, and finds the ground of it in the natural unwillingness of Jewish Christians to admit heathen converts at once to baptism. He finds confirmation of his theory in the fact that Clement of Alexandria (Quis Dives, c. 42), Irenæus (adv. Hæc. iv, 23, 24), and Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 18) trace the origin of the catechumenate back to the apostles. But even this would not prove his point; there might be, and for some time were, catechumens, without a disciplina arcani; and, moreover, there is ample proof of openness in ritual usages up to the second century. But yet the true origin of the secret discipline is doubtless to be found in the catechumenate (see Rothe, l. c.). The catechumens were probationers in the church, not full members; and this novitiate was designed, first, to keep unworthy persons out of the church, and, secondly, to train new converts in Christian doctrine and morals. At this day the Methodist Episcopal Church has such a catechumenate (Discipline, ch. ii, § 1), but without any secret discipline. But in the early church, during the persecutions, it was dangerous at once to admit professed converts, who might be spies, into the assemblies of the faithful. They were accordingly taught apart. But the tendency of this state of things would naturally be to make two kinds of Christianity, the esoteric, or that of the baptized believers (fideles), and the exoteric, or that of the unbaptized catechumens. The former shared in the Lord's Supper, but not the latter. Here is a plain starting-point for making mysteries of the two sacraments in liturgical practice as well as in theory. What was at first accidental finally grew into a rule.

4. The Romanists, as remarked above, have attempted to press the disciplina arcani into their service to account for the silence of the early church writers as to penance, image-worship, and other of their corruptions. The Jesuit Schelstrate first attempted this in his Antiquitas illustrata (Ant. 1678), but was fully refuted by Tenzel in Exercitationes Selectæ (Francof. 1692, 4to). Other Roman Catholic works on the subject are, Schöllner, De Disciplina Arcani (Venet. 1756); Lienhardt, De Antiq. Liturg. et de Disciplina Arcani (Argenter. 1829). When pressed hard by Protestants with the argument that no traces of the corruptions named above, or of the invocation of saints, the seven sacraments, or transubstantiation, are to be found in the early ages of the church, they admit the fact of this silence, but account for it on the ground that these doctrines and usages formed part of the disciplina arcani. Bingham shrewdly remarks that this "is an artifice that would justify as many errors and vanities as any church could be guilty of; it is but working a little with this admirable instrument and tool, called disciplina arcani, and then all the seeming contradictions between the ancient doctrines and practices of the church universal and the novel corruptions of the modern Church of Rome will presently vanish and disappear; so that we need not wonder why men, whose interest it serves so much, should magnify this as a noble invention" (bk. x, ch. v, § 1). The account given above of the nature of the arcani disciplina suffices of itself to refute the Romish pretence. The very mysteries themselves (baptism and the Eucharist), which formed the objects of the secret discipline, so far from being avoided by the early Christian writers, are topics of constant remark and discussion from the apostles' time downward. The bare fact, for instance, that the administration of the Eucharist was concealed from the catechumens, gives no more ground to suppose that transubstantiation was taught in the bread and wine, than the fact that baptism was concealed from them gives ground to suppose that the same doctrine was taught in the water of baptism. See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. s. bk. x, ch. v, and the other writers above cited. See also Neander, Church History, i, 308; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xiv, § 2; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, i, 467 sq. See MYSTERY.

ARCÈ. See ARKITE; PETRA.

Arch (only in the plur. אַרְכֵי־עֹלָמִים, eylamim, masc., and אַרְכֵי־עֹלָמֹת, eylamoth, fem.), an architectural term occurring only in Ezek. xl, 16, 22, 26, 29, and difficult of definition, but prob. allied with אָיִל, ayil, a ram, hence a column or pilaster (1 Kings vi, 31; Ezek. xli, 3, etc.). Most interpreters understand the term (sing. אָיִל, ayil) to be the same as אֲלָמִים, ulam, a vestibule or porch, following the Sept., Vulg., and Targums (Αὐλάριον, vestibulum, אֲלָמִים); but it is manifestly distinguished from this (Ezek. xl, 7, 8, 9, 39, 40), since the latter contained windows (ver. 16, 29), whereas this was carried round the building, even in front of the ascent to the gate (ver. 22, 26), and is usually associated with pillars. Of the other ancient interpreters Symmachus and the Syr. translate sometimes surrounding columns, sometimes threshold. The word appears either to denote a portico with a colonnade, or (according to Rabbi Menahen) is about equivalent to אָיִל, from which it is derived, i. e. some ornament, perhaps the roble or moulding at the top of a column (comp. Bötcher, Proben alttest. Schriftferrk. p. 319).—Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 47.

Arches with vaulted chambers and domed temples figure so conspicuously in modern Oriental architecture, that, if the arch did not exist among the ancient Jews, their towns and houses could not possibly have offered even a faint resemblance to those which now exist; and this being the case, a great part of the analogical illustrations of Scripture which modern travellers and Biblical illustrators have obtained from this source must needs fall to the ground. Nothing against its existence is to be inferred from the fact that no word properly signifying an arch can be found in the Hebrew Scriptures (see above). The architectural notices in the Bible are necessarily few and general; and we have at this day histories and other books, larger than the sacred volume, in which no such word as "arch" occurs. There is certainly no absolute proof that the Israelites employed arches in their buildings; but if it can be shown that arches existed in neighboring countries at a very early period, we may safely infer that so useful an invention could not have been unknown in Palestine.

Ancient Egyptian arched Door-ways.

Until within a few years it was common to ascribe a comparatively late origin to the arch; but circumstances have come to light one after another, tending to throw the date more and more backward, until at length it seems to be admitted that in Egypt the arch already existed in the time of Joseph. The observations of Rosellini and of Wilkinson (who carries back the evidence from analogy and probability to about B.C. 2020, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 116; iii, 316) led them irresistibly to this conclusion, which has also been recently adopted by Cockerell (Lect. iii, in Athenaeum for Jan. 28, 1843) and other architects. Wilkinson suggests the probability that the arch owed its invention to the small quantity of wood in Egypt, and the consequent expense of roofing with timber. The evidence that arches were known in the time of the first Osirtesen is derived from the drawings at Beni-Hassan (Wilkinson, ii, 117). In the secluded valley of Deir el-Medineh, at Thebes, are several tombs of the early date of Amenoph I. Among the most remarkable of these is one whose crude brick roof and niche, bearing the name of the same Pharaoh, prove the existence of the arch at the remote period of B.C. 1540 (Wilkinson, Topography of Thebes, p. 81). Another tomb of similar construction bears the ovals of Thothmes III, who is supposed by many to have reigned about the time of the Exode (Anc. Egyptians, iii, 319). At Thebes there is also a brick arch bearing the name of this king (Hoskins, Travels in Ethiopia). To the same period and dynasty (the 18th) belong the vaulted chambers and arched door-ways (fig. 4, above) which yet remain in the crude brick pyramids at Thebes (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii, 317). In ancient Egyptian houses it appears that the roofs were often vaulted, and built, like the rest of the house, of crude brick; and there is reason to believe that some of the chambers in the pavilion of Rameses III (about B.C. 1245), at Medinet Habu, were arched with stone, since the devices in the upper part of the walls show that the fallen roofs had this form (fig. 3). The most ancient actually existing arches of stone occur at Memphis, near the modern village of Sakkara. Here there is a tomb with two large vaulted chambers, whose roofs display in every part the name and sculptures of Psammetichus II (about B.C. 600). The chambers are cut in the limestone rock, and this being of a friable nature, the roof is secured by being, as it were, lined with an arch, like our modern tunnels. To about the same period—that of the last dynasty before the Persian invasion—belong the remarkable door-ways of the enclosures surrounding the tombs in the Assasif, which are composed of two or more concentric semicircles (fig. 2) of brick (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii, 319). Although the oldest stone arch whose age has been positively ascertained does not date earlier than the time of Psammetichus, we cannot suppose that the use of stone was not adopted by the Egyptians for that style of building previous to his reign, even if the arches in the pyramids in Ethiopia should prove not to be anterior to the same era. Nor does the absence of the arch in temples and other large buildings excite our surprise, when we consider the style of Egyptian monuments; and no one who understands the character of their architecture could wish for its introduction. In some of the small temples of the Osis the Romans attempted this innovation, but the appearance of the chambers so constructed fails to please; and the whimsical caprice of Osirei (about

B.C. 1385) also introduced an imitation of the arch in a temple at Abydos.

Ancient concave Roof.

In this building the roof is formed of single blocks of stone, reaching from one architrave to the other, which, instead of being placed in the usual manner, stand upon their edges, in order to allow room for hollowing out an arch in their thickness; but it has the effect of inconsistency, without the plea of advantage or utility. Another imitation of the arch occurs in a building at Thebes, constructed in the style of a tomb. The chambers lie under a friable rock, and are cased with masonry, to prevent the fall of its crumbling stone; but, instead of being roofed on the principle of the arch, they are covered with a number of large blocks, placed horizontally, one projecting beyond that immediately below it, till the uppermost two meet in the centre, the interior angles being afterward rounded off to form the appearance of a vault (fig. 1, above). The date of this building is about B.C. 1500, and consequently many years after the Egyptians had been acquainted with the art of vaulting (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 321). Thus, as the temple architecture of the Egyptians did not admit of arches, and as the temples are almost the only buildings that remain, it is not strange that arches have not oftener been found. The evidence offered by the paintings, the tombs, and the pyramids is conclusive for the existence and antiquity of arches and vaults of brick and stone; and if any remains of houses and palaces had now existed, there is little doubt that the arch would have been of frequent occurrence. We observe that Wilkinson, in portraying an Egyptian mansion (Anc. Egyptians, ii, 131), makes the grand entrance an archway. After this it seems unreasonable to doubt that the arch was known to the Hebrews also, and was employed in their buildings. Palestine was indeed better wooded than Egypt; but still that there was a deficiency of wood suitable for building and for roofs is shown by the fact that large importations of timber from the forests of Lebanon were necessary (2 Sam. vii, 2, 7; 1 Kings v, 6; 1 Chron. xxii, 4; 2 Chron. ii, 3; Ezra iii, 7; Cant. i, 17), and that this imported timber, although of no very high quality, was held in great estimation.—Kitto, s. v.

Mr. Layard found evident traces of the arch among the Assyrian ruins. He first discovered a small vaulted chamber, the roof of which was constructed of baked bricks placed sideways, one against another, in the usual manner of an arch (Nineveh, i, 38). He afterward came upon several vaulted drains beneath the palace of Nimroud, built of sun-dried bricks, and finally a perfect brick arch; showing the knowledge of this architectural element among the Assyrians at a very early date (Babylon and Nineveh, 2d ser. p. 163, 164). See ARCHITECTURE.

That the Greeks likewise understood the principle of the construction of the arch in very ancient times is evident from monuments as early as the Trojan war (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Arcus), a cut of one of which is subjoined.

Antique Arch in the Wall of Tyrus.

Triumphal arches were frequently erected by the Roman emperors to commemorate signal conquests, and several such are yet standing. The most noteworthy of these is that of Titus, on the interior of which are delineated the spoils of the Jewish temple.

Archæology (ἀρχαιολογία, the knowledge of antiquity, antiquarian lore). This word is used by different writers in three senses: 1st, as including all the elements of public and private life of ancient peoples, together with their language, history, and the geography of their lands; 2d, as embracing only a scientific knowledge of the material, and especially monumental remains of ancient civilizations (in this sense, see ANTIQUITIES); or, 3d, as synonymous with the history of the formative arts of the ancients (in this sense, see art. CHRISTIAN).

We use the word in the first or more general sense, omitting history and geography, however, from the definition. Sacred Archaeology naturally divides itself into (1st) Jewish and (2d) Christian.

1. Jewish.—This has been defined as the science that makes us acquainted with the physical nature and social condition of those countries where the Hebrew Scriptures originated and to which they relate (Gesenius, in the Hall. Encyclop. x, 74; comp. De Witte, Archæol. § 1). Some (as Jahn) regard it as including history and geography, but it is usually considered as embracing only such subjects as are involved in the science, art, and customs (political, social, and religious) of the nations of the Bible, especially the Jews (Hagenbach, Encycl. § 45; Schleiermacher, Darstell. d. theol. Studien, § 140). For the general history and the best treatises on the whole subject, see ANTIQUITIES; it is the object of the present article to indicate more in detail the principal original materials and sources of Biblical archaeology (comp. Rosenmüller, Alterthumsk. I, i, 6-130; Duncker, Gesch. d. Alterthums, Berl. 1852, 4 vols.).

1. Sources of archaeological knowledge.—a. REMAINS OF ANCIENT HEBREW ART. These are unfortunately few, and but imperfectly understood, and are confined almost entirely to Palestine. Many of the reputed monuments of Old Testament times owe their authority to mediæval (Mohammedan or Christian) tradition. A most important monument illustrating the Jewish service is the triumphal arch (q. v.) of Titus at Rome, containing in relief a delineation of the spoils of the Temple at Jerusalem (see Reland, De spol. templi Hieros. Traj. a. Rh. 1716, 2d ed. by Schulze, 1775). Besides these, the only genuine monuments in artistic relief are the Jewish "Samaritan" coins (q. v.), especially those of the Maccabees (see Bayer, De nummis Hebr. Samar. Valenc. 1784). The monumental remains of neighboring countries are also useful in the study of Jewish archaeology, especially the sculptures of Egypt (see Description de l'Égypte, Par. 1808; Rosellini, Monumenti d'Égypte, Padua, 1834; Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, Lond. 1847, N. Y. 1851; comp. Lane's Mod. Egyptians, Lond. 1842), the Phœnician inscriptions and coins (see Levy, Phœnische Studien, Breslau, 1856-62; Gesenius, Phœn. monumenta, Lips. 1837; also the numismatic works of Vaillant, Par. 1682; and Fröhlich, Vindob. 1744), the ruins and sculptures of Persepolis (see the Travels of Mr Porter, Chardin, and Ouseley) and Petra (see the Travels of Laborde and Olin), and the monuments of Nineveh and Babylon recently discovered by Botta and Layard. b. WRITTEN MEMORIALS.—The Bible itself stands first in value as the chief source of Jewish archaeology. Next are the works of Josephus and Philo, which are of great service; then follow the Talmuds (q. v.), and the Rabbins (q. v.), whose statements must be used carefully (see Meuschen's N. T. ex Talmud illustr. 1736; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. Cantab. 1658; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. 1733-1742; Weistein, Annot. in N. T. Amst. 1751). To these may be added notices respecting Egypt, Persia, Judea, etc., found occasionally in Greek and Roman writers, especially Herodotus (see Hupfeld, Erercit. Herod. i, ii); next, Xenophon, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pliny, Plutarch, Tacitus, Justinian, give illustrations of the customs of the times, particularly useful for the elucidation of the N. T., although they are very much given to misrepresentation of the Jews. c. ORIENTAL TREATISES, such as geographies and works on natural history, like those of Edrisi, Ibn Haukal, Albulfeid, Abdollatif, Avicenna; to which may be added the slight illustration to be derived from Eastern sacred books, such as the Koran, Zendavesta, Hamasa, and likewise the old historical and poetical productions of the East. d. TRAVELS in Oriental countries, particularly Egypt, Arabia, and Palestine, with itineraries, maps, and observations, from the 7th century, through the Middle Ages, down to modern times, constituting an immense fund of information, and affording reports not only on the geography, but also the natural history, and particularly the customs and social condition of the lands of the Bible, which have been proverbial for their uniformity. See a list of these at the end of the art. PALESTINE. The archaeological knowledge acquired by the Crusades may be found in the work of Bongarsius, entitled Gesta Dei per Francos (Hlanov. 1611); many of the early travels are collected in the Bewahrten Reichbuch d. heil. Landes (1609), the most valuable of which were published with notes by Paulus (Jena, 1792). For a fuller view of the literature of the subject, see Menses's Bibl. Hist. i, 2, p. 70; Winer's Handb. d. theol. Lit. i, 151, 3d ed.; and Ritter's Erdkunde, XV, 1.

2. Departments of Biblical Archaeology (see generally the extensive Bibl. Archæol. of Jahn, Wien, 1796-1805).—a. THE GEOGRAPHY of Bible lands, including not only Palestine and its immediate neighborhood, but also Egypt, the high interior of Asia, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, and to some extent Greece and Italy, with an elucidation of the ethnographical table in Gen. x (see Gesenius, in the Hall. Encyclop. x, 81 sq.). The most comprehensive work on this subject is that of Bochart, entitled Phaag. (Cadom, 1646, Frankf. 1674), with the supplement of Michaelis, entitled Spicilegium (Gött. 1780); to which may be added as an accompaniment Knobel's Wälkertafel (Giess. 1850). On Palestine and vicinity alone may be named, as well-nigh exhaustive of the ancient materials, Reland's Palaestina (Utrecht, 1614, etc.); the most convenient manual is Raumer's Palaestina (3d ed. Lpz. 1850; and the most complete and exact modern book of travels is Robinson's Researches (2d ed. N. Y. 1856). General works on the subject are especially Halesveldt's Bibl. Geographie (2d ed. Hamb. 1793-1796), Ritter's Erdkunde (Berl. 1817 sq.), and Robinson's Physical Geography of the Holy Land. The best maps are those of Berghaus (1835); Zimmermann (Berlin, 1830); Kiepert (Berlin, 1857); and Van de Velde (Gotha, 1859). b. ON THE NATURAL HISTORY of the Bible there are principally Scheuchzer's Physica Sacra (Augsb. 1731); Oeshmann's Fernsichte Samml. (Rost. 1786); Th. M. Harris, Natural Hist. of the Bible (Lond. 1824); J. B. Friedreich, Zur Bibel (Nurnberg, 1848); while on Biblical zoology and botany separately the only complete treatises are still respectively Bochart's Hierozoicon (Lond. 1663), and Celsius's Hierobotanicum (Upsala, 1745). On the DOMESTIC HABITS of the Hebrews may be named Selden, Uxor Ebr. (Lond. 1646); Michaelis, Ehegesetz Moses (Götting. 1786); Benary, De Hebr. cirrute (Berl. 1835); Schröder, De vestitu mulier. Hebr. (Leyd. 1745); Hartmann, Hebrærica am Putische (Amst. 1809). d. ON BIBLICAL AGRICULTURE, Paulsen, Ackerbau d. Morgenländer (Helmst. 1748); and the two prize essays by Buhle and Walch, Calendarium Palest. (Gött. 1785). e. THE SOCIAL RELATIONS of the Hebrews are treated in works on their political and judicial institutions, especially Michaelis, Mos. Recht. (Erfkt. 1775-1780); Hüllmann, Staatsverfassung d. Isr. (Lpz. 1834); Selden, De jure naturali (Lond. 1640); Saalschütz, Das Mos. Recht (Berlin, 1846-48, 2 vols.). f. ON JEWISH and the connected WEIGHTS and MEASURES may be especially consulted Böckh, Metrolog. Untersuch. (Berl. 1838); Bertheau, Gesch. d. Isr. (Gött. 1842). g. THE HEBREW ARTS have been specially treated, as to Poetry, by Louth, De sacra poesi Hebr. (ed. Michaelis, 1768, and Rosenmüller, 1815); Herder, Geist. d. heb. Poesie (1782); E. Meier, Form d. heb. Poesie (Tub. 1853), and Gesch. d. poet. Nat.-Literatur der Hebræer (Leipz. 1856); Saalschütz, Form u. Geist der heb. Poesie (Koenigsberg, 1856); as to Music, by Saalschütz, Gesch. d. Musik bei d. Hebr. (Berl. 1829); Schneider, Darstell. d. heb. Musik (Bonn); Weissman, Geschichte der Musik (Munich, 1862; still going on); as to Architecture, by Hist., Der Tempel Salomo's (Berl. 1809). h. THE RELIGIOUS USAGES of the Hebrews, including the moral condition of surrounding nations, have been specially treated by Spencer, De legibus Hebr. ritualibus (Camb. 1685); Reland, Antiq. sacræ vet. Hebr. (Utrecht, 1708, etc.); Vitringa, De Synagog. vet. (Frankf. 1696); and, as exhibiting more modern views, Bähr, Symbolik d. Mos. Cultus (Heidelb. 1837). The foregoing are but a few leading works; for others, see each subject in its alphabetical place.—Herzog, Real-Encycl. s. v.

II. Christian Archaeology is that branch of theological science the object of which is to represent the external phenomena of the ancient Church, i. e. its institutions, usages, ceremonies, etc. Theologians are not yet agreed how far the period of the ancient Church ought to be extended, and what matter, consequently, Christian archaeology ought to comprise. The prevailing opinion at present is that it ought mainly to extend over the first six centuries, and ought not to include the constitution of the Church. It is also generally agreed that, in representing the external forms of the ancient Church, the subsequent developments of these forms up to the present times ought to be constantly kept in view and referred to.

1. Sources of Christian archaeological Knowledge: (a) Remains.—The first class of sources consists of ancient remains, such as monuments, works of art [see ART, CHRISTIAN], inscriptions (q. v.), and designs on tombs, arches, buildings, and other monuments; medals and coins (q. v.); catacombs (q. v.) and other places of burial (q. v.). (b) WRITTEN MEMORIALS.—The New Testament, of course, gives the beginnings of the most important Christian usages, such as Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Ordination, Prayer, etc. Next in importance come the writings of the apostolical fathers (q. v.), and of contemporaneous pagan writers, e. g. Pliny, Tacitus, Celsus, Julian, etc. After these come the fathers (q. v.) generally, and at a later period, liturgies, decrees of councils, etc.

2. Christian archaeology, as a science, cannot be said to have fairly arisen before the 18th century. Nevertheless, in the struggles of the Reformation, both parties appealed to primitive usage, and this appeal made the study of antiquities a necessity. The church historians, therefore (the Magdeburg centuriators, 1559-1574, 13 vols. fol., on the Protestant side, and Baronius [+ 1607], in his Annales Ecclesiastici, on the Roman Catholic side), treated of the polity, worship, usages, etc., of the ancient Church. As early as 1645 Casalius wrote his Christianorum Ritus Veteres (Roman Catholic), who was followed by Cardinal Bona (+ 1694), Claude Fleury (1682), and by Edm. Martène, whose work De antiquis ecclesie ritibus (Antw. 1736-38, 4 vols. fol.) belongs among the best of the ancient works. But the science, in its modern form, may be said to have originated with Bingham's massive work, the Origines Ecclesiasticæ, which first appeared in 10 vols. 8vo, 1719-1722. It is divided into twenty-three books, of which the titles are, I. Names and Orders of Men in the Early Church; II. Superior Orders of Clergy; III. Inferior Orders of Clergy; IV. Elections and Ordinations of Clergy; V. Privileges, Immunities, and Revenues of Clergy; VI. Rules of Life for Clergy; VII. Ascetics; VIII. Church Edifices, etc.; IX. Geographical Divisions of the Ancient Church; X. Catechumens and Creeds; XI. Rites of Baptism; XII. Confirmation and other Ceremonies following Baptism; XIII. Divine Worship; XIV. Catechumen Service; XV. Communion Service; XVI. Unity and Discipline of the Ancient Church; XVII. Discipline of the Clergy; XVIII. Penitents and Penance; XIX. Absolution; XX. Festivals; XXI. Fasts; XXII. Marriage Rites; XXIII. Funeral Rites. This vast work, the product of twenty years of industry, is full of erudition, especially patristical, and the material is set forth generally with simplicity and discretion. It is a store-house from which all subsequent writers have drawn copiously. But it lacks scientific method, and has the disadvantage of a High-Church stand-point. It is a great arsenal for the upholders of prelacy; the true organization of the original church is not to be gathered from it. But, with all its faults, it is still indispensable to the student of archaeology. It was translated into Latin, and the originals of the quotations added, by Grischovius (Hale, 1724-29, 10 vols. fol.; and again in 1751). The best English edition now extant is that of Pitman, which contains Bingham's other writings as well as the Origines (Lond. 1840, 9 vols. 8vo). A cheap and good edition of the Origines for students is that of Bohn (London, 1852, 2 vols. imp. 8vo).

3. At the request of Pope Benedict XIV, the Dominican Marnæi composed his work Originum et Antiquitatum Christianarum libri xx (Rom. 1749-1755). But of the twenty books into which the matter was to be divided only four appeared in five volumes. Shorter works were published by Selvaggio, Antiquitatum Christianarum institutiones (Naples, 1772-1774, 6 vols.), and by the German Jesuit Mannhart, Liber Singularis de antiquit. Christianarum (Augsb. 1768). Better than any preceding work by Roman Catholic authors was that of Pellicia, De Christianæ ecclesiæ primæ mediæ et novissimæ ætatis pulchra (Naples, 1777-1779, 3 vols. 4to; last edition by Ritter and Braun, Cologne, 1829-1838, 3 vols.). On the basis of this work Dr. Binterim compiled his Denkwürdigkeiten der christkatholischen Kirche aus den ersten, mittleren und letzten Zeiten (Mentz, 1821-1841, 7 vols.).

4. Of recent works on Christian archaeology, the most extensive is Augusti's Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archaeologie (Leipzig, 1816-31, 12 vols.). This work adds immensely to the stock of materials, but is very prolix, and also deficient in arrangement. These faults are mended somewhat by the author in his compendium, entitled Handbuch der christl. Archæologie (Leipzig, 1836, 3 vols. 8vo). A scientific and condensed treatise is Rheinwald's Kirchliche Archæologie (Berlin, 1850, 8vo), the best hand-book on the subject extant. Böhmner's christl. k'rrchl. Alterthumswissenschaft (Breslau, 1826-39, 2 vols. 8vo) is equally scientific, and more copious. Guericke's Lehrbuch der christl. Archæologie (Leipzig, 1847, 8vo; 2d ed. 1859) is a useful manual. Other German manuals are by Locherer (Rom. Cath.), Lehrbuch d. christl.-kirchl. Archæol. (Frankf. 1822); Siegel, Handbuch der christl. Alterthümer (in alphabetical order, Leipzig, 1835-38, 4 vols.). In English we have Henry's Compendium of Christian Antiquities (Philad. 1837, 8vo), which is chiefly extracted from Bingham; Riddle's Manual of Christian Antiquities (2d edit. London, 1843, 8vo), in which large use is made of Augusti. But the best modern manual in English is Coleman's Ancient Christianity Exemplified (Philad. 1853, 8vo), in which the material is carefully wrought over in a truly Protestant spirit. See Haazebach, Theolog. Encyclopædie, § 77; Coleman, Christian Antiquities (Introduction); Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, i, 481; Riddle, Manual of Antiquities (Appendix II). For works treating more particularly of liturgies, see LITURGY.

Archangel (ἀρχαγγέλος, chief angel, 1 Thess. iv, 16; Jude 9). Those angels are so styled who occupy the highest rank in the celestial order or hierarchy, which consists, according to the apostles, of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers" (Ephes. i, 21; Col. i, 16; 1 Peter iii, 22). Of these there are said to be seven, who stand immediately before the throne of God (Luke i, 19; Rev. viii, 2), who have authority over other angels, and are the patrons of particular nations (1 Rev. xii, 7; Dan. x, 13). In Matt. xxvi, 53; 2 Thess. i, 7, hosts of angels are spoken of in the same manner as human armies. These the Almighty is said to employ in executing his commands, or in displaying his dignity and majesty, in the manner of human princes. These armies of angels are also represented as divided into orders and classes, having each its leader, and all these are subject to one chief, or archangel. The names of two only are found in the Scripture—Michael, the patron of the Jewish nation (Dan. x, 13, 21; xii, 1; Jude 9; Rev. xii, 7); and Gabriel (Dan. viii, 16; ix, 21; Luke i, 19, 26). The apocryphal book of Tobit (iii, 17; v, 4) mentions one, Raphael; and 2 Esdras (iv, 34) another, Uriel; while the book of Enoch names the whole seven (xx, 1-7). See ANGEL.

The fathers are not agreed on the number and order of the celestial hierarchy. Dionysius the Areopagite admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels in each hierarchy. In the first are Seraphim, Cherubim, and thrones; in the second, dominions, might, and powers; in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. These titles of ranks are probably allusions to the customary order of the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian kings; hence Michael the archangel tells Daniel that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty. Extraordinary powers and functions were conferred on angels by the different Gnostic sects. They all held that angels were the fabricators or architects of the universe, and Cerinthus affirmed they were superior to Christ himself. These opinions were early entertained, and the Apostle Paul thought it necessary to warn the Colossians against such errors. "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind" (Col. ii, 18). They also affirmed, according to Theodoret, that the law was given by angels, and that no one had access to God except through them. Hence we find on the Gnostic gems the names of numbers of their angels; on one are those of Michael, Gabriel, Uriel, Raphael, Ananael, Proserael, and Chalsael. But the chief and most highly venerated was Michael, inasmuch that oratories were erected in Asia Minor, where divine honors were paid to him. See MICHAEL.

Archbishop (ἀρχιεπίσκοπος), chief of the clergy of a whole province.

I. Epiphanius (Har. 68) speaks of Alexander of Alexandria, who lived about 320, as archbishop of that see, and this is the first mention of that title on record; nor is at all clear whether Epiphanius in that passage is not rather speaking after the custom of his own time, than intending to assert that Alexander bore the title of archbishop; for the titles of pope and bishop are given to this Alexander in a letter of Arius addressed to him. Be this as it may, Alexandria was the first see which assumed the title, which, however, was at first thought to savor too much of pride; for in the twenty-sixth canon of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 297, at which Augustine was present, it was ordered to be laid aside, and the ancient style of "bishop of the first see" used instead. This impression appears not to have worn out until the Council of Ephesus, where the title of archbishop was attributed to the bishops of the first three sees of the world, viz. Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, as well as to John of Antioch, and Memnon of Ephesus. In process of time, when the bishops of the great sees assumed the higher title of patriarch, that of archbishop became gradually to be applied to those metropolitans who had other metropolitans under them, i. e. to those whom the Greeks called caesars, and the Latins, in the middle and subsequent ages, primates. The archbishop differed from the metropolitan in the Eastern Church in that the former had only some privileges of honor and respect above the other bishops, whereas the metropolitans had jurisdiction over the bishops of their provinces (London, Ecol. Diet. s. v.).

II. In the Roman Church archbishops have a twofold character and authority: (1) Episcopal charge of their own dioceses; (2) Superintendence, to a certain extent, of all the bishops (not except) in their province. Their jurisdiction includes (a) the power to call synods (Conc. Trident. sess. xxiv, c. 2); (b) the right of visitation, on call of a provincial synod (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv, c. 3). They rank in the hierarchy next to cardinals and patriarchs. They must receive the palium (q. v.) from the pope before exercising their functions. A full account may be found in Thomas-sin, ret. ac. nov. Ecol. disciplina, etc., pt. i, lib. i, caps. 68, 69.

The number of archbishops in authority was, in 1865, as follows: In Europe (Roman Catholic), 112; viz. Italy, 47; Austria, 16; France, 17; Spain, 9; Turkey, 4; Ireland, 4; Portugal, 2; Prussia, Bavaria, Russia (counting in Poles, which exists only by name), Greece (inclusive of the Ionian Islands), 2 each; Belgium, Holland, England, Baden, Poland, Malta, 1 each. In Asia, 12; viz. Turkey, 10; Spanish possessions, 1; Portuguese possessions, 1. In Africa, 1; viz. Alger. In America, 22; viz. United States, 7; British possessions, 3; Mexico, Spanish possessions, Central America, United States of Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Brazil, Bolivia, Peru, Chili, Dominican Republic, and Hayti, each 1. In Australia, 1. Fourteen (in Turkey, Russia, and Austria) belong to the United Greek, Armenian, Syrian, Maronite, Chaldean (q. v.) rites. There are also some archbishops "in partibus infidelium," who are, of course, not included in the above list. Also the patriarchs (q. v.), though they exercise archiepiscopal rights, have been excluded from this list. The Jansenists (q. v.) in Holland have still one archbishop at Utrecht. We give a list of archbishops in our articles on the various countries.

In the United States there were, in 1865, seven provinces of the Roman Catholic Church, viz. Baltimore, Alb. Spaulding; New Orleans, Alb. Odin (died 1860); New York, Alb. McCloskey; Cincinnati, Alb. Purcell; St. Louis, Alb. Kenrick; Oregon, Alb. Blanchet; San Francisco, Alb. Almany. In the year 1828 Pope Leo XII appointed, after much delay, an archbishop in Colombia, whom Bolivar had proposed.

III. In all the Eastern Churches the difference between archbishops and bishops is less marked than in the Roman Catholic Church. The Greek Church of Turkey has four patriarchs, independent archbishops of Cyprus, Mount Sinai, and Montenegro, and several archbishops or metropolitans in the patriarchate of Constantinople. In Russia, in 1865, 25 prelates had the title archbishop; in Greece, 12; in Austria, 2. With regard to the other Eastern Churches, compare the articles Armenians, Nestorians, Jacobites, Copts, Abyssinian Church.

IV. In Protestant countries, archbishops are found in Finland (Russia), 1; Sweden, 1; England, 2; and Ireland, 2. Bede assigns the first establishment of archbishops in England to the time of Lucius, said to be the first Christian king of England, who, after the conversion of his subjects, erected three archbishoprics, viz. London, York, and Llandaff (Caerleon). The dignity of archbishop continued in the see of London one hundred and eighty years, and was then, in the time of the Saxons, transferred to Canterbury. Augustin, the monk who was sent by Pope Gregory to convert the English nation, in the reign of Ethelbert, king of Kent, was the first bishop of Canterbury; but Theodore, the sixth in succession after him, was the first archbishop of that see. The archbishop of Canterbury had anciently the primacy, not only over England, but Ireland also, and all the bishops of the latter were consecrated by him. He was styled by Pope Urban II Alterius Orbis Papa; he had a perpetual legate power annexed to his archbishopric; he had some marks of royalty, such as the power of coining money, etc. Since the Reformation he is styled Primate and Metropolitan of all England. Archbishop Cranmer was the first who bore this title. As to precedence, there have been many contests about it, as also about the oath of canonical obedience between the two archiepiscopal sees. Some antiquarians will have it that the archbishop of York was originally primate of the British Church; for London never was a Roman colony, or the seat of the Roman emperors, as York was, where both Severus and Constantius Chlorus lived and died, and where Constantine the Great was born; and from hence they infer that where the emperors resided was the most likely place to have pre-eminence above the rest. However it be, in the reign of Henry I, William Corbel, archbishop of Canterbury, obtained from the pope the character of legate, by which he secured to himself a superiority over the see of York, which he visited jure legationis. But after his death the contest still continued; for we find that in the reign of Henry II, a synod being called at Westminster by the pope's legate, the archbishop of Canterbury coming first, seated himself at the right hand of the legate; but York, coming afterward, refused to take the seat on the left hand, and demanded Canterbury's place, which the latter refusing, York sat down in his lap. This occasioned the synod to break up in disorder, and both parties appealing to the pope, the contest was decided in favor of the see of Canterbury, which enjoys the precedence to this day. The privileges of the archbishop of Canterbury are, among others, to crown the kings of England; to have prelates for his officers—as the bishop of London his provincial dean; the bishop of Winchester his chancellor; the bishop of Lincoln his vice-chancellor; the bishop of Salisbury his precentor; the bishop of Worcester his chaplain; and the bishop of Rochester his cross-bearer, which last office, since the times of popery, has ceased. He is also the first peer of England next to the royal family. The archbishop of Canterbury has the supreme government of ecclesiastical matters next under the king. Upon the death of any suffragan bishop, the custody of his see devolves upon the archbishop. He has the power of censuring any bishop in his province; he has an ancient right to preside in all provincial councils of his suffragans, which formerly were held once a year, but have been discontinued a long time; so that his power of examining things throughout his province is devolved to the courts, of which he holds several—as the Court of Arches, Prerogative Court, Court of Peculiars, etc., and he has the probate of wills. As to the archbishop of York, he is now styled Primate and Metropolitan of England, and takes place of all peers except the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord chancellor. The province of the archbishop of York consists of the six northern counties, with Cheshire and Nottinghamshire. The rest of England and Wales form the province of the archbishop of Canterbury. The dioceses of the two archbishops—that is to say, the districts in which they exercise ordinary episcopal functions—were remodelled by 6 and 7 William IV, c. 77. The diocese of Canterbury comprises Kent, except the city and deanery of Rochester, and some parishes transferred by this act; a number of parishes in Sussex called "peculiarities;" with small districts in other dioceses, particularly London. The diocese of the archbishop of York embraces the county of York, except that portion of it now included in the dioceses of Ripon and Manchester, the whole county of Nottingham, and some other detached districts. Scotland, while episcopacy prevailed in that country, had two archbishops—of St. Andrew's and Glasgow—the former of whom was Primate of all Scotland. Wales likewise anciently boasted of an archbishop, whose see (as has been observed) was established at Caerleon, and was afterward translated to St. David's. But the plague raging very much in that country, the archiepiscopal see was again removed to Doll, in Bretagne, where this dignity ended; notwithstanding which, in after ages, the Britons, or Welsh, commenced an action on that account against the archbishop of Canterbury, but were cast. In Ireland there are two Protestant and four Roman Catholic archbishops. Of the former, the archbishop of Armagh is Primate of all Ireland, the archbishop of Dublin being Primate of Ireland. They sit alternately in the House of Lords; the three bishops who, along with them, represent the Church of Ireland, being also chosen by rotation from the whole body. Previous to the creation of an archbishopric in Ireland, the authority of the archbishop of Canterbury extended to that island. The amount of control which belongs to an archbishop over the bishops of his province is not very accurately defined; but if any bishop introduces irregularities into his diocese, or is guilty of immorality, the archbishop may call him to account, and even deprive him. In 1822, the archbishop of Armagh, who is primate of all Ireland, deposed the bishop of Clogher on the latter ground. To the archbishop of Canterbury belongs the honor of placing the crown on the sovereign's head at his coronation; and the archbishop of York claims the like privilege in the case of the queen-consort, whose perpetual chaplain he is.

The Episcopal Church of Scotland has at present no archbishop, but the presiding bishop has the title of primate, or metropolitan. In the English colonies, the bishops of Calcutta, Sydney, New Zealand, Montreal, Capetown, each of whom presides over an ecclesiastical province (a number of dioceses), have the title METROPOLITAN. See METROPOLITAN.

The election of an archbishop does not differ from that of a bishop [see BISHOP]; but when he is invested with his office he is said to be "enthroned," whereas a bishop is "consecrated." He also writes himself "by divine providence," a bishop being "by divine permission;" and has the title of "Grace" and "Most Reverend Father in God," while a bishop is styled "Lord" and "Right Reverend Father in God." The archbishop is entitled to present to all ecclesiastical livings in the disposal of diocesan bishops if not filled up within six months; and every bishop, whether created or translated, is bound to make a legal conveyance to the archbishop of the next avoidance of one such dignity or benefice belonging to his see as the archbishop shall choose. This is called the archbishop's option. See BISHOP; EPISCOPACY. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. 17; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. viii, § 4.

V. In the Protestant churches of Germany the title archbishop is not customary, yet it was conferred, on April 19, 1829, by order of the king of Prussia, on the superintendent general of the province of Prussia, Borowski, with the declaration, "Why should not the highest dignitaries of our evangelical church have the same claim to this dignity as the clergymen of several other evangelical countries, in which it has been preserved without interruption?" See Nicolovius, Die bischöfl. Würde in Preussens evangel. Kirche (Koenigsberg, 1834).

On the Roman Catholic archbishops, see Helfert, Von den Rechten und Pflichten der Bischöfe (Prague, 1832); and Mast, Dogmat. histor. Abhandlung über die rechtliche Stellung der Erzbischöfe (Freiburg, 1847). A list of all archbishoprics, with their suffragans, throughout the world, will be given in an APPENDIX.—Hook, Church Dict. s. v.; Chambers's Encyclopædia, s. v.

Archdall, MERVYN, a learned clergyman and antiquary of the Protestant Church of Ireland, was born at Dublin in 1723, filled several ecclesiastical posts, and finally became rector of Slane, in the county of Meath. He died in 1791. After forty years of intense application to the monastic records of Ireland, he published, in 1786, Monasticon Hibernicum; a History of the Abbeys, Priors, and Religious Houses of Ireland—Gentleman's Magazine, xi, 780; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 67.

Archdeacon (chief of the deacons), an ecclesiastical officer whose duty originally consisted chiefly in superintending the temporal affairs of the church.

1. The office was one of great honor in the early church; but how it grew into such importance is matter of dispute. "The antiquity of this office is held to be so high by many Roman Catholic writers that they derive its origin from the appointment of the seven deacons, and suppose that St. Stephen was the first archdeacon; but there is no authority to warrant this conclusion. Mention is also made of Laurentius, archdeacon of Rome, who suffered A.D. 200; but, although he was called archdeacon (according to Prudentius), he was no more than the principal man of the seven deacons who stood at the altar. 'Ille primus et septem viris qui stant ad aram proximi' (Prudent. Hymn. de St. Steph.). Jerome says 'that the archdeacon was chosen out of the deacons, and was the principal deacon in every church, just as the archpresbyter was the principal presbyter.' But even in Jerome's time the office of archdeacon had certainly grown to great importance" (Hook, s. v.). It was usual for one of the deacons to stand by the bishop at the altar, while the other deacons discharged their duty in the assembly. This deacon was called primus, primicerius diaconum, the first or chief deacon; and he was usually the bishop's man of business. Jerome speaks of the archdeacon as necessary to ecclesiastical order in his epistle ad Rusticum; and Optatus, bishop of Milevi, says that it was the rebuke of the archdeacon Cécilianus to Lucilla which caused eventually the Donatist schism. It is probable that, at first, the deacon senior both in years and office was elevated to the rank of archdeacon; but as the office increased in importance, it became necessary to elect the most able and proper person to discharge the duties. Athanasius was made archdeacon while he was yet a young man. This mode of election to office did not, however, prevail universally; for in some places the choice rested solely with the bishop; and when the relation of bishop and archdeacon became very intimate, and the latter was of special importance to his superior in the discharge of his episcopal functions, it was natural that the bishop should have considerable influence in his appointment. The powers of the archdeacons were extensive and influential. They had charge of the instruction and education of the younger clerks, were overseers over the deacons, superintended the support of the poor, and assisted the bishops in matters of administration and jurisdiction. Without his certificate no one was admitted to the orders, and frequently he represented the bishop at synods. Still greater became his powers in the sixth century, when he even received punitive power over the priests, and a rank above all the priests, even the archpriest. This is clearly stated by Isidor of Sevilla, who, in his Epistola ad Euarium, plainly says: The archpriest must know that he is subordinate to the archdeacon, and must obey his orders, as well as those of his bishop (archipresbyter vero se esse sub archidiacono, ejus preceptis sicut episcopi sui sciri debere). Until the eighth century every diocese had only one archdeacon, but in 774, Bishop Heddo, of Strasburg, divided his diocese into seven archidiaconates (archidiaconatus rurales), and most of the other bishops imitated this institution, with the exception of Italy, where the smallness of the diocese seemed to make a division of the dioceses superfluous. The "rural archdeacons," to whom the deans (archipresbyteri rurales) were subordinate, were mostly priests, while the archdeacon of the cathedral church (archidiaconus metropolitani) was usually only a deacon. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the powers of the archdeacons reached their climax. They received a jurisdiction of their own (jurisdictio propria), suspended and excommunicated priests, held synods, and in many ways tried to enlarge their rights at the expense of the bishops. As the position had now become a very lucrative one, many members of noble, princely, and even royal families intruded themselves into it, even without having received the ordination of deacons. In many instances their powers even le-came dangerous to the bishops, and thus a reaction was called forth. Many of the synods of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as those of Tours (1230), Liege (1287), Mentz (1310), took from them some of their powers, reserving them to the bishop and his vicar-general. This limitation of their powers was confirmed by the Council of Trent. Many of the archidiaconates had already disappeared before the latter synod, and in many others this was the case in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. At some cathedral churches the office of archdeacon still exists, but the former rights are no longer connected with it.

In the Greek Church the office of rural archdeacon never existed; the office of cathedral archdeacon was early displaced by the chartophylax, and even the title of archdeacon early disappeared. In Constantinople the title was retained, but the archdeacon was an officer of the court, not of the cathedral church.

In some of the Protestant state churches of Germany the title archdeacon has been retained for the head ministers of ecclesiastical districts.

2. In the Church of England there are 71 archdeacons—several in each diocese. The archdeacon is a clergyman of the cathedral, and as the income of the office is limited, he generally holds a benefice besides. He is appointed by the bishop, and is himself a sort of vice-bishop. He has the right of visitation every two years in three, to inquire into the reparations and morals belonging to churches; to reform abuses; to suspend; excommunicate; in some places to prove wills; and to induct all clerks into benefices within his jurisdictions. He has power to keep a court, which is called the Court of the Archdeacon, or his commissary, and this he may hold in any place within his archdeaconry. In this court the church-warden's business is generally decided. The revenue of the archdeacon arises chiefly from pensions paid by the incumbents. These pensions originally bore no contemptible ratio to the whole value of the benefice, and formed a sufficient income for an active and useful officer of the church; but now, by the great change which has taken place in the value of money, the payments are little more than nominal, and the whole income of the archdeacons is very inconsiderable. The office, therefore, is generally held by persons who have also benefices or other preferment in the church. See Cripps, Law Relating to the Church and Clergy (Edinb. 1859).—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. xxi; Marsden, Churches and Sects, i, 320.

Archelâis (Ἀρχελαΐς), a city built by Archelaus, after whom it was named (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 13, 1). It was situated in the plain of the Jordan, near Jericho and Phasaclis (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 2). In the Putinger Table (p. 434) it is placed twelve miles from Jericho toward Scythopolis. Ptolemy reckons it among the cities of Judea (see Reland, Palest. p. 462; comp. p. 576), and Pliny (xiii, 4) speaks of it as a valley near Phasaclis and Livias. Antiochus is named in the Latin version of acts of the council of Chalcedon as bishop of Archelais in Palestine (Acta concilii generalis, iv, 80); but the Greek copies read Arce (Ἄρκε), which likewise occurs in other notices (ib. iv, 327), as also the name Alcemon (Ἀλκίμων, ib. iv, 460). Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 287) coincides in Schulze's identification of the site with the ruins el-Basalyeh, at the south base of a hill in the lower section of Wady Fariah.

Archela'us (Ἀρχελαός, ruler of the people, Talmud אֲרֵחֵלָאָס), son of Herod the Great by Malthea, a Samaritan woman (Josephus, Ant. xvii, i, 3; War. i, 28, 4), and brought up, with his brother Antipas, at Rome (Joseph. War. i, 31, 1). He inherited of his father's dominions (B.C. 4) Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, with the important cities Cæsarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, and a yearly income of 600 talents, as ethnarch (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 11, 4; called king, βασιλεύς, in Matt. ii, 22, in the sense of "prince," "regent;" comp. the commentators in loc.). His reign had commenced inauspiciously; for, after the death of Herod, and before Archelaus could go to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will, the Jews having become very tumultuous at the Temple in consequence of his refusing some demands, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack them, on which occasion upward of three thousand were slain (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 9, 3; War. ii, 1, 3). On Archelaus going to Rome to solicit the royal dignity (agreeably to the practice of the tributary kings of that age, who received their crowns from the Roman emperor), the Jews sent an embassy, consisting of fifty of their principal men, with a petition to Augustus that they might be permitted to live according to their own laws, under a Roman governor, and also complaining of his cruelty (Josephus, War. ii, 2-7). To this circumstance our Lord perhaps alludes in the parable related by Luke (xix, 12-27): "A certain nobleman (ὄψωνος, a man of birth or rank, the son of Herod) went into a far country (Italy), to receive for himself a kingdom (Judæa), and to return. But his citizens (the Jews) hated him, and sent a message (or embassy) after him (to Augustus Cæsar), saying, 'We will not have this man to reign over us.'" The Jews, however, failed in this remonstrance (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 11, 4). Archelaus returned to Judæa, and under pretence that he had countenanced the seditious against him, he deprived Joazar of the high-priesthood, and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judæa with so much violence that, in the tenth (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 2; comp. Life. 1) or ninth (Joseph. War. ii, 7, 3) year of his reign (according to Dio Cass. lx, 27, under the consulate of M. Æm. Lepidus and L. Aruntius, corresponding to A.D. 6), on account of his tyranny, especially toward the Samaritans, he was dethroned, deprived of his property, and banished to Vienna in Gaul (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 2), where he died (the year is unknown; Jerome, Onomat. s. v. Bethlehem, asserts that his grave was shown in this latter place, in which case he must have returned to Palestine as a private person). The parents of our Lord turned aside from fear of him on their way back from Egypt, and went to Nazareth in Galilee, in the domain of his gentler brother Antipas (Matt. ii, 22). He seems to have been guilty of great inhumanity and oppression. This cruelty was exercised not only toward Jews, but toward Samaritans also (Josephus, War. ii, 7, 3). He had illegally married Glaphyra, the wife of his brother Alexander, during the lifetime of the latter, who left several children by her (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 1).—Noldii Hist. Idum. p. 219 sq.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See HEROD.

Archeläus is also the name of several other persons mentioned by Josephus.

1. The last of the kings of Cappadocia by that name, who received the throne (B.C. 34) from Marc Antony, and was afterward held in great esteem by Augustus and the succeeding emperors, but at length fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, and died at Rome, A.D. 17. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) He was on intimate terms with Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 10, 6, 7), whose son Alexander married his daughter Glaphyra (ib. 8, 6), and his intervention was of service in reconciling Herod with his sons and brother (ib. 4, 6; War. i, 25). See ALEXANDER.

Coin of Archelaus of Cappadocia; the Reverse bearing a club and the inscription in Greek, "Of King Archelaus, Philopatris, the Founder" (i. e. of Eleusa).

2. Julius Archelaus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus and grandson of Chelcias; he espoused Mariamne, the young daughter of Herod Agrippa I, while yet a girl of ten years; but before she became marriageable she was shamefully deflowered by the soldiery (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 1).

3. Son of Magadotus, and one of the deserters to the Romans during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War. vi, 4, 2).

Archeläus, bishop of Carrha in Mesopotamia, A.D. 278, held a public dispute with a heretic, Manes, an account of which he published in Syriae, soon translated into Greek and Latin (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 22; Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 72). The Lat. version has been printed by Zaccagnius (Collect. Mon. Vt. Rome, 1698) and Fabricius (in his ed. of Hippolytus).

Archeläus, a bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who wrote a work against the heresy of the Messalians (A.D. 440), which is referred to by Photius (Cod. 52).—Cave, Hist. Lit. s. an.

the frequent appearance of combatants armed with bows and arrows on the Egyptian monuments (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i, 337, 354, 405) and Babylonish sculptures (see Layard's Nineveh, ii, 261), we may conclude that this art is of very high antiquity (see Jahn's Archäol. § 278). In Gen. xxi, 20, Ishmael is spoken of as an archer, and again in Gen. xxvii. 3, but with reference to hunting rather than to war; and this appears to have been long the case with the Israelites, though the neighboring nations employed it for military purposes. See ARMOI. Saul, we read (1 Sam. xxxi. 3), was wounded by the Philistine archers, and it has been conjectured that it was the unskillfulness of the Israelites with this weapon which led David, while lamenting the death of the king and his sons, to give directions for "teaching the children of Judah the use of the bow" (2 Sam. i. 18). See BOW. If such were the case, his efforts were successful, for, after this period, from its frequent mention in the Holy Scriptures, archery would appear to have been considered as of great importance, so much so that "breaking the bow" is a phrase often employed by the sacred writers for taking away one's power (Hos. i. 5; Jer. xlix. 35), while "strengthening the bow" was a symbol of the increase of influence (Gen. xlix. 24). The Persians were famous among the ancients for their archers (Isa. xlii. 18; Jer. xlix. 35; 1, 1-42). See BOWMAN.

Arches, COURT OF. This court, which subsisted in England before the time of Henry II, is a court of appeal, belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury; the judge is called the dean of arches, because he anciently held his court in the church of St. Mary-le-bow (Sancta Maria de Arenbus). The spiritual courts are now held at Doctors' Commons.

Ar'chevite (Chald. only in the plur. emphatic, Archevay', אַרְכֵיבַיִת; Sept. Ἀρχεβαῖοι), one of the nations transplanted by the Assyrians in place of the captive Samaritans, and who joined afterward in opposing the returned Jews (Ezra iv. 9), probably inhabitants of the city LELEU (q. v.), mentioned (Gen. x. 10) as an early settlement of Nimrod.

Ar'chi (Heb. Arki', אַרְכִי; Sept. combines with the following word, Ἀρχιαρχαῖος; Vulg. Archi Ataroth); but the Heb. has no connective between the words, where the Auth. Vers. has prob. supplied the best relation "to"), a city or place on the boundary of Benjamin and Ephraim, between Bethel and Ataroth (Josh. xvi. 2); supposed by some to be the region of Ibn-Zeid (Keil, Comment. in loc.), which, however, is too far north [see ATAROTH], and rather to be sought in the valley west of Bethel, perhaps at the ruined site called Kefr Musr. See TRIBE. It appears to designate (collectively used) a clan inhabiting a district called Erech (different, of course, from that in Babylonia, Gen. x. 10), elsewhere named only as the residence of Hushai the Archite (Heb. Arki', אַרְכִי; Sept. Ἀρχί v. r. Ἀρχαί), one of those who adhered to David during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xv. 32; xvi. 16). See ARCHITE.

Archiepellānus, i. e. Archchaplain, was the title of the highest dignitary in the old Frankish empire. His duty was to make a report to the king on all ecclesiastical matters which were brought before the government. Generally an archbishop was charged with this office, and gradually it became connected with certain archiepiscopal sees. The office became extinct after a few centuries, and for the discharge of its duties electoynarii or annoniers were instituted in the thirteenth century.

Archièreus (ἀρχιερέυς), a name denoting "high-priest," and used in the Greek Church for the higher clergy above the rank of presbyter, like the Latin term PRELATE.

Archimandrite (ἀρχων τῆς μάνδρας), the name given in the Greek Church to the head of a monastery, and is equivalent to "abbot." It has also been applied to all ecclesiastical superiors, and even in the Latin Church there have been examples of archbishops being styled archimandrites.

Archip'pus (Ἀρχιππος, "master of the horse"), a Christian minister, whom the Apostle Paul calls his "fellow-soldier" (Philem. 2), and whom he exhorts to renewed activity (Col. iv. 17), A. D. 57. As the former epistle, which concerns a private matter, is addressed to him jointly with Philemon and Apphia, and as "the Church in their house" is also addressed, it seems necessary to infer that he was a member of Philemon's family. From the latter reference (so Jerome, Theodoret, and Eusebius) it would seem that Archippus had exercised the office of evangelist sometimes at Ephesus, sometimes elsewhere (at Laodicea, according to the Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 36), and that he finally resided at Colosse, and there discharged the office of presiding presbyter or bishop when Paul wrote to the Colossian Church (see Dietelmaier, De Archippo, Altdorf, 1751). The exhortation given to him in this epistle has, without sufficient grounds, been construed into a rebuke for past negligence. Tradition states that he had been one of Jesus's 70 disciples, and that he suffered martyrdom at Chonæ, near Laodicea (Menaolog. Græc. i. 206).

Archisynagōgus (ἀρχισυναγωγος, "ruler of the synagogue," called also ἀρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς [Luke viii. 41], and simply ἀρχων [Matt. ix. 18]; Heb. אֲרִיִּשְׁנָאָה, ch'of or ruler of the synagogue). In large synagogues there appears to have been a college or council of elders (אֲבֵרֵי; = πρεσβύτεροι, Luke vii. 3) to whom the care of the synagogue and the discipline of the congregation were committed, and to all of whom this title was applied (Mark v. 22; Acts xiii. 15; xviii. 8, compared with ver. 17). Their duties were to preside in the public services, to direct the reading of the Scriptures and the addresses to the congregation (Vitringa, De Synagoga Vetere, lib. iii. pt. i. c. 7; comp. Acts xiii. 15), to superintend the distribution of alms (Vitr. c. 15), and to punish transgressors either by scourging (Vitr. c. 11; comp. Matt. x. 17; xxiii. 24; Acts xxii. 19) or by excommunication (Vitr. c. 9). In a more restricted sense the title is sometimes applied to the president of this council, whose office, according to Gratius (Annotations in Matt. ix. 18; Luc. xiii. 14) and many other writers, was different from and superior to that of the elders in general. Vitringa (p. 56 ff.), on the other hand, maintains that there was no such distinction of office, and that the title thus applied merely designates the presiding elder, who acted on behalf of and in the name of the whole.—Kitto, s. v. See SYNAGOGUE.

Ar'chite (Heb., with the art., ha-Arki', אַרְכִי; Sept. ὁ Ἀρχαί, Vulg. Archites), the usual designation of David's friend Hushai (2 Sam. xv. 32; xvii. 5, 14; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33). The word also appears (somewhat disguised, it is true, in the Auth. Vers.) in Josh. xvi. 2, where "the borders of Archi" (i. e. "the Archite") are named as on the boundary of the "children of Joseph," somewhere in the neighborhood of Bethel. No town of the name of Erech appears in Palestine: it is possible that, as in the case of the Gerizi, the Zemarites, and the Jebusites, we have here the last faint trace of one of the original tribes of the country. See ARCHI.

Architecture (Lat. architectura, from Gr. ἀρχι-τεκτων, a master builder), though usually ranked as a fine art, is not purely such in the sense that painting, sculpture, music, and poetry are, but must be ranked rather as an applied art. Buildings erected for dwelling, manufacture, merchandise, public business, education, worship, burial, or defense, serve, first and primarily, their practical purposes. In so far as reference is had to the mathematical and physical principles of construction, the choice of material, and the perfect adaptation of the building to its uses, the edifice is a scientific achievement, and from this standpoint architecture is a science. In so far as the laws of taste and the power of the imagination are applied to the grouping of the masses, and the invention and distribution of the ornamentation, the edifice is a work of art, and, from this æsthetic standpoint, architecture is a fine art. Embodying thus the material and spiritual wants of an age or people with its knowledge of the resources of nature and the power of its imagination, the history of architecture is a most important element in the history of civilization. The genius of a great architect, though largely controlled by the object of the building, the materials at his command, and other considerations of site, country, and climate, and especially by the prevailing styles and tastes, will always be stamped upon his works, and give them a marked individuality. Though no monuments remain of their earliest history, architecture is generally supposed to have existed as a fine art before the other formative arts of painting and sculpture.

1. Ancient Architecture.—This period extends from the earliest times to about the time of Constantine the Great, when Christianity took the place of Paganism as the controlling spirit in architecture.

1. Egyptian.—The earliest authenticated monuments of architecture are to be found in Egypt, where were developed indeed the germs of all the arts. Of the other styles we can trace the rise, culmination, and decadence. Of the rise of Egyptian art we know nothing, but we are placed suddenly face to face with the Pyramids of Gizeh, the Sphinx, and other works, all executed in true taste, and with so great a degree of scientific knowledge as to indicate a long period of anterior development. This first period (in the fourth dynasty) excelled all later periods in some elements of design, though the second (in the twelfth dynasty) gave the column and other elements, all of which were moulded together, and brought to the highest execution and finish in the third period (in the eighteenth dynasty). Egyptian architecture, in many points, such as the majestic disposition of the masses, the sublime massiveness and durability of its walls, the long vistas through successive courts and lines of columns and sphinxes, the predominance of the interior over exterior ornament, the universal use of color, the subordination of sculpture and painting to architectonic effects, the symbolism of its ornaments and the monumental character of its edifices, was the most perfect the world has yet seen. (See Wilkinson, Architecture of the Ancient Egyptians, Lond. 1856.) The Egyptian public edifices consisted of temples, palaces, tombs, and aqueducts. The earliest Temples and Tombs were doubtless of wood, or were excavated from the solid rock. These two styles of building gave a typical character to the later temples, built mostly above-ground and of cut stone. The temple was usually built upon a high, often a raised foundation, above the flow of the high waters of the Nile. The entrance-way was paved with broad stones, and often led from the tomb of a deceased king. This entrance opened on the side facing the Nile to an enclosure surrounded by a massive wall of cut stone, diminishing as it rose, and covered like all the Egyptian walls, as those of temples and tombs, with a broad, simple, spreading cornice. This unbroken massive wall was covered, as were the walls of the temple within, with symbolic paintings of the Egyptian religion, hieroglyphic records of history, or figures of deities and kings. Within the enclosure was the temple, surrounded by rows of trees, and often with an artificial basin of water at one side. From the single opening of the entrance in the wall the way led between two rows of colossal sphinxes or rams to the majestic façade of the temple. Before the door rose two lofty obelisks or sat two colossal figures, and banners floated from high poles at their side. The walls within and without, and the columns, even when made of costly and polished stones, were covered with religious paintings or hieroglyphics. The door opened to a court within, surrounded by a covered passage-way (sometimes a second similar court followed): into these were admitted the awe-struck multitude. Into the series of chambers extending back of the courts, covered by stone roofing and lighted by small openings from above, were admitted only priests or sacred persons. In the last chamber was the "sanctum sanctorum," containing the image of the deity. The columns of the Egyptian architecture are of three typical kinds, emblematic of the papyrus, the lotus, and the palm—the fluting, when used, originating in the columns of the under-ground temples. The temples varied in size, and the general disposition of the courts and chambers, often having the rear half cut out of the living rock. See TEMPLE.

The Pyramids, or tombs of the kings, faced the four cardinal points of the compass. They were first built small, and then enlarged by successive coverings, as the length and prosperity of the reigns of the monarchs permitted. They were built in terraces, and then were filled out and faced with stone, commencing from the upper terrace and going downward. The interiors of the Pyramids and of the successive layers were often filled with brick or loose stone, but the facing was of hard, dressed, often of polished stone. Examination has shown that the interior pyramid was often made with much more care than the subsequent facings. There was only one small chamber (with a narrow passage leading to it), and containing a sealed massive stone sarcophagus, holding the embalmed body of the monarch. Of large and small pyramids there are found in Lower Egypt, where they mostly occur, sixty-seven, counting the finished and unfinished, and those in the different degrees of preservation. They reach from Cairo to Fayoum, along the left shore of the Nile, a distance of about five miles. They are arranged in five principal groups, the chief one being that of Gizeh, situated near ancient Memphis, the seat of the earliest Egyptian monarchy. The largest of them, that of Cheops, is now 450 ft. high, and 746 ft. square at the base. All the great pyramids were built between the second and fifth dynasties. The later pyramids were built mostly of brick, and were much smaller, as were also those of Upper Egypt [see ETHIOPIA], near Meroe, being built about 700 B.C. The private tombs were mostly cut in the living rock, and were often decorated with great taste and labor. See PYRAMID.

The villas of the Egyptians were of great extent, and contained spacious gardens watered by canals communicating with the Nile. The house itself was sometimes ornamented with propylæa and obelisks, like the temples; it is even possible that part of the building may have been consecrated to religious purposes, as the chapels of other countries, since we find (in ancient paintings of them) a priest engaged in presenting offerings at the door of the inner chambers; and, indeed, were it not for the presence of the women, the form of the garden, and the style of the porch, we should feel disposed to consider it a temple rather than a place of abode. The entrances of large villas were generally through folding gates, standing between lofty towers, as at the courts of temples, with a small door at each side; and others had merely folding gates, with the jambs surmounted by a cornice. One general wall of circuit extended round the premises, but the courts of the house, the garden, the offices, and all the other parts of the villa had each their separate enclosure. The walls were usually built of crude brick, and when in damp places, or within reach of the inundation, the lower part was strengthened by a basement of stone. They were sometimes ornamented with panels and grooved lines, generally stuccoed, and the summit was crowned either with Egyptian battlements, the usual cornice, a row of spikes in imitation of spear-heads, or with some fancy ornament. The plans of the villas varied according to circumstances, but their general arrangement is sufficiently explained by the paintings. They were surrounded by a high wall, about the middle of which was the main or front entrance, with one central and two side gates, leading to an open walk shaded by rows of trees. Here were spacious tanks of water, facing the doors of the right and left wings of the house, between which an avenue led from the main entrance to what may be called the centre of the mansion. After passing the outer door of the right wing, you entered an open court, with trees, extending quite round a nucleus of inner apartments, and having a back entrance communicating with the garden. On the right and left of this court were six or more store-rooms, a small receiving or waiting room at two of the corners, and at the other end the staircases which led to the upper story. Both of the inner façades were furnished with a corridor, supported on columns, with similar towers and gateways. The interior of this wing consisted of twelve rooms, two outer and one centre court, communicating by folding gates; and on either side of this last was the main entrance to the rooms on the ground floor, and to the staircases leading to the upper story. At the back were three long rooms, and a gateway opening on the garden, which, besides flowers, contained a variety of trees, a summer-house, and a large tank of water. The arrangement of the left wing was different. The front gate led to an open court, extending the whole breadth of the façade of the building, and backed by the wall of the inner part. Central and lateral doors thence communicated with another court, surrounded on three sides by a set of rooms, and behind it was a corridor, upon which several other chambers opened. This wing had no back entrance, and, standing isolated, the outer court extended entirely round it; and a succession of doorways communicated from the court with different sections of the centre of the house, where the rooms, disposed, like those already described, around passages and corridors, served partly as sitting apartments and partly as store-rooms. (See Wilkinson's Anc. Eg. abridgm. i, 21 sq.) See BUILDING.

2. The remains of Persian and Assyrian palaces are important, as suggesting what may have been the predominant features of the palaces of David, and especially Solomon, although this style was doubtless somewhat modified by the Syrian method of architecture, which was probably more lofty, with several stories, quadrangular, and with flat roofs. In Mr. Fergusson's work (The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored, Lond. 1851) may be found the latest and most ingenious theory on this subject, with plans and elevations giving a tangible form to his conclusions. The scarcity of wood in the East must have had great effect in architectural style; but stone being abundant in Palestine, there was no occasion for the immense piles and thick walls of sunburnt brick which formed so distinguishing a feature in Assyrian structures. According to Mr. Fergusson, the ground story alone was faced with stone, the upper story being formed upon a system of beams supported by pillars, and enclosed by a high mud wall (see the Jour. of Sac. Lit. Jan. 1852, p. 422-433). On the numerous points of resemblance between the Assyrian and Jewish palaces, see Layard's Nineveh, 2d ser. p. 641 sq. See ASSYRIA.

3. The specimens of the Indian styles are of doubtful date, yet the most remarkable were probably erected about one thousand years B.C. They are exclusively Brahminical and Buddhist temples and pagodas. Some of the Brahminical temples are excavations in the rocks, but not closed like the Egyptians, and have columns cut out of the rock without rules or uniformity (e.g. the temple of Ellora and Elephanta); others are provided with cells, with cupolas or pyramidal ceilings, and supported by figures of animals (Kaillasa of Ellora). The Buddhist temples are also underground, but closed, and in the shape of a long parallelogram; they have a double row of pillars, a vault resembling the interior of a hollow cylinder, and end in a semicircular recess containing the divinity in the form of a soap-bubble (Dagoss), as in the temple of Wiswakarma at Ellora. The pagodas are built above-ground, generally pyramidal, and terminated by a cupola (e.g. Madura, Bramhana of Java). The Indian architecture approaches closely to the Persian and the Assyrian, as exemplified in Persepolis, Nineveh, and Babylon; and also, at a later time, to the Chinese, which adopted the pagoda style in their turrets, but replaced the cupola by a projecting angular roof ornamented with bells (e.g. the porcelain tower at Nankin). But it is with the Egyptian style that the Israelite is connected, as exemplified in Solomon's Temple (see article). (See Sleeman's Rambles in India Lond. 1844.)

Entirely independent of foreign sources, yet resembling the Indo-Chinese styles in its forms, is the Mexican style, especially in its temples (Theocalles), whose form is pyramidal, and of which remarkable remains are yet to be found in Testchuakan, Papantla, Ehulula, &c.

4. Grecian and Roman.—Greek architecture lacks the size, the majestic grandeur, the long vistas, and the symbolism of the Egyptian, but excels it in freedom of treatment, and in perfection of proportion and execution of detail. It received nearly all its elements from Egypt and Assyria, but moulded them into an original and native style, and influenced powerfully the architecture of the Roman and all subsequent styles. It is marked unequally by two great periods, the heroic and the historic. The heroic period extends from the first immigration of the Greek branch of the Greco-Italic division of the Indo-Germanic family into Greece and Asia Minor, to about the fall of Troy (1100 B.C.). The works of this period were mostly fortifications or palaces. The walls were built at first of massive, irregular, untrimmed stones (as at Tiryns, Fig. 1), or of irregular but trimmed stones (as at Argos, Fig. 2), and later of stones laid in broken ranges, as in the treasure-house of Atreus at Mycenæ. The stones were laid (as was the case till the latest period of Grecian architecture) without mortar, and these massive walls are often termed Cyclopean. In the historic period appeared at first two distinct styles among the two great branches of the Greek people, the Doric and the Ionic. The Doric elements were mostly derived from Egypt, and the Ionic from Assyria.

The Doric order is the most ancient, and is marked by the characteristics of the people from whom it derives its name. It is simple, massive, and majestic. The column is characterized by the absence of a base, by the thickness and rapid diminution of the shaft, and by the simplicity and massiveness of the capital. In the entablature, the architrave is in one surface and quite plain. The frieze is ornamented by triglyphs, so called from the three flat bands into which they are divided by the intervening channels; while the metopes, or the vacant spaces between the triglyphs, are also adorned with sculptures in high relief. The cornice projects far, and on its under side are cut several sets of drops, called mutules. Its principal specimens are the temples at Corinth (Greece), Girgenti (in Sicily), Paestum (in Italy), at Egina (Greece), and the Theseum, Parthenon, and Propylæum (at Athens).

The Ionic order is distinguished by simple gracefulness, and by a far richer style of ornament than the Doric. The shaft of the column is much more slender, and rests upon a base, while the capital is adorned by spiral volutes. The architrave is in three faces, each slightly projecting beyond the lower; there is a small cornice between the architrave and the frieze, and all three members of the entablature are more or less ornamented with mouldings. The Ionic order was used mostly in temples and theatres. Its finest example is the Erechtheum in the Acropolis.

The Corinthian order is only a later form of the Ionic, and belongs to a period subsequent to that of the pure Grecian style. It is especially characterized by its beautiful capital, which is said to have been suggested to the mind of the celebrated sculptor Callimachus by the sight of a basket, covered by a tile, and overgrown by the leaves of an acanthus, on which it had accidentally been placed. The earliest known example of its use throughout a building is in the monument of Lysicrates, commonly called the Lantern of Demosthenes, which was built in B.C. 335.

In Italy we find at first the Etruscan or Tuscan style partaking of the Greek style of the Heroic period, but inclining afterward to the Doric. The temples were built on a quadrangle, the columns Doric, but weak, smooth, with a plinth below the basis, and standing wide apart. The framework was mostly of wood. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rome was built in that style, of which no specimens now remain, with the exception of a few tombs, such as the Cucumella of Volsci, the so-called tomb of the Horatii near Rome, that of Porsenna near Chiusi, etc. Roman architecture brought forth temples and palaces worthy of a nation which claimed the dominion of the world; among them the most celebrated were the Forum, Basilica, Curia, etc.; and the triumphal arches (e. g. of Titus, Septimius Severus, Constantine, at Rome; Augustus, at Rimini; Trajan, at Ancona and Benevento, etc.), together with amphitheatres, circuses, and baths. These monuments were mostly in the Corinthian style, but on a gigantic scale. Their chief characteristic, however, was the union of the horizon-splendor (as in the temples of Palmyra and Baalbek), losing its characteristic features, as well as its original beauty and elegance. See BAALBEK; TADMOR.

5. Jewish.—(1.) Sources of Imitation.—"It was once common to claim for the Hebrews the invention of scientific architecture, and to allege that classical antiquity was indebted to the Temple of Solomon for the principles and many of the details of the art. It may here suffice to remark that temples previously existed in Egypt, Babylon, Syria, and Phœnicia, from which the classical ancients were far more likely to borrow the ideas which they embodied in new and beautiful combinations of their own. There has never, in fact, been any people for whom a peculiar style of architecture could with less probability be claimed than for the Israelites. On leaving Egypt, they could only be acquainted with Egyptian art. On entering Canaan, they necessarily occupied the buildings of which they had dispossessed the previous inhabitants; and the succeeding generations would naturally erect such buildings as the country previously contained. The architecture of Palestine, and, as such, eventually that of the Jews, had doubtless its own characteristics, by which it was suited to the climate and condition of the country, and in the course of time many improvements would no doubt arise from the causes which usually operate in producing change in any practical art. From the want of historical data and from the total absence of architectural remains, the degree in which these causes operated in imparting a peculiar character to the Jewish architecture cannot now be determined, for the oldest ruins in the country do not ascend beyond the period of the Roman domination. It does, however, seem probable that among the Hebrews architecture was always kept within the limits of a mechanical craft, and never rose to the rank of a fine art. Their usual dwelling-houses differed little from those of other Eastern nations, and we nowhere find any thing indicative of exterior embellishment. See HOUSE. Splendid edifices, such as the palace of David and the Temple of Solomon, were completed by the assistance of Phœnician artists (2 Sam. v, 11; 1 Kings v, 6, 18; 1 Chron. xiv, 1). See PALACE. After the Babylonish exile the assistance of such foreigners was likewise resorted to for the restoration of the Temple (Ezra iii, 7). See TEMPLE. From the time of the Maccabæan dynasty the Greek taste began to gain ground, especially under the Herodian princes (who seem to have been possessed with a sort of mania for building), and was shown in the structure and embellishment of many towns, baths, colonnades, theatres, and castles (Josephus, Ant. xv, 8, 1; xv, 10, 4; xv, 10, 3; War. i, 4, 1). The Phœnician style, which seems to have had some affinity with the Egyptian, was not, however, superseded by the Grecian; and even as late as the Mishna (Baba Bathra, iii, 6), we read of Tyrian windows, porches, etc. (Kitto). See HIRT'S Gesch. der Bau- tal, or Greek style of building, with the Etruscan arch, the result of which was cylindrical vaults, cupolas, and semi-cupolas. This style was introduced by the Romans in all their European and Asiatic possessions; but in the 3d century it fell into a state of tawdry

(2.) History of Biblical Architecture.—The look of Genesis (iv, 17, 20, 22) appears to divide mankind into great characteristic sections, viz., the “dwellers in tents” and the “dwellers in cities,” when it tells us that Cain was the founder of a city; and that among his descendants, one, Jabal, was “the father of them that dwell in tents,” while Tubal-cain was “the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron.” It is probable that the workers in metal were for the most part dwellers in towns; and thus the arts of architecture and metallurgy became from the earliest times leading characteristics of the civilized as distinguished from the nomadic tendencies of the human race. To the race of Shem is attributed (Gen. x, 11, 12, 22; xi, 2-9) the foundation of cities in the plain of Shinar, Babylon, Nineveh, and elsewhere; of one of which, Resen, the epithet “great” sufficiently marks its importance in the time of the writer, a period at least as early as the 17th century, B.C., if not very much earlier (Rawlinson, Outline of Ass. Hist. p. 10; Layard, Nineveh, ii, 221, 235, 238). From the same book we learn the account of the earliest recorded building, and of the materials employed in its construction (Gen. xi, 3, 9); and though a doubt rests on the precise site of the tower of Belus, so long identified with the Birs Nimrod (Benjamin of Tudela, p. 100, Bohn; Newton, On Proph. x, 155, 156; Vaux, Nin. and Persp. p. 173, 178; Keith, On Proph. p. 285), yet the nature of the soil, and the bricks found there in such abundance, though bearing mostly the name of Nebuchadnezzar, agree perfectly with the supposition of a city previously existing on the same or a closely neighboring site (Layard, ii, 249, 278, and Nin. and Tob. p. 531; Plin. vii, 56; Ezra iv, 1). In the book of Esther (i, 2) mention is made of the palace at Susa, for three months in the spring the residence of the kings of Persia (Esth. iii, 13; Xen, Cyrop. viii, 6, § 22); and, in the books of Tobit and Judith, of Eclatana, to which they retired for two months during the heat of summer (Tob. iii, 7; xiv, 14; Jud. i, 12; Herod. i, 98). A branch of the same Syro-Arabian race as the Assyrians, but the children of Ham, was the nation, or at least the dominant caste, of the Egyptians, the style of whose architecture agrees so remarkably with the Assyrian (Layard, ii, 206 sq.). It is in connection with Egypt that the Israelites appear first as builders of cities, compelled, in common with other Egyptian captives, to labor at the buildings of the Egyptian monarchs. Pithom and Raames are said to have been built by them (Exod. i, 11; Wilkinson, ii, 195). The Israelites were by occupation shepherds, and by habit dwellers in tents (Gen. xlvii, 3). The “house” built by Jacob at Succoth is probably no exception to this statement (Gen. xxxiii, 17). They had therefore originally, speaking properly, no architecture. Even Hebron, a city of higher antiquity than the Egyptian Zoan (Tanis), was called originally from its founder, perhaps a Canaanite of the race of Anak, Kirjath-Arba, the house of Arba (Num. xiii, 22; Josh. xiv, 15). From the time of the occupation of Canaan they became dwellers in towns and in houses of stone, for which the native limestone of Palestine supplied a ready material (Lev. xiv, 34, 45; 1 Kings vii, 10; Stanley, Palest. p. 116 sq.); but the towns which they occupied were not all, nor, indeed, in most cases, built from the first by themselves (Deut. vi, 10; Num. xiii, 19).

The peaceful reign and vast wealth of Solomon gave great impulse to architecture; for besides the Temple and his other great works at and near Jerusalem, he built fortresses and cities in various places, among which the names and sites of Baalath and Tadmor are usually thought to be represented by the more modern superstructures of Baalbec and Palmyra (1 Kings ix, 15, 24). Among the succeeding kings of Israel and of Judah more than one is recorded as a builder: Aza (1 Kings xv, 28), Baasha (xvi, 17), Omri (xvi, 24), Ahab (xvi, 34; xxii, 39); Hezekiah (2 Kings xx, 20; 2 Chron. xxxii, 27, 30), Jehoash, and Josiah (2 Kings xii, 11, 12; xxii, 6); and, lastly, Jehoiakim, whose winter palace is mentioned (Jer. xxii, 14; xxxvi, 22; see also Amos iii, 15). On the return from captivity, the chief care of the rulers was to rebuild the Temple and the walls of Jerusalem in a substantial manner, with stone, and with timber from Lebanon (Ezra iii, 8; v, 8; Neh. ii, 8; iii, 1, 32). During the government of Simon Maccabæus, the fortress called Baris, and afterward Antonia, was erected for the defence of the Temple and the city. But the reigns of Herod and of his sons and successors were especially remarkable for the great architectural works in which they delighted. Not only was the Temple restored to a large portion, if not to the full degree, of its former magnificence, but the fortifications and other public buildings of Jerusalem were enlarged and embellished to an extent previously unknown (Luke xxi, 5; Benj. of Tudela, p. 83, Bohn). See JERUSALEM. Besides these great works, the town of Casarea was built on the site of an insignificant building called Strato's Tower; Samaria was enlarged, and received the name of Sebaste; the town of Agrippium was built; and Herod carried his love for architecture so far as to adorn with buildings cities even not within his own dominions, Berytus, Damascus, Tripolis, and many other places (Josephus, J'war, i, 21, i, 11). His son, Philip the tetrarch, enlarged the old Greek colony of Paneas, giving it the name of Casarea in honor of Tiberias; while his brother Antipas founded the city of Tiberias, and adorned the towns of Sepphoris and Betharamphata, giving to the latter the name Livias, in honor of the mother of Tiberius (Keland, p. 497). Of the original splendor of these great works no doubt can be entertained; but of their style and appearance we can only conjecture, though with nearly absolute certainty, that they were formed on Greek and Roman models. Of the style of the earlier buildings of Palestine we can only form an idea from the analogy of the Egyptian, Assyrian, and Persian monuments now existing, and from the modes of building still adopted in Eastern countries. The connection of Solomon with Egypt and with Tyre, and the influence of the captivity, may have in some measure successively affected the style both of the two temples and of the palatial edifices of Solomon. The enormous stones employed in the Assyrian, Persepolitan, and Egyptian buildings find a parallel in the sub-structures of Baalbec, more ancient than the superstructure (Layard, ii, 317, 318), and in the stones of so vast a size which still remain at Jerusalem, relics of the building either of Solomon or of Herod (Williams, pt. ii, 1). But, as it has been observed again and again, scarcely any connected monuments are known to survive in Palestine by which we can form an accurate idea of its buildings, beautiful and renowned as they were throughout the East (Plin. v, 14; Stanley, p. 185), and even of those which do remain no trustworthy examination has yet been made. It is probable, however, that the reservoirs known under the names of the Pools of Solomon and Hezekiah contain some portions, at least, of the original fabrics (Stanley, p. 103, 165).—Smith, s. v.

The domestic architecture of the Jews, so far as it can be understood, is treated under HOUSE. Tools and instruments of building are mentioned by the sacred writers: the plumb-line, Amos vii, 7; the measuring-reed, Ezek. xl, 3; the saw, 1 Kings vii, 9. (See De Vogue, L'architecture dans le Syrie, Par. 1865.)

II. Medieval Architecture.—1. With the victory of Christianity over Paganism, as the religion of state, commences a new era in the history of architecture. Still the Greek, or, rather, Roman art exercised a powerful influence, especially in the details of the new style. When Christianity became the religion of the state, the ancient basilicas (q. v.), or halls of justice, were turned into churches. The lower floor was used by the men, and the galleries devoted to the women.

In later edifices the galleries were dispensed with. The church then consisted of a single oblong hall, with one, three, or five aisles, a round apsis at the rear end, an altar, etc. The basilican style prevailed throughout the entire Christian church throughout the fourth century. It prevailed much later in Syria and Southern France, and remained in Central Italy till the Renaissance period.

2. The Byzantine was the earliest branching off from the basilican style. It had its rise in Constantinople, and was the fruitful parent of nearly all the later styles of Christian and Mohammedan architecture. Its finest example was the Church of St. Sophia, rebuilt by Justinian (A.D. 538), which has the most perfect interior of any church ever built. See ST. SOPHIA. The other best examples of this style are the Church of St. Vitale, in Ravenna, and of St. Mark's, in Venice. The style prevailed in Asia when it gave birth to the Saracenic and the Armenian (and hence to the Russian), and in Western and North-western Italy, as well as in parts of France and Spain. Its chief characteristics are a central flat dome, illuminated by a row of small windows at its base; semicircular "apsides" at the ends of the cross, covered with half domes; a profuse use of the round arch in colonnades and galleries within and without, of such varied sizes as to give great apparent size to the edifice; slender windows; a rather low entrance; the walls, and even pillars, covered with mosaic paintings, ornamental and scenic, thus giving the interior the greatest possible brilliancy and dignity; and capitals ornamented by a most remarkably rich interweaving of conventional elements borrowed from the antique or from life, and interspersed with animals fantastically disposed.

3. The different elements of the basilican and Byzantine styles were united first in Lombardy, then on the Rhine, and produced the Romanesque, or round-arch Gothic, which, rising from the 7th to the 10th centuries, and extending to the 12th, spread over most of Europe. Among the finest examples of this style are the Cathedrals of Pisa, Verelli, Parma, Modena, and Lucca (in Italy), of Worms, Bonn, Mayence, Speyer, and the churches of St. Geron and St. Apostoli in Cologne (on the Rhine). To this style belong the peculiar churches and round towers of North Ireland, Scotland, Scandinavia, and the low round tower of Newport, R. I. In the round-arch style the aisles were covered with long arches instead of open wooden roofs. Bell-towers—round (as in Italy, the north of Europe, and elsewhere), or square, or octagonal, built separate from the church edifice (as in Italy) or joined to the edifice (as north of the Alps)—were added. The pillars broke from the antique rules of proportion, and were moulded into clustered columns. Small arched galleries ran around parts or the whole of the church, within and without. The exterior especially was covered with numerous well-disposed arches, pilasters, and other ornaments; richly-decorated doorways and windows drew the eye to the central part of the façade, and the whole external had a dignity not to be found in any other style of church architecture. The style prevailed throughout all Europe (excepting part of Italy) till the gradual introduction of the pointed arch gave rise to what is usually called the Gothic style.

4. Meanwhile the Saracenic style—another outgrowth of the Byzantine—had spread, with its numerous modifications, over all Mohammedan countries. It was modified largely by the Sassanian style (an outgrowth of the late Roman, as developed by the fire-worshippers of Persia) in the East, by the Spanish Romanesque in Spain and Morocco, and by the basilican style in Sicily. It arose in the seventh century, and spread with truly tropical luxuriance and quickness of growth from Persia to the Atlantic. Deprived by the Mohammedan faith of the use of painting or sculpture, it developed an architectonic ornamentation unsurpassed in the history of architecture by its richness and purely conventional character. Poetry took the place of the formative arts of sculpture and painting in the inscriptions from the Koran that were interwoven with the luxuriant ornament of the walls and columns. The Byzantine dome remained the principal feature of the roof, but this was hung with myriads of little semi-domes, producing a most fairy-like effect. Under the rich fancy of the Orient, color was used as freely as in the Egyptian style. The minaret was added, and gave a marvellous grace and lightness by its slender form. The pointed arch (adopted perhaps first from the court of a Christian monastery in Sicily erected in the sixth century) was soon adopted, and spread into the horse-shoe arch, finally developing itself into the complicated interwoven arches of the Moorish style. The style arose in the seventh century, and extended to the fifteenth, its culminating period being from the ninth to the eleventh centuries. The Turkish style is more Byzantine than Saracenic.

Entrance to the Court of the Lions in the Alhambra.

Among its most important monuments are the mosques and tombs of the sultans at Cairo, and Bejapoor and Delhi (India), the palaces and mosques of the Alhambra and of the Cuba (Palermo), and the Castle of Alcazar at Segovia (Spain). In the twelfth century, Central and Western Europe came into much more intimate contact than formerly with the Orient, especially through the Crusades, and the pointed arch and the spirit of ornamentation of the Saracenic art were borrowed, and added largely to the development of the Gothic from the Romanesque style.

5. The Gothic.—The round-arch or Romanesque style has given the Christian temple its almost complete plan, as far as concerns the disposition of the aisles, altar, choir, etc. The pointed arch began first in France and Normandy to supplant the round arch. The progress of this new feature was then gradual and fluctuating for over a century. The two arches are found used almost promiscuously till 1280, when the pointed arch, and all the constructive changes it induced, were used, purely and solely, for a century. This is hence called the golden period of the Gothic architecture. The use of this arch required, for harmony, a corresponding additional upward tendency in all the parts of the structure. To this was added a richness of conventionalized, foliated ornamentation, not surpassing, perhaps, that of the windows and doorways of some works of the round-arch style, but far more generally diffused and more harmoniously incorporated with the feeling of the entire edifice. The spire was made more slender, filled with elaborate open-work ornaments, and made, like a flower on its stalk, the richest part of the edifice. Sculpture was used profusely within and without, and the windows were filled with paintings, in colored glass, from Biblical scenes, making thus (as in the Egyptian arch) the other arts subordinate to the architecture; or, more strictly speaking, mere architectonic adjuncts. The principal characteristics of this style are as follows: The ground-plan is an oblong rectangle, and for churches, the cross; the crypt disappears; the choir becomes smaller in proportion to the building, and ends in a polygon; the walls of the nave are higher, so that the arches spring immediately from the pillars; the walls themselves are divided by arches, and the windows enlarged; the arches are all pointed, and connected by chamfers and astragals, as well as also the pillars. Outside are buttresses and piers to strengthen the building, connected with small turrets and ornamented foliage tracery; the cornices are deeply excavated and much in-lined (to facilitate the running off of water); the greatest number of ornaments are displayed on the façade, which is adorned with one or two towers, built on a square basis, but transformed afterward into an octagon, rising with a series of pillars, turrets, and high windows, and ending in an open-work octagonal pyramid; the entrance of the churches consists of either one or three richly decorated portals; the ornaments consist principally of straight lines and segments of circles meeting in acute angles, and of tracery representing natural objects, such as vine or oak leaves, etc. The principal specimens of German Gothic style are to be found in the cathedrals of Cologne, Freiburg, Regensburg, Vienna, Strasburg, etc. The French Gothic presents some peculiarities; thus, the foundation is generally fan-shaped, the choir being encircled by a row of chapels; its principal ornament consists in the three large portals in front; columns replace the pillars; the circles and arches are not connected by chamfers or astragals; the arches and buttresses are plain; the towers mostly square, and without the pyramidal apex; the perpendicular ascending tendency is balanced by a horizontal gallery in the façade. Its best specimens are Notre-Dame of Paris, and the cathedrals of Rouen, Dijon, Chartres, Rheims, Amiens, St. Ouen near Rouen, etc. The Spanish Gothic inclines to the horizontal, looks heavy, and the inside is generally overloaded with ornaments, as, for instance, the cathedrals of Toledo, Barcelona, Xeres, etc. The convent of Batalha is a fine specimen of the Portuguese Gothic, which is of purer style than the Spanish. The Gothic of Holland and Belgium partakes of the French and the German; the former preponderates in the inside, and the latter in the outside, where we find large pointed windows, no rosettes, smaller portals, and high towers, as in the cathedrals of Amsterdam, Brussels, Utrecht, the Oude Kerk of Amsterdam, St. Laurentius of Rotterdam, etc. The English Gothic has many peculiarities. The richest specimens belong to the so-called Tudor style; for instance, the Chapel of Henry VII. The Italian Gothic is distinguished from the same style as found in more northern countries by inclining more to the antique, and presenting the perpendicular features only in false façades, while in the actual buildings the horizontal predominates; it also preserves the walls in their original massiveness, instead of dividing them by means of pillars and windows; the foundations are broad, the choir ends in a quadrangle; they are surmounted by a cupola, but have no towers, as the cathedrals of Florence, Siena, Orvieto, Assisi, St. Antonio of Padua, St. Petronia of Bologna, St. Maria Novello of Florence, etc., etc. In the 15th and 16th centuries the spirit of the style had died out, though it still gave a tendency to the character of the edifices erected in Germany and elsewhere, even as late as the 18th century.

6. The Renaissance.—In Italy the Gothic style had never taken such deep root as in the other countries of Europe. The revival of classical studies, and the tendency of the age to exalt ancient philosophy over Christianity, led to an extensive study of the antique. This spirit, carried into architecture, produced the Renaissance style, which is marked by an adaptation of classical (especially of Roman) architectural principles and details to the Christian temple. The round arch was again resorted to. A massive dome was built over the centre of the cross. The columns resumed the classical proportions, or were made into massive pilasters. In the 17th century, and more especially in the 18th, architecture seemed to have broken away from all laws of proportion and harmony, and to have lost its predominance in church edifices. The churches seemed more galleries of painting or sculpture than architectural structures. The ornament became first massive, then overpowering, and was broken from its structural lines. It finally became trivial and inexpressive. Expensive stones and large gilded surfaces were more prized than aesthetic propriety or architectural effect. And, finally, the extravagant, insincere, almost infidel life of the 17th and 18th centuries manifested themselves in the Baroco (or Jesuitical) style of Italy, or the Rococo (or French) style of France and Germany.

Thus the greatest genuine architectural life of mediæval times manifested itself in the great epochs of the Basilican (1th to 6th centuries), Byzantine (7th to 14th centuries), Saracenic (7th to 14th centuries), Romanesque (9th to 12th centuries), Gothic (12th to 15th centuries), and Renaissance (14th to 17th centuries). Perhaps its highest culmination was in the Middle Gothic (1300). After the 16th century all true architecture died out, and the Rococo period (18th century) closed the second great division or history, and was followed by the modern in the 19th century.

III. The Modern.—The chief characteristic difference between the modern, and the ancient, and mediæval architecture, is that it is marked by no style such as is followed by all builders of the period in all lands where a certain civilization prevails. The inconsistencies and absurdities of the Rococo style of the latter part of the 18th century were felt under the purer taste awakened by the study of the history of ancient and mediæval art that has prevailed during the last fifty years. Attempts are making to revive the spirit of the pure ages—of the Gothic (mostly in England), of the Renaissance (mostly in France), and of the Ancient Classical (mostly in Germany). A few architects and critics feel the necessity of having a new style of architecture, adapted to the wants of modern society, and to the use of the new materials (especially iron and glass) that science has brought within the reach of the builder.

In America the early church edifices had usually no architectural merits or pretensions. This arose from the poverty of the people, the lack of artistic education in the builders and of a cultivated taste in the community, or from an honest desire to shun any thing that might savor of pompous display in the house of God. Within the last twenty years a different spirit it has animated all denominations of Christians, and a most healthy feeling prevails, manifesting itself in honest attempts to make the house of God a building worthy of its high and holy uses. The most important requisite for this is the development of a body of Christian architects from the church itself. These, permeated with the true Christian feeling, knowing the wants of the church, and cultivated in all the required departments of science and art, will be able to give an architecture suited to the wants of the present age. To accomplish this is needed the establishment of academies or departments of architecture in our universities and chairs of the fine arts in the colleges and theological seminaries.

Architriclinus (Ἀρχιτρικλῖνος, master of the triclinium or dinner-hall [see ACCEBATIŌN]), rendered in John ii, 8, 9, "governor of the feast" (q. v.), equivalent to the Roman Magister Conviviū. The Greeks also denoted the same social office by the title of Symposiarch (συμπωσιάρχος). He was not the giver of the feast, but one of the guests specially chosen to direct the entertainment, and promote harmony and good fellowship among the company. (See Potter's Gr. Ant. ii, 386.) In the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus (xxxv, 1, 2) the duties of this officer among the Jews are indicated.

He is there, however, called ἡγομενος: "If thou be made the master [of a feast], lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care for them, and so sit down; and when thou hast done all thy office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for thy well ordering of the feast." (See Walch, De Archidictio, Jen. 1753; Brendel, De loco Joh. Eisenh. 1785.) See BASQUET.

Archon (ἄρχων, a ruler), the title properly of the chief magistrates or rather executive officers of the Athenians during their democracy (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.), and applied to various functionaries, (1.) specially to the recognised head of the Syrian Jews during the Roman empire [see ALABARCH], and (2.) technically a title in the Greek Church of several officers, e. g. the church-keeper, keeper of the book of Gospels, etc.

Archontici, a sect of the second century who rejected baptism, and held that the world was not created by the Almighty God, but by certain powers, seven or eight in number, whom they called Archontes (ἀρχόντες, rulers), to the chief of whom they gave the name of Sabaoth, the god of the Jews and the giver of the law, whom they blasphemously distinguished from the true God. Now, as they pretended that baptism was administered in the name of Sabaoth, and not in that of the supreme God, they rejected it, and the holy Eucharist. They held that woman was a creation of the devil. They were a branch of the Valentinians. —Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xi, ch. x, cap. 2; Tillemont, ii, 295; Lawton, Ecol. Diet. i, 493.

Archpresbyter or Archpriest, the head of the priests, as the archdeacon was originally head of the deacons. Anciently, the minister next in order to the bishop. Generally the senior priest of the diocese bore this title, but Thomassin shows that the bishops frequently chose the abbot and not the senior priest as archpresbyter. This was more frequently the case in the Greek than in the Latin Church, and some popes were altogether opposed to appointing any but the senior priest. The archpresbyter acted as the representative of the bishop at public worship, while the archdeacon represented him in the government of the diocese. At first there was only one archpresbyter in a diocese; but since the 5th and 6th centuries we find, besides one in the diocesan town, several in the country. In the time of the Carolingians, every diocese was divided into a number of archpresbyterates, called archpresbyterates, deaneries, Christianities (Christianitates), rural chapters. The powers of the archpresbyter were: He had, in the name of his bishop, to superintend the clergymen of his district, to execute the episcopal and synodal decrees, to present the candidates for the priesthood from his district to the bishop, and to settle difficulties between the clergy. On the first day of every month he held conferences with the clergy. He also reported to the archdeacon, and through him to the bishop, the graver offences of the laymen. The archpriest's church was the only one in the district in which baptism was dispensed (ecclesia baptismalis). The whole of the districts was sometimes called plebs, and the archpresbyter Plebanns, a title which in several countries is still in use. There are still archpriests in the Greek Church, vested with most of the privileges of choirepiscopi, or rural bishops. The name is also still in use in some dioceses of the Roman Church, corresponding to the more common dean (q. v.). —Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, cap. 19; Coleman, Christian Antiquities, p. 161; Thomassin, De nova et veteri ecclesie disciplina, pt. ii, l. ii, c. 3; Neller, De Archipresbyteris (Trevir. 1771). Arcimboldi, JOHANNES ANGELUS, born at Milan toward the close of the fifteenth century, sent by Leo X as papal nuncio to Scandinavia in order to sell papal indulgences. The permission to do so he bought at a high price of King Christian II of Denmark. In the controversies springing up between the Danes and the Swedes, he was first bribed by the Danes and later by the Swedes. On his return to Italy, Leo X ordered a suit to be instituted against him, but in 1525 he was made bishop of Novara, and in 1550 archbishop of Milan. He died in 1555.

Arcturus (the Latin form of the Gr. ἀρκτοῦρος, bear-keeper, designating among the ancients the brightest star in the constellation Boötes, Cic. Arat. 99; also the whole constellation Boötes, Hes. Op. 564, 608; Virg. Georg. i, 201; and hence the time of its rising in September, Soph. Ed. Tyr. 1137; Thuc. ii, 78; Virg. Georg. i, 68), put in the Anth. Vers. for the Heb. אֲרִכְטוּר (Ash, for אֲרִכְטוּר, no'ish, Arabic the same, Job ix, 9, "[God], which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south," Sept. Ἰλαίτης, Vulg. Arcturus), or אֲרִכְטוּר (A'gish, a fuller form of the same, prob. signifying supporter, barrow, Job xxxviii, 32, "canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons," Sept. Ἐσπερος, Vulg. vesper), is thought by most recent interpreters to denote the constellation of the Great Bear, Ursa Major, but on grounds not altogether satisfactory nor with unanimity (see Hyde, ad Ulugh-Beyi, Tab. Stell. p. 22, 23; Michaelis, Suppl. p. 1907; Schultens on Job, p. 239). The older interpreters understand: (1.) the Great Bear, or the seven stars of the Ἰάκινθον (Sepentationes), so Saadias and Aben Ezra; (2.) the Pleiades, so the Sept. (in one passage only, and there perhaps the terms have become transposed, as Ἐσπερος and Ἀρκτοῦρος both occur in the same verse) and the Targum (אֲרִכְטוּר in the other passage, according to the Venice and Lond. editions, meaning, however, han, according to Bochart); (3.) the evening star, Hesperus, Venus, so the Sept. (in the latter passage, and perhaps also in the first) and Vulg.; (4.) the tail of Aries (אֲרִכְטוּר) or the head of Taurus (אֲרִכְטוּר), so the Talmudists (Berachoth, p. 586), apparently referring to the bright star in the eye of Taurus (Ahlebaran), near the tail of Aries; (5.) Arcturus, so the Vulg. (in chap. ix, and perhaps the Sept.); (6.) the rendering Lythia of the Syriac (in both passages, as likewise in Job xv, 27, for אֲרִכְטוּר, and Amos v, 8, for אֲרִכְטוּר; comp. Ephraemi Opera, ii, 449 a), as this word is itself of doubtful origin and signification, if really genuine (see Antecl. Orient. ii, 57; Lach, in Eichhorn's Bibl. vii, 241), but appears from the lexicographers to bear the general import of she-goat, referring to a star in the constellation Auriga. Laying aside those of these interpretations that are evidently mere conjecture (such as Arcturus, Venus), and others that are here out of the question (such as the Pleiades, which in Heb. are called אֲרִכְטוּר), there remain but two interpretations: First, that which identifies the Heb. Ash with the Great Bear, or Ursa Major, the Wain. The superior probability of this is sustained by the following considerations: (1.) This is so conspicuous a constellation, and so famous in all ancient as well as modern astronomy, that the total silence in these astrological enumerations, otherwise, respecting it is unaccountable, especially as inferior constellations are not omitted; (2.) The mention of the attendant stars ("sons," אֲרִכְטוּר) in the second passage of Job agrees with the ascription among the Arabs of daughters to No'ish, the corresponding Arabic constellation (Niebuhr, Beschreib. v. Arabien, p. 114), these being the three stars in the tail of the Bear. The other interpretation, namely, the goat, can only be sustained by a forced etymology from אֲרִכְטוּר, a goat, and a lesser constellation is then referred to, namely, Auriga; and the reference to the attendant stars, to those in the right hand of this figure, is not only unnatural, but at variance with its late origin. Schul-tens (Comment. in loc.) derives the Heb. word from an Arabic term signifying the night-watcher, because Ursa Major never sets; while Kinuchi refers it to the Heb. זכר , in the sense of a collection of stars; and Lud. de Dieu compares the Ethiopic name of the constellation Išeset; but the etymology first proposed above is preferable (see Bochart, Hieroz. ii, 680; Alfenz, p. 8, 63; Ideler, Vaters. ab. d. Stern-Namen, p. 3, 19; comp. Abulfeda, p. 375; Eutyech. p. 277; Schultens, Imp. Joctan, p. 19, 32).—Gesenius, Theas. Heb. p. 835. See ASTRONOMY; CONSTELLATION.

Arcudius, PETER, a native of Corfu. The Popes Gregory XIV and Clement VIII tried, but unsuccessfully, to bring about, through him, a union of the Greek Church in Russia with that of Rome. He died in Rome in 1635. He wrote Concord. eccles. Orient. et Occid. nt. in septem sacramentis, etc. (Paris, 1619, fol.).—Niceron, Mémoires, iii, 56; Hoefler, Biog. Gén. iii, 74.

Ard (Heb. id. אַרְד , prob. for אַרְדָּן , i. q. אַרְדָּן , descend; Sept. אַרְדָּן v. r. אַרְדָּן), a grandson of Benjamin through Bela (Num. xxvi, 40). B.C. 1856. In Gen. xvi, 21, he appears as a son of Benjamin, where, however, the Sept. makes him a great-grandson through Gera as a son of Bela. In I Chron. viii, 3, he is called ADDAR. His descendants were called Ardites, Heb. אַרְדִּיתִּים , Sept. אַרְדִּיתִּים (Num. xxvi, 40). See BENJAMIN. He is possibly the same with EZBON (I Chron. vii, 7).

Ar'dath (Lat. Ardath, the Gr. text being no longer extant), the name of a "field" mentioned only in the Apocrypha (2 [Vulz. 4] Esdr. ix, 26) as the scene of the vision of the bereaved woman; no doubt a fanciful appellation.

Ard'ite (Num. xxvi, 40). See ARD.

Ar'don (Heb. Ardon', אַרְדָּן , descend int, others flight; Sept. אַרְדָּן v. r. אַרְדָּן), the last-named of the three sons of Caleb by his first wife Azubah (I Chron. ii, 18). B.C. ante 1658.

Are'li (Heb. Arel', אַרְיֵל , heroic, fr. Ariel; Sept. אַרְיֵלִית , Arylith), the last-named of the seven sons of Gad (Gen. xli, 16). B.C. 1873. His descendants were called Arelites (Heb. id., Sept. אַרְיֵלִית , Num. xxvi, 17).

Are'lite (Num. xxvi, 17). See ARELI.

Areop'agite (Ἀρεοπαγιτῆς), a member (Acts xvii, 34) of the court of AREOPAGUS (q. v.). This, as constituted by Solon, consisted of the nine archons (chief magistrates) for the year, and the ex-archons. The latter became members for life; but before their admission, they were submitted, at the close of their annual magistracy, to a rigid scrutiny into their conduct in office and their private morals. Proof of criminal or unbecoming conduct was sufficient also afterward to expel them. Various accounts are given of the number to which the Areopagites were limited. If there was any fixed number, admission to the council could not have been a necessary consequence of honorable discharge from the archonship. But it is more probable that the accounts which limit the number are applicable only to the earlier period of its existence (see the anonymous argument to Demosthenes' Oration against Androtion). Lysias expressly states that the acting archons had a seat in it (Areop. p. 110, § 16-20).

Areop'agus, the Latin form of the Greek words ($\delta\ \text{Ἀρειος πάγος}$), signifying, in reference to place, Mars' Hill, but, in reference to persons, the council which was held on the hill. The council was also termed $\eta\ \text{ἐν Ἀρειῷ πάγῳ βουλή}$ (or $\eta\ \text{βουλή ἢ ἐν Ἀρειῷ πάγῳ}$), the Council on Mars' Hill; sometimes $\eta\ \text{ἄνω βουλή}$, the Upper Council, from the elevated position where it was held, and sometimes simply, but emphatically, $\eta\ \text{βουλή}$, the Council; but it retained till a late period the original designation of Mars' Hill, being called by the Latins Scopulus Martis, Curia Martis (Juvenal, Sat. ix, 101), and still more literally, Arcum Judicium (Tacit. Annal. ii, 55). The place was a rocky height in Athens, opposite the western end of the Acropolis, from which it is separated only by an elevated valley. It rises gradually from the northern end, and terminates abruptly on the south, over against the Acropolis, at which point it is about fifty or sixty feet above the valley already mentioned. Of the site of the Areopagus there can be no doubt, both from the description of Pausanias, and from the narrative of Herodotus, who relates that it was a height over against the Acropolis, from which the Persians assailed the latter rock (Paus. i, 28, § 5; Herod. viii, 52). According to tradition, it was called the hill of Mars (Ares) because this god was brought to trial here before the assembled gods by Neptune (Poseidon) on account of his murdering Halirrhothius, the son of the latter. The meetings were held on the south-eastern summit of the rock. There are still sixteen stone steps cut in the rock, leading up to the hill from the valley of the Agora below; and immediately above the steps is a bench of stones excavated in the rock, forming three sides of a quadrangle, and facing the south. Here the Areopagites sat as judges in the open air ($\text{ἐπαίθρια ἰκάζονται}$, Pollux, viii, 118). On the eastern and western side is a raised block. These blocks are probably the two rude stones which Pausanias saw there, and which are described by Euripides as assigned, the one to the accuser, the other to the criminal, in the causes which were tried in the court (Iph. T. 961).—Smith. See AREOPAGITE.

The Areopagus possesses peculiar interest to the Christian as the spot from which Paul delivered his memorable address to the men of Athens (Acts xvii, 22-31). It has been supposed by some commentators that he was brought before the Council of Areopagus, but there is no trace in the narrative of any judicial proceedings. Paul "disputed daily" in the "market" or Agora (xvii, 17), which was situated south of the Areopagus, in the valley lying between this hill and those of the Acropolis, the Pnyx, and the Museum. Attracting more and more attention, "certain philosophers of the Epicureans and Stoics" brought him up from the valley, probably by the stone steps already mentioned, to the Areopagus above, that they might listen to him more conveniently. Here the philosophers probably took their seats on the stone benches usually occupied by the members of the council, while the multitude stood upon the steps and in the valley below. The dignified bearing of the apostle is worthy of high admiration, the more so from the associations of the spot (see Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i, 346-379). Nor does his eloquent discourse appear to have been without good effect; for, though some mocked, and some procrastinated, yet others believed, among whom was a member of the council, "Dionysius, the Areopagite," who has been represented as the first bishop of Athens, and is said to have written books on the "Celestial Hierarchy;" but their authenticity is questioned. The history in the Acts (xvii, 22) states that the speaker "stood in the midst of Mars' Hill" (see Robinson's Researches, i, 10-12). Having come up from the level parts of the city, where the markets (there were two, the old and the new) were, he would probably stand with his face toward the north, and would then have immediately behind him the long walls which ran down to the sea, affording protection against a foreign enemy. Near the sea, on one side, was the harbor of Piræus, on the other that designated Phalerum, with their crowded arsenals, their busy workmen, and their gallant ships. Not far off in the ocean lay the island of Salamis, ennobled forever in history as the spot near which Athenian valor chastised Asiatic pride, and achieved the liberty of Greece. The apostle had only to turn toward his right hand to catch a view of a small but celebrated hill rising within the city near that on which he stood, called the Pnyx, where, standing on a block of bare stone, Demosthenes and other distinguished orators had addressed the assembled people of Athens, swaying that arrogant and fickle democracy, and thereby making

Philip of Macedon tremble, or working good or ill for the entire civilized world. Immediately before him lay the crowded city, studded in every part with memorials sacred to religion or patriotism, and exhibiting the highest achievements of art. On his left, somewhat beyond the walls, was beheld the Academy, with its groves of plane and olive trees, its retired walks and cooling fountains, its altar to the Muses, its statues of the Graces, its Temple of Minerva, and its altars to Prometheus, to Love, and to Hercules, near which Plato had his country-seat, and in the midst of which he had taught, as well as his followers after him. But the most impressive spectacle lay on his right hand; for there, on the small and precipitous hill named the Acropolis were clustered together monuments of the highest art, and memorials of the national religion, such as no other equal spot of ground has ever borne. The apostle's eyes, in turning to the right, would fall on the north-west side of the eminence, which was here (and all round) covered and protected by a wall, parts of which were so ancient as to be of Cyclopean origin. The western side, which alone gave access to what from its original destination may be termed the fort, was, during the administration of Pericles, adorned with a splendid flight of steps, and the beautiful Propylæa, with its five entrances and two flanking temples, constructed by Mnesicles of Pentelican marble, at a cost of 2012 talents. In the times of the Roman emperors there stood before the Propylæa equestrian statues of Augustus and Agrippa. On the southern wing of the Propylæa was a temple of Wingless Victory; on the northern, a Pinacotheca, or picture gallery. On the highest part of the platform of the Acropolis, not more than 360 feet from the entrance-buildings just described, stood (and yet stands, though shattered and mutilated) the Parthenon, justly celebrated throughout the world, erected of white Pentelican marble, under the direction of Callicrates, Ictinus, and Carion, and adorned with the finest sculptures from the hand of Phidias. Northward from the Parthenon was the Erechtheum, a compound building, which contained the Temple of Minerva Polias, the proper Erechtheum (called also the Cecropium), and the Pandroseum. This sanctuary contained the holy olive-tree sacred to Minerva, the holy salt-spring, the ancient wooden image of Pallas, etc., and was the scene of the oldest and most venerated ceremonies and recollections of the Athenians. Between the Propylæa and the Erechtheum was placed the colossal bronze statue of Pallas Promachos, the work of Phidias, which towered so high above the other buildings that the plume of her helmet and the point of her spear were visible on the sea between Sunium and Athens. Moreover the Acropolis was occupied by so great a crowd of statues and monuments, that the account, as found in Pausanias, excites the reader's wonder, and makes it difficult for him to understand how so much could have been crowded into a space which extended from the south-east corner to the south-west only 1150 feet, while its greatest breadth did not exceed 500 feet. On the hill itself where Paul had his station, and at the eastern end, the temple of the Furies, and other national and commemorative edifices. The court-house of the council, which was also here, was, according to the simplicity of ancient customs, built of clay. There was an altar consecrated by Orestes to Athene Areia. In the same place were two silver stones, on one of which stood the accuser, on the other the accused. Near them stood two altars erected by Epimenides, one to Insult (Υβρίων, Cic. Contumelior), the other to Shamelessness (Αναδείας, Cic. Impudatior). See ATHENS.

The court of Areopagus was one of the oldest and most honored, not only in Athens, but in the whole of Greece, and indeed in the ancient world. Through a long succession of centuries it preserved its existence amid changes corresponding with those which the state underwent, till at least the age of the Cæsars (Tacitus, Ann. ii, 55). The ancients are full of eulogies on its value, equity, and beneficial influence; in consequence of which qualities it was held in so much respect that even foreign states sought its verdict in difficult cases. But after Greece had submitted to the yoke of Rome, it retained probably little of its ancient character beyond a certain dignity, which was itself cold and barren; and however successful it may in earlier times have been in conciliating for its determinations the approval of public opinion, the historian Tacitus (ut supra) mentions a case in which it was charged with an erroneous, if not a corrupt, decision. The origin of the court ascends back into the darkest mythical period. From the first its constitution was essentially aristocratic; a character which to some extent it retained even after the democratic reforms which Solon introduced into the Athenian constitution. By his appointment the nine archons became for the remainder of their lives Areopagites, provided they had well discharged the duties of their archonship, were blameless in their personal conduct, and had undergone a satisfactory examination. Its power and jurisdiction were still further abridged by Pericles through his instrument Ephialtes. Following the political tendencies of the state, the Areopagus became in process of time less and less aristocratical, and parted piecemeal with most of its important functions. First its political power was taken away, then its jurisdiction in cases of murder, and even its moral influence gradually departed. During the sway of the Thirty Tyrants its power, or rather its political existence, was destroyed. On their overthrow it recovered some consideration, and the oversight of the execution of the laws was restored to it by an express decree. Isocrates endeavored by his Ἀριστοκρατικὸς λόγος to revive its ancient influence. The precise time when it ceased to exist cannot be determined; but evidence is not wanting to show that in later periods its members ceased to be uniformly characterized by blameless morals.

It is not easy to give a correct summary of its several functions, as the classic writers are not agreed in their statements, and the jurisdiction of the court varied, as has been seen, with times and circumstances. They have, however, been divided into six general classes (Real-Encyclopædie von Pauly, s. v.).

(1.) Its judicial function embraced trials for murder and manslaughter (φόνου ἕκαστα, τὰ φονικά), and was the oldest and most peculiar sphere of its activity. The indictment was brought by the second or king-archon (ἀρχὸν βασιλεύοντα), whose duties were for the most part of a religious nature. Then followed the oath of both parties, accompanied by solemn appeals to the gods. After this the accuser and the accused had the option of making a speech (the notion of the proceedings of the Areopagus being carried on in the darkness of the night rests on no sufficient foundation), which, however, they were obliged to keep free from all extraneous matter (ἴζω τοῦ πρᾶγματος), as well as from mere rhetorical ornaments. After the first speech, the accused was permitted to go into voluntary banishment if he had no reason to expect a favorable issue. Theft, poisoning, wounding, incendiarism, and treason belonged also to this department of jurisdiction in the court of the Areopagus.

(2.) Its political function consisted in the constant watch which it kept over the legal condition of the state, acting as overseer and guardian of the laws (ἐπίσκοπος καὶ φύλαξ τῶν νόμων).

(3.) Its police function also made it a protector and upholder of the institutions and laws. In this character the Areopagus had jurisdiction over novelties in religion, in worship, in customs, in every thing that departed from the traditional and established usages and modes of thought (πατριᾶς νομιμῶς) which a regard to their ancestors endeared to the nation. This was an ancient and well-supported sphere of activity. The members of the court had a right to take oversight of festive meetings in private houses. In ancient times they fixed the number of the guests, and determined the style of the entertainment. If a person had no obvious means of subsisting, or was known to live in idleness, he was liable to an action before the Areopagus; if condemned three times, he was punished with ἀργία, the loss of his civil rights. In later times the court possessed the right of giving permission to teachers (philosophers and rhetoricians) to establish themselves and pursue their profession in the city.

(4.) Its strictly religious jurisdiction extended itself over the public creed, worship, and sacrifices, embracing generally every thing which could come under the denomination of τὰ ἱερά—sacred things. It was its special duty to see that the religion of the state was kept pure from all foreign elements. The accusation of impiety (γραφή ἀσεβείας)—the vagueness of which admitted almost any charge connected with religious innovations—belonged in a special manner to this tribunal, though the charge was in some cases heard before the court of the Heliastæ. The freethinking poet Euripides stood in fear of, and was restrained by, the Areopagus (Euseb. Prep. Evang. vi, 14; Bayle, s. v. Eurip.). Its proceeding in such cases was sometimes rather of an admonitory than punitive character.

(5.) Not less influential was its moral and educational power. Isocrates speaks of the care which it took of good manners and good order (τῆς εὐκοσμίας, εὐταξίας). Quintilian relates that the Areopagus condemned a boy for plucking out the eyes of a quail—a sentence which has been both misunderstood and misrepresented (Penny Cyclop. s. v.), but which its original narrator approved, assigning no insufficient reason, namely, that the act was the sign of a cruel disposition, likely in advanced life to lead to baneful actions (Quint. v, 9). The court exercised a salutary influence in general over the Athenian youth, their educators and their education.

(6.) Its financial position is not well understood; most probably it varied more than any other part of its administration with the changes which the constitution of the city underwent. It may suffice to mention, on the authority of Plutarch (Themis. c, 10), that in the Persian war the Areopagus had the merit of completing the number of men required for the fleet by paying eight drachmæ each.—Kitto, s. v.

A' res (Αρές), one of those whose "sons" (to the number of 656) are said (1 Esdr. v, 10) to have returned from Babylon; evidently the ARAU (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 5; Neh. vii, 10).

Ar'etas (Αρέτας; Arab. charresh, Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. p. 58, or, in another form, chawish = חרש, graver, Pococke, i, 70, 76, 77, 89), the common name of several Arabian kings (see Diod. Sic. xiv, 70; comp. Wesseling; Michaelis, in Pctt's Sylog. iii, 62 sq.).

1. The first of whom we have any notice was a contemporary of the Jewish high-priest Jason and of Antiochus Epiphanes, about B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v, 8): "In the end, therefore, he (Jason) had an unhappy return, being accused before Aretas, the king of the Arabians."

2. Josephus (Ant. xiii, 13, 3) mentions an Aretas, king of the Arabians (surnamed Obodas, Ὀβόδας, Ant. xiii, 13, 5), contemporary with Alexander Jannæus (died B.C. 79) and his sons. After defeating Antiochus Dionysus, he reigned over Cœle-Syria, "being called to the government by those that held Damascus (καληθείς εἰς τὴν ἀρχὴν ὑπὸ τῶν τὴν Δαμασκὸν ἔχοντων) by reason of the hatred they bore to Ptolemy Mennæus" (Ant. xiii, 15, 2). He took part with Hyrcanus, who had taken refuge with him (War, i, 6, 2), in his contest (Ant. xiv, 1, 4) for the sovereignty with his brother Aristobulus (q. v.), and laid siege to Jerusalem (B.C. 65), but, on the approach of the Roman general Scaurus, he retreated to Philadelphia (War, i, 6, 3). Hyrcanus and Aretas were pursued and defeated by Aristobulus at a place called Papyrus, and lost above 6000 men (Ant. xiv, 2, 3). After Pompey had reduced Syria to a Roman province, Aretas submitted to him again, B.C. 64 (see Dion Cass. xxxvii, 15; Appian, Mithr. 166; Plut. Pomp. 39, 41). Three or four years after, Scaurus, to whom Pompey had committed the government of Cœle-Syria, invaded Petra, but, finding it difficult to obtain provisions for his army, he consented to withdraw on the offer of 200 talents from Aretas (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, 1; War, i, 8, 1). This expedition is commemorated on a coin. See SCAURUS. The successors of Scaurus in Syria also prosecuted the war with the Arabs (Appian, Syr. 50).—Kitto, s. v.

Probable Coin of Aretas II, with the Greek Inscription, "Of King Aretas Philhellens" (Lover of the Greeks)—an epithet perhaps assumed by him on acquiring his dominion.

3. Aretas, whose name was originally Aeneas (Αἰνεάς), succeeded Obodas (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 9, 4). He was the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. The latter made proposals of marriage to the wife of his half-brother Herod-Philip, Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, their brother, and the sister of Agrippa the Great. (On the apparent discrepancy between the Evangelists and Josephus, in reference to the name of the husband of Herodias, see Lardner's Credibility, etc., ii, 5; Works, 1835, i, 408-416.) In consequence of this the daughter of Aretas returned to her father, and a war (which had been fomented by previous disputes about the limits of their respective countries, see Joseph. Ant. xvii, 10, 9) ensued between Aretas and Herod. The army of the latter was totally destroyed; and on his sending an account of his disaster to Rome the emperor immediately ordered Vitellius to bring Aretas prisoner alive, or, if dead, to send his head (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 1). But while Vitellius was on his march to Petra, news arrived of the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37), upon which, after administering the oath of allegiance to his troops, he dismissed them to winter-quarters and returned to Rome (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 3). The Aretas into whose dominions Elius Gellius came in the time of Augustus (Strabo, xvi, 781) is probably the same. There is another coin extant inscribed Φιλέλλημος, i. e. lover of the Greeks (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. iii, 330), that may have belonged to this Aretas.—Kitto, s. v.

Supposed Coin of Aretas III, with a similar Legend to the foregoing.

It has been supposed by many that it was at the above juncture that Aretas took possession of Damascus, and placed a governor in it (ἐθνήραρχος) with a garrison, as stated by the Apostle Paul: "In Damascus the governor under Aretas, the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me; and through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands" (2 Cor. xi, 32, compared with Acts ix, 24). In that case we are furnished with a chronological mark in the apostle's history. From Gal. i, 18, it appears that Paul went up to Jerusalem from Damascus three years after his conversion. See PAUL. The Emperor Tiberius died March 16, A.D. 37; and, as the affairs of Arabia were settled in the second year of Caligula, Damascus was then most probably reoccupied by the Romans. The city under Augustus and Tiberius was attached to the province of Syria; and we have Damascene coins of both these emperors, and again of Nero and his successors. But we have none of Caligula and Claudius, and the following circumstances make it probable that the rulership of Damascus was changed after the death of Tiberius. By this occurrence at Rome a complete reversal took place in the situation of Antipas and his enemy. The former was ere long (A.D. 39) banished to Lyons, and his kingdom given to Agrippa, his foe (Ant. xviii, 7), who had been living in habits of intimacy with the new emperor (Ant. xviii, 6, 5). It would be natural that Aretas, who had been grossly injured by Antipas, should, by this change of affairs, be received into favor; and the more so as Vitellius had an old grudge against Antipas (Ant. xviii, 4, 5). Now in the year 38 Caligula made several changes in the East, granting Iturea to Soëmus, Lesser Armenia and parts of Arabia to Cotys, the territory of Cotys to Rhemetalcus, and giving to Polemon, son of Polemon, his father's government. These facts, coupled with that of no Damascene coins of Caligula or Claudius existing, make it probable that about this time Damascus, which belonged to the predecessor of Aretas (Ant. xiii, 5, 2), was granted to him by Caligula. The other hypotheses, that the ethnarch was only visiting the city (as if he could then have guarded the walls to prevent escape), that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius giving up the expedition against him (as if a Roman governor of a province would allow one of its chief cities to be taken from him merely because he was in uncertainty about the policy of a new emperor), are very improbable (Wieseler, Chron. des apostolischen Zeitalters, p. 174). If, then, Paul's flight took place in A.D. 39, his conversion must have occurred in A.D. 35 (Neander's History of the Planting of the Christian Church, i, 107; Lardner's Credibility, etc., Supplement, ch. xi; Works, v, 497, ed. 1835; Schmidt in Keil's Analyt., iii, 135 sq.; Bertholdt, Eind. v, 2702 sq.). But it is still more likely that the possession of Damascus by Aretas to which Paul alludes occurred earlier, on the affront of his daughter by the espousal of Herodias (Luke iii, 19, 20; Mark vi, 16; Matt. xiv, 3), which stands in connection with the death of John the Baptist (q. v.); and in that case it affords neither date nor difficulty in the apostle's history (see Browne's Ordo Seclorum, p. 113 n.; Conybeare and Howson, i, 82; Smith's Dict. of Class. Lit., s. v.).—Smith, s. v. See CHRONOLOGY.

4. One or more other kings of Arabia by the same name are mentioned in history (Strabo, xvii, 781; Dio Cass. xxxvii, 15; comp. Asseman, Bibl. Or. i, 367; ii, 321; HI. i, 139), and a coin of one of them is extant (Mionet, Desc. des médailles antiques, p. 284, 285; comp. Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 107); but it is not clear that the Aretas whom Josephus names as having a contest with Syllaus (Ant. xvii, 3, 2; War. i, 29, 3) was different from the preceding, and the succeeding kings of that name are unimportant in any Scriptural relation (see Anger, De tempor. ratione, p. 173; Heyne, De Areta Arabum reg., Viteb. 1775;

Third Coin of Aretas (II, III, or later, perhaps earlier), with the same inscription.

Heinold, De ethnarcha Judæorum Paulo obsidiante, Jen. 1757).

Aretas, or Arethas, a bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, is supposed to have lived in the second half of the sixth century. He wrote a Commentary on the Revelation (Συλλογὴ ἐξηγησέων), giving a collection of the opinions of different authors. See ANDREW (Bishop of Cæsarea).

Aretius, BENEDICT, a celebrated theologian and botanist; professor of logic at Marburg, 1548; appointed professor of languages at Berne, in Switzerland, 1563, and professor of theology the same year; in which office he remained until his death in 1754, leaving many works, among them—1. Examen Theologicum, or Locæ Conamnes (Geneva, 1759 and 1617), a voluminous work, much sought after at the time;—2. Commentaria Eræce in Pentateuchum (Berne, 1602);—3. Lectiones vii de Cena Domini (Geneva, 1589);—4. Also Commentaries on the Four Gospels, on the Acts, on all the Epistles of St. Paul, on the Apocalypse. In 1580 appeared a Commentary on the whole New Testament, in 11 vols. 8vo.—Adam, Vite Theol. Germ.; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 512.

Are'üs, a king of the Lacedæmonians, whose letter to the high-priest Onias is given in 1 Macc. xii, 20 sq. He is so called in the A. V. in ver. 20 and in the margin of ver. 7; but Oniäres in ver. 19, and so in the Greek text 'Ονιάρης (v. r. 'Ονιάρης, 'Ονιάρης) in ver. 20, and Darius (Δαρίος) in ver. 7: there can be little doubt, however, that these are corruptions of Are'üs. In Josephus (Ant. xii, 4, 10) the name is written (Are'üs) as in the Vulgate Areus. There were two Spartan kings of the name of Areus, of whom the first reigned B.C. 309-265, and the second, the grandson of the former, died when a child of eight years old in B.C. 257. There were three high-priests of the name of Onias, of whom the first held the office B.C. 323-800. This is the one who must have written the letter to Areus I, probably in some interval between 309 and 300 (Grimm, 2d Macc. p. 185). See ONIAS. This Areus was foremost in the league of the Greek states against Antigonus Gonatus (B.C. 280), and when Iyrhus attacked Sparta (B.C. 272) he repelled him by an alliance with the Argives. He fell in battle against the Macedonians at Corinth (Smith's Dict. of Class. Lit., s. v.).—Smith, s. v.

Argenteus, Codex (silver manuscript), a MS. of part of the N. T., so called from the silver letters in which it is written. This codex is preserved in the University of Upsal, and is a copy from the Gothic version of Ulfilas, which was made in the fourth century. It is of a quarto size, is written on vellum, the leaves of which are stained with a violet color; and on this ground the letters, which are all uncial, or capitals, are painted in silver, except the initial letters, which are in gold, of course now much faded. It contains fragments of the four gospels (in the Latin order, Matth., John, Luke, Mark) on 188 (out of about 320) leaves, so regularly written that some have imagined they were impressed with a stamp. This MS. was first discovered by Ant. Morillon in 1597, in the library of the Benedictine abbey of Werden, in Westphalia, but by some means it was deposited in Prague, and was taken to Stockholm by the Swedes on the capture of the former place in 1648. Queen Christina appears to have given it to her librarian Vossius prior to 1655, and while in his hands a transcript of it was made by one Derrer. Through the agency of Puffendorf, it was purchased by Count de la Gardie for the Swedish library, where it still remains. Vossius had previously placed the MS. in his uncle Junius's hands for publication; and in 1665 the text of the Gothic gospels, so far as contained in this codex, was edited at Dort under his care, accompanied by the Anglo-Saxon version, edited by Thos. Marshall. This edition was in Gothic characters cut for the purpose, and for it Junius employed the transcript made by Derrer.—Tregelles, in Horne's Introd. iv, 301. See GOTHIC VERSIONS.

Argentine Confederation, a confederation of states in South America, consisting in 1865, when Buenos Ayres, which had seceded in 1851, had been reunited with it, of 14 provinces, with a population of about 1,171,800. It constituted itself an independent state in 1816. The population, partly Europeans, partly Africans, partly Indians, partly of mixed descent, belong mostly to the Roman Catholic Church. The inhabitants of the country district (Pamperos) surpass in rudeness all other tribes of South America, and show very little interest in religion. The Roman Catholic Church has five bishoprics, Buenos Ayres, Corlova, Salta, Sarana, and Cuyo, all of which are suffragans of the archbishop of Charcas, in Bolivia. In 1825 religious toleration was granted to all denominations, and in 1834 mixed marriages were allowed, provided that the parents agreed to bring up all the children in the Roman Catholic Church. The tithes were placed under the administration of the government, which uses one part of them for school and other objects of common interest. The convents were suppressed, except one convent of Franciscans and two convents of nuns, and their property confiscated. Later, the Dominicans were again allowed to settle, and the Franciscans to receive new members from Spain. The Jesuits established themselves at Buenos Ayres in 1841. In 1858 there were disturbances at Buenos Ayres in consequence of the bishop prohibiting ecclesiastical rites at the burial of free-masons. Protestant missionaries came to the Argentine Confederation from the United States in 1835, and many copies of the Scriptures were disseminated. A treaty with the United States in 1852 guaranteed freedom of Protestant worship and burial. The Methodist mission in Buenos Ayres, commenced in 1836, is in a flourishing condition. The church and congregation support the pastor and pay the current expenses of the church and parsonage. According to the report of the Rev. William Goddellow, superintendent of the Methodist missions in South America, there were, in 1864, appointments at Tatay, Lobos, Guardia del Monte, Canelas, and Tuyu, all in the province of Buenos Ayres. At Azul, in the same province, about seventy leagues from the city of Buenos Ayres, where there is a fine region, rapidly filling up with good Protestant settlers, a separate charge has been arranged, holding a quarterly conference. In the province of Santa Fé, Rosario, the second city of the confederation, with an aggregate population of 12,000 or more, has a rapidly increasing Protestant population, and already possesses a Protestant cemetery, which was consecrated in 1864. At Esperanza, also in the province of Santa Fé, there were at that date about 600 Protestants, who were so located as to constitute an important point in reference to further extensions. San Carlos, in the same province, had a Protestant population of 500 Germans and French, whose number bade fair to increase rapidly by immigration. Another settlement of European Protestants was at San José, near Parana, in the province of Entre Rios. It was expected that the bulk of these Protestant colonists would unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1864 the church counted 88 members and 35 probationers, and a flourishing Sunday-school, with 155 scholars and 20 officers. See Wiggers, Kirchliche Statistik: 46th Annual Report of the Miss. Soc. of the M. E. Church (N. Y. 1865). See AMERICA.

Argentré, CHARLES DU PLESSIS D', bishop of Tulle, was born in the Castle du Plessis, near Vitry, May 16, 1673, and died Oct. 27, 1740. In 1699 he was appointed by Louis XIV to the abbey of St. Croix de Guingamp, and in 1700 he became a doctor of the Sorbonne. In 1705 he attended the General Assembly of the clergy of France as a deputy of the second order from the province of Tours. In 1707 he was appointed by the bishop of Tréguier vicar general; in 1709, almoner of the king; and in 1723, bishop of Tulle. In 1723 he also attended the General Assembly of the clergy of France as a deputy of the first order from the province of Bourges. He wrote numerous theological and philosophical works, among which are L'Analyse de Foi (against Jurieu, Lyons, 1698, 2 vols. 12mo); Lexicon Philosophicum (Hague, 1706, 4to).—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 130.

Ar'gob (Heb. Argob'), אַרְגוֹב, for אַרְגוֹב, with א prosthetic, stone-heap), the name of a place and also of a man.

1. (Sept. Ἀργώβ, but in Kings Ἐργώβ). A district in Bashan beyond the lake Gennesareth, containing 60 cities (HAVORH-JAHU), originally ruled over by Og (Deut. iv, 4, 13), and eventually formed into a pnyevorship by Solomon (1 Kings iv, 13). The name may probably be traced in the Ragab (רַגַּב) of the Mishna (Menechoth, viii, 3), the Rigobah (רִיגוֹבָה) of the Samaritan version (see Winer's Diss. de vers. Saur. inbale, p. 55), the Ragaba (Ραγαβία) of Josephus (Ant. xiii, 15, 5), and the Argi or Ergiba (Ἐργαβία) placed by Jerome and Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Argob) 15 Roman miles west of Gerasa (see Reland, Palest. p. 959). Josephus elsewhere (Ant. viii, 2, 3) seems to locate it in Trachonitis (q. v.), i. e. Gaulonitis, where Burckhardt is disposed to find it in El-Husan, a remarkable ruined site (Syria, p. 279), but Mr. Banks (Quar. Rev. xxvi, 389) has assigned this to Gamala (comp. Jour. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1852, p. 364). Dr. Robinson identifies it with the modern village with ruins called Rajib, a few miles north-east of the junction of the Jabbok with the Jordan (Researches, iii, Append. p. 166); and Dr. Thomson very properly remarks that it probably denotes rather the whole adjacent region, for the hill on which U. Keis (somewhat to the north) stands is called Arkob by the Bedouins (Land and Book, ii, 54).—Kitto, s. v.

From this special or original locality, however, the term Argob seems to have been extended in its application to designate a large tract to the north-east; for we find it identified (as by Josephus above) with TRACHONITIS (i. e. the rough country) in the Targums (Onkelos and Jonathan אַרְגוֹב בְּרַגְבָּה, Jerusalem אַרְגוֹב בְּרַגְבָּה). Later we trace it in the Arabic version of Saadiah as Majeb (with the same meaning); and it is now apparently identified with the Lajib, a very remarkable district south of Damascus, and east of the Sea of Galilee, which has been visited and described by Burckhardt (p. 111-119), Seetzen, and Porter (specially ii, 240-245). This extraordinary region—about 22 miles from north to south, by 14 from west to east, and of a regular, almost oval shape—has been described as an ocean of basaltic rocks and boulders, tossed about in the wildest confusion, and intermingled with fissures and crevices in every direction. "It is," says Mr. Porter, "wholly composed of black basalt, which appears to have issued from innumerable pores in the earth in a liquid state, and to have flowed out on every side. Before cooling, its surface was violently agitated, and it was afterward shattered and rent by internal convulsions. The cup-like cavities from which the liquid mass was extruded are still seen, and likewise the wavy surface a thick liquid assumes which cools while flowing. The rock is filled with little pits and air-bubbles; it is as hard as flint, and emits a sharp metallic sound when struck" (p. 241). "Strange as it may seem, this ungainly and forbidding region is thickly studded with deserted cities and villages, in all of which the dwellings are solidly built, and of remote antiquity" (p. 238). The number of these towns visited by one traveller lately returned is 50, and there were many others to which he did not go. A Roman road runs through the district from south to north.

probably between Bosra and Damascus. On the edge of the Lejah are situated, among others, the towns known in Biblical history as Kenath and Edrei. In the absence of more conclusive evidence on the point, a strong presumption in favor of the identification of the Lejah with Argob arises from the peculiar Hebrew word constantly attached to Argob, and in this definite sense apparently to Argob only. This word is צֶמֶךְ (Che'bel), literally "a rope" ($\sigma\tau\rho\iota\sigma\mu\alpha$, $\pi\epsilon\pi\eta\mu\epsilon\tau\theta\omicron\nu$, janiculus), and it designates with striking accuracy the remarkably defined boundary-line of the district of the Lejah, which is spoken of repeatedly by its latest explorer as "a rocky shore;" "sweeping round in a circle clearly defined as a rocky shore-line;" "resembling a Cyclopean wall in ruins" (Porter, ii, 19, 219, 230, etc.). The extraordinary features of this region are rendered still more remarkable by the contrast which it presents with the surrounding plain of the Hauran, a high plateau of waving downs of the richest agricultural soil stretching from the Sea of Galilee to the Lejah, and beyond that to the desert, almost literally "without a stone;" and it is not to be wondered at—if the identification proposed above be correct—that this contrast should have struck the Israelites, and that their language, so scrupulous of minute topographical distinctions, should have perpetuated in the words Mishor and Chebel (which see severally) at once the level downs of Bashan (q. v.), the stony labyrinth which so suddenly intrudes itself on the soil (Argob), and the definite fence or boundary which incloses it.—Smith, s. v. See HAURAN.

2. (Sept. אַרְגֹב .) A subaltern or ally of Pekahiah (B.C. 757), as appears from 2 Kings xv, 25, where we read that Pekah conspired against Pekahiah, king of Israel, "and smote him in Samaria, in the palace of the king's house, with Argob and Arieh." In giving this version, some think our translators have mistaken the sense of the original, which they therefore render "smote him in the harem of the palace of the king of Argob and Arieh," as if these were the names of two cities in Samaria. Others, however, maintain, with good reason, that the particle וְאִרְיָהוּ is properly translated with, i. e. these two officers were assassinated at the same time; so the Sept. ($\mu\epsilon\tau\acute{\alpha}$). It will hardly bear the other construction: the word strictly denotes near (Vulg. prope), but that would yield no tolerable sense to the whole passage (see Kiehl, Comment. in loc.). According to some, Argob was an accomplice of Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah. But Sebastian Schmid explained that both Argob and Arieh were two princes of Pekahiah whose influence Pekah feared, and whom he therefore slew with the king. Rashi understands by Argob the royal palace, near which was the castle in which the murder took place. In like manner, Arieh, named in the same connection ("the lion," so called probably from his daring as a warrior), was either one of the accomplices of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, or, as Schmid understands, one of the princes of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him. Rashi explains the latter name literally of a golden lion which stood in the castle. See PEKAH.

Argyle (Ergalia), an episcopal see in Scotland; the diocese contains the counties or districts of Argyle, Lorn, Kintyre, and Lochaber, with some of the Western Isles, as Lismore, where the see is. The present title of the see is "Argyle and the Western Isles," and the incumbent in 1865 was Alexander Ewing, D.D., consecrated in 1847.

Arialdus, deacon and martyr of the church of Milan in the 11th century. The Roman Church in the north of Italy was then very corrupt; a wide-spread licentiousness, originating from the unnatural institution of priestly celibacy, prevailed. Great numbers of the clergy kept concubines openly. Some earnest men, shocked by this flagrant evil, vainly imagined the strict enforcement of celibacy the only effectual cure. Chief among these reformers stood Arialdus, whose life was one continued scene of violent controversy. Although successively sanctioned by Popes Stephen X, Nicholas II, and Alexander II, he found little sympathy among his brethren, and used to complain that he could only get laymen to assist him in his agitation. Having at length succeeded in obtaining a papal bull of excommunication against the archbishop of Milan, a fierce tumult ensued in the city, whose inhabitants declared against Arialdus and his coadjutors. Arialdus now fled to the country; but his hiding-place being betrayed, he was conveyed captive to a desert isle in Lake Maggiore, where he was murdered by the emissaries of the archbishop, and his remains thrown into the lake, June 28, 1066. He was afterward canonized by Pope Alexander II.—Acta Sanctorum, June 28; Chambers, Encyclopædia, s. v.

Arianism, a heresy with regard to the person of Christ which spread widely in the church from the fourth to the seventh centuries. It took its name from Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, said to have been a Libyan, and a man of subtle, but not profound mind. The most probable account is that he was educated in the school of Lucian the martyr at Antioch; and the doctrinal position of Lucian (scientifically nearer to the subsequent doctrine of Arius than of Athanasius) helps to explain not only how Arius's view arose, but also how it happened to be so widely received (comp. Dörner, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 490; Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii, 10; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. iii, 5). He is said to have favored Meletius (q. v.), who was deposed A.D. 306; but it appears that Peter, bishop of Alexandria, the great enemy of Meletius, ordained Arius deacon (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i, 15) about A.D. 311, but soon, on account of his turbulent disposition, ejected him. When Peter was dead, Arius feigned penitence; and being pardoned by Achilles, who succeeded Peter, he was by him raised to the priesthood, and intrusted with the church of Baucalis, in Alexandria (Epiphanius, Hæres. 68, 4). It is said that on the death of Achilles, A.D. 313, Arius was greatly mortified because Alexander was preferred before him, and made bishop, and that he consequently sought every occasion of exciting tumults against Alexander; but this story rests simply on a remark of Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. i, 2) that Arius was envious of Alexander.

1. Ancient Arianism.—1. First Period: to the Council of Nice.—The eloquence of Arius gained him popularity; and he soon began to teach a doctrine concerning the person of Christ inconsistent with His divinity. When Alexander had one day been addressing his clergy, and insisting that the Son is co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father ($\text{ὁμοῦνον τοῦ Πατρὸς, καὶ τῆν αὐτὴν οὐσίαν ἔχων}$, Theod. i, 11), Arius opposed him, accused him of Sabellianism, and asserted that there was a time when the Son was not ($\text{ἦν ὄτε οὐκ ἦν ὁ υἱός}$), since the Father who begot must be before the Son who was begotten, and the latter, therefore, could not be eternal (Socrat. Hist. Eccl. i, 5). Such is the account, by the early writers, of the origin of the controversy. But if it had not begun in this way, it must soon have begun in some other. The points in question had not arrived at scientific precision in the mind of the church; and it was only during the Arian controversy, and by means of the earnest struggles invoked by it, carried on through many years, causing the convocation of many synods, and employing some of the most acute and profound intellects the church has ever seen, that a definite and permanent form of truth was arrived at (Dörner, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 227). See ATHANASIUS. At length, Alexander called a council of his clergy, which was attended by nearly one hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops, by whom Arius was deposed and excommunicated (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i, 15). This decision was conveyed to all the foreign bishops by circulars sent by Alexander himself (A. D. 321). Arius retired to Palestine, where by his eloquence and talents he soon gained a number of converts. Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who had also studied under Lucian, and doubtless held his opinions, naturally inclined to favor Arius, who addressed to Eusebius a letter, still extant (Epiphanius, Hæres. 69, 6, and in Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i, 5), from which we derive our knowledge of the first stage of Arian opinion. It runs thus: "We cannot assent to these expressions, 'always Father, always Son;' 'at the same time Father and Son;' that 'the Son always co-exists with the Father;' that 'the Father has no pre-existence before the Son, no, not so much as in thought or a moment.' But this we think and teach, that the Son is not unbegotten, nor a part of the unbegotten by any means. Nor is he made out of any pre-existent thing; but, by the will and pleasure of the Father, he existed before time and ages, the only begotten God, unchangeable; and that before He was begotten, or made, or designed, or founded, he was not. But we are persecuted because we say that the Son has a beginning, and that God has no beginning. For this we are persecuted; and because we say the Son is out of nothing. Which we therefore say, because he is not a part of God, or made out of any pre-existent thing" (Ὁὐδέποτε, ὅτι ὁ υἱὸς οὐκ ἔστιν ἀγέννητος, οὐδὲ μέρος ἀγέννητου κατ' οὐδένα τρόπον, οὐδέ ἐξ ὑποκειμένου τινός· ἀλλ' ὅτι θελήματι καὶ βουλήν ὑπέστη πρὸ χρόνων καὶ πρὸ αἰώνων πλήρους θεός, μονογενής, ἀναλλοίωτος, καὶ πρὶν γεννηθῆναι, ἦτοι κτισθῆναι, ἢ οὐσιθῆναι, ἢ περιελαθῆναι, οὐκ ἦν ἀγέννητος γὰρ οὐκ ἦν· ἐκωκίμεθα ὅτι εἶπαμεν, ἀρχὴν εἶναι τὸν υἱόν, ὃ ἐξ θεοῦ ἀναρχὸς ἔστι . . . καὶ ἐπιμένει, ὅτι ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἔστιν· οὕτω ἐξ εἶπαμεν καθότι οὐδὲ μέρος θεοῦ οὐδὲ ἐξ ὑποκειμένου τινός). Voigt (in his Lehre des Athanasius von Alexandrien) gives this letter, with critical emendations, which elucidate the development of the opinions of Arius (see transl. from Voigt, by Dr. Schaeffer, in Bibliotheca Sacra, xxi, 1-28). The second direct source of our knowledge of the opinions of Arius is a letter addressed by him to Alexander (preserved in Epiphanius Hæres. 69, 7, and in Athanasius, De Synod. 16), in which he states his positions plausibly and cautiously, and claims that they are the traditional opinions of the church. "We believe that there are three Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. God, the cause of all things, is alone without beginning. The Son, begotten of the Father before time, made before the ages were founded, was not before he was begotten. Nor is he eternal, or co-eternal, or begotten at the same time with the Father." In these two letters Arius teaches that the Father alone is God, and that the Son is his creature. He still regards the Son, however, "as occupying a unique position among creatures; as unalterable and unchangeable; and as bearing a distinctive and peculiar likeness to the Father" (Dorner, l. c. p. 236). He terms the Son "a perfect creature of God, but not as one of the creatures; an offspring, but not as one of those who are generated" (Ep. ad Alex.). Alexander now wrote a letter to Alexander of Constantinople (Theod. i, 4), in which he charges Arius with teaching not only that the Son is less than the Father, but also that he is "liable to change," notwithstanding that Arius, in the epistles cited above, speaks of the Son as "unalterable and unchangeable" (ἀναλλοίωτος, ἀτρέπτος). But Arius abandoned these terms, and set forth the changeableness of the Son without reservation in his Thalia (Θάλεια), the latest of his writings known to us (written during his stay at Nicomedia). It is partly in prose and partly in verse, and obviously addressed to the popular ear. What we have extant of it is preserved in Athanasius (cont. Arianos, i, 5-9; De Synod. 15; see citations from all the remains of Arius in Gieseler, Ch. History, i, § 79).

A council was called in Bithynia (A. D. 323) by Eusebius of Nicomedia, and other favorers of Arius, by which an epistle was written to "all bishops," exhorting them to hold fellowship with Arius (Sozomen, i, 15). Another council was now held at Alexandria (323?), from which Alexander sent forth an encyclical letter against Arius, and also sharply censured Eusebius of Nicomedia, and other Eastern bishops, as supporters of grave heresy (preserved in Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 6). We now hear, for the first time, the name of Eusebius of Caesarea in connection with the controversy. He did not accept the Arian formula (ὅτι πότε ἦν οὐκ ἦν); but, as he had been educated in Origen's denial of the eternal Sonship of Christ, he was just in the position to suggest a compromise between the opposing parties. He wrote letters in this spirit (excusing Arius) to Alexander; but the question at issue was a fundamental one, ready for its final decision, and the day of compromise was past and gone (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. i, 15; Epiphanius, Hæres. 69, 4; see EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA). The controversy had now spread like a flame throughout the Eastern empire, and at last Constantine found it absolutely necessary to bring it to a point. At first he sought to reconcile Alexander and Arius by a letter in which he urged them to drop discussion on unessential points, and to agree together for the harmony of the church. This letter was conveyed by his court bishop, Hosius; but he met with no success, and an uproar arose in Alexandria, in which the effigy of the emperor himself was insulted. As all the provincial synods had only helped to fan the flame of strife, Constantine determined to call a general council of bishops, and accordingly the first œcumenical council was held at Nice, A. D. 325, consisting of 318 bishops, most of whom were from the East. (See NICE, COUNCIL OF.)

The gist of the question to be settled by the Council of Nice lay in the summary argument of Arius: "The Father is a Father; the Son is a Son; therefore the Father must have existed before the Son; therefore once the Son was not; therefore he was made, like all creatures, of a substance that had not previously existed." This was the substance of the doctrine of Arius. His intellect, logical, but not profound or intuitive, could not embrace the lofty doctrine of an eternal, unbeginning generation of the Son. In a truly rationalistic way, he thought that he could argue from the nature of human generation to divine; not seeing that his argument, while insisting on the truth of the Sonship of Christ, ended by alienating Him wholly from the essence of the Father. "The Arian Christ was confessedly lacking in a divine nature, in every sense of the term. Though the Son of God was united with human nature in the birth of Jesus, yet that Son of God has a κρίσιμα. He indeed existed long before that birth, but not from eternity. The only element, consequently, in the Arian construction of Christ's person that was preserved intact and pure was the humanity" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, i, 393). Of the debates upon these great questions in the Council of Nice no full account is extant. Athanasius, who was then a deacon under Alexander, bore a prominent part in the council, and contributed largely to its decisions, in defence of which the remainder of his life was chiefly occupied. See ATHANASIUS. For an account of the proceedings, as far as known, see Kaye, Council of Nicea (Lond. 1853). Eusebius of Caesarea was also a chief actor in the council, and sought, in harmony with his character and habits, to act as mediator. He proposed, finally, a creed which he declared he had "received from the bishops who had preceded him and from the Scriptures" (Socrates, Eccl. Hist. i, 8), which received the immediate approbation of Constantine. It did not, however, contain the word ὁμοούσιος, which was insisted upon by the orthodox. (It is given in parallel columns with the Nicene Creed in Christian Yearly-Advertiser, January, 1854, p. 133.) The Creed, as finally adopted, condemned the heresy of Arius, and fixed the doctrine of the person of Christ as it has been held in the church to this day, declaring the Son to be "begotten of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made" (see Socrates, Hist. i, 8; and article CREED, NICENE). According to Sozomen (i, 20), all the bishops but fifteen, according to Socrates (i, 8), all but five, signed the Creed. These five were Eusebians of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Thomas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais; and of these only the two last held out against the threat of banishment made by the emperor. Arius was excommunicated and banished, and his books ordered by the emperor to be burnt.

2. From the Council of Nice to the Council of Milan.—Soon after the close of the Council of Nice, Eusebians of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nice, being found to continue their countenance of the Arian cause by refusing to carry out its anathemas, were deposed, were both subjected to the same penalty of exile by the emperor, and had successors appointed to their sees. By imposing upon the credulity of Constantine, they were in three years restored, and gained considerable influence at court (Sozom. ii, 16, 27). The indulgent emperor, on the statement being made to him (by a presbyter of the household of his sister Constantia, who herself favored Arianism, and on her death-bed recommended this presbyter to Constantine) that Arius had been misrepresented, and differed in nothing that was important from the Nicene fathers, had him recalled from banishment, and required him to present in writing a confession of his faith (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 25). He did this in such terms as, though they admitted a latent reservation, yet appeared entirely orthodox, and therefore not only satisfied the emperor, but offended some of his own friends, who from that time separated from him (see the Creed in Socrates, i, 26). Athanasius, now bishop of Alexandria, was not so easily imposed upon, but was resolute in refusing Arius admission to the communion, since the Nicene Council had openly condemned him, until a similar synod should receive his submission and restore him. The Synod of Tyre, convened A.D. 335 by the emperor, tried Athanasius on trumped-up charges of immorality, and he was banished. The emperor then sent for Arius to Constantinople, and, after receiving his signature to the Nicene Creed, insisted on his being received to communion by Alexander, the bishop of that city. On the day before this reception was to have taken place Arius died suddenly (A.D. 336) (Socrates, i, 26-38).

Constantine died A.D. 337, and the empire fell to his three sons, Constantine II in Gaul; Constantius in the East; Constans in Italy and Gaul. The latter was a friend and protector of Athanasius. The religious question was now greatly mixed up with politics. On the death of the younger Constantine, the emperor of the East, Constantius (340), took the Arians formally under his protection (Sozom. iii, 18). Eusebians obtained great influence with Constantius, and became bishop of Constantinople A.D. 339, and secured permission for the Arians to celebrate public worship at Alexandria and other places of the Eastern empire. Nevertheless, a council was held at Antioch, A.D. 341, in which the Eastern bishops declared that they could not be followers of Arius, because "how could we, being bi-shops, be followers of a presbyter?" In this synod four creeds were approved, in which an endeavor was made to steer a middle course between the Nicene Homoousios and the definitions of Arius, which two points were considered to be the two extremes of divergence from the standard of ecclesiastical orthodoxy in the East. These four Antiochene creeds are extant in Athanasius, De Synodis, § 22-25 (see Gieseler, Ch. History, i, § 80). As this middle course originated with Eusebians of Nicomedia, its adherents were called Eusebians. The Council of Antioch deposed Athanasius, who went to Rome, and was fully recognized as orthodox by the Synod of Rome, A.D. 342. Another Arian council met at Antioch, A.D. 345, and drew up what was called the long Creed (μακρόστιχος, to be found in Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii, 18), leaving out the homoousion, which they sent to the council of Western bishops summoned by Constans at Milan (A.D. 346). The Milan council not only rejected this creed, but required the deputies who brought it to sign a condemnation of Arianism. Of course they left the council in wrath. The emperors Constantius and Constans endeavored to reconcile the combatants for Oriental and Occidental orthodoxy by calling a general council of both East and West at Sardica, in Illyricum, A.D. 347 (according to Mansi A.D. 344, putting back also the preceding dates); but the Eusebians refused to remain in the council unless Athanasius and other heterodox bishops were excluded. Failing in this, they retired to the neighboring city of Philippopolis, leaving their opponents alone at Sardica. Eusebianism was, under Constantius, as victorious in the East as the Nicene Creed was, under Constans, in the West. The Eusebians procured the deposition of Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, on a charge of Sabellianism. After the death of Constans, A.D. 350, and the victory over Magnentius, A.D. 353, Constantius endeavored to establish Arianism by force in the West. In the synods of Arles, A.D. 354, and of Milan, A.D. 355, he compelled the assembled bishops to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, though most of them were, it is thought, orthodox. Hosius of Cordova and Liberius of Rome, refusing to sign, were deprived of their sees. Athanasius was expelled from Alexandria (A.D. 356), and George of Cappadocia put in his place, not without force of arms. Constantius persecuted the orthodox relentlessly, and it seemed for a time as if their cause were irretrievably ruined. Even Hosius (now a century old) and Liberius were brought to sign a confession which excluded the homoousion.

3. Division among the Arians: History to the Council of Constantinople.—A new era now began with this apparent triumph of Arianism. Heretofore the various classes of opponents of the orthodox doctrine had been kept together by the common bond of opposition. Now that the state and church were both in their power, their differences of doctrine soon became apparent. The reins of government were really in the hands of the Eusebians (q. v.), whose opinions were a compromise between strict Arianism and orthodoxy. The strict Arians were probably in a minority during the whole period of the strife. Their leaders at this period were Actius of Antioch, Eunomius of Cappadocia, and Acacius of Caesarea; and from them the parties were called Actians, Eunomians, Acacians. They were also called ἀνόμοιοι (Anomoeans), because they denied the sameness of the essence of the Son with the Father; and also Heterousians, as they held the Son to be ἕτεροούσιος (of different essence), inasmuch as the unbegotten, according to their materialistic way of judging, could not be similar in essence to the begotten. Actius and Eunomius sought, at the first Council of Sirmium (A.D. 351), to put an end to all communion between Arians and orthodox; but they were vigorously met by the Semi-Arians, led by "Basilius, bishop of Ancyra, and Georgius, bishop of Laodicea, who held fast by the position of the Eusebians, viz. that the Son is of similar essence with the Father (ὁμοούσιος), and were hence called Homoousians and Semi-Arians. Constantius was attached to the Semi-Arians, but a powerful party about his court exerted themselves with no less cunning than perseverance in favor of the Anomoeans. And because they could not publicly vindicate their formula, they persuaded the emperor that, in order to restore peace, the formulas of the two other parties also must be prohibited, which measure they brought about at the second synod of Sirmium (A.D. 357). The formula is given in Walch, Bibl. Synb. p. 133). On the other hand, Basil, bishop of Ancyra, called together a synod at Ancyra (358), which established the Semi-Arian creed, and rejected the Arian (see the decrees in Epiphanius, Hær. 73; the confession of faith adopted by the synod, in Athanasius, de Syn. § 41). Constantius allowed himself to be easily convinced that the Sirmium formula favored the Anomœans, and the confession of faith adopted at the second was now rejected at a third synod of Sirmium (358), and the anathemas of the Synod of Ancyra were confirmed. The Anomœans, for the purpose of uniting in appearance with the Semi-Arians, and yet establishing their own doctrine, now adopted the formula τὸν υἱὸν ὁμοῦτον τῷ πατρὶ κατὰ πάντα ὡς αἱ ἄγαι γραφαὶ λέγουσι τὴν καὶ ἰσοῦσθαι (the Son is similar to the Father in all respects, as the Scriptures say and teach), and succeeded in convincing the emperor that all parties might be easily united in it. For this all bishops were now prepared, and then the Westerns were summoned to a council at Ariminum, the Easterns to another at Seleucia, simultaneously (359). After many efforts, the emperor at last succeeded in getting most of the bishops to adopt that formula. But, along with this external union, not only did the internal doctrinal schism continue, but there were besides differences among such as had been like-minded, whether they had gone in with that union or not. Thus Constantius, at his death, left all in the greatest confusion (A.D. 360). The new emperor, Julian (361-363), was, as a Pagan, of course equally indifferent to all Christian doctrines, and restored all the banished bishops to their sees. Jovian also († 364), and his successors in the West, Valentinian († 375), then Gratian and Valentinian II, maintained general toleration. On the contrary, Valens, emperor of the East (364-378), was a zealous Arian, and persecuted both orthodox and Semi-Arians.

Various causes had contributed, since the death of Constantius, to increase in the East the number of adherents to the Nicene Creed. The majority of the Orientals, who held fast by the emanation of the Son from the Father, were naturally averse to strict Arianism; while the Nicene decrees were naturally allied to their ideas, as being fuller developments of them. Moreover, the orthodox were united and steadfast; the Arians were divided and wavering. Finally, the influence of Monachism, which had now arisen in Egypt, and was rapidly becoming general and influential, was bound up with the fortunes of Athanasius; and in all countries where it was diffused, was busy in favor of the Nicene Creed. One of the first of the important converts was Meletius, formerly an Acaean Arian, who declared himself in favor of the Nicene Creed immediately after he had been nominated bishop of Antioch, A.D. 361. But the old Nicene community, which had still existed in Antioch from the time of Eustathius, and was now headed by a presbyter, Paulinus, refused to acknowledge Meletius as bishop on the charge that he was not entirely orthodox (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii, 44). The Council of Alexandria, assembled by Athanasius (362), sought, indeed, not only to smooth the way generally for the Arians to join their party by mild measures, but endeavored particularly to settle this Antiochian dispute; but Lucifer, bishop of Calaris, gave firm footing to the Meletian schism about the same time by consecrating, as bishop, Paulinus the Eustathian. The Westerns and Egyptians acknowledged Paulinus, the Oriental Nicenes, Meletius, as the orthodox bishop of Antioch. If the emperor Valens (364-378) had now favored the Semi-Arians instead of the Arians, he might, perhaps, have considerably checked the further spread of the Nicene party; but, since he wished to make Arianism alone predominant by horribly persecuting all who thought differently, he drove by this means the Semi-Arians, who did not sink under the persecution, to unite still more closely with the Nicenes. Thus a great part of the Semi-Arians (or, as they were now also called, Macedonians, from Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who had been deposed in 360, at the instigation of the Arians) declared themselves, at several councils of Asia Minor, in favor of the Nicene confession, and sent an embassy to Rome to announce their assent to it (366). The Arians, supported by the emperor Valens, endeavored to counteract this new turn of affairs; yet the Macedonians were always passing over more and more to the Nicene Creed, and for this the three great teachers of the Church, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, began now to work. These new Oriental Nicenians did not believe their faith changed by their assent to the Nicene formula, but thought they had merely assumed a more definite expression for it in the rightly-understood ὁμοούσιος. Since they supposed that they had unchangeably remained steadfast to their faith, they also continued to consider their Eusebian and Semi-Arian fathers as orthodox, although condemned by the old Nicenes. Thus the canons of the Oriental councils held during the schism constantly remained in force, particularly those of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, and of Laodicea (perhaps A.D. 363), which canons afterward passed over from the Eastern to the Western Church. During this time new schisms arose from new disputes on other points of doctrine. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and the controversies respecting the Logos, had for a long time remained untouched. But when, in the East, not only the Semi-Arians, but also many of the new Nicenians, could not get rid of the Arian idea that the Holy Spirit is a creature and servant of God, the other Nicenes took great offence at this, and opposed these errorists as πνευματομάχοις (afterward Macedonians). Finally Apollinarianism arose (see APOLLINARIANISM).

Thus Theodosius, who, as a Spaniard, was a zealous adherent of the Nicene Creed, found at his accession to the throne of the West (379) universal toleration; in the East, Arianism prevalent, the Homoousians persecuted, and, besides them, the parties of the Photinians, Macedonians, and Apollinarians, with innumerable other sects, existing. After conquering the Goths, he determined to put an end to these prolonged and destructive strifes. Accordingly, he summoned a general council at Constantinople (381), by which the schism among the Nicenes was peaceably removed, and the Nicene Creed enlarged, with additions directed against heretics who had risen up since its origin (see CREED, NICENE). Valentinian II allowed the Arians in the West to enjoy freedom of religion some years longer; but the case was quite altered by Theodosius, and a universal suppression of the sect ensued. The last traces of its existence in the Byzantine empire appear under the Emperor Anastasius at Constantinople, 491-518" (Gieseler, Church History, § 81).

4. Closing Period of Ancient Arianism.—In the West, Arianism maintained itself for a long time among the German tribes, which had received Christianity in the Arian form under the emperor Valens. Arianism was carried by the Ostrogoths into Italy, by the Visigoths into Spain, and by the Vandals into Africa. The Ostrogoths, though strong Arians, did not persecute the orthodox. Arianism remained among them till the destruction of the Ostrogoth kingdom by Justinian (A.D. 553). More intolerant against the Catholics were the Visigoths; but Arianism gradually lost hold upon them, and finally, under the guidance of their king, Recaredus, they adopted the Nicene Creed, and were received into the Catholic Church by the Council of Toledo (A.D. 589). The Arian Vandals, after conquering Africa in 429, under the leadership of Genseric, instituted a furious persecution against the Catholics, which did not cease until the destruction of the Vandal empire through Belisarius in 534. The Suevi of Spain became Arians about the middle of the fifth century, probably in consequence of their connection with the Visigoths; they went over to the Catholic Church in 558, under Theodemir. The Burgundians, who came to Gaul as pagans in 417, appear as Arians in 440. The progress of the Catholic Church among this tribe is especially due to Aristus of Vienna, who gained over the son of king Gundobad, Sigismund, who, after his accession to the throne in 517, secured to the Catholic Church the ascendancy. Nowhere did the Arian doctrine maintain itself so long as among the Lombards. They invaded Italy (A.D. 568), and founded a new kingdom at Pavia, and their king, Ancharis, embraced Arian Christianity in 587; but when his successor Agilulph married Theudelinda, the Catholic daughter of the duke of Bavaria, the orthodox faith soon found adherents among them, and the son of Theudelinda, Adalward, gave all the churches to the Catholics. But this called forth a reaction. An Arian ascended the throne, who, however, was unable to suppress Catholicism; and we now find in every important city in Lombardy both a Catholic and an Arian bishop. Under Luitprand, who died in 744, the Catholic Church was entirely predominant. But, although Arianism was externally suppressed, its long prevalence in Spain, Gaul, and Northern Italy left behind it a spirit of opposition to the ecclesiastical supremacy of Rome, and made these countries a fertile soil for the spreading of dissenting doctrines. See Revillont, d'Arianisme des Peuples Germaniques (Paris, 1850, 8vo).

II. MODERN ARIANISM. — After the Reformation, the Antitrinitarians, who soon appeared, were chiefly Socinians. In Italy they especially developed themselves, and Alciati (1553) commenced his heretical course with teaching that Christ was divine, but inferior to the Father. His views were adopted by Joh. Val. Gentilis (q. v.), an acute Calabrian, who was beheaded at Berne (1566), after going far beyond Arianism in heresy. The earlier English writers on the Church history of the period tell of Arians put to death in England for heresy under Elizabeth. Plowright († 1579), Lewis († 1583), Cole and Ket († 1588), are named by Fuller, who, as well as Burnet, speak of Arian sentiments as held and propagated by various individuals in England after the Reformation. There is so much vagueness and inaccuracy in the way in which they speak about them that little dependence can be placed on most of the allegations. Arian views were probably held by individuals from time to time; but no important manifestation took place till the beginning of the 18th century, when Arianism made its appearance in the Church of England, and also among Dissenters. Thomas Emlyn (q. v.), an English Presbyterian (but pastor in Dublin), was deposed for Arianism by the Presbytery of Dublin in 1698 (see Reid, Hist. of Presbyt. Ch. in Ireland, iii, 14), and afterward wrote largely on the controversy (Emlyn, Works, with Life, Lond. 1746, 3 vols, 8vo). In the Church of England Arian views were set forth by Whiston, professor of mathematics at Cambridge, in his Primitive Christianity Revived (Lond. 1711, 4 vols, 8vo), the last volume of which contains an account of what he considered the primitive faith in the person of Christ, and the doctrine of the Trinity, and the first volume a historical account of the proceedings of the University and Convocation against him. His sentiments were declared heretical, and he was ejected from his chair at Cambridge. He still, however, went on to write, and produced a fifth volume of his Primitive Christianity Revived, in 1712; his Council of Nice Vindicated from the Athanasian Heresy, in 1713; his Letter to the Earl of Nottingham, on the Eternity of the Son of God and the Holy Ghost, 1719; to which Lord Nottingham replied in 1720. Whiston went on to the end of his life occasionally publishing on the subject. See WHISTON.

A far more learned and logical champion of error appeared in Dr. Samuel Clarke, who published in 1712 Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, in which he endeavors to show, in a commentary on forty texts of Scripture, the subordination of the Son to the Father. "Reason had so strongly the ascendant in Clarke's composition that every thing must be subjected to its rule and measure; that only must stand, in matters of religious belief, which reason could distinctly grasp and make good by a formal demonstration. His book on The Trinity is pervaded by this spirit, and is very artfully planned. It is divided into three parts; in the first of which are set forth all the passages in the New Testament bearing on the Father, then on the Son, and, lastly, on the Spirit; certain of the passages, and particularly those relating to the Son, being accompanied with brief comments, partly furnished by the author, and partly taken from the fathers and from later theologians. In the second part, the import of all these passages so explained is presented in a series of propositions concerning Father, Son, and Spirit respectively, each proposition accompanied with quotations from the Liturgy of the Church of England, to show the conformity of the propositions with the devotional utterances of the church" (Fairbairn, Apology to Dörner, Person of Christ, v, 373). Clarke was replied to by Dr. Knight in The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity Vindicated against Dr. Clarke (ed. by Nelson, London, 1713 and 1715, 8vo); by Bishop Gastrell, in Some Considerations of Dr. Clarke's Doctrine of the Trinity (republished in Randolph's Enchiridion Theologicum, vol. iii); and by various others. Clarke wrote voluntemously in reply to these and other attacks (Clarke, Collected Works, London, 1788, 4 vols, fol.). His works were translated into German by Semler, and found favor there, at a period in which the tendency of the age was toward "the creaturely aspect of Christ." See CLARKE. But his superior in learning and controversy appeared in Waterland, who published, at different times, A Vindication of Christ's Divinity;—A Further Vindication;—A Defence of the Divinity of Christ, in eight sermons;—The Case of Arian Subscription Considered;—A Critical History of the Athanasian Creed, and the Importance of the Doctrine of the Trinity asserted; making six vols. 8vo, besides smaller pieces. Waterland brought to his task a logical intellect, cool, wary, and disciplined, a thorough knowledge of the fathers, and a profound though unimpassioned love of truth. He demonstrated the inaccuracy, to say the least, of Clarke's patristic learning, and proved that the very fathers whom Clarke had cited maintained the strictly divine, uncreated, eternal being of the Son, while, at the same time, he pointed out their defective apprehension of the eternal filiation. See WATERLAND. On the other side, and in answer to Waterland, Whitty wrote Disquisitiones Modeste, and Reply to Dr. Waterland's Objections against them, in two parts, with an Appendix, 1720-21. An anonymous country clergyman (afterward known to be Mr. Jackson) produced A Reply to Dr. Waterland's Defence of his Queries, 1722, entering very largely into the controversy. It was this book which gave rise to Dr. Waterland's Second Vindication (1723), above mentioned. Dr. Sykes wrote several pamphlets on the subject (Letter to the Earl of Nottingham (1721); Answer to Remarks on Dr. Clarke (1730); Defence of the Answer (1730)). In this controversy, Clarke, and those who sided with him generally, refused to be called Arians, while at the same time they affirmed the subordination of Christ, and denied that he was consubstantial with the Father. Dr. Waterland exposed the sophistry of this position sharply: "They deny the necessary existence of God the Son. Run them down to but the next immediate consequence, precarious existence, and they are amazed and confounded. Push them a little further, as making a creature of God the Son, and they fall to blessing themselves upon it; they make the Son of God a creature! not they; God forbid." The Arian controversy commenced about the same time among the Dissenters, and raged as fiercely and more destructively among them than in the Church of England. It began in the west of England with James Pierce, who, and his colleague Joseph Hallet, were learned Presbyterian ministers in Exeter. The flame spread to London, and occasioned the celebrated Salter's Hall controversy, and led to the most dismal effects on the Presbyterian body. The books and pamphlets written on the subject are very numerous. The principal on the Arian side are the following: The Case of the ejected Ministers of Eron; Defence of ditto; The Western Inquisition, by Pierce; The Case of Martin Tomblins, 1719. On the other side, Dr. Calamy published nineteen sermons concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, 1722, in which the controversy is discussed with considerable ability and learning; and there appeared also The Doctrine of the Trinity stated and defended by some London Ministers, viz. Long, Robinson, Smith, and Reynolds. The controversy was revived again in the Church of England by Dr. Clayton, bishop of Clogher, and for a while carried on with considerable warmth. He published in 1751 An Essay on Spirit, in which the doctrine of the Trinity is considered, etc. This pamphlet was not in reality the bishop's, but the production of a young clergyman, whose cause and sentiments, however, he identified himself with. See CLAYTON. The most learned of all English Arians was Lardner (q. v.). On the orthodox side were William Jones, in his Full Answer to the Essay on Spirit, and afterward in his Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity (Jones, Works, 1801, vol. i), and Dr. Randolph, in his Validation of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1753, 8vo). At the present day Arianism has almost become extinct in England, having merged into one or other of the various grades of Socinianism, and is only to be found, in any thing like a systematic form, among the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland, especially those of the Synod of Munster (see Henderson's Buck, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.; Bogue and Bennett, History of Dissenters, ii, 168 sq.; Reil, Hist. of Presbyter. Ch. in Ireland, iii, 14, 489). Both in England and America there are doubtless many Arians among those who are called Socinians and Unitarians. See articles on these titles, and also ATHANASIUS; TRINITY.

The sources of information on the early history of Arianism are the church histories of Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoret, and also of Philostorgius the Arian, with the writings of Epiphanius and Athanasius. Ariarathes (Ἀριαράθης, apparently compounded of the Persian prefix Ari, the essential element of the old national name Ἄριοι or Ἀρειοί, Herod. iii, 93; vii, 762; signifying "honorable"; see Dr. Rosen, in the Quar. Jour. of Educ. ix, 336; and the Zend ratu, "master," Boop, Vergleichende Grammatik, p. 196; Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, p. xxxvi), a common name of the kings of Cappadocia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.), one of whom is named in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xv, 22), as ruling that country during the time of the Jewish governor Simon, about B.C. 139. See ATTALUS. The king there designated is doubtless Ariarathes V, surnamed Philopator (Φιλοπάτω, lover of his father), who reigned B.C. 163-130, called Mithridates before his accession (Diod. xxxi, or vol. x, p. 25, ed. Bip.), who was supported by Attalus II in his contest with the pretendent to the throne, Holofernes or Orophernes (Polyb. iii, 5; xxxii, 20; Appian, Syr. 47; Justin, xxxv, 1), but was hard pressed by the Syrian King Demetrius. Having been reinstated on his throne by the Romans, among whom he had been brought up (Liv. xlii, 19), he sent his son Demetrius, in connection with Attalus of Pergamos, to assist Ptolemy Philometor against the usurper Alexander Balas, B.C. 152 (Justin, xxxv, 1). See ALEXANDER. After a reign of thirty-three years he fell in battle, B.C. 130, while aiding the Romans against Aristonicus, prince of Pergamos, who had inherited the throne of his father Attalus III (Justin, xxxvi, 4; xxxvii, 1; Liv. Epit. 59). Letters were addressed to him from Rome in favor of the Jews (1 Macc. xv, 22), who in after times seem to have been numerous in his kingdom (Acts ii, 9; comp. 1 Pet. i, 1).

ARIAS MONTANUS (BENEDET), a Spanish priest and Orientalist, born in Estremadura (in a mountainous district, whence the name Montanus) in 1527, of noble but poor parents. He distinguished himself early by his acquaintance with the Oriental languages, and was ordained priest in the order of St. James, of which he had become a clerk. The bishop of Segovia took him with him to the Council of Trent, after which Arias retired to the monastery of Our Lady "de los Angeles," in the mountains of Andalusia, whence, however, he was recalled by King Philip II, to labor at the new Polyglot Bible, which he was causing to be made after that of Alcalá, at the suggestion of the celebrated printer Plantin. This Bible was printed at Antwerp, in 1571, under the title Biblia Sacra, Hebraice, Chaldaice, Græce, et Latine, Philippo II, Regis Catholici Fidei et Studio ad Sacrosanctæ Ecclesiæ Usam Chj. Plantinns excudebat (8 vols. fol.). The "Polyglot" in every respect justified the high expectation which had been formed of it; but in a voyage from the Netherlands to Spain nearly all the copies were lost. The king remunerated Arias's labors by giving him a yearly pension of 2000 ducats, besides other honorary rewards and lucrative offices. Arias was an upright, sincerely orthodox Romanist, but he was a declared enemy of the Jesuits, and that ambitious order omitted no opportunity to take revenge on so dangerous a foe—the more powerful because his orthodoxy had never been questioned, and was supported by uncommon erudition. He was accused of Judaism because he had inserted in the Polyglot certain Chaldee paraphrases, which tended to confirm the Jews in their errors. He made many voyages to Rome to justify himself, and in 1580 was honorably dismissed, and died at Seville in 1588, prior of the convent of St. Jago. Arias's numerous and extensive literary works chiefly belong to theological, but partly also to classical literature, but his Polyglot certainly holds the principal place; it is generally called the "Antwerp Polyglot," or, from the patronage bestowed on it by Philip II, "Biblia Regia," and sometimes also, after the printer, "Biblia Plantiniana."

Ariath, a city mentioned in the Notitia Ecclesiastica, and thought by Porter (Damascus, ii, 156) to be the present large city Irb, nearly three hours north of Busrah, at the west base of the Hauran mountains (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 288).

Arid'ai (Heb. Ariday', אֲרִידַי, of Persian origin, perhaps meaning strong; Sept. Αρδαϊος), the ninth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews of Babylonia (Esth. ix, 9). B.C. cir. 473.

Arid'atha (Heb. Aridatha', אֲרִידַתָּה, same etymol. as Aridai; Sept. Αρδαθᾶ v. r. Αρδαθᾶς), the sixth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esth. ix, 8). B.C. cir. 473.

Ari'eh (Heb. Aryeh', only with the art., אֲרִי־עֵה, the lion; Sept. Αριε), the name applied of one of the body-guard slain with King Pekabiah at Samaria (2 Kings xv, 25). B.C. 757. See ARBOB.

Ari'el (Heb. Ari'el, אֲרִי־אֵל, Sept. Αριήλ), a word meaning "lion of God," and correctly enough rendered by "lion-like" in 2 Sam. xxiii, 20; 1 Chron. xi, 22. It was applied as an epithet of distinction to bold and warlike persons, as among the Arabians, who surnamed Ali "The Lion of God" (Abulf. Ann. i, 96; Bochart, Hierez. i, 716). Others, as Thenius, Winer, Fürst, look upon it in these passages as a proper name, and translate "two [sons] of Ariel," supplying the word אֲרִי־אֵל, which might easily have fallen out. See ARELL.

1. One of the chief men sent for by Ezra to procure Levites for the services of the sanctuary (Ezra viii, 16). B.C. 459.

2. The same word is used as a local proper name in Isa. xxix, 1, 2, 7, applied to Jerusalem, "as victorious under God," says Dr. Lee; and in Ezek. xl.iii, 15, 16, to the altar of burnt-offerings. See HAREL. In this latter passage Gesenius (Theo. Heb. p. 147) and others, unsatisfied with the Hebrew, resort to the Arabic, and find the first part of the name in Ari, five-hearth (cognate with Heb. אֵשׁ, light, i. e. fire), which, with the Heb. El, God, supplies what they consider a more satisfactory signification (but see Ilävernick, Comment. in loc.). It is thus applied, in the first place, to the altar, and then to Jerusalem as containing the altar. Henderson gives the word this etymology also in the passage in Isa. (see Comment. in loc.).

A'rim. See KIRJATH-ARIM.

Arimathæ'a (Αρμαθαια, from the Heb. Ramathaim, with the art. prefixed), the birth-place of the wealthy Joseph, in whose sepulchre our Lord was laid (Matt. xxvii, 57; John xix, 38). Luke (xxiii, 51) calls it "a city of the Jews;" which may be explained by 1 Macc. xi, 31, where King Demetrius thus writes: "We have ratified unto them (the Jews) the borders of Judæa, with the three governments of Aphreata, Lydda, and Ramathem (Ραμαθῆμ), that are added unto Judæa from the country of Samaria." Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) and Jerome (Epit. Paulr) regard the Arimathæa of Joseph as the same place as the RAMATHAIM of Samuel, and place it near Lydda or Diospolis (see Reland, Palest. p. 579 sq.), Samuel's birth-place, the RAMAH of 1 Sam. i, 1, 19, which is named in the Septuagint Armathaim (Αρμαθαιμ), and by Josephus Armatha (Αρμαθα, Ant. v, 10, 2). Hence Arimathæa has by most been identified with the existing Ramleh, because of the similarity of the name to that of Ramah (of which Ramathaim is the dual), and because it is near Lydda or Diospolis. Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 40, 44; new ed. Ant. v, 141), however, disputes this conclusion on the following grounds: (1.) That Abulfeda alleges Ramleh to have been built after the time of Mohammed, or about A.D. 716, by Suleiman Abd-al-Malik; (2.) that "Ramah" and "Ramleh" have not the same signification; (3.) that Ramleh is in a plain, while Ramah implies a town on a hill (רָמָה, high). To these objections it may be answered, (1.) That Abulfeda's statement may mean no more than that Suleiman rebuilt the town, which had previously been in ruins, just as Irbethoam and others are said to have "built" many towns that had existed long before their time; for the Moslems seldom built towns except on old sites or out of old materials; so that there is not a town in all Palestine that is with certainty known to have been founded by them. (2.) In such cases they retain the old names, or others resembling them in sound, if not in signification, which may account for the difference between "Ramah" and "Ramleh." (3.) Neither can we assume that the place called Ramah could not be in a plain, unless we are ready to prove that Hebrew names were always significant and appropriate. This they probably were not. They were so in early times, but not eventually, when towns were numerous, and took their names arbitrarily from one another without regard to local circumstances. Farther, if Arimathæa, by being identified with Ramah, was necessarily in the mountains, it could not have been "near Lydda," from which the hills are seven miles distant (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 300; comp. Wilson, Lands of Bible, ii, 263). See RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM.

Ramleh is in north lat. 31° 59', and east long. 35° 28', 8 miles south-east from Joppa, and 24 miles north-west by west from Jerusalem. It lies in the fine undulating plain of Sharon, upon the eastern side of a broad, low swell rising from a fertile though sandy plain. Like Gaza and Jaffa, this town is surrounded by olive-groves and gardens of vegetables and delicious fruits. Occasional palm-trees are also seen, as well as the kharob and the sycamore. The streets are few; the houses are of stone, and many of them large and well built. There are five mosques, two or more of which are said to have once been Christian churches; and there is here one of the largest Latin convents in Palestine. The place is supposed to contain about 3000 inhabitants, of whom two thirds are Moslems, and the rest Christians, chiefly of the Greek Church, with a few Armenians. The inhabitants carry on some trade in cotton and soap. The great caravan-road between Egypt and Damascus, Smyrna, and Constantinople, passes through Ramleh, as well as the most frequented road for European pilgrims and travellers between Joppa and Jerusalem (Robinson, iii, 27; Raumer, p. 215). The tower is the most conspicuous object in or about the city. It stands a little to the west of the town, on the highest part of the swell of land, and is in the midst of a large quadrangular enclosure, which has much the appearance of having once been a splendid khan. The tower is wholly isolated, whatever may have been its original destination. The town is first mentioned under its present name by the monk Bernard, about A.D. 870. About A.D. 1150 the Arabian geographer Edrisi (ed. Jaubert, p. 339) mentions Ramleh and Jerusalem as the two principal cities of Palestine. The first Crusaders, on their approach, found Ramleh deserted by its inhabitants; and with it and Lydda they endowed the first Latin bishopric in Palestine, which took its denomination from the latter city. From the situation of Ramleh between that city and the coast, it was a post of much importance to the Crusaders, and they held possession of it generally while Jerusalem was in their hands, and long afterward. In A.D. 1266 it was finally taken from the Christians by the Sultan Bibars. Subsequently it is often mentioned in the accounts of travellers and pilgrims, most of whom rested there on their way to Jerusalem. It seems to have declined very fast from the time that it came into the possession of the Crusaders. Benjamin of Tudela (Itin. p. 79, ed. Asher), who was there in A.D. 1173, speaks of it as having been formerly a considerable city. Belon (Observat. p. 311), in 1547, mentions it as almost deserted, scarcely twelve houses being inhabited, and the fields mostly untilled. This desertion must have occurred after 1487; for Le Grand Voyage de Hierusalem, fol. xiv, speaks of it as a peopled town (though partly ruined), and of the "seigneur de Rama" as an important personage. By 1674 it had somewhat revived, but it was still rather a large unwall'd village than a city, without any good houses, the governor himself being miserably lodged (Nau, Voyage Nouveau, i, 6). A century later it remained much in the same state, the governor being still ill lodged, and the population scarcely exceeding 200 families (Volney, ii, 220). Its recent state must, therefore, indicate a degree of comparative prosperity, the growth of the present century (see Robinson's Researches, iii, 33 sq.).—Kitto, s. v. See RAMAH.

Arindēla (τὰ Ἀρινδιῶνα), an episcopal city of the Third Palestine of considerable importance, noticed in the early ecclesiastical lists (Rehnd, Palæst. p. 533, 581); identified by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 496) with the site Ghurandel, near the south-east corner of the Dead Sea, "consisting of considerable ruins on the slope of a hill, near a spring.

Arīoch (Heb. Arjok, אַרְיֹךְ, from the Sanscrit Arjaka, venerable, or perhaps from the Heb. אֲרִי, a lion; Sept. Ἀριώχ [v. r. in Dan. Ἀριώχης, in Tob. Εριώχ], Josephus Ἀριώχος, Ant. i, 9, 1; Ἀριώχος, Ant. x, 10, 2), the name of two men and one place.

1. A king of Ellasar, confederate with Chedorlaomer against Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xiv, 1, 9), B.C. cir. 2080 (Jour. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1862). See Lot.

2. The captain of the royal guard at the court of Babylon, into whose charge Daniel and his fellow youths were committed (Dan. ii, 14). B.C. 604.

3. A "plain" of the Elymaeans (? Persians), mentioned in the apocryphal book of Judith (i, 6) as furnishing aid to Arphaxad in his contest with Nebuchadnezzar; supposed by Grotius to mean the Oravina (Ὀράκινα) of Ptolemy (vi, 2, 11), but more probably borrowed from the first of the above names (see Fritzsche, Handb. in loc.).

Aris'āi (Heb. Arisay, אֲרִיסָאִי, from Sanscrit Arisay, arrow of Aria; Sept. Πορφαρίος v. r. Πορφαίος), the eighth of the ten sons of Haman slain by the Jews of Babylonia (Esth. ix, 9). B.C. cir. 473.

Aristarchus (Ἀριστάρχος, best ruler, a frequent Greek name), a faithful adherent of the Apostle Paul in his labors. A.D. 51-57. He was a native of Thessalonica, and became the companion of Paul in his third missionary tour, accompanying him to Ephesus, where he was seized and nearly killed in the tumult raised by the silversmiths (Acts xix, 29). He left that city with the apostle, and accompanied him in his subsequent journeys (Acts xx, 4), even when taken as a prisoner to Rome (Acts xxvii, 2); indeed, Aristarchus was himself sent thither as a prisoner, or became such while there (Philem. 24), for Paul calls him his "fellow-prisoner" (Col. iv, 10). The traditions of the Greek Church represent Aristarchus as bishop of Apsame in Phrygia, and allege that he continued to accompany Paul after their liberation, and was at length beheaded along with him at Rome in the time of Nero. The Roman martyrologies make him bishop of Thessalonia.—Kitto, s. v.

Aristēas (Ἀριστῆας) or Aristæus (Ἀριστᾶεος), a Cyprian by nation, was a high officer at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was distinguished for his military talents. Ptolemy, being anxious to add to his newly-founded library at Alexandria (B.C. 273) a copy of the Jewish law, sent Aristæas and Andreas, the commander of his body-guard, to Jerusalem. They carried presents to the Temple, and obtained from the high-priest, Eleazar, a genuine copy of the Pentateuch, and a body of seventy elders, six from each tribe, who could translate it into Greek. On their arrival, they are said to have completed the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament, usually termed the "Septuagint" from the number of translators. The story about the translation rests chiefly on the reputed letter of Aristæas himself, but it is told, with a few differences, by Aristobulus, the Jewish philosopher (Euseb. Præp. Ev. xiii, 12), by Philo Judeus (Vit. Mos. 2), and Josephus (Ant. xii, 2); also by Justin Martyr (Cohort. ad Græc. p. 13; Apol. p. 72; Dial. cum Tryph. p. 297), Irenæus (Adv. Hæc. iii, 25), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i, 250), Tertullian (Apolo. 18), Euseb. (Præp. Ev. viii, 1), Athanasius (Synop. S. Scrip. ii, 156), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. p. 36, 37), Epiphanius (De Mns. et Pomd. 3), Jerome (Præf. in Pentateuch; Quæst. in Gen. Proæm.), Augustine (De civ. Dei, xviii, 42, 43), Chrysostom (Adv. Jud. i, 443), Hilary of Poitiers (In Psalm. 2), and Theodoret (Præf. in Psalm.). The letter was printed, in Greek and Latin, by Schard (Basil. 1561, 8vo); reprinted at Oxford (1692, 8vo); best ed. in Gallandii Biblioth. Patr. ii, 771 (Fabricii Bibl. Græc. iii, 669); in Engl. by Lewis (Lond. 1715, 12mo). See Furst, Bibl. Jud. i, 51 sq. Comp. SEPTUAGINT.

Aristides, an Athenian philosopher, who became a Christian, without, however, forsaking his original profession. He presented to the Emperor Adrian, at the same time with Quadratus, an Apology for the Christian faith, which existed in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, and even as late as that of Usuardus, and Ado of Vienne, if the account given of the passion of St. Dionysius the Areopagite may be relied on. Aristides flourished about A.D. 123. Jerome says that his Apology was filled with passages from the writings of the philosophers, and that Justin afterward made much use of it. He is commemorated August 31st.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 123; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iv, cap. iii; Lardner, Works, ii, 308; Fabricius, Bib. Græc. vi, 29.

Aristobulus (Ἀριστόβουλος, best counsellor, a frequent Grecian name), the name of several men in sacred history.

1. A Jewish priest (2 Macc. i, 10), who resided in Egypt in the reign of Ptolemy (VI) Philometor (comp. Grimm, 2 Macc. i, 9). In a letter of Judas Maccabeus he is addressed (B.C. 165) as the representative of the Egyptian Jews (Ἀριστοβούλου . . . καὶ τῶν ἐν Αἴγ. Ἰουδ. 2 Macc. i, c.), and is further styled "the teacher" (ἡγεσάκαλος, i. e. counsellor?) of the king, Josephus makes no mention of him, and the genuineness of the letter itself is doubtful (De Wette, Einleit. i, 413); yet there may have lived at this time an eminent Jew of this name at the Egyptian court. Some have thought him identical with the peripatetic philosopher of the name (Clem. Alex. Str. v, 98; Euseb. Præp. Ev. viii, 9), who dedicated to Ptol. Philometor his allegorical exposition of the Pentateuch (Ἐξηγητικὰς τοῦ Μωυσίου νόμου, Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii, 32). Considerable fragments of this work have been preserved by Clement and Eusebius (Euseb. Præp. Evang. vii, 13, 14; viii (8), 9, 10; xiii, 12; in which the Clementine fragments recur); but the authenticity of the quotations has been vigorously contested. It was denied by R. Simon and especially by Hody (De bibl. tert. orig. p. 50 sq. Oxon. 1705), who was answered by Valckenær (Diatribè de Aristot.

bulo Judæo, Lugd. Bat. 1806); and Valekenær's arguments are now generally considered conclusive (Gfrörer, Philo, ii, 71 sq.; Dähne, Jud. Alex. Relig.-Philos. ii, 73 sq.; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. iv, 294 n.) The object of Aristobulus was to prove that the peripatetic doctrines were based (ὑποβάθαι) on the Law and the Prophets; and his work has an additional interest as showing that the Jewish doctrines were first brought into contact with the Aristotelian and not with the Platonic philosophy (comp. Matter, Hist. de l'école d'Alex. iii, 153 sq.). The fragments which remain are discussed at length in the works quoted above, which contain also a satisfactory explanation of the chronological difficulties of the different accounts of Aristobulus. (See Eichhorn, Biblioth. d. bibl. Lit. v, 253 sq.)—Smith, s. v.

2. The eldest son of John Hyrcanus, prince of Judæa. In B.C. 119, he, together with his brother Antigonus, successfully prosecuted for his father the siege of Samaria, which was destroyed the following year (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 2 and 3; War, i, 2, 7). Hyrcanus dying in B.C. 107, Aristobulus took the title of king, this being the first instance of the assumption of that name since the Babylonian captivity (but see Strabo, xvi, 762), and secured his power by the imprisonment of all his brothers except his favorite one Antigonus, and by the murder of his mother, to whom Hyrcanus had left the government by will. The life of Antigonus was soon sacrificed to his brother's suspicions through the intrigues of the queen and her party, and the remorse felt by Aristobulus for his execution increased the illness under which he was at the time suffering, and thus hastened his own death, B.C. 106. During his reign the Itureans were subdued and compelled to adopt the Jewish law. He also received the name of Φαλλανρ from the favor which he showed the Greeks (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 1; War, i, 5).—Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

3. The younger son of Alexander Jannæus by Alexandra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 16, 1; War, i, 5, 1). During the nine years of his mother's reign he set himself against the party of the Pharisees, whose influence she had sought; and after her death, B.C. 70, he made war against his eldest brother Hyrcanus, and obtained from him the resignation of the crown and the high-priesthood, chiefly through the aid of his father's friends whom Alexandra had placed in the several fortresses of the country to save them from the vengeance of the Pharisees (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 16; xiv, 1, 2; War, i, 5; 6, 1). In B.C. 65 Judæa was invaded by Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, with whom, at the instigation of Antipater the Idumean, Hyrcanus had taken refuge. By him Aristobulus was defeated in a battle and besieged in Jerusalem; but Aretas was obliged to raise the siege by Scarus and Gabinus, Pompey's lieutenants, whose intervention Aristobulus had purchased (Joseph. Ant. xii, 2; 3, 2; War, i, 6, 2 and 3). In B.C. 63 he pleaded his cause before Pompey at Damascus, but finding him disposed to favor Hyrcanus, he returned to Judæa and prepared for war. On Pompey's approach, Aristobulus, who had fled to the fortress of Alexandrium, was persuaded to obey his summons and appear before him; and, being compelled to sign an order for the surrender of the garrison, he withdrew in impotent discontent to Jerusalem. Pompey still advanced, and Aristobulus again met him and made submission; but, his friends in the city refusing to perform the terms, Pompey besieged and took Jerusalem, and carried away Aristobulus and his children as prisoners (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 3, 4; War, i, 6, 7; Plut. Pomp. 39, 45; Strabo, xvi, 762; Dion Cass. xxxvii, 15, 16). Appian (Bell. Mith. 1117) erroneously represents him as having been put to death immediately after Pompey's triumph. In B.C. 57 he escaped from confinement at Rome with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judæa, was joined by large numbers of his countrymen, and renewed the war; but he was besieged and taken at Machærus, the fortifications of which he was attempting to restore, and was sent back to Rome by Gabinus (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 6, 1; War, i, 8, 6; Plut. Ant. 3; Dion Cass. xxxix, 56). In B.C. 49 he was again released by Julius Cæsar, who sent him into Judæa to forward his interests there, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 7, 4; War, i, 9, 1; Dion Cass. xli, 18).—lb.

4. The grandson of No. 3, and the son of Alexander, and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. His mother Alexandra, indignant at Herod's having bestowed the high-priesthood on the obscure Ananelus, endeavored to obtain that office for her son from Antony through the influence of Cleopatra. Herod, fearing the consequences of this application, and urged by Mariamne's entreaties, deposed Ananelus, and made Aristobulus high-priest, the latter being only 17 years old at the time. The king, however, still suspecting Alexandra, and keeping a strict and annoying watch upon her movements, she renewed her complaints and designs against him with Cleopatra, and at length made an attempt to escape into Egypt with her son. Herod discovered this, and affected to pardon it; but soon after he caused Aristobulus to be treacherously drowned at Jericho, B.C. 35 (Joseph. Ant. xv, 2, 3; War, i, 22, 2).—lb.

5. One of the sons of Herod the Great by Mariamne, and sent with his brother Alexander to Rome, where they were educated in the house of Pollio (Josephus, Ant. xv, 10, 1). On their return to Judæa, the suspicions of Herod were excited against them by their brother Antipater (q. v.), aided by Pheroras and their aunt Salome, though Berenice, the daughter of the latter, was married to Aristobulus; the young men themselves supplying their enemies with a handle against them by the indiscreet expression of their indignation at their mother's death. In B.C. 11 they were accused by Herod at Aquilæ before Augustus, through whose mediation, however, he was reconciled to them. Three years after Aristobulus was again involved with his brother in a charge of plotting against their father, but a second reconciliation was effected by Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, the father-in-law of Alexander. A third accusation, through the arts of Euryales, a Lacedæmonian adventurer, proved fatal. By permission of Augustus, the two young men were arraigned by Herod before a council convened at Berytus (at which they were not even allowed to be present to defend themselves), and, being condemned, were soon after strangled at Sebaste, B.C. 6 (Joseph. Ant. xvi, 1-4; 8; 10; 11; War, i, 23-27; comp. Strabo, xvi, 765).—lb. See ALEXANDER.

6. Surnamed "the younger" (ὁ νεώτερος, Josephus, Ant. xxi, 2), was the son of the preceding Aristobulus and Berenice, and the grandson of Herod the Great. Himself and his two brothers (Agrippa I and Herod, the future king of Chalcis) were educated at Rome, together with Claudius, who was afterward emperor, and who appears to have regarded Aristobulus with great favor (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; 6, 1; xx, 1, 2). He lived at enmity with his brother Agrippa, and drove him from the protection of Flaccus, proconsul of Syria, on the charge of having been bribed by the Damascenes to support their cause with the proconsul against the Sidonians (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 3). When Caligula sent Petronius to Jerusalem to set up the statues in the Temple, Aristobulus joined in the remonstrance against the procedure (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 8; War, ii, 10; Tacit. Hist. v, 9). He died as he had lived, in a private station (Josephus, War, ii, 11, 6), having, as appears from the letter of Claudius to the Jews in Josephus (Ant. xx, 1, 2), survived his brother Agrippa, who died in A.D. 44. He was married to Jotapa, a princess of Emessa, by whom he left a daughter of the same name (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; War, ii, 11, 6).—lb.

7. Son of Herod, king of Chalcis, grandson of the Aristobulus who was strangled at Sebaste, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In A.D. 55 Nero made him king of Armenia Minor, in order to secure that province from the Parthians; and in A.D. 61, the emperor added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia, which had been given to Tigranes (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 4; Tacit. Ann. xiii, 7; xiv, 26). Aristobulus appears (from Josephus, War. vii, 7, 11) to have also obtained from the Romans his father's kingdom of Chalcis, which had been taken from his cousin, Agrippa II, in A.D. 52; and he is mentioned as joining Casennius Pætus, proconsul of Syria, in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in the fourth year of Vespasian, or A.D. 73 (Joseph. ib.). He was married to Salome, daughter of the infamous Herodias, by whom he had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus; of these, nothing further is recorded (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4).—Id.

8. A person, perhaps a Roman, named by Paul in Rom. xvi, 10, where he sends salutations to his household. A.D. 55. He is not himself saluted; hence he may not have been a believer, or he may have been absent or dead. Tradition represents him as brother of Barnabas, and one of the seventy disciples, and alleges that he was ordained a bishop by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels, and that he was eventually sent into Britain, where he labored with much success, and where he at length died (Menolog. Græc. iii, 17 sq.).—Kitto, s. v.

Aristotle (Ἀριστοτέλης), one of the greatest philosophers of ancient times, whose philosophical system has exercised for a long time a controlling influence on the development of Christian philosophy and on Christian literature in general. Aristotle was born in B.C. 384, at Stagira, in Macedonia, whence he received his surname, The Stagirite. He was first instructed by his father, Nicomachos, the private physician of King Augustus III of Macedonia; afterward by Proxenos in Atarneus. At the age of 17 years he went to Athens, where he enjoyed for 20 years the instruction of, and intercourse with, Plato. In B.C. 343 he was appointed by Philip of Macedonia teacher of his son Alexander. About 335 he returned to Athens, where he established a new school of philosophy in the "Lyceum" (Λύκειον, so called from an epithet of Apollo), a gymnasium near the city. There he instructed in the mornings a select circle of disciples (Acroate, Esoterics), while in the afternoons he gave popular lectures to all kinds of readers (Eroterics). After having taught for 13 years he was accused of impiety, and compelled to leave Athens. He went to Chalcis, and died soon after (B.C. 322). At Stagira an annual festival, called the "Aristoteleia," was celebrated in his honor. According to a Jewish legend, he is said to have turned Jew in consequence of a conversation held with a Jew at Athens. He is said to have composed about 800 works, lists of which are given by Diogenes Laertius and others. Many of his works are lost; while, on the other hand, several that bear his name are undoubtedly spurious. The oldest complete edition of his works was published by Aldus Manutius (Venice, 1495-98, 5 vols. fol.); the latest and best by Imman. Bekker (Berlin, 1831 sq. 4 vols.).—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

The influence of the philosophic system of Aristotle on the intellectual development of the human race has been more extensive and more lasting than that of any other philosopher except Plato. This supremacy is to be ascribed (1) to his method, which not only restricted the range of human observation and thought, but also fixed the laws of their operation, so far as the field of the outer world is concerned, on principles fundamental to the human mind; (2) to his logic, which grew out of his method and also complemented it; (3) to the practical character of his intellect, and the practical tendency of his speculations, even the most subtle; and (4) to the comparative clearness and simplicity of his system, which arises partly from the really luminous clearness of his own intellect, and partly from the fact that the most profound problems of philosophy do not come within the range of his method when confined to its legitimate application. His method is the so-called empirical one, viz., to begin with the observation of phenomena, and to reason upon them. "Art commences when, from a great number of experiences, one general conception is formed, which will embrace all similar cases; experience is the knowledge of individual things; art is that of universals" (Metaphys. i, 1). What Aristotle here calls 'art' is plainly what we now call 'induction;' and had he adhered throughout to the method here indicated, he would have been, in reality, what Bacon is called, the father of the inductive philosophy. The distinction between Aristotle and Plato is, that while both held that science could only be formed from universals, τὰ καθόλου, Aristotle contended that such universals had purely a subjective existence, i. e. that they were nothing more than the inductions derived from particular facts. He therefore made experience the basis of all science, and reason the architect. Plato made reason the basis. The tendency of the one was to direct man to the observation and interrogation of nature, that of the other was to direct man to the contemplation of ideas" (Lewes, Hist. of Philosophy, ii, 114). In passing from Plato to Aristotle, the thoughtful student observes that he comes into a different if not a lower atmosphere. The end of all Plato's teaching is to show, in opposition to the Sophists, that the mind of man is not its own standard; the tendency of Aristotle's teaching is to show that it is. It has been the fashion, since Hegel's exposition of Aristotle, to deny that his doctrine is substantially realism, in the empirical sense, as opposed to Plato's idealism. To illustrate: Both Plato and Aristotle could say that "dialectics is that science which discovers the difference between the false and the true. But the false in Plato is the semblance which any object presents to the sensualized mind; the true the very substance and meaning of that object. The false in Aristotle is a wrong affirmation concerning any matter whereof the mind takes cognizance; the true a right affirmation concerning the same matter. Hence the dialectic of the one treats of the way whereby we obtain to a clear and vital perception of things; the dialectic of the other treats of the way in which we discourse of things. Words to the one are the means whereby we descend to an apprehension of realities of which there are no sensible exponents. Words to the other are the formulas wherein we set forth our notions and judgments. The one desires to ascertain of what hidden meaning the word is an index; the other desires to prevent the word from transgressing certain boundaries which he has fixed for it. Hence it happened that the sense and leading maxim of Plato's philosophy became not only more distasteful, but positively more unintelligible to his wisest disciple than to many who had not studied in the Academy, or who had set themselves in direct opposition to it. When Aristotle had matured his system of dialectics, there was something in it so perfect and satisfactory that he could not even dream of any thing lying outside of its circle, and incapable of being brought under its rules. He felt that he had discovered all the forms under which it is possible to set down any proposition in words; and what there could be besides this, what opening there could be for another region entirely out of the government of these forms, he had no conception. At any rate, if there were such a one, it must be a vague, uninhabited world. To suppose it peopled with other, and those more real and distinct forms, was the extravagance of philosophical delirium. Accordingly, when he speaks of the doctrine of substantial ideas—of ideas, that is to say, which are the grounds of all our forms of thought, and consequently cannot be subject to them, he is reduced to the strange, and, for so consummate a logician, most disagreeable necessity of begging the whole question; of arguing that, since these ideas ought to be included under some of the ascertained conditions of logic, and by the hypothesis are not included under any, they must be fictitious" (Maurice, Moral and Metaph. Philosophy, ch. vi, div. iii, § 2).

In order to classify facts, and to arrive at the universal from the particular, we must reason; and the theory of reasoning is logic, which, according to Aristotle, is the organon or instrument of all science, quoad formam. In this field the pre-eminence of Aristotle is indisputable; he may, indeed, be said to have invented logic as the formal part of reasoning, and it remains to this day substantially what he made it. Grote observes that "what was begun by Socrates, and improved by Plato, was embodied as a part of a comprehensive system of formal logic by the genius of Aristotle; a system which was not only of extraordinary value in reference to the processes and controversies of its time, but which also, having become insensibly worked into the minds of instructed men, has contributed much to form what is correct in the habits of modern thinking. Though it has now been enlarged and recast by some modern authors (especially by Mr. John Stuart Mill in his admirable System of Logic) into a structure commensurate with the vast increase of knowledge and extension of positive method belonging to the present day, we must recollect that the distance between the best modern logic and that of Aristotle is hardly so great as that between Aristotle and those who preceded him by a century—Empedocles, Anaxagoras, and the Pythagoreans; and that the movement in advance of these latter commences with Socrates" (History of Greece, pt. ii, ch. lxxviii).

In Psychology Aristotle anticipated a great deal of what is called "mental philosophy" at present. The soul, he says, is an entity; not the product of matter or of organization, but distinct from the body, though not separable from it as to its form (De Anim. ii, 1). In this principle he agrees with Plato, and it saves his doctrine from becoming wholly materialistic, a tendency natural to the empirical method. "The faculties (δυνάμεις) of the soul are production and nutrition (De Anim. ii, 2, 4; De Gener. Anim. ii, 2), sensation (Ibid. ii, 5, 6, 12; iii, 12), thought (τὸ ἐπινοητικόν), and will or impulse. His remarks are particularly interesting on the manifestations of the cognitive powers (De Anim. ii, 6; iii, 12 sq.; De Sensu et Sensibilibus), i. e. on the senses; on common sense (κοινὴ αἰσθησις); the first attempt toward a clearer indication of consciousness (Ibid. iii, 1 sq.), on imagination, reminiscence, and memory (Ibid. iii, 3, et De Memoria). The act of intuition and perception is a reception of the forms of objects; and thought is a reception of the forms presupposed by feeling and imagination (Ibid. iii, 4). Hence a passive (παθητικὸς, intellectus patiens) and an active understanding (ποιητικὸς νοῦς, intellectus agens). The first implies receptivity for those forms, therefore it has the closest relation with the faculty of feeling, and hence with the body; to the latter, which elaborates those forms into judging (ἀπολογιζόμενον) and inferring (λογιστικόν), and which moreover itself thinks, appertains indestructibility (immortality without consciousness or memory) (De Anim. ii, 1 6; iii, 2 sq. 5). Thought itself is a power separate from the body, coming from without into man (De Gener. Anim. ii, 3), similar to the element of the stars (Cic. Acad. Quest. i, 7). Further, the understanding is theoretical or practical; it is the latter, inasmuch as it proposes ends and aims. The will (ἡσυχία) is an impulse directed toward matters of practice—that is to say, toward good; which is real or apparent, according as it procures a durable or a transient enjoyment (De An. iii, 9-11; Eth. iii, vi): ἡσυχία is subdivided into βούλησις and ἐπιθυμία—the will, properly so called, and desire. Pleasure is the result of the perfect exertion of a power—an exertion by which the power again is perfected. The noblest pleasures spring from reason (Ethic. x, 4, 5, 8)."—Tennemann, § 145.

From Psychology we proceed to Metaphysics, or "the first philosophy," as Aristotle called it, i. e. the attempt to solve the problem of being. Had Aristotle adhered strictly to his own empirical method, he would have confined himself to the relative, and not sought the absolute at all. His prima philosophia deals with the unchangeable, while physical science deals with change or movement. "Matter," he said, "exists in a threefold form. It is, I. Substance, perceptible by the senses, which is finite and perishable. This substance is either the abstract substance, or the substance connected with form (εἶδος). II. The higher substance, which, though perceived by the senses, is imperishable, such as are the heavenly bodies. Here the active principle (ἐνέργεια) steps in, which, in so far as it contains that which is to be produced, is understanding (νοῦς). That which it contains is the purpose (τὸ ὄν ἐνεκα), which purpose is realized in the act. Here we have the two extremes of potentiality and agency, matter and thought. The often-mentioned entelechy is the relation between these two extremes. It is the point of transition between ἐνέργεια and ἐπιθυμία, and is accordingly the cause of motion, or efficient cause, and represents the soul. III. The third form of substance is that in which the three forms of power, efficient cause and effect, are united—the absolute substance, eternal unmoved, God himself" (Lewes, Hist. of Philosophy, ii, 126). As to the relative place of the idea of God in the systems of Plato and of Aristotle, Maurice well remarks that "it cannot be denied that the recognition of an absolute being, of an absolute good, was that which gave life to the whole doctrine of Plato, and without which it is unmeaning; that, on the contrary, it is merely the crowning result, or, at least, the necessary postulate of Aristotle's philosophy. In strict consistency with this difference, it was a being to satisfy the wants of man which Plato sighed for; it was a first cause of things to which Aristotle did homage. The first would part with no indication or symbol of the truth that God has held intercourse with men, has made himself known to them; the second was content with seeking in nature and logic for demonstrations of his attributes and his unity. When we use personal language to describe the God of whom Plato speaks, we feel that we are using that which suits best with his feelings and his principles even when, through reverence or ignorance, he forbears to use it himself. When we use personal language to describe the deity of Aristotle, we feel that it is improper and unsuitable, even if, through deference to ordinary notions, or the difficulty of inventing any other, he resorts to it himself" (Maurice, Moral and Metaph. Philosophy, ch. vi, div. iii, § 5).

Practical philosophy, according to Aristotle, includes ethics, the laws of the individual moral life; economics, those of the family; and politics, those of man in the state. His "inquiry starts from the conception of a sovereign good and final end. The final end (τέλος) is happiness (εὐδαιμονία, εὐπραξία), which is the result of the energies of the soul (ἐν βίῳ τελειῶν) in a perfect life (Eth. Nic. i, 1-7; x, 5, 6); to it appertains true dignity, as being the highest thing. This perfect exercise of reason is virtue, and virtue is the perfection of speculative and practical reason; hence the subdivision of intellectual virtue (διανοητικὴ ἀρετή) and moral (ἠθικὴ, Eth. Nic. i, 13; ii, 1). The first belongs, in its entire plenitude, to God alone, and confers the highest felicity, or absolute beatitude; the second, which he also styles the human, is the constant perfecting of the reasonable will (ἔξῃς, habitus), the effect of a deliberate resolve, and consequently of liberty (προαιετική), of which Aristotle was the first to display its psychological character, and of which the subjective form consists in always taking the mean between two extremes (τὸ μέσον, μεσότης). Aristotle may be said to have been the first to analyze προαιεσις, or deliberate free choice (Eth. Nic. ii, 6). Ethical virtue presents itself under six principal characters, having reference to the different objects of desire and avoidance (the cardinal virtues), namely, courage (ἀνδρεία), temperance (σωφροσύνη), generosity (ἐλευθεριότης), delicacy (μεγαλοπρέπεια), magnanimity and a proper love of glory (Eth. Nic. v, i, 6 sq.), (μεγαλοδουλία), gentleness and moderation. To these are added the accessory virtues, such as politeness of manners (ἐντροπεία), amiability, the faculty of loving and being beloved (φιλία), and, lastly, justice (ἐκαιοσύνη), which comprises and completes all the others, and on that account is called perfect virtue (τελεία). Under the head of justice Aristotle comprehends right also. Justice he regards as the special virtue (applied to the notion of equality, τὸ ἴσον) of giving every man his due; and its operation may be explained by applying to it the arithmetical and geometrical proportions conformably to the two species, the distributive and corrective, into which he subdivided the virtue. To these must be added equity, which has for its end the rectification of the defects of law. Under the head of right (ἐκαιοσύνη) he distinguishes that pertaining to a family (οἰκονομικόν) from that of a city (πολιτικόν), dividing the latter into the natural (φυσικόν) and the positive (νομικόν). A perfect unity of plan prevails throughout his ethics, his politics, and his economics. Both the latter have for their end to show how the object of man's existence defined in the ethics, viz. virtue combined with happiness, may be attained in the civil and domestic relations through a good constitution of the state and household. The state (πολιτεία) is a complete association of a certain number of smaller societies sufficient to satisfy in common all the wants of life (Pol. i, 2). Mental power alone should preponderate. The science of politics is the investigation of means tending to the final end proposed by the state. Its principle is expediency, and its perfection the suitability of means to the end. By this principle Aristotle would prove the lawfulness of slavery. (W. T. Krug, De Aristotele Scripturis Defensore (Lips. 1813, 4to); C. G. Gottling, Commentatio de Notione Scripturæ apud Aristotelem (Jen. 1821, 4to); Wallon, Hist. de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquité (Paris, 1847, 3 vols. 8vo); Tennemann, Manuel Hist. Phil. § 147, 148.) Professor Shedd (History of Doctrines, bk. i, ch. i) adopts, perhaps too closely, Ritter's reconciliation of Plato and Aristotle, going so far as to say that "Platonism and Aristotelianism differ only in form, not in substance." While we cannot agree to this broad statement, there is yet, as to the points named, reason for what he says, viz. that, in reference to the principal questions of philosophy, "both are found upon the same side of the line that divides all philosophies into the material, the spiritual, the pantheistic, and the theistic. There is a substantial agreement between Plato and his pupil Aristotle respecting the rationality and immortality of the mind as mind in distinction from matter, respecting the nature and origin of ideas, respecting the relative position and importance of the senses, and of knowledge by the senses. But these are subjects which immediately reveal the general spirit of a philosophic system. Let any one read the ethical treatises of Plato and Aristotle, and he will see that both held the same general idea of the Deity as a moral governor, of moral law, and of the immutable reality of right and wrong." But the fundamental difference of the two systems still remains, viz. that Plato regards the "ideas" or eternal archetypes of things as forming the true substance of the latter, and as having their existence in themselves, independent of the material things, their soulless shadows; while Aristotle was of opinion that the individual thing contained the true substance, which forms whatever is permanent in the flux of outward appearances.

For a long time the Aristotelian philosophy remained in Greece a rival of the Platonic, but at last the latter gained the ascendancy. In Rome Aristotle found but few adherents. The fathers of the ancient Church were, on the whole, not favorable to Aristotelianism, but it was cultivated with great zeal by several sects, especially those which were inclined toward a kind of rationalism. (Comp. Lecky, History of Rationalism, i, 417.) Thus the Armetonites were reproached with occupying themselves more with the study of Aristotle than with that of the Scriptures. The Anomeans of the school of Eunomius were called by the fathers "young Aristotelians" (see, on the opinions of the Greek fathers respecting this point, Lannoy, De variis Aristotelis in Acad. Par. fortune, in his Opera omnia, iv, 175 sq. Col. 1732; Kuhn, Katholische Dogmatik, i, 2, 369). Nevertheless, the influence of Aristotle commenced to spread in Christian philosophy during the 4th and 5th centuries, especially in the West. Previously the Neo-Platonic philosophy, which tried to reconcile Aristotle with Plato, had given a new impulse to the study of Aristotle, and called forth a number of commentaries, of which that of Porphyry is the most celebrated. Among the Christian Aristotelians of those times was Nemesius, bishop of Emesa, A.D. 400, whose work on "the Nature of the Soul" is based on the Aristotelian anthropology, and remained long in use and influence in Christian philosophy. Æneus of Gaza, toward the end of the 5th century, and Zacharius Scholasticus (first half of 6th century), opposed Aristotle, especially with regard to the world, and approached nearer the doctrine of Plato. Of greater significance was Johannes Philoponus, who called himself "Grammaticus," and is supposed by modern writers to have lived in the first half of the 6th century. He combated the Platonic philosophy, and followed Aristotle so closely as even to deviate from the commonly received doctrines of Christianity. Thus, applying the Aristotelian doctrine that individual things are substances, he changed the doctrine of the Trinity into a kind of Tritheism. John Damascenus, the chief theologian of the Greek Church, knew and used the dialectics of Aristotle, but made no attempt to thoroughly blend it with the doctrines of Christianity. A new era in the history of the Aristotelian philosophy within the Christian Church begins after the Christianization of the Germanic tribes, for the treatment of which see SCHOLASTICISM.

A very full account of Aristotle's writings and of his system (from the Hegelian point of view), by Prof. Stahr, is given in Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Roman Biog. etc., vol. i. Arithmetic, or the science of numbers, was unquestionably practised as an art in the dawn of civilization; since to put things or their symbols together (addition), and to take one thing from another (subtraction), must have been coeval with the earliest ef-of the human mind; and what are termed multiplication and division are only abbreviated forms of addition and subtraction. The origin, however, of the earliest and most necessary of the arts and sciences is lost in the shades of antiquity, since it arose long before the period when men began to take special notice and make some kind of record of their discoveries and pursuits. In the absence of positive information, we seem authorized in referring the first knowledge of arithmetic to the East (see Edinburgh Review, xviii, 185). From India, Chaldea, Phœnicia, and Egypt the science passed to the Greeks, who extended its laws, improved its processes, and widened its sphere. To what extent the Orientals carried their acquaintance with arithmetic cannot be determined. The greatest discovery in this department of the mathematics, namely, the establishment of our system of ciphers, or of figures considered as distinct from the letters of the alphabet, belongs undoubtedly, not to Arabia, as is generally supposed, but to the remote East, probably India. It is to be regretted that the name of the discoverer is unknown, for the invention must be reckoned among the greatest of human achievements. Our numerals were made known to these Western parts by the Arabians, who, though they were nothing more than the mediums of transmission, have enjoyed the honor of giving them their name. These numerals were unknown to the Greeks, who made use of the letters of the alphabet for arithmetical purposes (see Encyclopædia Metropolitana, s. v.). The Hebrews were not a scientific, but a religious and practical nation. What they borrowed from others of the arts of life they used without surrounding it with theory, or expanding and framing it into a system. So with arithmetic, designated by them by some form of the verb מָדַד , manah', signifying to determine, limit, and thence to number. Of their knowledge of this science little is known more than may be fairly inferred from the pursuits and trades which they carried on, for the successful prosecution of which some skill at least in its simpler processes must have been absolutely necessary; and the large amounts which appear here and there in the sacred books serve to show that their acquaintance with the art of reckoning was considerable. See NUMBER. Even in fractions they were not inexperienced (Gesenius, Lehrgeb. p. 704). For figures, the Jews, after the Babylonish exile, made use of the letters of the alphabet, as appears from the inscriptions on the so-called Samaritan coins (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. i, iii, 468); and it is not unlikely that the ancient Hebrews did the same, as well as the Greeks, who borrowed their alphabet from the Phœnicians, neighbors of the Israelites, and employed it instead of numerals (Schmidt, Biblischer Mathematicus, Tub. 1735, 1749).—Kitto, s. v. See ABBREVIATION.

Arius, born toward the close of the third century, in Libya, according to others, in Alexandria. He wrote a theological work, Thalia, extracts from which are given in the writings of Athanasius. He died in 336. For his doctrines and their history, see ARIANISM.

Ark is used in the Bible to designate three vessels of special importance.

1. NOAH'S ARK (תֵּבַת , tebah'; Sept. κιβωτός , akh st; Josephus λίβανος , a coffir; Vulg. arca, Gen. vi, 11), different from the term אֲרוֹן , aron', applied to the "ark" of the covenant, and other receptacles which we know to have been chests or coffers, but the same that is applied to the "ark" in which Moses was hid (Exod. ii, 3), the only other part of Scripture in which it occurs. In the latter passage the Septuagint renders it θησαυρος , a ship; but the truth seems to be that aron' denotes any kind of chest or coffer, while the exclusive application of tebah' to the vessels of Noah and of Moses would suggest the probability that it was restricted to such chests or arks as were intended to float upon the water, of whatever description. The identity of the name with that of the wicker basket in which Moses was exposed on the Nile has led some to suppose that the ark of Noah was also of wicker-work, or rather was wattled and smeared over with bitumen (Auth. Vers. "pitch," Gen. vi, 14). This is not impossible, seeing that vessels of considerable burden are thus constructed at the present day; but there is no sufficient authority for carrying the analogy to this extent.

The boat-like form of the ark, which repeated pictorial representations have rendered familiar, is fitted for progression and for cutting the waves; whereas the ark of Noah was really destined to float idly upon the waters, without any other motion than that which it received from them. If we examine the passage in Gen. vi, 14-16, we can only draw from it the conclusion that the ark was not a boat or ship; but, as Dr. Robinson (in Calmet's Diet. s. v.) describes it, "a building in the form of a parallelogram, 300 cubits long, 50 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high. The length of the cubit, in the great variety of measures that bore this name, it is impossible to ascertain and useless to conjecture. So far as the name affords any evidence, it also goes to show that the ark of Noah was not a regularly-built vessel, but merely intended to float at large upon the waters. We may, therefore, probably with justice, regard it as a large oblong, floating house, with a roof either flat or only slightly inclined. It was constructed with three stories, and had a door in the side. There is no mention of windows in the side, but above, i. e. probably in the flat roof, where Noah was commanded to make them of a cubit in size (Gen. vi, 16). That this is the meaning of the passage seems apparent from Gen. viii, 13, where Noah removes the covering of the ark in order to ascertain whether the ground was dry—a labor unnecessary, surely, had there been windows in the sides of the ark."

The purpose of this ark was to preserve certain persons and animals from the deluge with which God intended to overwhelm the land, in punishment for man's iniquities. The persons were eight—Noah and his wife, with his three sons and their wives (Gen. vii, 1; 2 Pet. ii, 5). The animals were, one pair of every "unclean" animal, and seven pairs of all that were "clean." By "clean" we understand fit, and by "unclean" unfit, for food or sacrifice. Of birds there were seven pairs (Gen. vii, 2, 3). Those who have written professedly and largely on the subject have been at great pains to provide for all the existing species of animals in the ark of Noah, showing how they might be distributed, fed, and otherwise provided for. But they are very far from having cleared the matter of all its difficulties, which are much greater than they, in their general ignorance of natural history, were aware of. These difficulties, however, chiefly arise from the assumption that the species of all the earth were collected in the ark. The number of such species has been vastly underrated by these writers, partly from ignorance, and partly from the desire to limit the number for which they imagined they were required to provide. They have usually satisfied themselves with a provision for three or four hundred species at most. "But of the existing mammalia considerably more than one thousand species are known; of birds, fully five thousand; of reptiles, very few kinds of which can live in water, two thousand; and the researches of travellers and naturalists are making frequent and most interesting additions to the number of these and all other classes. Of insects (using the word in the popular sense) the number of species is immense; to say one hundred thousand would be moderate: each has its appropriate habitation and food, and these are necessary to its life; and the larger number could not live in water. Also the innumerable millions upon millions of animalcules must be provided for, for they have all their appropriate and diversified places and circumstances of existence" (Dr. J. Pye Smith, On the Relation between the Holy Scriptures and some Parts of Geological Science, p. 135). Nor do these numbers form the only difficulty; for, as the same writer observes: "All land animals have their geographical regions, to which their constitutional natures are congenial, and many could not live in any other situation. We cannot represent to ourselves the idea of their being brought into one small spot, from the polar regions, the torrid zone, and all the other climates of Asia, Africa, Europe, America, Australia, and the thousands of islands, their preservation and provision, and the final disposal of them, without bringing up the idea of miracles more stupendous than any which are recorded in Scripture." These are some of the difficulties which arise on the supposition that all the species of animals existing in the world were assembled together and contained in the ark. And if the object, as usually assumed, was to preserve the species of creatures which the Deluge would otherwise have destroyed, the provision for beasts and birds only must have been altogether inadequate. What, then, would have become of the countless reptiles, insects, and animals to which we have already referred? and it is not clear that some provision must not also have been necessary for fishes and shell-animals, many of which cannot live in fresh water, while others cannot live in salt. The difficulty of assembling in one spot, and of providing for in the ark, the various mammalia and birds alone, even without including the otherwise essential provision for reptiles, insects, and fishes, is quite sufficient to suggest some error in the current belief. We are to consider the different kinds of accommodation and food which would be required for animals of such different habits and climates, and the necessary provision for cleansing the stables or dens. And if so much ingenuity has been required in devising arrangements for the comparatively small number of species which the writers on the ark have been willing to admit into it, what provision can be made for the immensely larger number which, under the supposed conditions, would really have required its shelter? There seems to be no way of meeting these difficulties but by adopting the suggestion of Bishop Stillingfleet, approved by Matthew Poole, Dr. J. Pye Smith, Le Clerc, Rosenmüller, and others, namely, that, as the object of the Deluge was to sweep man from the earth, it did not extend beyond that region of the earth which man then inhabited, and that only the animals of that region were preserved in the ark. See DELUGE. Bishop Stillingfleet, who wrote in plain soberness long before geology was known as a science, and when, therefore, those discoveries were altogether unthought of, by which, in our day, such warm controversies have been excited, expresses his belief that the Flood was universal as to mankind, and that all men, except those preserved in the ark, were destroyed; but he sees no evidence from Scripture that the whole earth was then inhabited; he does not think that it can ever be proved to have been so; and he asks what reason there can be to extend the Flood beyond the occasion of it. He grants that, as far as the Flood extended, all the animals were destroyed; "but," he adds, "I see no reason to extend the destruction of these beyond the compass of the earth which men then inhabited; the punishment of the beasts was occasioned by, and could not but be concomitant with, the destruction of mankind. But (the occasion of the Deluge being the sin of man, who was punished in the beasts that were destroyed for his sake, as well as in himself) where the occasion was not, as where there were animals and no men, there seems no necessity for extending the Flood thither" (Origines Sacree, bk. iii, ch. iv). The bishop farther argues that the reason for preserving living creatures in the ark was that there might be a stock of the tame and domesticated animals that should be immediately "serviceable for man after the Flood; which was certainly the main thing looked at in the preservation of them in the ark, that men might have all of them ready for use after the Flood; which could not have been had not the several kinds been preserved in the ark, although we suppose them not destroyed in all parts of the world."

As Noah was the progenitor of all the nations of the earth, and as the ark was the second cradle of the human race, we might expect to find in all nations traditions and reports more or less distinct respecting him, the ark in which he was saved, and the Deluge in general. Accordingly, no nation is known in which such traditions have not been found. They have been very industriously brought together by Banier, Bryant, Faber, and other mythologists. See ARARAT; NOAH. And as it appears that an ark—that is, a boat or chest—was carried about with great ceremony in most of the ancient mysteries, and occupied an eminent station in the holy places, it has with much reason been concluded that this was originally intended to represent the ark of Noah, which eventually came to be regarded with superstitious reverence. On this point the historical and mythological testimonies are very clear and conclusive. The tradition of a deluge, by which the race of man was swept from the face of the earth, has been traced among the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Phœnicians, Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Goths, Druids, Chinese, Hindoos, Burmese, Mexicans, Peruvians, Brazilians, Nicaraguans, the inhabitants of Western Caledonia, and the islanders of the Pacific; and among most of them also the belief has prevailed that certain individuals were preserved in an ark, ship, boat, or raft, to replenish the desolated earth with inhabitants. Nor are these traditions uncorroborated by coins and monuments of stone. Of the latter there are the sculptures of Egypt and of India; and it is fancied that those of the monuments called Druidical which bear the name of kistvaens, and in which the stones are disposed in the form of a chest or house, were intended as memorials of the ark. The curious subject of Arkite worship is especially illustrated by the two famous medals of Apamea. There were six cities of this name, of which the most celebrated was that of Syria; next to it in importance was the one in Phrygia, called also Kιβωτός, Kibotos, which, as we have seen, means an ark or hollow vessel. The medals in question belong, the one to the elder Philip, and the other to Pertinax. In the former it is extremely interesting to observe that on the front of the ark is the name of Noah, ΝΩΕ, in Greek characters. In both we perceive the ark floating on the water, containing the patriarch and his wife, the dove on wing, the olive-branch, and the raven perched on the ark. These medals also represent Noah and his wife on terra firma, in the attitude of rendering thanks for their safety. The genuineness of these medals has been established beyond all question by the researches of Bryant and the critical inspection of Abbé Barthélemy. There is another medal, struck in honor of the Emperor Hadrian, which bears the inscription ΑΗΑΜΕΩΝ ΚΙΒΩΤΟΣ ΜΑΡΣΥΣΙΑ, "the ark and the Marsyas of the Apameans." See APAMEA. The coincidences which these medals offer are at least exceedingly curious; and they are scarcely less illustrative of the prevailing belief to which we are referring, if, as some suppose, the figures represented are those of Deucalion and Pyrrha (Meissner, De arca Nochi, Witt. 1622).—KITTO. 2. The ARK OF BULRUSHES (תֵּבָחָה, tebah'; Sept. ῥιβύη). In Exod. ii, 3, we read that Moses was exposed among the flags of the Nile in an ark (or boat of bulrushes) daubed with slime and with pitch. The bulrushes of which the ark was made were the papyrus reed (Cyperus papyrus), which grows in Egypt in marshy places. It was used for a variety of purposes, even for food. Pliny says, from the plant itself they weave boats, and other ancient writers inform us that the Nile wherries were made of papyrus. Boats made of this material were noted for their swiftness, and are alluded to in Isa. xviii, 2. See REED.

3. The SACRED ARK of the Jews (אֲרוֹן or אֲרוֹן, aron'; Sept. and New Test. κιβωτός), different from the term applied to the ark of Noah. It is the common name for a chest or coffer, whether applied to the ark in the tabernacle, to a coffin, to a mummy-chest (Gen. i, 26), or to a chest for money (2 Kings xii, 9, 10). Our word ark has the same meaning, being derived from the Latin arca, a chest. The sacred chest is distinguished from others as the "ark of God" (1 Sam. iii, 3), "ark of the covenant" (Josh. iii, 6; Heb. ix, 4), and "ark of the law" (Exod. xxv, 22). This ark was a kind of box, of an oblong shape, made of shittim (acacia) wood, a cubit and a half broad and high, two cubits long, and covered on all sides with the purest gold. It was ornamented on its upper surface with a border or rim of gold; and on each of the two sides, at equal distances from the top, were two gold rings, in which were placed (to remain there perpetually) the gold-covered poles by which the ark was carried, and which continued with it after it was deposited in the tabernacle. The Levites of the house of Kohath, to whose office this especially appertained, bore it in its progress. Probably, however, when removed from within the veil in the most holy place, which was its proper position, or when taken out thence, priests were its bearers (Num. vii, 9; x, 21; iv, 5, 19, 20; 1 Kings viii, 3, 6). The ends of the staves were visible without the veil in the holy place of the temple of Solomon, the staves being drawn to the ends, apparently, but not out of the rings. The ark, when transported, was enveloped in the "veil" of the dismantled tabernacle, in the curtain of badgers' skins, and in a blue cloth over all, and was therefore not seen. The lid or cover of the ark was of the same length and breadth as the ark itself, and made of the purest gold. Over it, at the two extremities, were two cherubim, with their faces turned toward each other, and inclined a little toward the lid (otherwise called the mercy-seat). See CHERUB. Their wings, which were spread out over the top of the ark, formed the throne of God, the King of Israel, while the ark itself was his footstool (Exod. xxv, 10-22; xxxvii, 1-9). (Comp. Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 5; Philo, Opera, ii, 150; Koran, ii, 249, cd. Marrac.; for heathen parallels, see Apulej. Astin. xi, 262, Bip.; Pausan. vii, 19, 3; Ovid, Ars Am. ii, 609 sq.; Catull. Lxiv. 260 sq. See generally Reland, Antiq. Sacr. i, 5, 19 sq., 43 sq.; Carpov, Appar. p. 260 sq.; Schaacht, Animadvrs. p. 334 sq.; Buxtorf, Hist. arce fad. in Ugolini Thesaur. viii; Hoffmann, in the Hall. M.s. p. 117 sq.)

This ark was the most sacred object among the Israelites; it was deposited in the innermost and holiest part of the tabernacle, called "the holy of holies" (and afterward in the corresponding apartment of the Temple), where it stood so that one end of each of the poles by which it was carried (which were drawn out so far as to allow the ark to be placed against the back wall) touched the veil which separated the two apartments of the tabernacle (1 Kings viii, 8). It was also probably a reliquary for the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron. We read in 1 Kings viii, 9, that "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb." Yet Paul, or the author of Heb. ix, 4, asserts that, besides the two tables of stone, the "pot of manna" and "Aaron's rod that budded" were inside the ark, which were directed to be "laid up" and "kept before the testimony," i. e. before the tables of the law (Exod. xl, 20); and probably, since there is no mention of any other receptacle for them, and some would have been necessary, the statement of 1 Kings viii, 9, implies that by Solomon's time these relics had disappeared. The expression בְּצִדֵי אֲרוֹן, Deut. xxxi, 26, obscurely rendered "in the side of the ark" (Auth. Vers.), merely means "beside" it.

During the marches of the Israelites it was covered with a purple pall, and borne by the priests, with great reverence and care, in advance of the host (Num. iv, 5, 6; x, 33). It was before the ark, thus in advance, that the waters of the Jordan separated; and it remained in the bed of the river, with the attendant priests, until the whole host had passed over; and no sooner was it also brought up than the waters resumed their course (Josh. iii; iv, 7, 10, 11, 17, 18). We may notice a fiction of the Rabbis that there were two arks, one which remained in the shrine, and another which preceded the camp on its march, and that this latter contained the broken tables of the law, as the former the whole ones. The ark was similarly conspicuous in the grand procession round Jericho (Josh. vi, 4, 6, 8, 11, 12). It is not wonderful, therefore, that the neighboring nations, who had no notion of spiritual worship, looked upon it as the God of the Israelites (1 Sam. iv, 6, 7), a delusion which may have been strengthened by the figures of the cherubim on it. After the conquest, the ark generally (see Judg. xx, 27) remained in the tabernacle at Shiloh, until, in the time of Eli, it was carried along with the army in the war against the Philistines, under the superstitious notion that it would secure the victory to the Hebrews. They were, nevertheless, not only beaten, but the ark itself was taken by the Philistines (1 Sam. iv, 3-11), whose triumph was, however, very short lived, as they were so oppressed by the hand of God that, after seven months, they were glad to send it back again (1 Sam. v, 7). After that it remained apart from the tabernacle, at Kirjath-jearim (vii, 1, 2), where it continued until the time of David, who purposed to remove it to Jerusalem; but the old prescribed mode of removing it from place to place was so much neglected as to cause the death of Uzzah, in consequence of which it was left in the house of Obededom (2 Sam. vi, 1-11); but after three months David took courage, and succeeded in effecting its safe removal, in grand procession, to Mount Zion (ver. 12-19). When the Temple of Solomon was completed, the ark was deposited in the sanctuary (1 Kings viii, 6-9). Several of the Psalms contain allusions to these events (e. g. xxiv, xlvii, cxxxii), and Psa. cv appears to have been composed on the occasion of the first of them. See PSALMS. The passage in 2 Chron. xxxv, 3, in which Josiah directs the Levites to restore the ark to the holy place, is understood by some to imply that it had either been removed by Amon, who put an idol in its place, which is assumed to have been the "trespass" of which he is said to have been guilty (2 Chron. xxxiii, 23), or that the priests themselves had withdrawn it during idolatrous times, and preserved it in some secret place, or had removed it from one place to another. But it seems more likely that it had been taken from the holy of holies during the purification and repairs of the Temple by this same Josiah, and that he, in this passage, merely directs it to be again set in its place. Or it may have been removed by Manasseh, to make room for the "carved image" that he placed "in the house of God" (2 Chron. xxxiii, 7). What became of the ark when the Temple was plundered and destroyed by the Babylonians is not known, and all conjecture is useless. It was probably taken away or destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Esdr. x, 22). The Jews believe that it was concealed from the spoilers, and account it among the hidden things which the Messiah is to reveal (see Ambros. Off. iii, 17, 18; Joseph. Gorionid. i, 21; Wernsdorf, De jide Maccab. p. 183 sq.; Mishna, Shekal. vi, 1). It is certain, however, from the consent of all the Jewish writers, that the old ark was not contained in the second temple, and there is no evidence that any new one was made. Indeed, the absence of the ark is one of the important particulars in which this temple was held to be inferior to that of Solomon. The most holy place is therefore generally considered to have been empty in the second temple (as Josephus states, War. v, 14); or at most (as the rabbins allege, Mishna, Yoma. v, 2) to have contained only a stone to mark the place which the ark should have occupied (comp. Tacit, Hist. v, 9). The silence of Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and Josephus, who repeatedly mention all the other sacred utensils, but never name the ark, seems conclusive on the subject. But, notwithstanding this weight of testimony, there are writers, such as P'rideaux (Connection, i, 207), who contend that the Jews could not properly carry on their worship without an ark, and that if the original ark was not recovered after the Captivity, a new one must have been made (Calmet's Dissertation sur l'Arche d'Alliance; Hase, De lapide cui arca imposita fuit, Erb. and Lpz. n. d. 4to). See TEMPLE.

Concerning the design and form of the ark, it appears that clear and unexpected light has been thrown by the discoveries which have of late years been made in Egypt, and which have unfolded to us the rites and mysteries of the old Egyptians. (See Descr. de l'Egypte, Att. i, pl. 11, fig. 4; pl. 12, fig. 3; iii, pl. 32, 34, 36; comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenl. ii, 96 sq.; Heeren, Ideen, II, ii, 831; Spencer, Leg. rit. iii, 5, p. 1084 sq.; Bähr, Symbol. i, 381, 402 sq.) "One of the most important ceremonies was the 'procession of shrines,' which is mentioned Egyptian Ark. From the in the Rosetta stone, and frequently occurs on the walls of the temples. The shrines were of two kinds: the one a sort of canopy; the other an ark or sacred boat, which may be termed the great shrine. This was carried with grand pomp by the priests, a certain number being selected for that duty, who supported it on their shoulders by means of long staves, passing through metal rings at the side of the sledge on which it stood, and brought it into the temple, where it was deposited upon a stand or table, in order that the prescribed ceremonies might be discharged before it. The stand was also carried in procession by another set of priests, following the shrine, by means of similar staves; a method usually adopted for carrying large statues and sacred emblems, too heavy or too important to be borne by one person. The same is stated to have been the custom of the Jews in some of their religious processions (comp. 1 Chron. xv, 2, 15; 2 Sam. xv, 24; and Josh. iii, 12), as in carrying the ark to its place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place, when the Temple was built by Solomon (1 Kings viii, 6)." . . . "Some of the arks or boats contained the emblems of Life and Stability, which, when the veil was drawn aside, were partially seen; and others presented the beetle to the sun, overshadowed by the wings of two figures of the goddess Thenei, or Truth, which call to mind the cherubim of the Jews" (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, v, 271, 275). The ritual of the Etruscans, Greeks, Romans, and other ancient nations, included the use of what Clemens Alexandrinus calls κισσα μυστακα (Prolypt. p. 12). The same Clemens (Strom. v, 578) also contains an allusion of a proverbial character to the ark and its rites, which seems to show that they were popularly known, where he says that "only the master (κύριος ἀναλωτής) may uncover the ark" (κυστωρός). In Latin, also, the word arcam, connected with arca and arceo, is the recognised term for a sacred mystery. (Illustrations of the same subject occur also in Plut. De Is. et Osir. c. 39; Euseb. Præp. Evang. ii, 3.)

These resemblances and differences appear to us to cast a strong light, not only on the form, but on the purpose of the Jewish ark. The discoveries of this sort which have lately been made in Egypt have added an overwhelming weight of proof to the evidence which previously existed, that the "tabernacle made with hands," with its utensils and ministers, bore a designed external resemblance to the Egyptian models, but purged of the details and peculiarities which were the most open to abuse and misconception. That the Israelites, during the latter part of their sojourn in Egypt, followed the rites and religion of the country, and were (at least many of them) gross idolaters, is distinctly affirmed in Scripture (Josh. xxiv, 14; Ezek. xxiii, 3, 8, 19), and is shown by their ready lapse into the worship of the "golden calf," and by the striking fact that they actually carried about with them one of these Egyptian shrines or tabernacles in the wilderness (Amos v, 26). From their conduct, and the whole tone of their sentiments and character, it appears that this stiff-necked and rebellious people were incapable (as a nation) of adhering to that simple form of worship and service which is most pleasing to God. (See an article on this subject in the Am. Bib. Repos. Oct. 1813, p. 290-312.)—Kitto, s. v.

Ancient Egyptian Shrine.

The purpose or object of the ark was to contain inviolate the Divine autograph of the two tables, that "covenant" from which it derived its title, the idea of which was inseparable from it, and which may be regarded as the depositum of the Jewish dispensation. The perpetual safe custody of the material tables no doubt suggested the moral observance of the precepts inscribed. The words of the Auth. Vers. in 1 Chr. xiii, 3, seem to imply a use of the ark for the purpose of an oracle; but this is probably erroneous, and "we sought it not" the meaning; so the Sept. renders it (see Gesenius, Lex. s. v. אֲרוֹן). Occupying the most holy spot of the whole sanctuary, it tended to exclude any idol from the centre of worship. And Jeremiah (iii, 16) looks forward to the time when even the ark should be "no more remembered" as the climax of spiritualized religion apparently in Messianic times. It was also the support of the mercy-seat, materially symbolizing, perhaps, the "covenant" as that on which "mercy" rested. It also furnished a legitimate vent to that longing after a material object for reverential feeling which is common to all religions. It was, however, never seen, save by the high-priest, and resembled in this respect the Deity whom it symbolized, whose face none might look upon and live. That this reverential feeling may have been impaired during its absence among the Philistines seems probable from the case of Uzzah.—Smith. See MERCY-SEAT.

Ar'kite (Heb. Arki', אַרְכִי; Sept. and Joseph. Ἀροκῆτος, like the Samar. Aruki', אַרְכִי), a designation of the inhabitants of Arka (Plin. v, 16; Ἀρκα, Ptol. v, 15), who are mentioned in Gen. x, 17; 1 Chron. i, 15, as descended from the Phœnician or Sidonian branch of the great family of Canaan. This, in fact, as well as the other small northern states of Phœnicia, was a colony from the great parent state of Sidon. Arka, or Arce (Ἀρκή), their chief town, lay between Tripolis and Antardanus, at the western base of Lebanon (Joseph. Ant. i, 6, 2; Jerome, Quest. in Gen. x, 15). Josephus (Ant. viii, 2, 3) makes Baanah, who in 1 Kings iv, 16, is said to have been superintendent of the tribe of Asher, governor of Arka (Ἀρκή) by the sea; and if, as commonly supposed, the capital of the Arkites is intended, their small state must, in the time of Solomon, have been under the Hebrew yoke. In the time of Alexander a splendid temple was erected here in honor of Astarte, the Venus of the Phœnicians (Macrob. Sat. i, 21). Subsequently Arka shared the lot of the other small Phœnician states in that quarter; but in later times it formed part of Herod Agrippa's kingdom. Titus passed through it on his return from the destruction of Jerusalem (Ἀρκαία, Joseph. War. vii, 5, 1). In the Midrash (Midr. Rabb. 37) it is called "Arkam of Lebanon" (אַרְכָּם דְּלִבְנוֹן). The name and site seem never to have been unknown (Mannert, p. 391), although for a time it bore the name of Cæsarea Libani (Aurel. Vict. De Cæs. xxiv, 1), from having been the birthplace of Alexander Severus (Lamprid. Alex. Sev.). Coins are extant of it (Eckhel. Doctr. Num. iii, 360), but not of its Phœnician period (Gesenius, Monum. Phœnic. ii, 285 sq.). It was eventually the seat of a Christian bishopric (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii, 815, 823). It is repeatedly noticed by the Arabian writers (Michaelis, Spicil. ii, 23; also Oriental. Bibl. vi, 99 sq.; Schultens, Vita Saladin; Edrisi, p. 13; Rosenmüller, Barhebr. Chron. p. 282). It is mentioned in all the itineraries of this region, and is conspicuous in early ecclesiastical records. It also figures largely in the exploits of the Crusaders, by whom it was unsuccessfully besieged in 1099, but at last taken in 1109 by Bertrand (see Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 578 sq.). In 1202 it was totally destroyed by an earthquake. It lay 32 Roman miles from Antardanus, 18 miles from Tripoli, and, according to Abulfeda, a parasang from the sea (Tab. Syriæ, p. 11). In a position corresponding to these intimations, Shaw (Observat. p. 270) noticed the site and ruins. Burckhardt (Syriæ, p. 162), in travelling from the north-east of Lebanon to Tripoli, at the distance of about four miles south of the Nahr-el-kebir (Eleuthernus), came to a hill called Tel-Arka, which, from its regularly flattened conical form and smooth sides, appeared to be artificial. He was told that on its top were some ruins of habitations and walls. Upon an elevation on its east and south sides, which commands a beautiful view over the plain, the sea, and the Anzeiry mountains, are large and extensive heaps of rubbish, traces of ancient dwellings, blocks of hewn stone, remains of walls, and fragments of granite columns. These are no doubt the remains of Arka; and the hill was probably the acropolis or citadel, or the site of a temple (Hamesveld, iii, 39 sq.). The present village has 21 Greek and 7 Moslem families—a wretched hamlet amid the columns of this once splendid city (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1848, p. 16).

Arles (Arelate), an ancient archiepiscopal see in Lower Provence, on the left of the Rhone, seven leagues from its mouth, about one hundred and eighty-six leagues from Paris. It is said to derive its name from Ara clata, a high altar raised here in pagan times. A number of councils and synods were held at Arles, of which the following are the chief: (1.) In 314, a general synod for the West, at which Constantine and 600 or 633 bishops were present; 22 canons were framed on the Donatists, etc.; (2.) in 428 or 429, at which Germaus and Lupus were deputed to England; (3.) in 455, under Ravennius, to settle the dispute between Faustus, abbot of Lerins, and the bishop of Frejus; (4.) in 475, against Lucidus, accused of Predestinationism; (5.) in 524, under Caesarius, four canons on ordination were published; (6.) in 1234, under John Bausan, twenty-four canons were published against heretics, chiefly against the Waldenses; (7.) in 1275, by Bertrand de S. Martin, twenty-two canons were published, and the clergy forbidden making wills.—Landon, Manual of Councils; Smith, Tales of Church Hist.

Arm (usually אֶרֶם, zerô'â, βραχίον) is frequently used in Scripture in a metaphorical sense to denote power. Hence, to "break the arm" is to diminish or to destroy the power (Psa. x, 15; Ezek. xxx, 21; Jer. xlviii, 25). It is also employed to denote the infinite power of God (Psa. lxxxix, 13; xlviii, 2; Isa. liii, 1; John xii, 38). In a few places the metaphor is, with great force, extended to the action of the arm, as, "I will redeem you with a stretched-out arm" (Exod. vi, 5), that is, with a power fully exerted. The figure is here taken from the attitude of ancient warriors baring and outstretching the arm for fight. Thus, in Isa. lii, 10, "Jehovah hath made bare his holy arm in the sight of all the nations." Louth has shown, from the Sept. and other versions, that in Isa. ix, 20, "they shall eat every one the flesh of his own arm" should be "the flesh of his neighbor," similar to Jer. xix, 9, meaning that they should harass and destroy one another. (See Weyniss's Clavis Symbolica, p. 23, 24.)

Armaged'don (Αρμαγεδών, Rev. xvi, 16), properly "the mountain of Megiddo" (Heb. מְגִדּוֹ, a city on the west of the river Jordan, rebuilt by Solomon (1 Kings ix, 15). See MEGIDDO. In the mystical language of prophecy, the word mountain represents the Church, and the events which took place at Megiddo are supposed to have had a typical reference to the sorrows and triumphs of the people of God under the Gospel. "In that day," says Zechariah (xii, 11), "shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon;" referring to the death of Josiah (q. v.). "He gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon," is the language of the Apocalypse; and the word has been translated by some as "the mountain of destruction," by others as "the mountain of the gospel"—a passage that probably has reference to the symbolical use of the name in Zechariah. Into a valley ominous of slaughter the unclean spirits (representing the heathen influence of the Roman empire), under the special guidance of Providence (xvii, 17), conduct the assembled forces of the beast and his allies; and there in due time they come to an overthrow through an almighty conqueror (Stuart, Comment. in loc.). The passage is best illustrated by comparing a similar one in the book of Joel (iii, 2, 12), where the scene of the divine judgments is spoken of in the prophetic imagery as the "valley of Jehoshaphat," the fact underlying the image being Jehoshaphat's great victory (2 Chron. xx, 26; see Zech. xiv, 2, 4). So here the scene of the struggle of good and evil is suggested by that battle-field, the plain of Esdraelon, which was famous for two great victories—of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. iv, v), and Gideon over the Midianites (Judg. vii); and for two great disasters, the death of Saul in the invasion of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 8), and the death of Josiah in the invasion of the Egyptians (2 Kings xxiii, 29, 30; 2 Chron. xxxv, 22). With the first and fourth of these events, Megiddo (Μαγιδδών in the Sept. and Josephus) is especially connected. Hence 'Αρ-μαγεδών, "the hill of Megiddo." (See Bähr's Excursus on Herod. ii, 159.) As regards the Apocalypse it is remarked by Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 330) that this imagery would be peculiarly natural to a Galilean, to whom the scene of these battles was familiar. See ESRAELON.

Armagh, the seat of an archbishopric in Ireland. This church was founded by St. Patrick in 414 or 445. The chapter is composed of five dignitaries, four prebendaries, eight vicars choral, and an organist. The present cathedral is built of red sandstone, and is cruciform—184 by 119 feet. It has recently been repaired and beautified, chiefly at the cost (£10,000) of the present lord primate. A new Gothic Roman Catholic cathedral occupies the principal height to the north, and the primatial palace that to the south of the cathedral. There is a fever hospital for forty patients, maintained by the present primate, and a lunatic asylum for four counties. The archbishop is Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, and has an income of £12,087 a year. The present incumbent is Lord J. G. Beresford, translated from Dublin in 1822.

Arme'nia (Αρμενία), a country of Western Asia, is not mentioned in the original language of Scripture under that name (on the Harmonies of Amos iv, 3, see Rosenmüller, in loc.), though it occurs in the English version (2 Kings xix, 37), where our translators have very unnecessarily substituted it for Ararat (comp. marginal reading); but is supposed to be alluded to in the three following Hebrew designations, which seem to refer either to the country as a whole, or to particular districts. See ASIA.

1. ARARAT, אֲרָרָט, the land upon (or over) the mountains of which the ark rested at the Deluge (Gen. viii, 4; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 3, 5); whither the sons of Sennacherib fled after murdering their father (2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38); and one of the "kingdoms" summoned, along with Minni and Ashkenaz, to arm against Babylon (Jer. li, 27). That there was a province of Ararat in ancient Armenia we have the testimony of the native historian, Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. ed. Whiston, Lond. 1736, p. 261). It lay in the centre of the kingdom, was divided into twenty circles, and being the principal province, was commonly the residence of the kings or governors. See article ARARAT.

2. MINNI, מִנִּי, is mentioned in Jer. li, 27, along with Ararat and Ashkenaz, as a kingdom called to arm itself against Babylon. The name is by some taken for a contraction of "Armenia," and the Chald. in the text in Jeremiah has Hurmini (ܠܗܘܪܡܝܢ). There appears a trace of the name Minni in a passage quoted by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 6) from Nicolas of Damascus, where it is said that "there is a great mountain in Armenia, beyond the Minyas (Μινυάδες), called Baris, upon which it is reported that many who fled at the time of the Deluge were saved; and that one who was carried in an ark came on shore upon the top of it; and that the remains of the timber were a great while preserved. This might be the man about whom Moses, the legislator of the Jews, wrote." Saint-Martin (Mémoires sur l'Arménie, i, 249), has the not very probable conjecture that the word "Minni" may refer to the Manavazians, a distinguished Armenian tribe, descended from Manavaz, a son of Haik, the capital of whose country was Manavazagerd, now Melazgerd. It contains the root of the name Armenia according to the generally received derivation, Har-Minni, "the mountains of Minni." It is worthy of notice that the spot where Xenophon ascertains that the name of the country through which he was passing was Armenia, coincides with the position here assigned to Minni (Xen. An. iv, 5; Ainsworth, Track of 10,000, p. 177). In Psa. xlv, 8, where it is said, "out of the ivory palaces wherby they made thee glad," the Hebrew word rendered "wherby" is minni (מִנִּי), and hence some (e. g. Rosenmüller, in loc.) take it for the proper name, and would translate "palaces of Armenii," but the interpretation is forced and incongruous (Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 799). See MINNI.

3. TOGARMAH, תּוֹגַרְמַיִם, in some MSS. TORGAMAH, and found with great variety of orthography in the Sept. and Josephus. In the ethnographic table in the tenth chapter of Genesis (ver. 3; comp. 1 Chron. i, 6) Togarmah is introduced as the youngest son of Gomer (son of Japhet), who is supposed to have given name to the Cimmerians on the north coast of the Euxine Sea, his other sons being Ashkenaz and Riphath, both progenitors of northern tribes, among whom also it is natural to seek for the posterity of Togarmah. The prophet Ezekiel (xxxviii, 6) also classes along with Gomer "the house of Togarmah and the sides of the north" (in the Eng. Vers. "of the north quarters"), where, as also at Ezek. xxvii, 14, it is placed beside Meshech and Tubal, probably the tribes of the Moschi and Tibareni in the Caucasus. Now, though Josephus and Jerome find Togarmah in Phrygia, Bochart in Cappadocia, the Chaldee and the Jewish rabbins in Germany, etc., yet a comparison of the above passages leads to the conclusion that it is rather to be sought for in Armenia, and this is the opinion of Eusebius, Theodoret, and others of the fathers. It is strikingly confirmed by the traditions of that and the neighboring countries. According to Moses of Chorene (Hist. Arm. ed. Whiston, i, 8, p. 24), and also King Wachtang's History of Georgia (in Klaproth's Travels in the Caucasus, ii, 64), the Armenians, Georgians, Lesghians, Mingrelians, and Caucasians are all descended from one common progenitor, called Thargamos, a son of Awanan, son of Japhet, son of Noah (comp. Eusebius, Chron. ii, 12). After the dispersion at Babel he settled near Ararat, but his posterity spread abroad between the Caspian and Euxine seas. A similar account is found in a Georgian chronicle, quoted by another German traveller, Guldenstedt, which states that Thargamos was the father of eight sons, the eldest of whom was Aos, the ancestor of the Armenians. They still call themselves "the house of Thorgom," the very phrase used by Ezekiel, the corresponding Syriac word for "house" denoting "land or district" (see Wahl, Gesch. der Morgenl. Spr. u. Lit. p. 72). From the house or province of Togarmah the market of Tyre was supplied with horses and mules (Ezek. xxvii, 14); and Armenia, we know, was famed of old for its breed of horses. The Satrap of Armenia sent yearly to the Persian court 20,000 foals for the feast of Mithras (Strabo, xi, 13, 9; Xen. oph. Anubas. iv, 5, 24; Herod. vii, 40). See TOGARMAH.

Map of ancient Armenia, with the adjoining Regions.

The Ἀρμενία of the Greeks (sometimes aspirated, Ἀρμενία, comp. Xen. Anab. iv, 6, 34) is the Arminiya or Irminiya of the Arabs, the Ermenistan of the Persians. Moses of Chorene (Hist. Arm. p. 35) derives the name from Aram (q. v.), a son of Shem, who also gave name to Aramæa or Syria; Hartmann (Aufklär. i, 34) draws it from Armenugh, the second of the native princes; but the most probable etymology is that of Bochart (Phaleg, i, 3), viz., that it was originally מִינִי הַר, Har-Minni or Mount Mini, i. e. the Highland of Minyas, or, according to Wahl (Asien, i, 807), the Heavenly Mountain (i. e. Ararat), for mino in Zend, and myno, myny, in Parsee, signify "heaven, heavenly." In the country itself the name Armenia is unknown; the people are called Haik (Rosenmüller, Alterth. I, i, 267 sq.), and the country Hayotz-zor, the Valley of the Haiks—from Haik, the fifth descendant of Noah by Japhet, in the traditional genealogy of the country (comp. Ritter's Erldkunde, ii, 714).

The boundaries of Armenia (lat. 37-42°) may be described (Strabo, xi, 526) generally as the southern range of the Caucasus on the north, and the Moschian branch of the Taurus on the south; but in all directions, and especially to the east and west, the limits have been very fluctuating (Rennell, Geogr. Herod. i, 369). It forms an elevated table-land, whence the rivers Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and Acampsis pour down their waters in different directions, the first two to the Persian Gulf, the last two respectively to the Caspian and Euxine seas. It may be termed the nucleus of the mountain system of Western Asia: from the centre of the plateau rise two lofty chains of mountains, which run from east to west, converging toward the Caspian Sea, but parallel to each other toward the west, the most northerly named by ancient geographers the Abus Mountains, and culminating in Mount Ararat; the other named the Niphates Mountains. Westward these ranges may be traced in Anti-Taurus and Taurus, while in the opposite direction they are continued in the Caspius Mountains. These ranges (with the exception of the gigantic Ararat) are of moderate height, the plateau gradually sinking toward the plains of Iran on the east, and those of Asia Minor on the west. The climate is generally cold (Xen. Anab. iv, 4, 8), but salubrious, the degree of severity varying with the altitude of different localities, the valleys being sufficiently warm to ripen the grape. The country abounds in romantic forest and mountain scenery, and rich pasture-land, especially in the districts which border upon Persia (Herod. i, 194; vii, 40; Xen. Anab. iv, 5, 24; Strabo, x, 528, 558, 587; Ezek. xxvii, 14; Chardin, Voyages, ii, 158; Tournefort, Reisen, iii, 179 sq.). The latter supported vast numbers of mules and horses, on which the wealth of the country chiefly depended; and hence Strabo (xi, 529) tells us that the horses were held in as high estimation as the celebrated Nisean breed. The inhabitants were keen traders in ancient as in modern times. Ancient writers notice, also, the wealth of Armenia in metals and precious stones (Herod. i, 194; Pliny, xxxvii, 23). The great rivers Euphrates and Tigris both take their rise in this region, as also the Araxes, and the Kur or Cyrus. Armenia is commonly divided into Greater and Lesser (Lucan. ii, 638), the line of separation being the Euphrates (comp. Ptolem. v, 7 and 13); but the former constitutes by far the larger portion (Strabo, xi, 532), and, indeed, the other is often regarded as pertaining rather to Asia Minor. (See, generally, Strabo, xi, 526 sq.; Pliny, vi, 9; Mannert, V, ii, 181 sq.; Ritter, Erldkunde, x, 285 sq.) There was anciently a kingdom of Armenia, with its metropolis Artaxata: it was sometimes an independent state, but most commonly tributary to some more powerful neighbor. Indeed, at no period was the whole of this region ever comprised under one government, but Assyria, Media, Syria, and Cappadocia shared the dominion or allegiance of some portion of it, just as it is now divided among the Persians, Russians, Turks, and Kurds; for there is no doubt that that part of Kurdistan which includes the elevated basins of the lakes of Van and Oormiah anciently belonged to Armenia. The unfortunate German traveller Schulz (who was murdered by a Kurdish chief) discovered in 1827, near the former lake, the ruins of a very ancient town, which he supposed to be that which is called by Armenian historians Shamiranakert (i. e. the town of Semiramis), because believed to have been built by the famous Assyrian queen. The ruins are covered with inscriptions in the arrow-headed character; in one of them Saint-Martin thought he deciphered the words Khsh'arshu, son of Durcioush (Xerxes, son of Darius). In later times Armenia was the border-country where the Romans and Parthians fruitlessly strove for the mastery; and since then it has been the frequent battle-field of the neighboring states. During the recent wars between Russia and Turkey, large bodies of native Armenians have emigrated into the Russian dominions, so that their number in what is termed Turkish Armenia is now considerably reduced. By the treaty of Turkomanshi (21st Feb. 1828), Persia ceded to Russia the Khanats of Erivan and Nakhchevan. The boundary-line (drawn from the Turkish dominions) passes over the Little Ararat; the line of separation between Persian and Turkish Armenia also begins at Ararat; so that this famous mountain is now the central boundary-stone of these three empires. (See, generally, Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.; Penny Cyclopadia, s. v.; McCulloch's Geogr. Dict. s. v.)—Kitto, s. v.

The slight acquaintance which the Hebrew writers had of this country was probably derived from the Phœnicians. There are signs of their knowledge having been progressive. Isaiah, in his prophecies regarding Babylon, speaks of the hosts as coming from the "mountains" (xiii, 4), while Jeremiah, in connection with the same subject, uses the specific names Ararat and Mini (li, 27). Ezekiel, who was apparently better acquainted with the country, uses a name which was familiar to its own inhabitants, Togarmah. Whether the use of the term Ararat in Isa. xxxvii, 38, belongs to the period in which the prophet himself lived, is a question which cannot be here discussed. In the prophetic passages to which we have referred, it will be noticed that Armenia is spoken of rather in reference to its geographical position as one of the extreme northern nations with which the Jews were acquainted than for any more definite purpose.—Smith.

Christianity was first established in Armenia in the fourth century; the Armenian Church (q. v.) has a close affinity to the Greek Church in its forms and polity; it is described by the American missionaries who are settled in the country as in a state of great corruption and debasement. The total number of the Armenian nation throughout the world is supposed not to exceed 2,000,000. Their favorite pursuit is commerce, and their merchants are found in all parts of the East.—Kitto.

Armenian Church. The designation of a branch of Christians, which, although originating in Armenia, is now disseminated over all the adjacent portions of the East.

I. History.—Armenia, it is said, first received Christianity from Bartholomew and Thaddaus, the latter not the apostle, but one of the seventy, who instructed Abgarus of Edessa (q. v.) in the faith, although the Armenians themselves maintain that he was the apostle. The light was very speedily quenched, and was not rekindled until the beginning of the fourth century. About that time Gregory (q. v.) Illuminator (or Lusarorich, in their tongue) preached the Gospel throughout Armenia, and soon converted the king, Tyridates. Gregory was consecrated first bishop of the Armenians by Leontius of Casarea, whence the Armenian Church became thenceforward dependent on the see of Casarea, and for a long period the successors of Gregory were consecrated by that primate. It was to this subjection to the see of Casarea that the primates of Armenia owed the title of Catholicos (or proctor-general), which was assigned them as vicars of the primate of Casarea in that country. In the fourth century they received many literary institutions through the Catholicos Sahag (after 406), and a translation of the Bible through Mesrob (q. v.). The Armenian Church preserved the faith until the end of the reign of Theodosius the younger; and in 437 a synod was held at Ispahan, composed of many Armenian bishops, who addressed a synodical letter to Proclus, of Constantinople, condemning the impieties of Nestorius and Theodore of Mopsuestia. In the following century the Church of Armenia, from an excess of hatred toward Nestorianism, embraced the Eutychian (q. v.) heresy, and condemned the Council of Chalcedon. The name commonly given to the Church was Gregorian Church (after Gregory Illuminator). When, in the fifth century, several kings of Persia made an attempt to force the doctrines of Zoroaster upon the Armenians, many emigrated to various countries of Asia and Europe. About 554 a synod of Armenian bishops was convened at the city of Thevin, or Tiben, by the patriarch Nerses II, at the command of the King of Persia, who desired to separate the Armenians from the Greeks. In this synod they renounced the communion of the orthodox churches, anathematized that of Jerusalem, allowed only one nature in Jesus Christ, and added to the Tersanctus the words Qui crucifixus es. See MONOPHYTES. An attempt to abolish the schism was made by a synod at Garin in 629, which adopted the resolutions of Chalcedon; but soon the connection between the Armenian and the Greek Church was again dissolved. The metropolis of the Armenian Church was called Vagarschabat in their tongue, but was known to the Latins as Artaxata, the capital of the country. In this city was built, A. D. 650, the monastery of Eschmiazin (or Etchmiaz), which contains the sepulchre of St. Gregory, and is now the see of the patriarch, or catholicos, as he is called, of Armenia Major. Vagarschabat no longer exists; but the monastery of Eschmiazin is the seat of the catholicos, and contained three churches built in a triangle. At first the catholicos of Eschmiazin was the sole patriarch of Armenia; but before the year 1311 there were three, viz. a second at Aghtamar, and a third at Sis. Rikaut, who wrote an account of "the Greek and Armenian Churches" (Lond. 1679, 8vo), mentions, besides these three, a fourth one at Can-sahar. All four had under them 37 archbishops and 100 bishops. By the treaty of Uinkiar Skelessi (1828) a large portion of Upper Armenia was ceded to the Czar, and thus also the head of the Church, the catholicos of Eschmiazin, became a subject of Russia. The attempts of the Russian government to induce the Armenians to enter into a union with the Russian Church have failed. In Turkey the Armenians shared in general the fate of the other Christian denominations. See TURKEY. In 1848 they elected a council of 12 lay primates, who rule the Church in all its temporal affairs. The patriarch has only the right of presidency.

At an early period efforts were made to establish a closer connection of the Armenians with the Roman Catholic Church. In consequence of the Crusades, several kings, in the twelfth and following centuries, interested themselves in behalf of a corporate union of the churches with Rome, and the synods of Kromglai (1179), Sis (1307), and Atan (1316) declared themselves in the same way. At the Council of Florence (1439), the Armenian deputies, together with the Greeks, accepted the union, but neither people ratified it. Some churches, however, remained, ever since the fourteenth century, when Pope John XXIII sent a Roman archbishop to Armenia, in connection with Rome, and formed the "Armenian Catholic, or United Armenian Church," which in doctrinal points conforms with Rome, but in all other respects agrees with the Gregorian Armenian Church. Through the influence of Meclitar (q. v.) and the Meclitarists, this branch obtained a literary superiority over the main (non-unioned) body, which, especially in modern times, has worked not a little in favor of Rome. Of late, not only a number of Armenian villages have accepted the union, but in Turkey, among some of the leading men of the national (Gregorian) Armenian Church, a disposition has been created to try anew the accomplishment of a corporate union. See UNITED ARMENIAN CHURCH.

The efforts made by the High-Church Episcopalians for establishing a closer intercommunion between the Church of England and the Eastern churches was favorably received by many Armenians of Turkey. A pamphlet was published in 1860, in Constantinople, with the imprimatur of the Armenian patriarch, to show how nearly the Armenian Church is like that of England. The pamphlet, to this end, quotes from the prayer-book the whole of the twenty-fifth Article of Religion, but so shapes the translation as to make it appear that the Church of England, as well as the Armenian, believe in seven sacraments, though five of them, the pamphlet says, are received only, as they are by the Armenian Church, as secondary sacraments. Several Armenian theologians are quoted in support of this theory. In the same year (1860), Rev. G. Williams, of Cambridge (England), had an interview with the Armenian archbishop of Tiflis, in Georgia, relative to the scheme of a union between the English and Armenian churches. Mr. Williams was the bearer of letters from the bishops of Oxford and Lincoln, who, it appears, assumed to speak in the name of the Church of England to the "catholicos, patriarch, bishops, etc., of the orthodox Eastern Church." He was to see "the holy catholicos," the head of the entire Armenian Church, at Eschmiazin; but, being somewhat unwell, and his time of absence having almost expired, he abandoned his journey to Eschmiazin, and spent ten days in Tiflis to confer with the archbishop of that city. He expressed, in the name of the Church of England, his acknowledgment of the Armenian Church as a true, orthodox, and apostolic church, and kissed "the sacred hand of his holiness." The archbishop, in return, granted to him his episcopal blessing, and expressed a thousand good wishes for himself and his people. To the proposition of Mr. Williams to send a few young Armenians to Cambridge for an education, no definite answer was given.

The Armenian Church has produced a numerous theological literature, the chief works of which have been published at Venice by the Mechitarists, and at Constantinople. The translation of the Bible by Mesrob is still regarded as a model of classic language. The most celebrated Armenian writers were Gregory Illuminator and David the philosopher. A martyrology was compiled in the ninth century by Kakik and Gregory, an enlarged edition of which (Haismarvark, Constantinople, 1847) is still read in the Armenian churches. See Neumann, Versuch einer Geschichte der Armenischen Litteratur (Leipzig, 1836). See MEKHITAR.

II. Doctrines, Usages, and Polity.—The Armenians are said to be Monophysites, but modern "missionaries are generally disposed to regard them as differing more in terminology than in idea from the orthodox faith on that point. They agree with the Greeks and other Oriental churches in rejecting the 'filio-que' from the Nicene Creed, and maintaining the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father only. With some difference in forms and modes of worship, the religious opinions of the Armenians are mostly like those of the Greeks. The sign of the cross is used on all occasions; but made by the Greeks with three fingers, by the Armenians with two, by the Jacobites with one—the Greek usage pointing to the Trinity, the Armenian to the two natures made one in the person of Christ, and the Jacobite to the Divine unity. They profess to hold to the seven sacraments of the Latin Church; but, in fact, extreme unction exists among them only in name, the prayers so designated being intermingled with those of confirmation, which latter rite is performed with the 'holy chrism' by the priest at the time of baptism. Infants are baptized, as commonly in the Greek and other Oriental churches, by a partial immersion in the font and three times pouring water on the head. Converted Jews, etc., though adults, are baptized in the same manner. They readily admit to their communion Romanists and Protestants baptized by sprinkling, differing in this from the Greeks, who receive none, however previously baptized, without rebaptizing them. They believe firmly in the 'real presence' in the Eucharist, and adore the host in the mass. The people partake, however, in both kinds, the wafer or broken bread (unleavened) being dipped in undiluted wine (the Greeks use leavened bread and wine mixed with water), and laid carefully on the tongue. It must be received fasting. They reject the Latin purgatory, but, believing that the souls of the departed may be benefited by the aid of the church (which, of course, must be paid for), they pray for the dead. Saint-worship is carried to an extraordinary length, the addresses to saints being often grossly idolatrous, and the mediation of Christ lost sight of in the liturgical services of the church, as it is in the minds of the people. The cross, and pictures of the saints, are also objects of worship, as possessing inherent efficacy. The Supreme Being is likewise represented under the form of an aged, venerable man, with whom, and the Son, under the form of a young man, and the Holy Spirit, symbolized as a dove, the Virgin Mary is associated in the same picture. The perpetual virginity of the latter is held as a point of pre-eminent importance. Confession to the priesthood, in order to absolution, is deemed essential to salvation. Penances are imposed; but absolution is without money, and indulgences are never given. Baptism confers regeneration and cleansing from sin, original and actual; spiritual life is maintained by penances and sacraments; and the priest holds in his hand the passport to heaven. The merit of good works is acknowledged, particularly of asceticism. Monachism, celibacy, fasting, etc., are viewed as in other Eastern churches, but fasts are more lengthened and severe; the number of fast-days, when no animal food of any kind can be eaten, is 165 in the year. On the fourteen great fast-days the observance of the day is more strict than that of the Sabbath, which last is as in Roman Catholic countries. Minor feasts are even more numerous than the days in the year. The Church services are performed in the ancient tongue, not now understood by the common people, and in a manner altogether perfunctory and painful to an enlightened mind.

"There are nine different grades of clergy, each receiving a distinct ordination by the laying on of hands. Four of these are below the order of deacon, and are called porters, readers, exorcists, and candle-lighters. After these come the sub-deacons, the deacons, the priests, then the bishops, and, last of all, the catholicoi. The catholicoi is ordained by a council of bishops. He is the spiritual head of the church, who alone ordains bishops, and can furnish the meiron, or sacred oil used by bishops in ordaining the inferior clergy, and in the various ceremonies of the church. The priests are obliged to be married men, and can never rise higher than the priesthood, except in case of the death of a wife, when, not being allowed to marry a second time, they may enter among the Vartabeds—an order of celibate priests, who are attached to the churches as preachers (the married priests do not usually preach), or live together in monasteries, and from among whom the bishops, etc., on whom the law of celibacy is imposed, are taken" (Newcomb, Cyclopædia of Missions).—Ekkehard, d. Christl. Glaubens d. armen. Kirch. (Petersb. 1799); Armeniorum Confessio (Witob. 1570); Liturgia Armena (cura G. Andichiani (Ven. 1826); Tauf-Ritual d. arm. K. in Russ. (Petersb. 1799).

There are among the Gregorian (Non-united) Armenians a great number of monks. They follow either the rule of St. Anthony or that of St. Basil. The monks of St. Anthony live in solitude and in the desert, and surpass in austerity almost all the orders of the Roman Church. There are sometimes as many as a hundred monks in one monastery. The order of St. Basil (introduced into the Armenian Church in 1173) is less strict; their convents are in the towns, and from them the bishops and vartabeds are taken. Their principal convent, called "Three Churches," is at Eschmiazin. Most of their convents are poor, but they have three very rich ones in Jerusalem. The United Armenians have the following orders: (1.) A congregation of monks of St. Anthony, still existing, under a general abbot, who resides on Mount Lebanon, while a procurator general represents the order at Rome. (2.) A congregation of Basilians, also called Bartholomites, founded in 1307 at Genoa by a fugitive monk, Peter Martin. They obtained many convents in Italy, assumed in 1356 the rule of Augustine and the garb of the Dominican lay brothers, and were suppressed in 1650. (3.) In 1330 a number of Armenian monks and priests were induced by some Dominican friars to join the Church of Rome, and formed a monastic congregation, called the United Brethren of St. Gregory Illuminator. They likewise adopted the rule of St. Augustine, and the constitutions and habit of the Dominicans. In 1356 they fused entirely with the Dominican order, and were formed into the province of Nakhevan. (4.) The most celebrated of the Armenian monks are the Mechitarists (q. v.).

III. Present Condition and Statistics.—The estimates of the present number of Armenians greatly vary. In Turkey they are believed to amount to about 2,600,000 souls. Russia had, in 1851, 372,535 Gregorian (Non-united) and 22,253 Catholic (United) Armenians. Persia has, according to the "Missionary Herald" of 1859, about 30,000; according to Uchicini (Letters on Turkey), 600,000 Armenians. Uchicini gives 40,000 for India, and 60,000 for Western Europe; but other statements give lower figures. The Armenians of Western Europe are mostly United; of those in India, Persia, and Turkey, only a minority (in Asiatic Turkey 75,000 in 1844, which number has since increased). The number of Armenians in Turkey who had declared themselves Protestants amounted in 1858 to nearly 6000. The catholicos of Eschmiazin (now in Russia) is still regarded as the chief bishop of the church. He is appointed by the Czar, and has under him a synod, an imperial procurator, and 67 bishops. Also the bishops of Constantinople and Jerusalem assume the title Patriarch, though they are said not to be strictly such, but rather superior bishops, possessing certain privileges conferred by the patriarch. The United Armenians have in European Turkey 1 archbishop at Constantinople; in Asiatic Turkey, 1 patriarch in Cilicia, 1 archbishop at Seleucia, and 9 bishops; in Persia, 1 bishop at Ispahan; in Austria, 1 archbishop at Lemberg, besides whom also the Mechitarist abbots of Venice and Vienna are archbishops in partibus.

IV. Armenian Protestant Missions.—The history of Protestantism among the Armenians forms one of the most interesting chapters in the history of modern Protestant missions. As a forerunner in the reformation of the Armenian Church we may regard a priest by the name of Debajy Oghli, about 1760. He lived in Constantinople, and wrote a book in which he praised Luther, and castigated both clergy and people with an unsparring hand. His book, though never published, circulated from hand to hand, and was later used by the Protestant missionaries with some effect. The efforts of the Protestant Church in behalf of the Armenian Church began with the circulation of the Bible. In 1813 the British Bible Society began the publication of the Armenian Bible (the translation made by Mesrob in the fifth century), and in 1815 an edition of 5000 copies was issued at Calcutta. The same society published in 1823 at Constantinople an edition of 5000 copies of the New Testament, and of 3000 copies of the four Gospels alone. Simultaneously with the British society, the Russian Bible Society undertook the publication of the Armenian Bible, and issued at St. Petersburg, in 1817, an edition of 2000 copies, and soon after an edition of the ancient Armenian New Testament. A great enthusiasm manifested itself in Russia for this work, the Emperor Alexander, the archbishops and bishops of the Greek and the Armenian churches, and nearly all the Russian nobility being among its patrons. The Armenian Bibles and New Testaments thus printed were widely circulated through various agencies. But it was soon discovered that the mass of the people did not understand the old Armenian language, and that one portion (perhaps one third, chiefly in the more southern portions of Asia Minor) had even lost the use of the modern Armenian, speaking only Turkish. This led to the translation of the Bible into modern Armenian and into Armeno-Turkish (Turkish written with Armenian characters). The former translation was issued by the Russian society in 1822, the latter by the British society in 1823. These translations, however, called forth the opposition of the Armenian patriarch of Constantinople and the Armenian clergy in general.

A Protestant mission was established among the Armenians by the American Board in 1830, after the way had been previously prepared by the conversion of three Armenian priests (two of whom were bishops) by the American missionaries of Syria, and by the famous school of Pestitimalyan, a man conversant not only with Armenian, but also with Western literature and theology. The first missionaries were E. Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, who were joined in the following years by W. Goodell, J. B. Adger, B. Schneider, C. Hamlin, and others. The missionaries soon organized several schools at Constantinople, Pera, Brousa, Hass-Keuy, Bebek, and through them worked successfully for spreading evangelical views in the Armenian Church. In 1831 the mission press was transferred from Malta to Smyrna, and there soon began a most successful operation, printing, up to the 1st of January, 1858, two and a half million pages in the Armenian languages. In the following years Mr. Goodell completed the translation of the whole Old Testament into the Armeno-Turkish language, and W. Adger issued an improved translation of the New Testament into modern Armenian. The missionaries early found devoted co-laborers among the Armenians; among whom Sahakyan, who was converted when a student, in 1833, and a pious priest, Der Kevork, were prominent. Though not interrupted, they encountered a strong opposition, which was generally headed by the patriarchs and the chief Armenian bankers in Constantinople, and sometimes manifested itself as open and cruel persecution. That was especially the case when, in 1844, Matteos, formerly bishop of Brousa, was made patriarch of Constantinople. For two years he used all means within his reach against the favorers of the Protestant missions, and it required the interference of the Christian ambassadors to obtain an order from the sultan, which put an end to further persecutions (March, 1846). Up to that time the converts had not formally separated from the church; but when they were now formally excommunicated by the patriarch Matteos, and thus also cut off from the civil rights of the Armenian community [see TRKEY], they organized independent evangelical Armenian churches. The first churches thus organized were those of Constantinople, Nicomedia, Adalabazan, and Trebizond. Their number has since steadily increased. In 1850 the Protestants were placed on an equality with the other Christian denominations, and, in 1853, even on an equality with the Mussulmans before the law. The report made by the American Board on the Armenian missions in 1859 shows them to be in a very prosperous condition. They are now divided into two separate missions, the Northern Armenian and the Southern Armenian. The Northern Armenian contained, in 1858, 13 stations, occupied by missionaries; 31 out-stations, occupied by native teachers or helpers; 33 missionaries, of whom one is a physician; 1 mission treasurer; 34 female assistant missionaries; 4 native pastors; 21 native preachers; 48 other native helpers (not including 38 teachers). The number of churches was 28, with 602 members; the number of free-schools 44, with 928 pupils. There were also three male high-schools (Bebek, Erzurum, and Tocat), with 52 pupils, and one female boarding-school at Hass-Keuy, with 22 pupils. Nearly nineteen millions of pages were issued during the year 1858. The Southern Armenian Mission presented the following statistics: 5 stations; 14 out-stations; 9 missionaries—one a physician; 9 female assistant missionaries; 1 native pastor; 2 other ordained native preachers; 1 licentiate; 37 other helpers; churches, 10; communicants, 489; average congregations on the Sabbath, 185; theological students (at Aintab, Marsh, and Antioch), 26; common schools, 18, with 746 scholars. In 1859 the Turkish government appointed an Armenian Protestant censor, in order to relieve the Protestants from the annoyances which they had suffered from the (Gregorian) Armenian censor. The civil community of the Protestant Armenians is at present (1860) greatly suffering from pecuniary embarrassment, as the Protestants, on account of their poverty, find it difficult to pay the tax levied on them for supporting their civil organization. Until 1859 the American missionaries had mostly confined themselves to the Armenians of Turkey, but in that year one of the missionaries visited several Armenian villages of Persia for the purpose of establishing a Protestant mission.

Armenian Language. The ancient Armenian or Haikan language (now dead), notwithstanding the great antiquity of the nation to which it belongs, possesses no literary documents prior to the fifth century of the Christian era. The translation of the Bible, begun by Mesrob (q. v.) in the year 410, is the earliest monument of the language that has come down to us. The dialect in which this version is written, and in which it is still publicly read in their churches, is called the old Armenian. The dialect now in use—the modern Armenian—in which they preach and carry on the intercourse of daily life, not only departs from the elder form by dialectal changes in the native elements of the language itself, but also by the great intermixture of Persian and Turkish words which has resulted from the conquest and subjection of the country. It is, perhaps, this diversity of the ancient and modern idioms which has given rise to the many conflicting opinions that exist as to the relation in which the Armenian stands to other languages. Thus Cirbied and Vater both assert that it is an original language; that is, one so distinct from all others in its fundamental character as not to be classed with any of the great families of languages. Eichhorn, on the other hand (Sprachenkunde, p. 349), affirms that the learned idiom of the Armenian undoubtedly belongs to the Medo-Persian family; whereas Pott (Untersuchungen, p. 32) says that, notwithstanding its many points of relation to that family, it cannot strictly be considered to belong to it; and Gatterer actually classed it as a living sister of the Basque, Finnish, and Welsh languages.

As to form, it is said to be rough and full of consonants; to possess ten cases in the noun—a number which is only exceeded by the Finnish; to have no dual; to have no mode of denoting gender in the noun by change of form, but to be obliged to append the words man and woman as the marks of sex—thus, to say prophet-woman for prophetess (nevertheless, modern writers use the syllable ouhi to distinguish the feminine; Wahl, Geschichte d. Morgenl. Sprachen, p. 100); to bear a remarkable resemblance to Greek in the use of the participle, and in the whole syntactical structure; and to have adopted the Arabian system of metre.—Kitto, s. v.

The history of its alphabetical character is briefly this: until the third century of our era, the Armenians used either the Persian or Greek alphabet (the letter in Syrian characters, mentioned by Diodor. xix, 23, is not considered an evidence that they wrote Armenian in Syrian characters, as that letter was probably Persian). In the fifth century, however, the translation of the Bible created the necessity for characters which would more adequately represent the peculiar sounds of the language. Accordingly, after a fruitless attempt of a certain Daniel, and after several efforts on his own part, Mesrob saw a hand in a dream write the very characters which now constitute the Armenian alphabet. The 38 letters thus obtained are chiefly founded on the Greek, but have partly made out their number by deriving some forms from the Zend alphabet. The order of writing is from left to right. Mesrob employed these letters in his transla-

Armenian Version. This translation of the Bible was undertaken in the year 410 by Mesrob, with the aid of his pupils Joannes Eecelenensis and Josephus Palnensis. It appears that the Patriarch Isaac first attempted, in consequence of the Persians having destroyed all the copies of the Greek version, to make a translation from the Peshito; that Mesrob became his coadjutor in this work; and that they actually completed their translation from the Syriac. But when the above-named pupils, who had been sent to the ecclesiastical council at Ephesus, returned, they brought with them an accurate copy of the Greek Bible. Upon this, Mesrob laid aside his translation from the Peshito, and prepared to commence anew from a more authentic text. Imperfect knowledge of the Greek language, however, induced him to send his pupils to Alexandria, to acquire accurate Greek scholarship; and, on their return, the translation was accomplished. Moses of Chorene, the historian of Armenia, who was also employed, as a disciple of Mesrob, on this version, fixes its completion in the year 410; but he is contradicted by the date of the Council of Ephesus, which necessarily makes it subsequent to the year 431.

In the Old Testament this version adheres exceedingly closely to the Septuagint (but in the book of Daniel has followed the version of Theodotion). Its most striking characteristic is, that it does not follow any known recension of the Sept. Although it more often agrees with the Alexandrine text, in readings which are peculiar to the latter, than it does with the Aldine or Complutensian text, yet, on the other hand, it also has followed readings which are only found in the last two. Bertholdt accounts for this mixed text by assuming that the copy of the Greek Bible sent from Ephesus contained the Lucian recension, and that the pupils brought back copies according to the Hesiychian recension from Alexandria, and that the translators made the latter their standard, but corrected their version by aid of the former (Eubii, ii, 560). The version of the New Testament is equally close to the Greek original, and also represents a text made up of Alexandrine and Occidental readings.—Kitto.

This version was afterward revised and adapted to the Peshito in the sixth century, on the occasion of an ecclesiastical union between the Syrians and Armenians. Again, in the thirteenth century, an Armenian king, Hethom or Haltho, who was so zealous a Catholic that he turned Franciscan monk, adapted the Armenian version to the Vulgate, by way of smoothing the way for a union of the Roman and Armenian churches. Lastly, the Bishop Usean, who printed the first edition of this version at Amsterdam, in the year 1666, is also accused of having interpolated the text as it came down to his time by adding all that he found the Vulgate contained more than the Armenian version. The existence of the verse 1 John v, 7, in this version, is ascribed to this supplementary labor of Usean. It is clear, from what has been said, that the critical uses of this version are limited to determining the readings of the Sept. and of the Greek text of the New Testament which it represents, and that it has suffered many alterations, which diminish its usefulness in that respect. See generally Walch, Bibl. Theol. iv, 50, 247; Rosenmüller, Handb. d. Literatur, iii, 78-84, 153 sq. The following are the forms of this version hitherto published: 1. Biblia, jussu Jacobi protopatriarchæ (Amst. 1666, 4to); Biblia, jussu patriarchæ Nahabiet (Constpl. 1795, 4to); Biblia, jussu Abrahami patriarchæ (Ven. 1733, fol.); Biblia (ed. Arm-hole (ԴՐՄԻՆ, atssil' yad, joint of the hand; Sept. ἀγκῶν χροαίος). "Woe to the women that sew pillows to all arm-holes" (Ezek. xiii, 18), i. e. elbows, although the term has also been taken for the wrist, or for the knuckles of the hand. The true meaning is somewhat doubtful, for it evidently refers to some custom with which we are unacquainted. The women spoken of are no doubt the priestesses of Ashtaroth, and the object of the prophet is to denounce the arts they employed to allure God's chosen people to a participation in their idolatrous worship. Orientals, when they wish to be at their ease, recline on or against various kinds of rich pillows or cushions. The adulteress in the Proverbs (vii, 16) alludes to the costliness and richness of those that belonged to her divan or "bed" among the circumstances by which she sought to seduce "the young man void of understanding;" it is therefore not unreasonable to suppose that something of the same kind may be here intended. See PILLOW. The term also occurs in Jeremiah xxxviii, 12, in describing the release of the prophet from the dungeon of Malchiah.

Arminianism, properly, the system of doctrine taught by James Arminius, especially with regard to the Augustinian theory of unconditional predestination, as revived and extended by Calvin and others in the Reformation. It is designated by Guthrie as that "gigantic recoil from Calvinism, than which no reaction in nature could have been more certainly predicted. Of all the actors in that movement—so fertile of mighty actors—no one played a more conspicuous, important, and trying part than Arminius. To high talent and cultivation, and to consummate ability as a disputant, Arminius added the ornament of spotless Christian consistency (his enemies being judges), and of a singularly noble, manly, and benevolent nature. This, with his conspicuous position, made his personal influence to be very potent and extensive. And yet few names have ever been overshadowed by a deeper and denser gloom of prejudice than his; to utter which, as Wesley remarked, was much the same, in some ears, as to raise the cry of mad d. g. This is attributable partly to the latitudinarianism of some of his followers, who, revolting at the dominant faith, and maddened by oppression, resiled to the opposite extreme; and partly to the accidental circumstance that his milder scheme found general favor in the Church of England at a time when she stood in hostile relations to the English Puritans and the Scottish Presbyterians. But these were results with which neither the in Arminius nor the Arminian principle of conditionalism had any thing whatever to do. To trace them to him were not more just than to trace German Neology to Luther and Melancthon, and Socinianism to Calvin." (Preface to Brande's Life of Arminius.)

1. Life of Arminius and the Controversy in his time.—The following sketch, so far as the facts of the life of Arminius is concerned, is modified from the Biographical Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

JAMES ARMINIUS (Lat. Jacobus Arminius; Dutch, Jacob Hermatson or Van Herman) was born in the year 1560 at Oudewater, a small town of Holland. As Oudewater means in Dutch "Old Water," Veteres Aque, Arminius is sometimes surnamed in his works Veteraquinus. He lost his father, a cutler, in his infancy; but he found a protector in Theodorus Emilius, who had once been a Roman Catholic priest. Emilius took Arminius with him to Utrecht, and sent him to the school of that place. In his 15th year Arminius lost his patron by death, but another protector, Rudolph Snellius, took him under his care, and removed him to Marburg (1575). Arminius had scarcely arrived at Marburg when he heard that his native town had been sacked by the Spaniards. Hurrying back to Oudewater, he found that his mother and his other relatives had been killed. He returned to Marburg on foot. He went thence to Rotterdam, and was received into the house of Peter Bertius, pastor of the Reformed Church. In the same year (1575) he was sent, with Peter Bertius the younger, to the University of Leyden, which had just been founded. After he had studied at Leyden for six years, "the directors of the body of merchants" of Amsterdam undertook to bear the expenses of his education for the ministry, Arminius agreeing that after he had been ordained he would not serve in the church of any other city without the permission of the burgomasters of Amsterdam. In 1582 he was sent to Geneva, which was then the great school of theology for all the Reformed churches, and where the doctrines of Calvin were taught in their most rigorous shape by Theodore Beza. At Geneva Arminius formed a close friendship which united him through life with Uyttenbogaert of Utrecht. During his residence at Geneva he gave great offence to some of the Aristotelian teachers of the Geneva school by advocating in public and lecturing in private to his friends on the logic of Ramus as opposed to that of Aristotle. See RAMUS. This course created so much commotion that he left Geneva and went to Basle, where the faculty of divinity offered to confer upon him the degree of doctor gratis; but he declined it, considering himself too young, and in 1583 returned to Geneva, where he continued his theological studies for three years more. In 1586 the fame of Zabarella, professor of philosophy at Padua, induced him to take a journey into Italy. From Padua he proceeded to Rome. After this journey Arminius came back to Geneva, and soon received an order from the burgomasters of Amsterdam to return to that town. He had taken this journey without their knowledge, and rumors had spread abroad that he had kissed the pope's slipper, held intercourse with the Jesuits, and especially with Cardinal Bellarmine—that, in short, he had become a Roman Catholic. The testimony of a friend who had travelled with him cleared him from these charges. Arminius used afterward to say that he derived no little benefit from this journey, as "he saw at Rome a mystery of iniquity much more foul than he had ever imagined." He was ordained at Amsterdam on the 11th of August, 1588, and he soon became distinguished as a preacher. The mild opinions of Melancthon on predestination had spread into Holland even before those of Calvin. In 1589 Theodore Koornhert, of Amsterdam, published several works, in which he attacked the doctrine of predestination, which was taught by Beza and the Genevan school. To obviate Koornhert's objections, some ministers of Delft proposed a change in Beza's doctrine. They agreed with Beza that divine predestination was the antecedent, unconditional, and immutable decree of God concerning the salvation or damnation of each individual; but whereas Beza represented that man, not considered as fallen, or even as created, was the object of this unconditional decree, the ministers of Delft made this peremptory decree subordinate to the creation and fall of man; that is to say, they adopted sublapsarianism in place of the supralapsarianism of Calvin and Beza. They thought this hypothesis would do away with Koornhert's objection that the doctrine of absolute decrees represented God as the author of sin—as such decrees made sin necessary and inevitable no less than damnation. Their view was published under the title Responsio ad argumenta quorundam Bezae et Calvinii, ex tractatu de Predestinatione, in Cap. IX ad Romanos. The book was sent to Lydius, professor at Francker, who requested Arminius to answer it. He consented; but in studying the subject he began to doubt which of the two views to adopt, and at length became inclined to embrace the doctrine which he had undertaken to refute. Meanwhile, on the 16th of September, 1590, he married Elizabeth Reael, daughter of Laurent Reael, a judge and senator of Amsterdam. In the course of his sermons at Amsterdam, Arminius commenced an exposition of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, in which some of the new views which he had adopted found expression. In 1593 he published Lectures in Rom. IX, in which he questions the view of that chapter given by Calvin and Beza. Disputes arose, but the consistory of Amsterdam gave an audience to the contending parties, and ordered them to cease all controversy until a general synod could be summoned to determine the subject of the dispute. In 1602 a pestilence raged at Amsterdam, during which Arminius showed the greatest courage and kindness in visiting the sick. The disease carried off two of the professors of the University of Leyden, Lucas Trilecius, the elder, and Francis Junius, professor of divinity. The curators of the university turned their eyes upon Arminius as a fit successor to Junius; but it was only after repeated applications on the part of the university that the authorities of Amsterdam consented to give him permission to leave on the 15th of April, 1603. As he had been charged with holding Pelagian views, before he was finally appointed he held a conference with Francis Gomar, who was also professor of divinity at Leyden, and who became afterward his capital enemy, at the Hague, the 6th of May, 1603, and the result was that Gomar declared the charge that he was a Pelagian to be groundless. At the same time, not only the curators of the university, but Gomar himself, were thoroughly aware that on the subject of predestination Arminius differed from the Genevan school. He underwent another examination, a private one, conducted by Gomar, for the degree of D. D., which he received 11th July, 1603. Arminius was the first on whom the University of Leyden conferred the degree of Doctor. One of the first observations of Arminius, after entering on the duties of his chair, was that the students were much more given to scholastic subtleties and disputations than to the thorough study of Scripture. He determined to cure this evil. "With this view he reckoned nothing more important than to re-close, as far as he could, crabbed questions and the cumbrous mass of scholastic assertions, and to inculcate on his disciples that divine wisdom which was drawn from the superlatively pure fountains of the Sacred Word, and was provided for the express purpose of guiding us to a life of virtue and happiness. From his first introduction into the academy it was his endeavor to aim at this mark, and give a corresponding direction to his studies both public and private. But truly this laudable attempt was in no small degree thwarted, partly by the jealousy which some had conceived against him, and partly also by a certain inveterate prejudice as to his heterodoxy, with which many ministers of religion had long been imbued, and under the impulse of which they stirred up his colleagues against him. The first germs, indeed, of this budding jealousy betrayed themselves in the following year (1604); for when Arminius, who had undertaken the task of interpreting the Old Testament in particular, proceeded also now and then to give a public exposition of certain portions of the New Testament, Gomar took this amiss, and began to allege that the right of expounding the New Testament belonged solely to him, as Primarius Professor of Sacred Theology; for this title had been conceded to him by the Senatus Academicus a short time prior to the arrival of Arminius. Nay, more; happening to meet Arminius, he felt unable to contain himself, and, in a burst of passion, broke out in these words: 'You have invaded my professorship.' Arminius replied that he did not mean to detract any thing whatever from the primacy of his colleague, and from the academic titles and privileges conferred upon him; and that he had not done him the slightest injury, having obtained license from the honorable curators to select themes of prelection at any time, not only from the Old Testament, but also from the New, provided he did not encroach on the particular subject in which Gomar might be engaged" (Brandt, Life of Arminius, ch. vii).

On the 7th of February, 1604, Arminius propounded certain theses on predestination, of which the sum was this: "Divine predestination is the decree of God in Christ by which he has decreed with himself from eternity to justify, adopt, and gift with eternal life, to the praise of his glorious grace, the faithful whom he has decreed to gift with faith. On the other hand, reprobation is the decree of the anger or severe will of God, by which he has determined from eternity, for the purpose of showing his anger and power, to condemn to eternal death, as placed out of union with Christ, the unbelieving who, by their own fault and the just judgment of God, are not to believe." On the last day of October Gomar openly attacked these positions, and from this day may be dated the tumults which ensued. In 1605 Arminius was created rector magnificus of the University, which office he quitted February 8th, 1606. Meanwhile the disputes continued. Festus Hommius, a minister of Leyden, Johannes Kuchlinus, rector of the Theological Faculty, and uncle of Arminius, were among his warmest adversaries. Deputies from the churches of all the provinces of Holland, and deputies from the Synod of Leyden, required from him a conference on the subject of his opinions. Preachers attacked him from the pulpit as a Pelagian, and worse than a Pelagian. A national synod was demanded to settle the disputes. On 22d May, 1607, an assembly was held at the Hague, at which Arminius was present, to settle the manner in which the synod was to be held. In 1608 Arminius and Uyttenbogaert applied to the States of Holland to convoke a synod, that these grave controversies might be settled. In the same year Arminius and Gomar held a conference before the Supreme Court of the Hague, which declared in its report that these two professors differed on points of little importance, and unessential to religion. Arminius gave in an account of his opinions to the States at the Hague on the 30th of October, 1608. (See the Declaratio, in his works.) Before the proposed synod could be held Arminius died. The disease which carried him off at last had long lain latent. It broke out on the 7th of February, 1609, but he recovered so far as to resume the usual duties of his professorship, though still weak. At last he sunk under his disorder, and expired 19th October, 1609. His death was most painful; and to bodily pain was added mental anguish at the misrepresentations of his religious opinions and of his personal character made by his embittered foes. The curators of the University of Leyden allowed his wife and children a pension.

Arminius was one of the most learned men of a learned age. His natural faculties were singularly acute; his mind was at once inquisitive and profound; and his industry in study equalled his capacity. As a preacher he was exceedingly popular; in sweetness of voice, ardor of manner, and finish of style, he was distinguished above all his contemporaries. His personal manners were of the most attractive kind; he grappled his friends by books of steel. The funeral oration delivered by Bertius ends with the phrase, "fuisse in Batavia virum quem qui norant non potuerunt satis existimare; qui non aestimantur, non satis cognoverunt." His writings, though inferior in point of Latinity to those of Calvin and Grotius, bear ample testimony to his learning, and to his skill in logic. He was so thoroughly versed in the ancient fathers, and so much of an adept in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, that his opinions carried along with them a weight among the learned which his antagonists could not well resist. Neander calls him the "model of a conscientious and zealously investigating theogian" (Hist. of Dogmas, ii, 276). His opponents accused him of Pelagianism and Arianism, but no theologian of any pretence to learning will at present sustain these accusations. The same temper of mind which led him to renounce the peculiarities of Calvinism induced him also to adopt more enlarged and liberal views of church communion than those which had prevailed before his time. While he maintained that the mercy of God is not confined to a chosen few, he conceived it to be quite inconsistent with the genius of Christianity that men of that religion should keep at a distance from each other, and constitute separate churches, merely because they differed in their opinions as to some of its doctrinal articles. He thought that Christians of all denominations should form one great community, united and upheld by the bonds of charity and brotherly love; with the exception, however, of Roman Catholics, who, on account of their idolatrous worship and persecuting spirit, must be unfit members of such a society. His great disciple, the republican Barneveldt, was perhaps the first European statesman that made religious toleration one of his maxims. In fact, the Arminians of Holland were the real fathers of religious toleration; they were the first society of Protestants who, when in possession of power, granted the same liberty of conscience to others which they claimed for themselves.

Before setting forth the theological views of Arminius, a brief historical review of the church doctrine as to predestination may not be out of place. Before the time of Augustine (fourth century), the unanimous doctrine of the church fathers, so far as scientifically developed at all, was, that the Divine decrees, as to the fate of individual men, were conditioned upon their faith and obedience, as foreseen in the Divine mind. Augustine, in his controversy with Pelagius, with a view to enhance the glory of grace, was the first to teach, unequivocally, that the salvation of the elect depends upon the bare will of God, and that his decree to save those whom he chooses to save is unconditional. Augustine did not teach the doctrine of unconditional reprobation; that doctrine was first formally taught by Gottschalk (q. v.) in the ninth century. His views were condemned at Mentz, A. D. 848. In the Reformation period, Luther and Melancthon first inclined to Augustine's theory, but, finding that it involved the reception of Gottschalk's as well, they went back to the primitive doctrine of conditional election. Luther, indeed, never formally retracted some of his characteristically strong expressions made at early periods in his history; but there are indications enough that his views coincided with those of Melancthon, who took out of the later editions of his Loci Communes all expressions favoring unconditional predestination. The Lutheran Church to this day follows Melancthon. Calvin, however, adopted unconditional election and reprobation in the strongest form, and built his whole theological system upon it. His genius impressed the age wonderfully, and the Reformed churches generally adopted his doctrines. The churches of the Netherlands were founded partly by Lutherans and partly by Calvinists, and so both sets of opinions had currency there. But the Belgic Confession (q. v.), which was Calvinistic, was invested with a quasi national authority from the year 1570. The larger part of the clergy of the Netherlands were undoubtedly Calvinists at the time of the appearance of Arminius, though freedom of thought on the controverted points had not been suppressed before his time. His rejection of the doctrine was the result of long, calm, and patient study of the Scriptures. His task was to restore the primitive and scriptural view of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation, and of the sole responsibility of man for his own damnation; and not to do it he performed it. "The great error which he had to combat consisted in making the Divine efficiency with relation to one temporal phenomenon, viz., the readjustment of the disturbed relation of God and the sinner an exception—making the relation of the Divine efficiency to that phenomenon essentially unlike its relation to any other temporal phenomenon in the universe. The church had held that every exercise of the Divine efficiency, in relation to temporal phenomena, was subjectively conditioned by Divine wisdom, omniscience, and goodness; Calvinism, on the other hand, maintained that this particular exercise of Divine efficiency was absolutely unconditioned, and was grounded solely upon the arbitrary good pleasure of God. The refutation of this error, and the re-establishment of the opposite view, was the mission of Arminius." (Warren, in Meth. Quarterly Review, July, 1857, 350.)

The views of Arminius on the points of predestination and grace are presented in the following articles, drawn up almost entirely in words which may be found in his writings: (1.) God, by an eternal and immutable decree, ordained in Jesus Christ, his Son, before the foundation of the world, to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race, which is fallen and subject to sin, those who by the grace of the Holy Spirit believe in the same his Son, and who, by the same grace, persevere unto the end in that faith and the obedience of faith; but, on the contrary, to leave in sin and subject to wrath those who are not converted and are unbelieving, and to condemn them as aliens from Christ, according to the Gospel, John iii, 36. (2.) To which end Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, died for all and each one, so that he has gained for all, through the death of Christ, reconciliation and remission of sins; on this condition, however, that no one in reality enjoys that remission of sins except the faithful man, and this, too, according to the Gospel, John iii, 16, and 1 John ii, 2. (3.) But man has not from himself, or by the power of his free will, saving faith, inasmuch as in the state of deflection and sin he cannot think or do of himself any thing good, which is, indeed, really good, such as saving faith is; but it is necessary for him to be born again and renewed by God in Christ through his Holy Spirit, in his mind, affections, or will, and all his faculties, so that he may be able to understand, think, wish, and perform something good, according to that saying of Christ in John xv, 5. (4.) It is this grace of God which begins, promotes, and perfects every thing good, and this to such a degree that even the regenerate man without this preceding or adventitious grace, exciting, consequent, and co-operating, can neither think, wish, or do any thing good, nor even resist any evil temptation: so that all the good works which we can think of are to be attributed to the grace of God in Christ. But as to the manner of the operation of that grace, it is not irresistible, for it is said of many that they resisted the Holy Spirit, in Acts vii, 51, and many other places. (5.) Those who are grafted into Christ by a true faith, and therefore partake of his vivifying Spirit, have abundance of means by which they may fight against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and obtain the victory, always, however, by the aid of the grace of the Holy Spirit; Jesus Christ assists them by his Spirit in all temptations, and stretches out his hand; and provided they are ready for the contest, and seek his aid, and are not wanting to their duty, he strengthens them to such a degree that they cannot be seduced or snatched from the hands of Christ by any fraud of Satan or violence, according to that saying, John x, 28, "No one shall pluck them out of my hand." But whether these very persons cannot, by their own negligence, desert the commencement of their being in Christ, and embrace again the present world, fall back from the holy doctrine once committed to them, make shipwreck of their conscience, and fall from grace: this must be more fully examined and weighed by the Holy Scripture before men can teach it with full tranquillity of mind and confidence. This last proposition was modified by the followers of Arminius so as to assert the possibility of falling from grace. In his scheme of theology Arminius "accepted the church's developed ideas respecting God and respecting man, and then expounded with keen dialectical rigor the only doctrine which could harmonize the two. His mission was to point out how God could be what the church taught that he was, and man what the church declared him to be, at one and the same time. The readjustment of the disturbed and abnormal relations of man to God, by justification, is the central thought of Protestant theology; the announcement and exposition of their relations in that readjustment was the work of Arminius. Magnify either of the related terms to the final suppression of the other, and error is the result. Magnify the Divine agency to the complete suppression of the human in that readjustment, and fatalism is inevitable. Magnify the human to the complete suppression of the Divine, and extreme Pelagianism is the result. To Arminius is the church indebted for her first vivid apprehension and scientific statement of the Christian doctrine of the relation of man to God."

The services of Arminius to theology are summed up as follows by Watson (Miscellaneous Works, vii, 476): "They preserved many of the Lutheran churches from the tide of supralapsarianism, and its constant concomitant, Antinomianism. They moderated even Calvinism in many places, and gave better countenance and courage to the sublapsarian scheme; which, though logically, perhaps, not so to be preferred to that of Calvin, is at least not so revolting, and does not impose the same necessity upon men of cultivating that harshness which glories in extremes and laughs at moderation. They gave rise, incidentally, to a still milder modification of the doctrine of the decrees, known in England by the name of Baxterianism, in which homage is, at least in words, paid to the justice, truth, and benevolence of God. They have also left on record, in the beautiful, learned, eloquent, and, above all these, the scriptural system of theology furnished by the writings of Arminius, how truly man may be proved totally and hereditarily corrupt, without converting him into a machine or a devil; how fully secured, in the scheme of the redemption of man by Jesus Christ, is the divine glory, without making the Almighty partial, wilful, and unjust; how much the Spirit's operation in man is enhanced and glorified by the doctrine of the freedom of the human will, in connection with that of its assistance by Divine grace; with how much lustre the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ shines, when offered to the assisted choice of all mankind, instead of being confined to the forced acceptance of a few; how the doctrine of election, when it is made conditional on faith foreseen, harmonizes with the wisdom, holiness, and goodness of God, among a race of beings to all of whom faith was made possible; and how reprobation harmonizes with justice, when it has a reason, not in arbitrary will, the sovereignty of a pasha, but in the principles of a righteous government."

The earliest authority for the life of Arminius is Petrus Bertius, De Vita et Obitu J. Arminii Oratio. The fullest account is given by Caspar Brandt, Historia Vita J. Arminii (Amst. 1724, 8vo), a posthumous work, edited by Gerhard Brandt, son of Caspar. It was published, with a preface and notes, by Mosheim (Brunswick, 1725, 8vo); and a translation, by Guthrie (Lond. 1854, 18mo). See also Bangs, Life of Arminius (N. Y. 1843). The chief sources of information as to the early period of the controversy between the Arminians and Calvinists are as follows: Arminian writers, Uytenbogaert, Kerkelijke Historie . . . voornamelijk in deze gemieerde provincie (Rotterdam, 1647, fol.); Gerhard Brandt, Historie der Reformatie, etc., which is the most copious account extant (Amst.

1663, 8vo; 1671, 4to; transl. into English by Chamberlayne, Lond. 1729, 4 vols. fol.); Limborch, Historia Vitr Sim. Episcopii (Amst. 1701, 8vo), and Relatio Historica de Origine et Progressu Controversiarum in Fœderato Belgio de Predestinatione, etc., which last work is subjoined to the later editions of his Theologia Christiana (transl. Methodist Quarterly, July, 1844, p. 425). For other writers, see Cattenburgh, Bibliotheca Scriptor. Remonstrant. (Amst. 1728, 4to); and citations under art. REMONSTRANTS. On the Calvinistic side the chief works are, Jac. Triglandus, Den recht-gheuetlichen Christen (Amst. 1615, 4to); Kerkelyke geschiedenis van de reeren. Nederlanden (Lugd. Bat. 1650, fol., written to oppose Uyttenboogaert's history); Jacolus Leydekker, Eere van de Nationale Synode van Dordrecht (Amst. 1705-1707, 4to); Acta Synodi Nationalis, etc. (Dort, 1629, 4to). See DORT. The writers on the Synod of Dort are enumerated by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, lib. vi, c. 4, vol. xi, p. 723. Mosheim (Ecol. Hist.) had well studied the whole controversy, and his account is impartial. Prof. Stuart, of Andover, published a favorable and able treatise on "The Creed of Arminius, with a brief Sketch of his Life and Times," in the Biblical Repository (Andover, 1831, vol. 1). See also Lit. and Theol. Review, vi, 337. But the views of Arminius are nowhere better set forth, in small compass, than by the Rev. W. F. Warren (Meth. Quar. R. v. July, 1857), and by Dr. Whedon (Bibliotheca Sacra, April, 1864).—Armini Opera Theologica (Lugd. Bat. 1629, 4to); Works of James Arminius, translated by Nicholls and Bagnall (best ed. 3 vols. 8vo, N. Y. 1843).

H. From the death of Arminius to the present time.—

1. The dispute ran high after the death of Arminius, and with increased bitterness. The clergy and laity of Holland were arrayed into two hostile armies—Gomarists and Arminians; the former being the most numerous, but the latter including the leading scholars and statesmen. In 1629 the Arminians presented a petition to the States of Holland and West Friesland, which was called a "Remonstrance" (Remonstrantie, Urbis supplicis adhibitus Hollandiæ et West Frisariæ ordinationis). They were named REMONSTRANTS (q. v.) in consequence; and, as the Calvinists presented a "Counter-Remonstrance," they were called Contra-Remonstrants. The "Remonstrance" sets forth the Arminian theory over against the Calvinistic in five articles, substantially as given above, but in briefer form. Attempts were made by the authorities to reconcile the two contending parties by a conference between them at the Hague in 1611, a discussion at Delft in 1613, and also by an edict in 1614, enjoining peace. At last the States-General issued an order for the assembling of a national synod. It met at Dort, in Holland, and opened on November 13th, 1618, and its sittings continued through that and the following year. This famous synod condemned entirely the "five articles" in which the Arminians expressed their opinions. See DORT. These articles had been drawn up in 1619, presented in the conference at the Hague in 1611, and finally laid before the Synod of Dort. To fix the sense of the passages in the Scriptures which related to the dispute, a new Dutch translation of the whole Bible, from the original Hebrew and Greek, was undertaken at the command of the synod. This new version was published in 1637. The Arminians, being dissatisfied with the version of the New Testament, made another version of the New Testament from the Greek, which was published at Amsterdam in 1689. The Arminians were subjected to severe penalties. Their great leader, Barneveldt, died on the scaffold on a political pretence. They were all deprived of their sacred and civil offices, and their ministers were forbidden to preach. For an account of these persecutions, see Calder, Life of Episcopius, xv. Many retired to Antwerp and France; a considerable body emigrated to Holstein, upon the invitation of Frederich, duke of Holstein, and built the town of Frederickstadt in the duchy of Schleswig. After the death of Maurice in 1625, the Arminians were allowed to return, and a decree of 1630 authorized them to build churches and schools. The exiles from France and the Spanish Netherlands came back and established congregations in various places, particularly at Rotterdam and Amsterdam. At Amsterdam they founded a school, in which Simon Episcopius was the first professor of theology. See EPISCOPUS; and for a fuller account of the fortunes of the Remonstrant party, see REMONSTRANTS.

2. In 1621, Episcopius, at the request of the leading Remonstrants, drew up a formula of faith under the title Confessio seu declaratio sententiæ pastorum quæ in Fœd. Belg. Remonstrantes vocatur (Episc. Opp. ii, 69), in 25 chapters, which was widely circulated. A cen-sura of this confession was published by Polyander and four other Leyden professors, to which Episcopius replied in his Apologia pro Confessione, 1630. The "Confessio" disappointed the Gomarists, for it was perfectly sound on the Trinity, thus refuting the charge of Socinianism brought against the Arminians. It was received with great favor by the Lutherans. A number of eminent names adorn the literary history of Arminianism in Holland and France; among them the most prominent, besides Episcopius, are Curcellæus, Vossius, Grotius, Casanbon, Limborch, Le Clerc, and Wetstein (all to be found under the proper heads in this Cyclopædia). It is to be regretted that in the hands of some of these eminent men Arminianism was corrupted by semi-rationalism.

3. The effect of the controversy appeared in France in the modified Calvinism of Amyraldus (q. v.). Nor was the dispute confined to the reformed churches. During the whole of the sixteenth century the Church of Rome was agitated with the controversy upon grace and free-will. The Benedictines and Dominicans had already broken the ground; but the battle raged in its greatest fury between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, the latter being ably represented by the religions of the monastery of Port Royal, near Paris. Here again it happened, as in Holland, that the controversy extended itself from religion to politics. The Jansenists of France became the reformers of the age, the men of free thought and bold discussion, while the Jesuit party were the advocates of the court and the old abuses, both in church and state. At the same time, it is a curious fact that in Holland the Arminians were the friends of liberty and free discussion, in France the Calvinists; the two parties had changed places. The Jesuits, who were Arminians, were now the persecutors, and the Jansenists, or Calvinists, the patient and afflicted sufferers. See JANSENISTS.

4. In Germany, the Lutherans, of course, sympathized fully in the Arminian movement. In the Reformed Church the decisions of Dort were admitted as authoritative for a time; but "this outward show of victory was really a defeat; for the true elements of Arminianism were not killed at Dort, but grew up, silently but surely, within the bosom of the orthodox Reformed Church. . . . In the period of Wolfianism the Reformed dogmatics were finally purged from the doctrine of absolute predestination" (Elorard, Christliche Dogmatik, i, § 38). It is a shrewd remark of Nicholls, that had there been a great religious body, apart from Calvin's followers, with which all Protestants who did not adopt Luther's doctrine of the sacraments might have united themselves, the doctrines of Calvin would not have been so widely diffused on the Continent between 1540 and 1600 (Calvinism and Arminianism, I, iv).

5. In England the so-called Arminian doctrines were held, in substance, long before the time of Arminius. The Articles of Religion are regarded by some writers as Calvinistic, by others as Arminian. The truth seems to be that they were meant to be ambiguous, or, to use a kinder word, comprehensive, so as to leave liberty of opinion in the church on a question so obscure and difficult. On this point, see, on the Arminian side, Burnet, Exposition of Thirty-nine Articles; Laurence, Bampton Lecture, 1801; Fletcher, Works, ii, 216, 218; Browne, On Thirty-nine Articles (Lond. 1864, 4th ed.); and on the Calvinistic side, Cunningham, Reformers and Theology of the Reformation (Edinburgh, 1862, Essay iv; also in Brit. and For. Evang. Rev. No. 35, and reprinted in Amer. Theol. Rev. Oct. 1861, art. v). It is certain that Cranmer had a hand in drawing up the Necessary Erudition of a Christian Man (1543), just before the compilation of the Articles, and that book (the Erudition) is by no means Calvinistic. Latimer, Hooper, Bilson, Andrews, Overall, and Hooker "might with propriety have been called Arminians, had Arminianism, as a system of doctrine, prevailed when they wrote" (Nicholls, Calvinism and Arminianism, I, xevi). Baro (q. v.), professor of divinity at Cambridge, taught Arminianism, and his case gave rise to the Lambeth Articles (q. v.). But Arminianism unfortunately became a political question. Two Arminian bishops, Laud and Juxon, became members of his majesty's privy council at the precise juncture when the liberty of the subject and the prerogative of the crown were brought into direct competition. John Play-fere, Margaret professor at Cambridge († 1608), published a strong defence of the Arminian doctrine, under the title of An Appeal to the Gospel for the true Doctrine of Predestination (republished in Cambridge Tracts, 1717). Dr. Samuel Hoad, rector of Morcton († 1657), originally a Calvinist, became a strong Arminian, and published God's Love to Mankind manifested by disproving his absolute Decree for their Damnation (Lond. 1633, 4to), which called forth answers by Davenant, Twisse, and Amyraut. In the civil war the Arminians gradually ranged themselves with King Charles, the Calvinists with Parliament. But John Goodwin (q. v.), who was ejected in 1645, was one of the ablest defenders of Arminianism in his time. See Jackson, Life of Goodwin (1822, 8vo). When the war was over the Church of England was destroyed, and Arminianism seemed to have perished with it. The restoration of Charles II took place (1660); Arminianism returned with prelacy, and held for more than half a century almost undisputed sway in the Church of England. It must be observed, however, that as the Arminianism of Laud differed from that of the Dutch leader in many points, so did that of the divines of Charles II and their successors in many more. Laud combined it with views of sacramental efficacy which Arminius would have denounced as superstitious; the later school of divines, though far from Socinianism, threw the doctrines of grace into the shade, and dwelt more on the example of Christ than his atonement. Among the eminent Episcopal Arminian divines of England are Cudworth, Pierce, Jeremy Taylor, Tiltonson, Chillingworth, Stillfleet, Womack, Burnet, Pearson, Sanderson, Heylyn, Whitty, Patrick, Tomline, Coplestone, Whately, etc. Arminianism at last, in the Church of England, became a negative term, implying a negation of Calvinism rather than any exact system of theology whatever. Much that passed for Arminianism was, in fact, Pelagianism. In the Church of England, most of those theologians who have deviated from the golden mean maintained by Arminianism (between Calvinism on the one hand and Pelagianism on the other) have fallen into error as to the Trinity, while those who have adhered to the evangelical doctrine of Arminius have retained all the verities of the orthodox faith. The pure doctrine of Arminianism arose again in England in the great Wesleyan Reformation of the seventeenth century. Its ablest expositions may be found in the writings of John Wesley, John Fletcher, and Richard Watson, whose Theological Institutes (best edit. N. Y. 1850, 2 vols. 8vo) is the most complete Arminian body of divinity extant in English. Its system is the same as that of the orthodox Protestant churches in general, except so far as the question of predestination and the points connected with it are concerned. "As some heterodox writers have called themselves Arminians, and as the true theory of Arminianism has been often grossly maligned, it may be proper here to allude to certain points with regard to which it has been especially misrepresented. If a man hold that good works are necessary to justification; if he maintain that faith includes good works in its own nature; if he reject the doctrines of original sin; if he deny that divine grace is requisite for the whole work of sanctification; if he speak of human virtue as meritorious in the sight of God, it is very generally charged by Calvinists that he is an Arminian. But the truth is, that a man of such sentiments is properly a disciple of the Pelagian and Socinian schools. To such sentiments pure Arminianism is as diametrically opposite as Calvinism itself. The genuine Arminians assert the corruption of human nature in its full extent. They declare that we are justified by faith only. They assert that our justification originates solely in the grace of God. They teach that the procuring and meritorious cause of our justification is the righteousness of Christ. Propter quam, says Arminius, Deus credentibus peccatum condonat, eosque pro justis reputat non aliter atque si legem perfecte impleverint. [For the sake of which God pardons believers, and accounts them as righteous precisely as if they had perfectly obeyed the law.] They admit in this way that justification implies not merely forgiveness of sin, but acceptance to everlasting happiness. Sanctam habet adoptionem in filios, et collationem juris in hereditatem vite eterne. [It has connected with it adoption to sonship, and the grant of a right to the inheritance of eternal life.] They teach, in fine, that the work of sanctification, from its very commencement to its perfection in glory, is carried on by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God by Jesus Christ" (Edinb. Encyclopaedia, s. v.).

"The whole sum and substance of religious doctrine and theory is embraced in these three terms: God's nature, man's nature, and the relation subsisting between the two. Theology is nothing more than the systematic definition, adjustment, and exposition of these three terms. Christian theology, or genuine orthodoxy, is simply a system of theological views upon these three points, which is self-coherent, and harmonious with the teachings of Scripture. For the development of such a system, exhibiting the precise truth relative to these cardinal points, without redundancy or defect, it is necessary that each of these three points be made a special object of scrutiny and discussion. An error in respect to either will not only destroy at once the system's self-coherence, but infallibly conduct to the gravest heresies. For example, an error respecting the first (Theology) may give us Pantheism; an error on the second point (Anthropology) may lead to Atheism; while an erroneous theory respecting the third gives us the two extremes of an iron fate or a groundless chance. True orthodoxy states and maintains a consistent doctrine respecting each, authenticated by the assertions of God's revelations. Casting now a philosophic eye upon the doctrine of the church as developed in history, we cannot fail to be struck by the remarkable fact that the three great controversies which trisect the historic developments of Christian doctrine as a scientific system have followed without deviation the natural order of these three terms. That development has hinged successively upon each in order. Athanasius, Augustine, and Arminius represent in themselves the whole sweep of the dogmatic unfolding of Christianity; these factors being given, we can construct the whole history of Christian doctrine. The first is the representative of that speculative movement which developed into scientific form and defensible shape the ecclesiastical doctrine respecting God's nature; the second, of the subsequent movement by which the true doctrine of man's being was evolved; the third, of the still later and scarcely yet completed one by which the relations of the two are instigated and defined.

The ancient church believed vaguely in the true divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit; but Athanasius was raised up to explain with clearness, to maintain, and to bring forth into suitable prominence the great doctrine of a substantial tri-unity of the Divine essence, under all temporal manifestations of separate hypostases, on which suppositions only the ancient beliefs of the church and the unqualified declarations of Scripture could be true. His mission was the enunciation, exposition, and defence of a great truth respecting the Divine nature, and round that truth was grouped all the Christian thinking of that age. There was no great doctrinal system of the time, heretical or not, which was not logically related to this centre thought of the church. It implied in itself all anterior and all subsequent speculations upon the Divine nature, Origenistic, Arian, Sabellian, Monophysitic, Nestorian, or orthodox.

Augustine was commissioned for another work. The church, in the centuries antecedent to his appearance, had vaguely believed in the depravity and helplessness of human nature; but Augustine was raised up to explain with clearness, and to maintain, and to bring forth in suitable prominence, the great doctrine of the native corruption and moral ruin of man; his utter hopelessness apart from the remedial agencies of Divine grace, on which supposition only the ancient beliefs of the church and the unqualified declarations of Scripture could be true. His mission was the enunciation, exposition, and defence of a great truth respecting human nature, and round that truth was grouped all Christian thinking of that age. It is this which gives that age its character. The whole scholastic theology is but the radiated and ramified outgrowth of that vital germ of truth. To him is the church indebted for her first vivid apprehension and scientific statement of the Christian doctrine of man. Augustine is the historical representative of that organic evolution. The third of these divinely appointed representative men laid hold of both these truths, which for sixteen centuries had been developing; accepted the church's developed ideas respecting God and respecting man, and then expounded with keen dialectical rigor the only doctrine which could harmonize the two. His mission was to point out how God could be what the church taught that he was, and man what the church declared him to be, at one and the same time. The readjustment of the disturbed and abnormal relations of man to God by justification is the central thought of Protestant theology; the announcement and exposition of their relations in that readjustment was the work of Arminius. And not until Arminius is placed in this relation to the doctrinal development of Christianity in the church is there attained a true perception of the grand and growing rhythm of its history. The Predestinarians (as remarked above) erred by maintaining that the particular exercise of Divine efficiency, by which the abnormal relation of God to a sinner is readjusted, was unconditioned by anything; whatsoever, and was grounded solely upon the arbitrary good pleasure of the Almighty. Maintaining this unconditioned elective volition, they naturally demanded an "effectual calling," "irresistible grace," and "perevering success," for all these were necessary concomitants. The refutation of this error, and the establishment of the opposite view, was the mission of Arminius. His labors gave scientific form to the ecclesiastical opinion upon the third great point, and completed the cycle of Christian theology. As in the development of apostolic doctrine, the Pauline and Petrine elements were unified in John, so, in its uninspired development, after Athanasius had set forth his truth, and Augustine his, Arminius steps forth the later apostle of dogmatic completion (Dr. Warren, in Methodist Quarterly Review, 1857, p. 346 sq.).

The Arminian doctrine on predestination is now very widely diffused in the Protestant world. It is, in the main, coincident with that of the Lutherans in Germany; is held by the Wesleyan Methodist churches throughout the world; by a large part of the Church of England, and by many of the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. It is substantially the doctrine (on the question of predestination) of the Greek and Roman churches; and it is also held by several of the minor sects. Armlet (represented by 𐤀𐤁𐤁𐤁, atsadal', Num. xxxi, 50; 2 Sam. i, 10; Sept. κλιών; Aquila βαχιάδων; Vulg. periscelis armilla); properly a fetter, from 𐤀𐤁𐤁𐤁, to step; comp. Isa. iii, 20, and ANKLET), an ornament universal in the East, especially among women; worn by princes as one of the insignia of royalty, and by distinguished persons in general. The word is not used in the A. V., as even in 2 Sam. i, 10, they render the Heb. term "by the bracelet on his arm." Sometimes only one was worn, on the right arm (Eccles. xxi, 21). From Cant. viii, 6, it appears that the signet sometimes consisted of a jewel on the armlet. These ornaments are frequent on the sculptures of Persepolis and Nineveh, and were set in rich and fantastic shapes resembling the heads of animals (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 250). The kings of Persia wore them, and Astyages presented a pair, among other ornaments, to Cyrus (Xen. Cyr. i, 3). The Ethiopians, to whom some were sent by Cambyses, scornfully characterized them as weak fetters (Herod. ii, 23). Nor were they confined to the kings, since Herodotus (viii, 113) calls the Persians generally "wearers of bracelets" (Ἀσλιοφόροι). In the Egyptian monuments kings are often represented with armlets and bracelets (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. iii, 375, and Plates 1, 2, 14). They were even used by the old British chiefs (Turner, Angl. Sax. i, 383). The story of Tarpeia shows that they were common among the ancient Sabinians, but the Romans considered the use of them effeminate, although they were sometimes given as military rewards (Liv. x, 44). Finally, they are still worn among the most splendid regalia of modern Oriental sovereigns, and it is even said that those of the King of Persia are worth a million sterling (Kitto, Pict. Hist. of Pal. i, 499). They form the chief wealth of modern Hindu ladies, and are rarely taken off. They are made of every sort of material, from the finest gold, jewels, ivory, coral, and pearl, down to the common glass rings and varnished earthenware bangles of the women of the Deccan. Now, as in ancient times, they are sometimes plain, sometimes enchased; sometimes with the ends not joined, and sometimes a complete circle. The arms are sometimes quite covered with them, and if the wearer be poor, it matters not how mean they are, provided only that they glitter. It is thought essential to beauty that they should fit close, and hence Harmer calls them "rather manacles than bracelets," and Buchanan says that "the poor girls rarely get them on without drawing blood, and rubbing part of the skin from the hand; and as they wear great numbers, which often break, they suffer much from their love of admiration." Their enormous weight may be conjectured from Gen. xxiv, 24.—Smith, s. v. See BRACELET.

Armor (represented in the Anth. Vers. by several Heb. words, Gr. ὄπλα), properly distinguished from ARMS as being military equipment for the protection of the person, while the latter denotes implements of aggressive warfare; but in the English Bible the former term alone is employed in both senses. In the records of a people like the children of Israel, so large a part of whose history was passed in warfare, we naturally look for much information, direct or indirect, on the arms and modes of fighting of the nation itself and of those with whom it came into contact. Unfortunately, however, the notices that we find in the Bible on these points are extremely few and meagre, while even those few, owing to the uncertainty which rests on the true meaning and force of the terms, do not convey to us nearly all the information which they might. This is the more to be regretted because the notices of the history, scanty as they are, are literally every thing we have to depend on, inasmuch as they are not yet supplemented and illustrated either by remains of the arms themselves, or by those commentaries which the sculptures, vases, bronzes, mosaics, and paintings of other nations furnish to the notices of manners and customs contained in their literature. (See, generally, Jahn's Archæology, § 266-285.) In order to give a clear view of this subject, we shall endeavor to show, succinctly and from the best authorities now available, what were the martial instruments borne upon the person, whether for attack or resistance, by the ancient Asiatics, leaving for other proper heads an explanation of the composition and tactical condition of their armies, their systems of fortification, their method of conducting sieges and battles, and their usages of war as regards spoil, captives, etc.—Smith, s. v.; Kitto, s. v. See BATTLE; FORTIFICATION; SIEGE; WAR; ARMY; FIGHT; FORTRESS, etc.

I. OFFENSIVE WEAPONS.—1. The instruments at first employed in the chase or to repel wild beasts, but converted by the wicked to the destruction of their fellow-men, or used by the peaceable to oppose aggression, were naturally the most simple. Among these were the club and the throwing-bat. The first consisted originally of a heavy piece of wood, variously shaped, made to strike with, and, according to its form, denominated a mace, a bar, a hammer, or a maul. This weapon was in use among the Hebrews, for in the time of the kings wood had already been superseded by metal; and the מַזְבֵּץ הַבַּרְזֵל, she'bet barzel, "rod of iron" (Psa. ii, 9), is supposed to mean a mace, or gavellock, or crowbar. It is an instrument of great power when used by a strong arm; as when, in modern menageries, a man with one in his hand compels a tiger's ferocity to submit to his will. (See Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, i, 327, fig. 3, 4; and mace, fig. 1, 2. The throwstick, or lissan, occurs p. 329.) See ROD; SCEPTER. The other was also known if, as is probable, מַזְבֵּץ הַבַּרְזֵל, mephits' (Prov. xxv, 18), be a "maul," a marteel, or a war-hammer. It is likely metal was only in general use at a later period, and that a heavy crooked bill continued long to serve both as a missile and a sword. The throwstick, made of thorn-wood, is the same instrument which we see figured on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. By the native Arabs it is still called lis- arm, and was anciently known among us by the name of crooked billet. The Australians are exceedingly skillful in the use of this implement, called by them the boomerang. These instruments, supplied with a sharp edge, would naturally constitute a battle-axe and a kind of sword; and such in the rudest ages we find them, made with flints set into a groove, or with sharks' teeth firmly secured to the staff with twisted sinews. On the earliest monuments of Egypt, for these ruder instruments is already seen substituted a piece of metal, with a steel or bronze blade fastened into a globe, thus forming a falchion-axe; and also a lunata-blade, riveted in three places to the handle, forming a true battle-axe (Wilkinson, i, 325, 326); and there were, besides, true bills or axes, in form like our own. See MAUL; AXE.

2. Next came the dirk or poniard, which, in the Hebrew word קֶרֶבֶט , cheret' (usually translated "sword"), may possibly retain some allusion to the original instrument made of the antelope's horn, merely sharpened, which is still used in every part of the East where the material can be procured. From existing figures, the dirk appears to have been early made of metal in Egypt, and worn stuck in a girdle (Wilkinson, i, 319); but, from several texts (1 Sam. xvii, 39; 2 Sam. xx, 8; 1 Kings xx, 11), it is evident that the real sword was slung in a belt, and that "girding" and "loosing the sword" were synonymous terms for commencing and ending a war. The blades were, it seems, always short (one is mentioned of a cubit's length); and the dirk-sword, at least, was always double-edged. The sheath was ornamented and polished. In Egypt there were larger and heavier swords, more nearly like modern talvairs, and of the form of an English round-pointed table-knife. But, while metal was scarce, there were also swords which might be called quarter-pikes, being composed of a very short wooden handle, surmounted by a spear-head. Hence the Latin telum and ferrum continued in later ages to be used for gladius. In Nubia swords of heavy wood are still in use. See SWORD; KNIFE.

Oriental Projectile Weapons.

3. The "spear," רֹמַח , ro'mach, was another offensive weapon common to all the nations of antiquity, and varied much in size, weight, and length. Probably the shepherd Hebrews, like nations similarly situated in northern Africa, anciently made use of the horn of an oryx, or a leucoryx, above three feet long, straightened in water, and sheathed upon a thornwood staff. When sharpened, this instrument would penetrate the hide of a bull, and, according to Strabo, even of an elephant: it was light, very difficult to break, resisted the blow of a battle-axe, and the animals which furnished it were abundant in Arabia and in the desert east of Palestine. At a later period the head was of brass, and afterward of iron. Very ponderous weapons of this kind were often used in Egypt by the heavy infantry; and, from various circumstances, it may be inferred that among the Hebrews and their immediate neighbors, commanders in particular were distinguished by heavy spears. Among these were generally ranked the most valiant in fight and the largest in stature; such as Goliath, "whose spear was like a weaver's beam" (1 Sam. xvii, 7), and whose spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron, which by some is asserted to be equal to twenty-five pounds' weight. The spear had a point of metal at the butt-end to fix it in the ground, perhaps with the same massy globe above it which is still in use, intended to counterbalance the point. It was with this ferret that Abner slew Asahel (2 Sam. ii, 22, 23). The form of the head and length of the shaft differed at different times both in Egypt and Syria, and were influenced by the fashions set by various conquering nations. See SPEAR.

ed "spear"), and כִּידוֹן , kidon' (variously rendered "spear," "shield," etc.), may have had distinct forms: from the context, where the former first occurs, it appears to have been a species of dart carried by light troops (1 Sam. xiii, 22; Psa. iv); while the latter, which was heavier, was most likely a kind of pilum. In most nations of antiquity, the infantry, not bearing a spear, carried two darts, those lightly armed using both for long casts, and the heavy-armed only one for that purpose; the second, more ponderous than the other, being reserved for throwing when close to the enemy, or for handling in the manner of a spear. This explanation may throw light on the fact of the chanith being named in connection with the צִינָה , tsinnah', or larger buckler (1 Chron. xii, 34), and may reconcile what is said of the chidon (Job xxxix, 23; xli, 29, and Josh. viii, 10). While on the subject of the javelin, it may be remarked that, by the act of casting one at David (1 Sam. xix, 9, 10), Saul virtually absolved him from his allegiance; for by the customs of ancient Asia, preserved in the usages of the Teutonic and other nations, the Suchsen recht, the custom of the East Franks, etc., to throw a dart at a freedman, who escaped from it by flight, was the demonstrative token of manumission given by his lord or master; he was thereby sent out of hand, manumissus, well expressed in the old English phrase "scot-free." But for this act of Saul, David might have been viewed as a rebel. See DART; JAVELIN; LANCE.

Oriental Implements of Archery. 1, 2, 3, 4, Bows; 5, Quiver; 6, Bow-case; 7, 8, Arrows.

4. But the chief offensive weapon in Egypt, and from the nature of the country, it may be inferred, in Palestine also, was the war-bow, כֶּשֶׁת , ke'sheth ("bow"), the arrow being denominated חֵץ , chets. From the simple implements used by the first hunters, consisting merely of an elastic reed, a branch of a tree, or rib of palm, the bow became in the course of time very strong and tall, was made of brass, of wood backed with horn, or of horn entirely, and even of ivory; some being shaped like the common English bow, and others, particularly those used by riding nations, like the buffalo horn. There were various modes of bending this instrument, by pressure of the knee, or by the foot, treading the bow, or by setting one end against the foot, drawing the middle with the hand of the same side toward the hip, and pushing the upper point forward with the same hand, till the thumb passed the loop of the string beyond the nock. The horned bows of the cavalry, shaped like those of the Chinese, occur on monuments of antiquity. They cannot be bent from their form of a Roman C to that of what is termed a Cupid's bow , but by placing one end under the thigh; and as they are short, this operation is performed by Tatar riders while in the saddle. This was the Parthian bow, as is proved by several Persian bass-reliefs, and may have been in use in the time of the Elamites, who were a mounted people. These bows were carried in cases to protect the string, which was composed of deer sinews, from injury, and were slung on the right hip of the rider, except when on the point of engaging. Then the string was often cast over the head, and the bow hung upon the breast, with the two nocks above each shoulder, like a pair of horns. See BOW; ARCHER.

The arrows were likewise enclosed in a case or "quiver," קִיבֵר , tell', hung sometimes on the shoulder, and at other times on the left side; and six or eight flight-arrows were commonly stuck in the edge of the cap, ready to be pulled out and put to the string. The infantry always carried the arrows in a quiver on the right shoulder, and the bow was kept unbent until the moment of action. On a march it was carried on the shield arm, where there was frequently also a horn bracer secured below the elbow to receive the shock from the string when an arrow was discharged. The flight or long-range arrows were commonly of reed, not always feathered, and mostly tipped with flint points; but the shot or aimed arrows, used for nearer purposes, were of wood tipped with metal, about thirty inches long, and winged with three lines of feathers, like those in modern use: they varied in length at different periods, and according to the substance of the bows. See ARROW; QUIVER; SUOOT.

5. The last missile instrument to be mentioned is the "sling," שֶׁטֶל, ke'lu (Job xli, 28), an improvement upon the simple act of throwing stones. It was the favorite weapon of the Benjamites, and mostly making a great mass in an order of battle, but well composed for light troops. They could also boast of using the sling equally well with the left hand as with the right. The sling was made of plaited thongs, somewhat broad in the middle, to lodge the stone or leaden missile, and was twirled two or three times round before the stone was allowed to take flight. Stones could not be cast above 400 feet, but leaden bullets could be thrown as far as 600 feet. The force as well as precision of aim which might be attained in the use of this instrument was remarkably shown in the case of David; and several nations of antiquity boasted of great skill in the practice of the sling. See SLING.

Ancient Assyrian Bowmen and Slingers.

All these hand-weapons were in use at different periods, not only among the Hebrews and Egyptians, but likewise in Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Macedonia; in which last country the sarissa carried by the heavy infantry of the phalanx differed from the others only in the great length of the shaft. The Roman pilum was a kind of dart, distinguished from those of other nations chiefly by its weight, and the great proportional length of the metal or iron part, which constituted one half of the whole, or from two and a half to three feet. Much of this length was hollow, and received nearly twenty inches of the shaft within it: the point was never hooked like that of common darts, because, the weapon being nearly indestructible, the soldiers always reckoned upon advancing in battle and recovering it without trouble when thrown; whereas, if it had been hooked or hamate, they could not have wrenched it out of hostile shields or breast-plates without trouble and delay. See WEAPON.

II. DEFENSIVE ARMS.—1. The most ancient protective piece of armor was the Shield, buckler, roundel, or target, composed of a great variety of materials, very different in form and size, and therefore in all rations bearing a variety of names. The Hebrews used the word שֶׁטֶל, tsinnah' (rendered "shield," "target," or "buckler"), for a great shield—defence, protection (Gen. xv, 1; Psa. xlvii, 9; Prov. xxx, 5)—which is commonly found in connection with spear, and was the shelter of heavily-armed infantry; שֶׁטֶל, magen' (rendered "shield" or "buckler"), a buckler or smaller shield, which, from a similar juxtaposition with sword, bow and arrows, appears to have been the defence of the other armed infantry and of chiefs; and שֶׁטֶל, socherah' (only once, Psa. xci, 4, "buckler"), parma, a roundel, which may have been appropriated to archers and slingers; and there was the שֶׁטֶל, she'let ("shield"), synonymous with the magen, only different in ornament. In the more advanced eras of civilization shields were made of light wood not liable to split, covered with bull-hide of two or more thicknesses, and bordered with metal; the lighter kinds were made of wicker-work or osier, similarly, but less solidly covered; or of double ox-hide cut into a round form. There were others of a single hide, extremely thick from having been boiled; their surface presented an appearance of many folds, like round waves up and down, which might yield, but could rarely be penetrated.

We may infer that at first the Hebrews borrowed the forms in use in Egypt, and that their common shields were a kind of parallel-ogram, broadest and arched at the top, and cut square beneath, bordered with metal, the surface being covered with raw hide with the hair on. The lighter shields may have been soaked in oil and dried in the shade to make them hard; no doubt hippopotamus, rhinoceros, and elephant skin shields were brought from Ethiopia and purchased in the Phœnician markets; but small round hand-bucklers of whale-skin, still used by Arabian swordsmen, came from the Erythrean Sea. During the Assyrian and Persian supremacy the Hebrews may have used the square, oblong, and round shields of these nations, and may have subsequently copied those of Greece and Rome. The princes of Israel had shields of precious metals; all were managed by a wooden or leathern handle, and often slung by a thong over the neck. With the larger kinds a testudo could be formed by pressing the ranks close together; and, while the outside men kept their shields before and on the flanks, those within raised theirs above the head, and thus produced a kind of surface, sometimes as close and fitted together as a pantile roof, and capable of resisting the pressure even of a body of men marching upon it. The tsinnuh was most likely what in the feudal ages would have been called a parise, for such occurs on the Egyptian monuments. This weapon was about five feet high, with a pointed arch above and square below, resembling the feudal knight's shield, only that the point was reversed. This kind of large-sized shield, however, was best fitted for men without any other armor, when combating in open countries, or carrying on sieges; for it may be remarked in general that the military buckler of antiquity was large in proportion as other defensive armor was wanting. Shields were hung upon the battlements of walls, and, as still occurs, chiefly above gates of cities by the watch and ward. In time of peace they were covered to preserve them from the sun, and in war uncovered; this sign was poetically used to denote coming hostilities, as in Isa. xxii, 6, etc. In Europe, where the Crusaders could imitate the Saracens, but not introduce their climate, shields were carved in stone upon towers and gates, as at York, etc. The Eastern origin of this practice seems to be attested by the word Zinne, which, in German, still denotes a battlement, something pointed, a summit, and conveys the idea of a pavise with the point uppermost, a shape such as Arabian battlements often assume. See SHIELD; BUCKLER.

2. The Helmet was next in consideration, and in the earliest ages was made of osier or rushes, in the form of a bee-hive or of a skull-cap. The skins of the heads of animals—of lions, bears, wild boars, bulls, and horses—were likewise adopted, and were adorned with rows of teeth, manes, and bristles. Wood, linen cloth in many folds, and a kind of felt, were also in early use, and helmets of these materials may be observed worn by the nations of Asia at war with the conquerors of Egypt, even before the departure of Israel. At that time also these kings had helmets of metal, of rounded or pointed forms, adorned with a figure of the serpent Kneph; and an allied nation, perhaps the Carian, reported to have first worn a military crest, bears on the skull-cap of their brazen helmets a pair of horns with a globe in the middle—the solar arkite symbol. The nations of farther Asia, however, used the woolen or braided caps still retained, and now called kauak and fic, around which the turban is usually wound. These were almost invariably supplied with long lappets to cover the ears and the back of the head, and princes usually wore a radiated crown on the summit. This was the form of the Syrian, and probably of the Assyrian helmets, excepting that the last mentioned were of brass, though they still retained the low cylindrical shape. The כִּטְוֹן, ko'ba ("helmet"), some helmet of this kind, was worn by the trained infantry, who were spearmen among the Hebrews; but archers and slingers had round skull-caps of skins, felts, or quilted stuffs, such as are still in use among the Arabs. The form of Greek and Roman helmets, both of leather and of brass, is well known; they were most likely adopted also by the Hebrews and Egyptians during their subjection to those nations, but require no farther notice here. See HELMET.

3. Body Armor.—The most ancient Persian idols are clad in shaggy skins, such as the Aegis of Jupiter and Minerva may have been, the type being taken from a Cyrenaean or African legend, and the pretended red goat-skin may be supposed to have been that of a species of gnu (Catoblepas Gorgon, Ham. Smith), an animal fabled to have killed men by its sight, and therefore answering to the condition both of a kind of goat and of producing death by the sight alone. In Egypt cuirasses were manufactured of leather, of brass, and of a succession of iron hoops, chiefly covering the abdomen and the shoulders; but a more ancient national form was a kind of thorax, tippet, שִׁירְיָן, shiryon ("coat of mail," "habergeon"), or שִׁירְיָן, shiryon

("harness," "breastplate"), or square, with an opening in it for the head, the four points covering the breast, back, and both upper arms. This kind in particular was affected by the royal band of relatives who surrounded the Pharaoh, were his subordinate commanders, messengers, and body-guards, bearing his standards, ensign-fans, and sun-screens, his portable throne, his bow and arrows. Beneath this square was another piece, protecting the trunk of the body, and both were in general covered with red-colored cloth or stuff. On the oldest fictile vases a shoulder-piece likewise occurs, worn by Greek and Etruscan warriors. It covers the upper edge of the body armor, is perforated in the middle to allow the head to pass, but hangs equal on the breast and back, square on the shoulders, and is evidently of leather. (See the figure of Menelaus discovering Helen in the sack of Troy, Millin, Mon. inédits.) This piece of armor occurs also on the shoulders of Varangi (northmen, who were the body-guards of the Greek emperors); but they are studded with roundels or bosses, as they appear figured in mosaic or fresco on the walls of the cathedral of Ravenna, dating from the time of Justinian. The late Roman legionaries, as published by Du Choul, again wear the tippet armor, like that of the Egyptians, and one or other of the above forms may be found on figures of Danes in illuminated manuscripts of the eleventh century. By their use of metal for defensive armor the Carians appear to have created astonishment among the Egyptians, and therefore may be presumed to have been the first nation so protected in western Asia; nevertheless, in the tombs of the kings near Thebes, a tegulated hauberk is represented, composed of small three-colored pieces of metal—one golden, the other reddish and green. It is this suit which Denon represents as composed of rings set on edge; but they are all parallelograms, with the lower edge forming the segment of a circle, and each piece, beside the fastening, has a button and a vertical slit above it, giving flexibility by means of the button of each square working in the aperture of the piece beneath it. This kind of armor may be meant by the word חֲסִימָה, tachra ("habergeon," only Exod. xxviii, 32; xxxix, 23), the closest interpretation of which appears to be deussatio, tegulatio, a tiling. The expression in 2 Chron. xviii, 33, may be that Ahab was struck in one of the grooves or slits in the squares of such a shiryon, or between two of them where they do not overlap; or perhaps, with more probability, between the metal hoops of the trunk of the shiryon before mentioned, where the thorax overlaps the abdomen. The term חֲסִימָה, kaskasim (elsewhere "scales"), in the case of Goliath's armor, denotes the squamous kind, most likely that in which the pieces were sewed upon a cloth, and not hinged to each other, as in the tachra. It was the defensive armor of Northern and Eastern nations, the Persian Cataphracti, Parthians, and Sarmatians. But of true annular or ringed mail, Denon's figure being incorrect, we doubt if there is any positive evidence, excepting where rings were sewn separately upon cloth, anterior to the sculpture at Takt-i-Bustan, or the close of the Parthian era. The existence of mail is often incorrectly inferred from our translators using the word wherever flexible armor is to be mentioned. The tachra could not well be worn without an under garment of some density to resist the friction of metal; and this may have been a kind of sagum, the shiryon of the Hebrews, under another form—the dress Saul put upon David before he assumed the breastplate and girdle. The Roman sagum offers a parallel instance. Under that name it was worn at first à loricè, then beneath it, and at last again without, but the stuff itself made into a kind of felt.

The Cuirass and Corset, strictly speaking, were of prepared leather (corium), but often also composed of quilted cloths: the former in ancient times generally denoted a suit with leathern appendages at the bottom and at the shoulder, as used by the Romans; the latter, one in which the barrel did not come down below the hips, and usually destitute of leathern vitta, which was nationally Greek. In later ages it always designates a breast and back piece of steel. It is, however, requisite to observe that, in estimating the meaning of Hebrew names for armor of all kinds, they are liable to the same laxity of use which all other languages have manifested; for in military matters, more perhaps than in any other, a name once adopted remains the same, though the object may be changed by successive modifications till there remains but little resemblance to that to which the designation was originally applied. The objects above denominated appendages and vitta (in the feudal ages, lambrequins), were straps of leather secured to the lower rim of the barrel of a suit of armor, and to the openings for arm-holes: the first were about three and a half inches in width; the second, two and a half. They were ornamented with embroidery, covered with rich stuffs and goldsmiths' work, and made heavy at the lower extremity, to cause them always to hang down in proper order; but those on the arm-holes had a slight connection, so as to keep them equal when the arm was lifted. These vittæ were rarely in a single row, but in general formed two or three rows, alternately covering the opening between those underneath, and then protecting the thighs nearly to the knee, and half the upper arm. In the Roman service, under the suit of armor, was the sagum, made of red serge or baize, coming down to the cap of the knee and folding of the arm, so that the vittæ hung entirely upon it. Other nations had always an equivalent to this, but not equally long; and, in the opinion of some, the Hebrew shiryon served the same purpose. The Roman and Greek suits were, with slight difference, similarly laced together on the left, or shield side; and on the shoulders were bands and clasps, comparatively narrow in those of the Romans, which covered the joinings of the breast and back pieces on the shoulders, came from behind, and were fastened to a button on each breast. At the throat the suit of armor had always a double edging, often a band of brass or silver; in the Roman, and often in the Greek, adorned with a lion's or a Gorgon's head. It was here that, in the time of Augustus, and probably much earlier, the warriors distinguished for particular acts of valor wore insignia; a practice only revived by the moderns under the names of crosses and decorations. The Romans, it appears, had phalæx and phalæra of honor, terms which have been supposed to signify bracelets and medals; but all opinion on the subject was only conjectural previously to the discovery, on the borders of the Rhine, of a monumental bass-relief, raised by the freedman of Marcus Cælius Lembo, tribune of the (xiiix) 18th legion, who fell in the disastrous overthrow of Varus. The effigy is of three-quarter length, in a full suit of armor, with a laurel crown on the head, a Gallic twisted torque round the neck; and from the lion-head shoulder-clasps of the cuirass hang two embossed bracelets, having beneath them a label with three points, from which are suspended five medals of honor: one large, on the pit of the stomach, representing a face of Medusa; and two on each side, one beneath the other; and all, as far as can be seen, charged with lions' faces and lions' heads in profile. The monument is now in the museum of the university at Bonn. See COAT OF MAIL.

The girdle, or, more properly, the baldric or belt (cin- gula or balteus), was used by the Hebrews under the name of צִנּוּר, ezor' ("girdle"); it was of leather, studded with metal plates or bullæ; when the armor was slight, broad, and capable of being girt upon the hips; otherwise it supported the sword scarf-wise from the shoulder. See GIRDLE.

4. Greaves were likewise known, even so early as the time of David, for Goliath wore them. They consisted of a pair of shin-covers of brass or strong leather, bound by thongs round the calves and above the ankles. They reached only to the knees, excepting among the Greeks, whose greaves, elastic behind, caught nearly the whole leg, and were raised in front above the knees. The Hebrew word צִנּוֹת, scin' ("batt'le"), in Isaiah ix, 5, is supposed to mean a half-greave, though the passage is altogether obscure. Perhaps the war-boot may be explained by the war-shoe of Egypt with a metal point; and then the words might be rendered, "For every greave of the armed foot is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood," etc., instead of "every battle of the warrior," etc. But, after all, this is not quite satisfactory.—KITTO, s. v. See BREASTPLATE; GREAVES.

Armor-bearer (צִנּוֹת, nosi' kal'm'), an officer selected by kings and generals from the bravest of their favorites, whose service it was not only to bear their armor, but to stand by them in danger and carry their orders, somewhat after the manner of adjutants in modern service. (Jud. ix, 54; 1 Sam. xiv, 6; xvi, 21; xxxiii, 4.)

Armory (תַּיִתוֹת, talpithot', destructives, i. e. weapons, Cant. iv, 4), the place in which armor was deposited in times of peace. Solomon had a naval arsenal at Ezion-geber (Jer. i, 25; 1 Kings ix, 26). There is mention made in Neh. iii, 19, of an armory (תַּיִתוֹת, ne'shek, elsewhere armor) in Jerusalem, "at the turning of the wall," meaning probably the bend in the brow of Zion opposite the south-western corner of the Temple, near where the bridge connected them, although Josephus (Ant. ix, 7, 2) speaks of the armory as being in the temple itself. This was probably the arsenal ("house of armor") which Hezekiah took so much pride in showing to the Babylonian ambassadors (Isa. xxxix, 2). Dr. Barclay (City of the Great King, p. 155) thinks it was the same as "the house of the forest of Lebanon" (2 Kings x, 17; Isa. xxii, 8), and locates it at the north-eastern corner of Zion, adjoining the north-western angle of the Xystus. See ARSENAL.

Army, represented by several Heb. and Gr. words. See WAR.

I. Jewish.—The military organization of the Jews commenced with their departure from the land of Egypt, and was adapted to the nature of the expedition on which they then entered. Every man above 20 years of age was a soldier (Num. i, 3); each tribe formed a regiment, with its own banner and its own leader (Num. ii, 2; x, 14); their positions in the camp or on the march were accurately fixed (Num. ii); the whole army started and stopped at a given signal (Num. x, 5, 6); thus they came up out of Egypt ready for the fight (Exod. xiii, 18). That the Israelites preserved the same exact order throughout their march may be inferred from Balaam's language (Num. xxiv, 6). On the approach of an enemy, a conscription was made from the general body under the direction of a muster-master (originally named מַסְרֵם, Deut. xx, 5, "officer," afterward מַסְרֵם, 2 Kings xxv, 19, "scribe of the host," both terms occurring, however, together in 2 Chron. xxvi, 11, the meaning of each being primarily a writer), by whom also the officers were appointed (Deut. xx, 9). From the number so selected some might be excused serving on certain specified grounds (Deut. xx, 5-8; 1 Macc. iii, 56). The army was then divided into thousands and hundreds under their respective captains (מֵאוֹת וְאֶלְפֵי־אֶלֶּסָּרִים, Num. xxxi, 14), and still further into families (Num. ii, 34; 2 Chron. xxv, 5; xxvi, 12), the family being regarded as the unit in the Jewish polity. From the time the Israelites entered the land of Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom, little progress was made in military affairs: their wars resembled border forays, and the tactics turned upon stratagem rather than upon the discipline and disposition of the forces. Skillfully availing themselves of the opportunities which the country offered, they gained the victory sometimes by an ambush (Josh. viii, 4), sometimes by surprising the enemy (Josh. x, 9; xi, 7; Judg. vii, 21), and sometimes by a judicious attack at the time of fording a river (Judg. iii, 28; iv, 7; vii, 24; xii, 5). No general muster was made at this period; but the combatants were summoned on the spur of the moment either by trumpet-call (Judg. iii, 27), by messengers (Judg. vi, 35), by some significant token (1 Sam. xi, 7), or, as in later times, by the erection of a standard (צֶבַח, Isa. xviii, 3; Jer. iv, 21; li, 27), or a beacon-fire on an eminence (Jer. vi, 1). See BATTLE.

With the kings arose the custom of maintaining a body-guard, which formed the nucleus of a standing army. Thus Saul had a band of 3000 select warriors (1 Sam. xiii, 2; xiv, 52; xxiv, 2), and David, before his accession to the throne, 600 (1 Sam. xxiii, 13; xxv, 13). This band he retained after he became king, and added the CHERETHITES and PELETHITES (2 Sam. xv, 18; xx, 7), together with another class, whose name, Shalishim (שְׁלִישִׁים, Sept. τριακοντα, Auth. Vers. "a third part"), has been variously interpreted to mean (1.) a corps of veteran guards = Roman tribuni (Winer, Lex. Heb. p. 991); (2.) chariot-warriors, as being three in each chariot (Gesen. Theor. p. 1429); (3.) officers of the guard, thirty in number (Ewald, Gesch. ii, 601). The fact that the Egyptian war-chariot, with which the Jews were first acquainted, contained but two warriors, forms an objection to the second of these opinions (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 335), and the frequent use of the term in the singular number (2 Kings vii, 2; ix, 25; xv, 25) to the third. Whatever be the meaning of the name, it is evident that it indicated officers of high rank, the chief of whom (לֵוִי־הַצֵּבָא, "lord," 2 Kings vii, 2, or לֵוִי־הַצֵּבָא, "chief of the captains," 1 Chron. xii, 18) was immediately about the king's person, as adjutant or secretary-at-war. David farther organized a national militia, divided into twelve regiments, each of which was called out for one month in the year under their respective officers (1 Chron. xxvii, 1); at the head of the army when in active service he appointed a commander-in-chief (סֹפֵר־הַצֵּבָא, "captain of the host," 1 Sam. xiv, 50).

Hitherto the army had consisted entirely of infantry (צָבָא, 1 Sam. iv, 10; xv, 4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut. xvii, 16). The Jews had, however, experienced the great advantage to be obtained by chariots, both in their encounters with the Canaanites (Josh. xvii, 16; Judg. i, 19), and at a later period with the Syrians (2 Sam. viii, 4; x, 18). The interior of Palestine was indeed generally unsuited to the use of chariots; the Canaanites had employed them only in the plains and valleys, such as Jezreel (Josh. xvii, 16), the plain of Philistia (Judg. i, 19; 1 Sam. xvii, 5), and the upper valley of the Jordan (Josh. xi, 9; Judg. iv, 2). But the border, both on the side of Egypt and Syria, was admirably adapted to their use; and accordingly we find that as the foreign relations of the kingdoms extended, much importance was attached to them. David had reserved a hundred chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. viii, 4): these probably served as the foundation of the force which Solomon afterward enlarged through his alliance with Egypt (2 Kings x, 28, 29), and applied to the protection of his border, stations or barracks being erected for them in different localities (1 Kings ix, 19). The force amounted to 1400 chariots, 4000 horses, at the rate (in round numbers) of three horses for each chariot, the third being kept as a reserve, and 12,000 horsmen (2 Kings x, 26; 2 Chron. i, 14). At this period the organization of the army was complete; and we have, in 1 Kings ix, 22, apparently a list of the various gradations of rank in the service, as follow: (1.) מְלִיכֵי־הַמָּלְכָה, "men of war" = privates; (2.) סֹפְרֵי־הַצֵּבָא, "servants," the lowest rank of officers = lieutenants; (3.) מְלִיכֵי־הַצֵּבָא, "princes" = captains; (4.) מְלִיכֵי־הַצֵּבָא, "captains," already noticed, perhaps = staff-officers; (5.) מְלִיכֵי־הַצֵּבָא and מְלִיכֵי־הַצֵּבָא, "rulers of his chariots and his horsemen" = caraval officers. See CAPTAIN.

It does not appear that the system established by David was maintained by the kings of Judah; but in Israel the proximity of the hostile kingdom of Syria necessitated the maintenance of a standing army. The militia was occasionally called out in time of peace, as by Asa (2 Chron. xiv, 8), by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 14), by Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv, 5), and lastly by Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 11); but these notices prove that such cases were exceptional. On the other hand, the incidental notices of the body-guard lead to the conclusion that it was regularly kept up (1 Kings xiv, 28; 2 Kings xi, 4, 11). Occasional reference is made to war-chariots (2 Kings viii, 21), and it would appear that this branch of the service was maintained until the wars with the Syrians weakened the resources of the kingdom (2 Kings xiii, 7); it was restored by Jotham (Isa. ii, 7), but in Hezekiah's reign no force of the kind could be maintained, and the Jews were obliged to seek the aid of Egypt for horses and chariots (2 Kings xviii, 23, 24). This was an evident breach of the injunction in Deut. xvii, 16, and met with strong reprobation on the part of the prophet Isaiah (xxxii, 1). See CHARIOT.

With regard to the arrangement and manœuvring of the army in the field, we know but little. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. vii, 16; ix, 43; 1 Sam. xi, 11; 2 Sam. xviii, 2); such a division served various purposes: in action there would be a centre and two wings; in camp, relays for the night-watches (Judg. vii, 19); and by the combination of two of the divisions, there would be a main body and a reserve, or a strong advanced guard (1 Sam. xiii, 2; xxv, 13). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies, corresponding, according to Ewald (Geschichte, iii, 192), to the geographical divisions of the kingdom at that time; may not, however, the three-fold principle of division be noticed here also, the heavy-armed troops of Judah being considered as the proper army, and the two divisions of light-armed of the tribe of Benjamin as an appendage (2 Chron. xvii, 14-18)? See FIGUR.

The maintenance and equipment of the soldiers at the public expense dates from the establishment of a standing army; before which, each soldier armed himself, and obtained his food either by voluntary offerings (2 Sam. xvii, 28, 29), by forced exactions (1 Sam. xxv, 13), or by the natural resources of the country (1 Sam. xiv, 27); on one occasion only do we hear of any systematic arrangement for provisioning the host (Judg. xx, 10). It is doubtful whether the soldier ever received pay even under the kings (the only instance of pay being mentioned applies to mercenaries, 2 Chron. xxv, 6); but that he was maintained, while on active service, and provided with arms, appears from 1 Kings iv, 27; x, 16, 17; 2 Chron. xxvi, 14; notices occur of an arsenal or armory, in which the weapons were stored (1 Kings xiv, 28; Neh. iii, 19; Cant. iv, 4). See ARMOR.

The numerical strength of the Jewish army cannot be ascertained with any degree of accuracy; the numbers, as given in the text, are manifestly corrupt, and the various statements therefore irreconcilable. At the Exodus the number of the warriors was 600,000 (Exod. xii, 37), or 603,350 (Exod. xxxviii, 26; Num. i, 46); at the entrance into Canaan, 601,730 (Num. xxvi, 51). In David's time the army amounted, according to one statement (2 Sam. xxiv, 9), to 1,300,000, viz. 800,000 for Israel and 500,000 for Judah; but according to another statement (1 Chron. xxi, 5, 6) to 1,470,000, viz. 1,000,000 for Israel and 470,000 for Judah. The militia at the same period amounted to 24,000 × 12 = 288,000 (1 Chron. xxvii, 1 sq.). At a later period the army of Judah under Abijah is stated at 400,000, and that of Israel under Jeroboam at 300,000 (2 Chron. xiii, 3). Still later, Asa's army, derived from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin alone, is put at 530,000 (2 Chron. xiv, 8), and Jehoshaphat's at 1,160,000 (2 Chron. xvii, 14 sq.). See NUMBER.

Little need be said on this subject with regard to the period that succeeded the return from the Babylonish captivity until the organization of military affairs in Judæa under the Romans. The system adopted by Judas Maccabæus was in strict conformity with the Mosaic law (1 Mac. iii, 55); and though he maintained a standing army, varying from 3000 to 6000 men (1 Mac. iv, 6; 2 Mac. viii, 16), yet the custom of paying the soldiers appears to have been still unknown, and to have originated with Simon (1 Mac. xiv, 32). The introduction of mercenaries commenced with John Hyrcanus, who, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii, 8, 4), rifled the tombs of the kings in order to pay them; the intestine commotions that prevailed in the reign of Alexander Jannæus obliged him to increase the number to 6200 men (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 5; 14, 1); and the same policy was followed by Alexandra (Ant. xiii, 16, 2), and by Herod the Great, who had in his pay Thracian, German, and Gallic troops (Ant. xvii, 8, 3). The discipline and arrangement of the army was gradually assimilated to that of the Romans, and the titles of the officers borrowed from it (Josephus, War. ii, 20, 7). See SOLDIER.

II. Roman Army.—This was divided into legions, the number of which varied considerably, each under six tribunes (ὀνόμαρχος, "chief captain," Acts xxi, 31), who commanded by turns. The legion (q. v.) was subdivided into ten cohorts (σπῆραι, "band," Acts x,

1), the cohort into three maniples, and the manipule into two centuries, containing originally 100 men, as the name implies, but subsequently from 50 to 100 men, according to the strength of the legion. (See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v.) There were thus 60 centuries in a legion, each under the command of a centurion (καρπούραρχος, Acts x, 1, 22; ἰκαρόνταρχος, Matt. viii, 5; xxvii, 54). In addition to the legionary cohorts, independent cohorts of volunteers served under the Roman standards; and Biscoe (History of Acts, p. 220) supposes that all the Roman forces stationed in Judæa were of this class. Josephus speaks of five cohorts as stationed at Cæsarea at the time of Herod Agrippa's death (Ant. xix, 9, 2), and frequently mentions that the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste served in the ranks (Ant. xx, 8, 7). One of these cohorts was named the "Italian" (Acts x, 1), not as being a portion of the Italica legio (for this was not embodied until Nero's reign), but as consisting of volunteers from Italy (Gruter, Inscr. i, 434). This cohort probably acted as the body-guard of the procurator. The cohort named "Augustus" (σπῆραι Σεβαστῆς, Acts xxvii, 1) may have consisted of the volunteers from Sebaste (Josephus, War. ii, 12, 5; Biscoe, p. 223). Others; however, think that it was a cohors Augusta, similar to the legio Augusta. The head-quarters of the Roman forces in Judæa were at Cæsarea. A single cohort was probably stationed at Jerusalem as the ordinary guard; at the time of the great feasts, however, and on other public occasions, a larger force was sent up, for the sake of preserving order (Josephus, War. ii, 12, 1; 13, 3). Frequent disturbances arose in reference to the images and other emblems carried by the Roman troops among their military ensigns, which the Jews regarded as idolatrous; deference was paid to their prejudices by a removal of the objects from Jerusalem (Ant. xviii, 3, 1; 5, 3). For the sentry (Acts xii, 4) and their "captain" (Acts xxviii, 16), see GUARD. The δεῦροκέφα (Vulg. lanccarii; A. V. "spearmen"), noticed in Acts xxiii, 23, appear to have been light-armed, irregular troops; the origin of the name is, however, quite uncertain (Alford, Comm. in loc.).—Smith, s. v. See HONOR.

Ar'na (Lat. Arna, for the Greek text is not extant), a name given as the father of Marinotto and son of Ozias, in the genealogy of Ezra (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 2); evidently meaning the ZERAHAN (q. v.) of the genuine list (Ezra vii, 3).

ARNOLD, RICHARD, M.A., a divine of the Church of England, born in London about 1636(?); entered Benedict College, Cambridge, 1714; became fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, 1720; afterward rector of Marcston, Leicestershire, where he died in 1756. He is known chiefly by his Critical Commentary on the Apocrypha (new ed. Lond. 1822, 4to), which is printed together with Patrick's, Louth's, and Whitley's Commentaries (best ed. Tegg, Lond. 4 vols. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. i, 99; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 63.

Ar'nán (Heb. Arnan', אֲרָנָן, nimble; Sept. Ὀρνᾶ), the great-grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 21). He is probably the same with Christ's maternal ancestor Joanna, in Luke iii, 27 (see Strong's Harmony and Exposition, p. 17). B. C. considerably post 536.

ARNAUD, HENRI, pastor and military leader of the Vaudois, was born at La Tour, in Piedmont, 1641. His early history is obscure, but he is said to have been a soldier before entering the ministry among the persecuted Vaudois. In 1689 he led his people in their efforts to recover their native land and their right to worship God in peace. William III of England gave him a colonel's commission, and he served with great distinction, at the head of 1200 Vaudois, under Marlborough. When his people were exiled in 1698, he became their pastor at Schönberg, and died there in 1721. In this retirement he wrote the history of his enterprise, under the title Histoire de la glorieuse Rencontre des Vaudois dans leurs Vallées, printed in 1710, and dedicated to Anne, Queen of Great Britain. The French edition of this work is very rare; it has been translated into English, under the title The glorious Recovery by the Vaudois of their Vallées, trans. by H. D. Ackland (Lond. 1827, 8vo). Arnauld, Angélique, abbess of Port-Royal, a daughter of Robert Arnauld d'Andilly, was born 28th November, 1624. From her earliest years she exhibited an extraordinary force and resoluteness of character, and excited much anxious speculation concerning her future career among her relatives. When not quite twenty years of age she became a nun at Port-Royal des Champs, where she had been educated by her aunt, Marie Jacqueline Angélique Arnauld, sister of the great Arnauld. Nine years after she was made sub-prioress; and on removing some years later to Port-Royal de Paris, she held the same office. During the persecution of the Port-Royalists, Angélique, by her piety and courage, sustained the spirit of the sisterhood. The whole family, male and female, were determined Jansenists, and none more so than Mère Angélique de St. Jean (her conventual name). She had much to endure, but she met misfortune with earnest intrepidity. A royal order was issued to break up the nunnery. The police arrested the inmates, who were dispersed in various convents throughout France, and constant efforts were made by the Jesuits to induce them to sign the "Formulary of Alexander VII." Angélique was alone exempted from listening to their arguments and solicitations, her "obstinacy" being supposed invincible. At length, by command of the Archbishop of Paris, the nuns were restored to Port-Royal des Champs; but for some years they were subjected to a strict surveillance by soldiers, who watched all their movements, and allowed them no intercourse with persons out of the convent. In 1669, however, was issued the edict of Clement IX for the peace of the church, which was a kind of compromise on this vexed question of Jansenism and Jesuitism. The nuns received back the privileges of which they had been stripped, and constituted their society anew. Angélique was again elected prioress. In 1678 she was made abbess. The next year her protectress, the Duchesse de Longueville, died, and the persecution recommenced by the prohibition to receive any more novices. Still Angélique did not despair. She consoled the nuns, and exerted all her influence with persons in power, but with little effect. At last she sank under a complication of griefs, and expired on the 29th of January, 1684, leaving behind her as bright and beautiful a memory as any of her countrywomen. She was learned without being pedantic, pious without bigotry, and gentle to others in proportion as she was severe to herself. Angélique wrote several works. Of these, one, perhaps the most valuable work relative to Port-Royal, is entitled Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, et à la Vie de la Révérende Mère Marie Angélique de Sainte Magdeleine Arnauld, Réformatrice de ce Monastère (Trocet, 1712, 12mo, 3 vols.). While the Mémoires of Du Fossé, Fontaine, and Lancelot detail the external history of Port-Royal, these Mémoires represent its internal history, with the mind and habits of its members, particularly of the elder Angélique. The Mémoires were edited by Barbeau de la Bruyère in 1712. The originals, from which Barbeau de la Bruyère printed the Mémoires, were preserved in the library of Saint Germain des Prés at Paris. Angélique also took a great part in the composition of the Néologie de Port-Royal des Champs (Amst. 1723, 4to), and wrote other works in defence of the monastery.—Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de

Arnauld, Antoine, one of a family distinguished for piety, talent, and suffering, and which greatly influenced both religion and literature in France, was born at Paris Feb. 6, 1612. His father, named also Antoine Arnauld (died 29th Dec. 1619), was a distinguished advocate, and a great antagonist of the Jesuits. The Jesuits met with an opponent in the younger Arnauld as determined as his father had been. Arnauld the younger was educated at Calvi. He originally studied for the law, but was induced by the Abbot de St. Cyran to turn his attention to theology. In 1641 he was made priest and doctor of the Sorbonne, where he had been pupil of Lescot (afterward Bishop of Chartres), who taught him the scholastic theology. In this period of study he imbibed a love for Augustine and his writings, which he ever after preserved. In 1643 he was made an honorary member of the Society of Sorbonne for his extraordinary merit. In this year, 1643, he published his famous work, De la fréquente Communion (7th ed. 1783), which excited great attention, and was vigorously attacked by the Jesuits. Arnauld now put forth, in reply, his Théologie Morale des Jésuites—the beginning of a fierce and protracted controversy. The Jesuits endeavored to have Arnauld sent to Rome; to escape this peril, he retired from public life for many years, but kept his pen ever busy, at the convent of Port-Royal des Champs, near Paris. See PORT-ROYAL. Soon after, he became involved in the disputes about Jansenius (q. v.), bishop of Ypres, and his book Augustinus, several propositions of which concerning the intricate questions of grace and free-will had been condemned by Pope Urban VII (Aug. 1, 1641). Arnauld boldly ventured to defend it against the censures of the papal bull. He published several pamphlets, closing with a first and second Apologie de Jansenius. In these years of strife, whenever a moment of armistice permitted, he occupied it in writing such works as Mœurs de l'Eglise Catholique, La Correction, La Grâce, La Vérité de la Religion, De la Foi, de l'Espérance, et de la Charité, and the Manuel de Saint Augustin. He also varied these occupations by translating into Latin his Frequent Communion, and by the composition of his Nove objections contra Renat, Descartes Meditations, and several smaller tracts. In addition to his literary labors, he undertook the direction of the nuns at Port-Royal, of which his sister, Marie Jacqueline Angélique Arnauld, was abbess. In his retreat he had the society of such men as Pascal, Nicole, etc. Here they wrote in common numerous excellent works, e. g. Grammaire Générale Raisonnée, Eléments de Géométrie, and L'Art de Penser. In 1649 the Jansenist controversy broke out more fiercely than ever. The Augustinus of the Bishop of Ypres was again attacked and condemned by the Sorbonne and the pope. Arnauld replied in his Considérations. In 1650 appeared what he conceived to be his best work, L'Apologie pour les Saints Pères. For the next half dozen years he was engaged in constant and painful disputes; yet, in spite of the polemical character of his life, the impression of his piety and earnestness was deepened in the mind of the nation; and, on reading some of his compositions, even Alexander VII is reported to have praised the author, and to have exhorted him for the future to despise the libels of his adversaries. During the strife he published La Concorde des Evangiles and L'Office du Saint-Sacrement. In 1655-56, for prudential reasons, he left his retreat at Port-Royal, and sought a secret place of security. About the same time he was expelled from the Sorbonne and the faculty of theology. Seventy-two doctors and many licentiates and bachelors went with him. In 1656, the war with the Jesuits was renewed—not, however, by Arnauld in person. Under the nom de plume of Louis de Montalto, the great Pascal (q. v.) discharged his scorpion wit against the Jesuits for about a year and a half in the Provincial Letters. Arnauld furnished him with materials. In 1658 he took the field in propreiâ personâ, by publishing his Cinq Ecrits en faveur des Curés de Paris contre les Casuistes rebelles. In 1662 appeared La Nouvelle Héresie (of the Jesuits); in 1669 the first volume of his Morale Pratique (of the Jesuits), the last of which was not published until the year of his death. After the peace of Clement IX, which for a time allayed the Jansenist controversy, and to which Arnauld contributed by an eloquent memorial to the pontiff, he was presented to the pope's nuncio, and also to Louis XIV., who received him graciously, and invited him "to employ his golden pen in defence of religion." His next work, in which he was associated with his friend Nicole, De la Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise Catholique touchant l'Eucharistie, was dedicated to the pope. This occasioned a warm controversy between Arnauld and the reformed minister Claude, in the course of which Arnauld wrote Du Renversement de la Morale de J. C. par la Doctrine des Calvinistes touchant la Justification (Paris, 1672). Arnauld at the same time continued his war against the Jesuits, and wrote the greater part of the work styled Morale Pratique des Jésuites (8 vols. 12mo), in which many authentic facts and documents are mixed up with party bitterness and exaggeration. The Jesuits, of course, an ambitious society, did not bear this patiently. Harlay, the archbishop of Paris, assisted in prejudicing the king against Arnauld, and Louis XIV. issued an order for his arrest. Arnauld concealed himself for some time at the house of the Duchess of Longueville; but in 1679 he repaired to Brussels, where the Marquis of Grana, the Spanish governor of the Low Countries, assured him of his protection. There he published in 1681 his Apologie pour les Catholiques, a defence of the English Romanists against the charges of Titus Oates's conspiracy. In this work he undertook the defence of his old antagonists the Jesuits, whom he considered as having been calumniated in those transactions. Another work, not so creditable to Arnauld's judgment, is one against the Prince of Orange, William III. of England, whom he styled a new Absalom, a new Herod, and a new Cromwell (8vo, 1689). It was published anonymously, but it afterward appeared that he was the author. In refutation of his old friend Malebranche's opinions, Arnauld wrote his Traité des Vraies et des Faussez Idées (Cologne, 1683); and afterward, Réflexions Philosophiques et Théologiques sur le Nouveau Systéme de la Nature et de la Grâce du Père Malebranche (1685). He continued to the last, although past 80 years of age, to carry on his various controversies with the Jesuits, with Malebranche, with the Calvinists, and with the sceptic philosophers, among whom was Bayle. His last work was Réflexions sur l'Eloquence des Prédicateurs, 1694. He died in his exile at Brussels, on the 8th of August of that year, after receiving the sacrament from the curate of his parish. His works, which filled more than 100 volumes of various sizes, were collected and published at Lausanne and at Paris, in 48 volumes, 4to, 1775-83. The last volume contains the author's biography. Moreri gives a catalogue of his writings, 320 in number.—Penny Cyclopædia; Ranke, History of Popacy, ii, 259 sq.; Edinburgh Review, July, 1841; Princeton Review, xxi, 467; *Élog. Arnauld, Henri, brother of Antoine, was born in Paris in 1597. He was originally designed for the bar, but, on receiving from the court the abbey of St. Nicholas, he entered the church. He was elected bishop of Toul by the diocesan chapter; but, as the election gave rise to disputes, he would not accept it. In 1615 he went to Rome to appease the quarrel between the Barberini family and Pope Innocent X.; and such was his success that the family had a medal struck and a statue erected in his honor. On his return to France, he was made bishop of Angers in 1649, devoted himself to his sacred calling, and became, like the rest of his family, a zealous Jansenist. He was one of the four bishops who refused to sign the acceptance of the pope's bull condemning the "Augustinus" of Jansenius. He was accustomed to take only five hours' sleep, that he might have time for prayer and the reading of the Scriptures without encroaching on the duties of his episcopal office. He was regular in visiting the sick. When there was a scarcity of provisions at Angers, on one occasion, he sent ten thousand livres so secretly that the donation was attributed to another, and the real donor was only discovered by accident some time afterward. His diocese he never left but once, and that was to reconcile the Prince of Tarento to his father, the Duke of the Tremouille. When Angers revolted in 1652, the queen-mother was about to take heavy vengeance upon it, but was prevented by this bishop, who, as he administered the sacrament to her, said: "Take the body of Him who forgave His enemies when on the cross." Some one advising him to take one day in the week for recreation, he replied, "Yes, I will, when you find me a day in which I am not bishop." His Négociations à la Cour de Rome (1748, 5 vols.) contain many curious facts and anecdotes. He died at Angers, June 8, 1694.—Mémoires de Port-Royal (Utrecht, 1742), vol. i; Besoigne, Vie de Henri Arnauld (Cologne, 1756, 2 vols. 12mo); Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 290.

Arnauld (of ANDILLY), Robert, eldest brother of Antoine Arnauld, was born at Paris in 1588, and entered early into public life, and filled several offices at the French court. At fifty-two he retired into the convent of Port-Royal, where he wrote numerous translations, and other works, printed in 8 vols. fol. 1675. He died Sept. 27, 1671. His Vies des Saintes Pères du désert were translated into English: Lives of the Fathers of the Desert (London, 1757, 2 vols. 8vo).—Collier, Hist. Diet. s. v.; Hoefler, *Biog. Arnd or Arndt, JOHN, the first of the Pietists (q. v.), was born December 2, 1555, at Ballenstädt, at the foot of the Harz Mountains. He studied at the University of Helmstädt, and devoted himself at first to medicine, but afterward applied himself to theology at Strasburg under Pappus, a theologian of the rigid Lutheran school. In 1583 he became pastor of the Lutheran church at Babelorn, in Anhalt; in 1590, at Quedlinburg; in 1599, at St. Martin's, Brunswick. His theological learning was varied and accurate; but his chief peculiarity was his heart religion, in which respect he was the Spenser or the Wesley of his time. While at Brunswick he published (1605) the first volume of his "True Christianity" (Uer Bucher vom wahren Christenthum), designed to awaken students, ministers, and others to practical and experimental religion, and to mend, if possible, the loose morals of the age. The book created a great sensation, and was at once translated into several languages. Its revivalism also brought out the enmity of the scholastic theologians and of the "dry" religionists; a controversy of many years' duration was the result. See Scharff, Suppl. Hist. Littéragie Arndtiana (1727). In 1608 Arndt was called to Eisleben, and in 1609 the three other books of his True Christianity were given to the press. No book of practical religion has been more widely circulated, not even Bunyan's Pilgrim or Baxter's Saints' Rest. The substance of the book is as follows: Book I is called the Book of Scripture; it seeks to show the way of the inward and spiritual life, and that Adam ought to die every day more and more in the heart of a Christian, and Christ to gain the ascendant there. The second is called the Book of Life; he proposes in it to direct the Christian to a greater degree of perfect-tion, to give him a relish for sufferings, to encourage him to resist his enemies after the example of his Saviour. The third is entitled the Book of Conscience: in this he recalls the Christian within himself, and discovers to him the kingdom of God seated in the midst of his own heart. The last book is entitled the Book of Nature: the author proves here that all the creatures lead men to the knowledge of their Creator. New editions of the work are very numerous; those by J. F. von Meyer (4th ed. Francf. 1857) and Krummacher (4th ed. Leipz. 1859) contain biographies of the author. For a complete list of the new German editions of Arndt's work, see Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., s. v. Arndt. The work was translated into many different languages: Latin, Luneburg, in 1625; Frankfurt, in 1628; and Leipsic, in 1704. It was printed in Low Dutch in 1642 and 1647, and translated into Danish and Bohemian. It was translated into French by Samuel Basnage de Beauval. The first book was printed in English in 1646; in 1708 the Latin translation was reprinted at London; an English translation was published in 1712, 8vo, dedicated to Queen Anne, by M. Boehm. A new English translation was published in 1815 by William Jaques—True Christianity, or the whole Economy of God toward Man, and the whole Duty of Man toward God (2 vols. 8vo, Lond.), and an American edition (Philad. 1842, 8vo). In 1611 Arndt was transferred to Celle, when the duke of Luneburg made him court chaplain and superintendent, and his last years were spent in promoting the religious interests of the duchy. He died in 1621. Among the charges brought against Arndt, one was that he was a member of the Rosicrucian fraternity; but that has been disproved (Hlonke, Deutsche Zeitschrift, 1852, No. 35); yet his medical studies had undoubtedly led him to dabble in alchemy. Besides the True Christianity, he published a number of minor writings, which may be found in the edition of his works by Rambach (Leipzig, 1734, 3 vols. 8vo). See Arnold, Kirchen und Ketzehistorie, II. xvii, § 6; F. Arndt, Joh. Arndt, ein biog. Versuch (Berlin, 1838); Pertz, De Joanne Arndio, etc. (Hanover, 1852); Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, i, 540; Hurst, History of Rationalism, ch. i; Morris, Life of John Arndt (Baltimore, 1853, 12mo).

Arndt, JOSUA, a Lutheran clergyman, born in 1626, was a professor at Rostock, and published several works on philosophy, divinity, and history; among others, Lexicon Antiquitatum Ecclesiasticarum (4to, Greifswald, 1669). He died in 1685.

Arno, archbishop of Salzburg, frequently called, with a Latin name, Aquila, was probably a native of Germany, and not, as has been erroneously inferred from some figurative expressions of Aleuin, a brother of the latter. Arno (or, as he calls himself, Arn) was educated at Freising (Bavaria), and was consecrated in the same city deacon in 765, and priest in 776. He was a frequent attendant of Duke Thassilo, of Bavaria, and no less than 25 documents of the church of Freising have his name as a witness. He became, in 782, abbot at Elmon, in the Netherlands, and in the same year began his intimate relations with Aleuin, who at that time was residing near Elmon. In 785 he returned to Bavaria, having been appointed by Duke Thassilo bishop of Salzburg. While sojourning at Rome in 798, he was, in accordance with the wish of King Karl and the Bavarian bishops, raised to the dignity of archbishop. Arno presided at several synods, and was, in 813, one of the presidents of the Council of Mentz. He also converted many Huns and Wends, and died in 820. He wrote, together with Deacon Benedict, the Congestum (Indicibus) Arnonis, a list of all the churches, villages, etc., of the archbishopric of Salzburg, which is a very valuable contribution to the early Church history of southwestern Germany.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, i, 542.

Arnobius, THE ELDER, also called "Afer," lived about 297, and taught rhetoric at Sicca, in Africa. He was originally a pagan, and the master of Lactantius, but about the time of Diocletian he embraced the Christian faith, and, according to Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 79), in order the more readily to induce the bishops to receive him among the number of the faithful, he composed, before his baptism, about the year 303, seven books against the Gentiles (adversus Gentiles, libri vii). This account of Jerome's is followed by many writers (e. g. Tillemont, Cave; Smith, Dictionary, s. v.); but Lardner's argument against it (iii, 458) seems to be conclusive. Arnobius writes in the tone, not of a catechumen, but of a Christian; and he nowhere hints at any necessity or compulsion for his task, but, on the contrary, in the beginning of his book, he speaks of it as a task voluntarily undertaken in view of the injurious reproaches cast upon the Christians. The book begins with a vindication of Christianity from the charges brought against it by the pagans. In a few points Arnobius makes statements savoring of Gnosticism, and he does not manifest a complete acquaintance with the Christian system or with the Scriptures. He shows, however, an extensive knowledge of pagan worship and literature, and the book is a valuable source of information on these topics. The marked peculiarity of his Apology, as distinguished from those of his predecessors, consists in the fact that he not only repels the charges made against Christianity, but also undertakes to show that Christianity itself is demonstrable by evidence. In his argument for the divinity of Christ and of his religion, he anticipates many of the leading arguments of modern apologetics, especially of Paley. For a very clear summary of it, see Woodham, Introduction to Tertullian's Liber Apologeticus, ch. iii. Villemain gives Arnobius a very high place among the early writers, in Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 311. See also Dorner, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 190. The works of Arnobius were published, for the first time, by Faustus Sabeus, at Rome, in 1542, but with many faults. Many editions have since been issued, but the best are those of Orelli (Leips. 1816, 3 vols. 8vo), of Hillebrandt (Halle, 1844, 8vo). See Geret, De Arnobio judicio (Viteb, 1752); Meyer, De ratione Arnobiana (Hafn. 1815); Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 112.

Arnobius, THE YOUNGER, lived about 460, and is said to have been a priest of Gaul, brought up in the monastery of Lerins. He wrote a Commentarius in Psalmos Davidis (Basle, 1522; Paris, 1639), which shows him to have been a semi-Pelagian. His extant remains may be found in Bib. Patr. vol. viii.—Cave, Hist. Lit. cent. v; Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Dupin, Eccle. Writers, cent. v.

Arnold (ARNALDO, ARNAUD) OF BRESCIA was born in the town of Brescia about the beginning of the twelfth century. Our information as to his history is scanty, and depends chiefly upon the accounts of his enemies. The chief sources are Otto of Freisingen, de Gestis Frider. I., and Günther, Liguinus (12th cent., both printed together, Basle, 1569, fol.). He studied under Abelard at the desert of Nogent. Having returned to Italy he became a monk. The corruption of the clergy was very great at that time, and Arnold, endowed with an impassioned oratory, began to preach against the ambition and luxury of abbots, prelates, and cardinals, not sparing the pope himself. He maintained that ecclesiastics as well as laymen ought to be subordinate to the civil power; that the disposal of kingdoms and principalities did not belong to the Church of Christ; that the clergy should not accumulate wealth, but should depend upon the offerings of the faithful, or, at most, upon tithes, for their support. His vehement eloquence inflamed the minds of the people, who had been alienated from the clergy before by the excessive corruption of the times. Brescia revolted against its bishop, the fermentation spread to other towns, and complaints against the author of all this poured in at Rome. Innocent II had Arnold condemned, together with other heretics, in the council of Lateran, in 1139. Such, at least, is the positive statement of Otto of Freisingen and other historians of those times, but Arnold's name is not mentioned in the canons of the council; and it is only clear that, by Innocent's order, he was prohibited from preaching, was banished from Italy, and forbidden to return without the pope's permission. He then proceeded to France, where he fell in with an old fellow-student, the papal legate Guido, afterward Pope Celestine II; but he met with an unrelenting adversary in Bernard of Clairvaux, who forced him to seek refuge at Zürich, and afterward at Constance (about 1140). He there resumed his preaching against the abuses of the clergy, and found many favorable listeners. But Bernard traced him there also, and caused the Bishop of Constance to banish him. After the death of Innocent II (1143), Arnold returned to Italy, and, hearing that the people of Rome had revolted against the pope, he put himself at the head of the insurrection. Lucius II had died of the wounds received in a popular affray, and Eugenius III, a disciple of Bernard, succeeded him in the papal chair, but was driven away from the city by the people and the senate. The multitude hurried on to excesses which Arnold probably had never contemplated. They attacked the houses of the cardinals and nobles, and shared the plunder. Arnold, however, still remained poor; he really despised wealth, and his morals were irreproachable. Rome continued for ten years in a state of agitation little differing from anarchy, at war with the pope and the people of Tibur, and at variance within itself. Bernard, in his epistles, draws a fearful picture of the state of the city at that time. Eugenius III died in 1153, and his successor, Anastasius IV, having followed him to the grave shortly after, Adrian IV was elected pope in 1154. He was a man of a more determined spirit than his predecessors. A cardinal having been attacked and seriously wounded in the streets of Rome, Adrian resorted to the bold measure of excommunicating the first city in Christendom, a thing without a precedent. The Romans, who had set at naught the temporal power of the pope, quailed before his spiritual authority. In order to be reconciled to the pontiff they exiled Arnold, who took refuge among some friendly nobles in Campania. When the Emperor Frederick I came to Rome to be crowned, the pope applied to him to have Arnold arrested. Frederick accordingly gave his orders, and Arnold was strangled, his body burnt, and the ashes thrown into the Tiber in the year 1155 (Penny Cyclopædia). See ADRIAN IV. The Roman Catholic writers naturally give Arnold a bad character. In truth, he was a great reforming spirit—the Savonarola or Luther of his time—but driven by the evil circumstances of his age into errors and excesses. Neander is doubtless only just in saying that the inspiring idea of his movements was that of a holy and pure church, a renovation of the spiritual order after the pattern of the apostolic church. Baptist writers class him among the forerunners of their church, as one of the charges brought against him in 1139 was the denial of infant baptism. Baronius calls him "the patriarch of political heretics" (Annals, anno 1155). See Köler, De Arnolde Briziensi (Gött. 1742, 4to); Francke, *Arnold v. ARNOLD OF USSINGEN. See ARNOLDI, BARTHOLOMEW.

ARNOLD OF VILLENEUVE, a celebrated physician of the thirteenth century, was born about 1240. He was eminently skilled in natural science and general literature. In 1285 he was made physician to Pedro III of Aragon; but his heterodox opinions brought on his excommunication by the bishop of Tarragona, and he wandered from place to place for years, until finally he found refuge with Frederick II at Palermo. The monks stigmatized him as a magician, not so much for his science as for his attacks upon their bad lives and principles. He taught that the monks had corrupted the doctrine of Christ, and that the founding of masses and benefices was useless. In 1311, Pope Clement V, being ill of gravel, sought the medical skill of Arnold, who was shipwrecked, and perished on the voyage to Rome. His remains were buried at Genoa in 1313, and his writings were afterward burnt by the Inquisition. Among the propositions in them which were condemned are the following: 1. that the human nature of Christ is equal to the divinity; 2. that the soul of Christ, immediately after the union, knew as much as the divinity; 3. that the devil has perverted the whole human race, and destroyed faith; 4. that the monks corrupted the doctrine of Jesus Christ; 5. that the study of philosophy ought to be banished from the schools; 6. that the revelation made to Cyril is more valuable than Holy Scripture; 7. that works of mercy are more pleasing to God than the sacrifice of the altar; 8. that founding benefices and masses is useless; 9. that he who gathers a great number of beggars, and founds chapels and perpetual masses, incurs everlasting damnation; 10. that the sacrificing priest and the offerer offer nothing of their own to God; 11. that the passion of Jesus Christ is better represented by the giving of alms than by the sacrifice of the altar; 12. that God is not honored in deed in the mass, but in word only; 13. that the papal constitutions are simply the works of men; 14. that God threatens with damnation, not all those who sin, but all those who afford a bad example; 15. that the end of the world would happen in 1335, 1345, or 1376. His works were printed at Lyons in 1520, in one vol. fol.; and 1585; also at Basle.—Nicéron. Mem. tom. xxxiv, p. 82; Landon, Ecol. Diet. i, 541; Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 281.

Arnold, Godfrey, an eminent German Pietist and Mystic, born at Annaberg, Saxony, 1666. Educated at Wittenberg, he became a tutor, 1689, at Dresden, where he imbibed an ardent Pietistic tendency from Spener, who obtained him a situation as private tutor at Quedlinburg, where he devoted himself to the study of the mystic writers and of Church history. After condemning marriage, he married in 1700, and lost some of his fanatical views. In 1707 he obtained a pastorate in Perleberg, where he remained until his death in 1714. In spite of all his errors, Arnold was eminently pious, and was a faithful preacher. He wrote largely, but his most important work is his Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzergeschichte (Frankf. 1698-1700; republ. at Schaffhausen, with additions, 1740-1743, 3 vols.). This "Impartial Church History" was the first written in German instead of Latin. It makes personal piety the central idea of Christianity. But, while bent on showing fair play, as no historian before had done, to all sorts of heretics and schismatics, particularly to the Mystics, for whom he had a special predilection, Arnold fell into the most gross wrong toward the representatives of orthodoxy, ascribing to them the basest motives, and aspersing their character in every possible way. See Schaff, History of the Apostolic Church, § 30; Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, i, 548. The number of works which were published against Arnold is very large. A list of them is given in the preface to the third volume of his works in the Schaffhausen edition. The most important among these is by Groschius, Nothwendige Vertheidigung der evangelischen Kirche wider die Arnoldische Ketzerhistorie (Frankf. 1745). Among the other works of Arnold are, Historia et descriptio theosophica, 1702 (German, 1703); Das Geheimnis der göttlichen Sophia (Leipzig, 1700). Some of the works of Arnold continue to be in common use among the German Pietists, and are still being published in new editions; as, Die Erste Liebe (an essay on the life of the first Christians; new edit. by Lammert, Stuttgart, 1844; and with an appendix containing all the religious poems of Arnold, by Knapp, Stuttgart, 1844); Parad'esischer Lustgarten (a Prayer-book; with biography of Arnold, and selection of his religious poems by Elmann, Reutlingen, 1852); Geistliche Erfahrungs-Lehre (an essay on experimental Christianity, from the beginning of the conversion to its completion (Milford Square, Pennsylvania, 1855). Complete collections of the religious poems of Arnold (Sämmtliche Geistliche Lieder) have been published by Knapp (Stuttgart, 1845) and Elmann (Stuttgart, 1856); a selection ("Geistliche Minnelieder") by Elmann (Stuttgart, 1856). See G. Arnold's Geduppelter Lebenslauf (partly autobiography, 1716); Coler, Summarische Nachricht von G. Arnolds Leben und Schriften (Wittenberg, 1718); Knapp, Biographie G. Arnolds (Stuttgart, 1845); Göbel, Gesch. des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westphälischen evangelischen Kirche (vol. ii, p. 628-735).

Arnold, Nicholas, a Protestant theologian, was born at Lesna, in Poland, December, 1618; died Oct. 13, 1680. He became, in 1639, rector of the school in Jablonow, and in 1654 succeeded Cocceius as professor of theology at Franeker, where he became especially noted as a pulpit orator. His writings were chiefly polemical, e. g. Religio Sociniana refutata (Franeker, 1654, 4to);—Atheismus Socinianus (1659, 4to);—Discurs. theol. cont. Comenianum (1660, 4to);—a refutation of the Catechism of the Socinians (Atheismus Socinianus F. Bidalii refutatus, Amst. 1659);—a work entitled Lux in Tenebris (Light in Darkness), in which he explains those passages of Scripture which the Socinians use as arguments for their doctrines (Franeker, 1662, 2 vols.);—and a Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews.—Hofer, Biog. Générale, iii, 326.

Arnold, Smith, a highly esteemed Methodist preacher, was born in Middlebury, Conn., in 1766, and removed in 1791 to Herkimer Co., N. Y. In the year 1800 he connected himself with the itinerant ministry, and continued in the field of active labor until 1821, when he assumed a supernumerary relation. He died at Rochester, March 16, 1839.—Wakely, Heroes of Methodism; Min. of Confer., ii, 670; Sprague, Annals, vii, 357.

Arnold, Thomas, D.D., was born at Cowes, England, June 13th, 1795. In 1803 he was sent to Winchester school, where he remained until 1811. In 1811 he obtained a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and in 1815 a fellowship in Oriel, where he was associated with Coplestone, Whately, and Hampden, a noble band. In 1818 he was ordained deacon, in 1819 settled at Laleham, where he opened a school to fit a few young men for the university. In 1820 he married. In 1828 he was made head master of Rugby school, and ordained priest. It soon began to be noised abroad that a reform was in progress in Rugby; and the effects of Dr. Arnold's administration of the school are visible to-day, not only in Rugby, but in most schools in England. In this occupation he spent the last fourteen years of his life, and during that period took the deepest interest in all the political questions of the time. He was one of the most decided opponents of the Oxford new school of theology. His idea of a Christian Church was first given in his pamphlet on "Church Reform," which he was induced to publish in 1823, in consequence of the apprehensions he entertained of the danger which then threatened the Establishment. His theory is much the same as Hooker's—that the church and state are identical; that a church is a Christian state. His views on this subject are again stated in his Fragment on the Church, subsequently published, in which he hits the key-stone of the Tractarian heresy in attacking what he considers to be their false notions of the Christian priesthood. Dr. Arnold's mind was early directed to the social condition of the working classes; and many efforts were made, and a variety of plans devised by him, not only for improving it, but for directing the attention of the public to a subject of so much importance. In 1841 he was appointed by Lord Melbourne to the Regius-Professorship of Modern History at Oxford—an appointment which gave him the most lively satisfaction. But he lived to deliver only his introductory course of lectures. When at the very summit of his reputation as a teacher, and at the time when the odium in which, for the liberality of his religious and political opinions, his name had been held by men of his own profession was fast disappearing, and the grandeur of his character was every day becoming more manifest and more distinctly understood, he was seized with a fatal disease, which carried him off in a few hours. He died on the 12th of June, 1842, of spasms at the heart. His great work, and the one by which he will be remembered, is his History of Rome (Lond. 1840-1843, 3 vols. 8vo), comprehending the period between the origin of the state and the end of the Second Punic War; with his History of the later Roman Commonwealth (Lond. 1843, 2d ed. 2 vols. 8vo), reprinted from the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, carrying on the history to the time of Trajan. In the Notes and Dissertations to his edition of Thucydides he has given a social and political, as well as a critical interest to his author. History and divinity—man and man's relation to God—were his favorite studies. In both he preferred the practical to the theoretical. His Sermons (5 vols. 8vo) demonstrate with what earnestness and devotion he labored to bring religion into the daily concerns of men, and to invest every act of life with a Christian character. His remaining productions are, a volume of Lectures on Modern History, delivered at Oxford (Lond. 1843, 8vo), and Miscellaneous Works (Lond. 1845, 8vo), which include many articles written for reviews, etc., and essays. Most of Dr. Arnold's writings have been reprinted in New York. They are not important to scientific theology, a branch to which Arnold seems to have given no serious or prolonged study. In some points he approximated to rationalistic views of inspiration and interpretation, but his hold of Christ and of the atonement saved him from going to extremes. Still he is, perhaps justly, styled the founder of the "Broad School" of the Church of England.—Stanley, Life and Correspondence of Dr. Arnold; Eng. Encyclop.; Methodist Quart. Rev. April, 1846, p. 266; North Brit. Rev. ii, 403; Quarterly Rev. (Lond.) lxxiv, 252; Edinb. Lec. lxxxi, 99; Princeton Rev. xvii, 283.

Arnoldi, August Wilhelm, a Roman Catholic bishop of Germany, born at Baden, near Treves, in Prussia, died in 1861. He was ordained priest in 1825, became professor of Oriental languages and eloquence at the seminary of Treves, and subsequently canon at the Cathedral. He was elected bishop of Treves in 1839, but the Prussian government refused to ratify the election. He was again elected in 1842, when he was recognised by the government, but was at once involved in new difficulties by his refusal to take the constitutional oath. He became widely known, and produced a great commotion in 1845 by ordering the public exhibition of a relic of the Church of Treves, claimed to be "the holy coat" of Christ. He is the author of a German translation of the Homilies of Chrysostom and his book on the priesthood.—Pierer, i, 753; Vapereau, 66.

Arnoldi (Arnold), Bartholomew, a German Augustine monk. He was a professor of theology at Erfurt. He was Luther's teacher, and at first agreed with his views; but when he broke with the papacy, Arnoldi became his warm antagonist. He wrote many works, chiefly against the Lutherans. He died at Erfurt in 1532.

Arnoldists, followers of Arnold of Brescia (q. v.). Many seem to have adhered to the doctrines of Arnold even after his death, and to have propagated them in Upper Italy. The Arnoldists were condemned by Pope Lucius III at the council of Verona in 1184. The name occurs also later, as in a law of Frederick II against the heretics (1224); but it is doubtful whether the name was merely copied from the condemnatory decree, or whether they continued to exist as a sect.

Ar'non (Heb. Arnon', אֲרֹנּוֹן, a murmur; Sept. Ἀρωνῶν, sometimes Ἀρωνῶν), a river (אֲרֹנּוֹן, torrent, Deut. ii, 24, forming the southern boundary of trans-Jordanic Palestine (originally of the Amoritic territory, Num. xxi, 13, 26), and separating it from the land of Moab (Deut. iii, 8, 16; Josh. xii, 1; Judg. xi, 22; Isa. xvi, 2; Jer. xlvi, 20). Josephus speaks of it as issuing from the mountains of Arabia (Ant. iv, 5, 1). Among these hills are probably to be sought the "heights of Arnon" (Num. xxi, 28). See BARMOTH. It is also named in Deut. ii, 36; iii, 12; iv, 48; Josh. xii, 2; xiii, 9, 16; Judg. xi, 13, 26. From Judg. xi, 18, it (i. e. one of its branches N.E. of Arnon) would seem to have been also the east border of Moab (see also 2 Kings x, 33). In many of the above passages it occurs in the formula for the site of Aroer, "which is by the brink of the river Arnon." In Numbers it is simply "Arnon," but in Deut. and Joshua generally "the river Arnon" (A. V. sometimes "river of Arnon"). Isaiah (xvi, 2) mentions its fords; and in Judg. xi, 26, a word of rare occurrence (אֲרֹנּוֹן, hand, comp. Num. xiii, 29) is used for the sides of the stream. In the time of Jerome it was still known as Arnon; but in the Samaritan-Arabic version of the Pentateuch by Abū-Said (10th to 12th century) it is given as el-Mojeb. There can be no doubt that the Wady el-Mojeb of the present day is the Arnon (Seetzen, Reise, 1854, ii, 347; and in Ritter, Erk. xv, 1195). The ravine through which it flows is still the "locum vallis in præruptis demersæ satis horribilem et periculosum" which it was in the days of Jerome (Onom.). The Roman road from Rabba to Dhib'an crosses it at about two hours' distance from the former. On the south edge of the ravine are some ruins called Mehatet el-Hajj, and on the north edge, directly opposite, those still bearing the name of Arair. See AROER. Burckhardt was the first to give a satisfactory account of this river under the name which it now bears. It rises in the mountains of Gilead, near Katrane, whence it pursues a circuitous course of about eighty miles to the Dead Sea. It flows in a rocky bed, and, at the part visited by Burckhardt, in a channel so deep and precipitous as to appear inaccessible (comp. Seetzen, Mouall. Correspond. xviii, 432); yet along this, winding among huge fragments of rock, lies the most frequented road, and, being not far from Diban, probably that taken by the Israelites. The descent into the valley from the south took Irby and Mangles (Letters, p. 461) one hour and a half; the descent from the north took Burckhardt (Syria, p. 372) thirty-five minutes. The last-named traveller declares that he had never felt such suffocating heat as he experienced in this valley from the concentrated rays of the sun and their reflection from the rocks. The stream is almost dried up in summer; but huge masses of rock, torn from the banks, and deposited high above the channel, evince its fullness and impetuosity in the rainy season. Irby and Mangles suppose that it is this which renders the valley of the Arnon less shrubby than that of most other streams in the country. "There are, however, a few tamarisks, and here and there are oleanders growing about it." On each face of the ravine traces of the paved Roman road are still found, with milestones, and one arch of a bridge, 31 feet 6 inches in span, is standing. The stream runs through a level strip of grass some 40 yards in width, with a few oleanders and willows on the margin. Lieut. Lynch describes it at its mouth in April as "a considerable stream of water, clear, fresh, and moderately cool, and having some small fish in it" (Expedition, p. 299). Where it bursts into the Dead Sea this stream is 82 feet wide and 4 feet deep, flowing through a chasm with perpendicular sides of red, brown, and yellow sandstone, 97 feet wide. It then runs through the delta in a S.W. course, narrowing as it goes, and is 10 feet where its waters meet those of the Dead Sea (Lynch, Report, May 3, 1847, p. 20).

According to the information given to Burckhardt, its principal source is near Katrane, on the Hajar route. Hence, under the name of Seil es-Saidch, it flows N.W. to its junction with the W. Lejum, one hour E. of Arair, and then as W. Mojeb, more directly W. to the Dead Sea. The W. Mojeb receives on the north the streams of the W. Waleh, and on the south those of W. Shekik and W. Salihch. At its junction with the Lejum (W. Enkeileh) is a piece of pasture-ground, in the midst of which stands a hill with ruins on it (Burck. p. 374). May not these ruins be the site of the mysterious "city that is in the midst of the river" (Josh. xiii, 9, 16; Deut. ii, 36) so often coupled with Aroer? From the above description of the ravine, it is plain that that city cannot have been situated immediately below Aroer, as has been conjectured.

Arnoul, bishop of Lisieux, born at the beginning of the twelfth century, died August 24, 1183. He made fruitless efforts to reconcile King Henry II of England with Archbishop Thomas of Canterbury. In his old age he resigned his bishopric, and retired to the abbey of St. Victor of Paris, where he died. We have from him a volume of epistles, of discourses, and epigrams (Epistolæ, Conciones, et Epigrammata, published by Turnèbe, Paris, 1585, 8vo), which contains interesting details on the history of ecclesiastical discipline during his time. He is also the author of some poems, and of an essay on the schism which followed the death of Honorius II (published in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and the Spécimens d'Achéry).—Hœcker, Étographie Générale, iii, 363.

Arnulphus, St., bishop of Metz. In 609, at the entreaty of his parents, he married, but in 612 his wife took the veil in the monastery of Treves: and in 614, the bishopric of Metz becoming vacant, the people insisted on having Arnulphus for their bishop. As bishop he managed his diocese with rare excellence, and was made by King Clotaire prime minister of his son Dagobert, whom he had associated with him in the empire. Upon the death of Clotaire, Arnulphus retired into a solitude, where he passed the rest of his life in prayer and mortification, and in every work of charity. He died in 629, and his relics are preserved in the abbey of St. Arnoul de Metz. He is commemorated on the 16th of August.—Baillet, Vies de Saints, Aug. 16; Landon, Eccle. Dictionary, i, 547.

A'rod (Heb. Arod', אֲרֹד, perhaps affliction, otherwise a wild ass, Sept. Ἀροάρι), the sixth son (or branch of the family) of Gad (Num. xxvi, 17). B. C. 1856. His descendants (Heb. Arod', אֲרֹדִים) are called Arodites (Gen. xli, 16, Sept. Ἀροδίται) or Arodites (Num. xxvi, 17; Sept. Ἀροάρι).

Arod. See ASS.

A'rodi, A'rodite. See ARÔD.

A'roër (Heb. Aroër', אֲרֹעֵר [once אֲרֹעֵרָה, Judg. xi, 26], ruins, as in Jer. xlvi, 6, "heath?" Sept. Ἀρωίρη and Ἀρωίρη), the name of three places. In Isa. xvii, 2, "cities of Aroer" are mentioned; but it should rather be translated "ruined cities," as Aroer was not a metropolis, and the name does not suit the connection (see Gesenius, Comment. in loc.).

L. A town "by the brink," or "on the bank of"

(both the same expression—Heb. “on the lip”), or “by,” i. e. on the north side of the torrent Arnon (Deut. iv. 48; Judg. xi. 26; 2 Kings x. 33; 1 Chron. v. 8), and therefore on the southern border of the territory conquered from Sihon, which was assigned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Deut. ii. 36; iii. 12; Josh. xii. 2; xiii. 9). The Amorites had previously dispossessed the Ammonites of this territory; and although the town seems to be given to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 16), it is mentioned as a Moabitish city by Jeremiah (xlviii. 19). According to Eusebius (Oriens. s. v. Αροίρα) it stood “on the brow of the hill.” Burckhardt (comp. Macnicheel, Journey, p. 212) found the ruins of this town, under the name of Araray, on the edge of a precipice overlooking Wady Mojeb (Travels in Syria, p. 372). They are also mentioned under the name Arar in Robinson’s Researches (App. to vol. iii. p. 170, and Map). Schwarz places it 15 miles from the Dead Sea (Palest. p. 226). Aroer is always named in conjunction with “the city that is in the midst of the river;” whence Dr. Mansford (Script. Gaz.) conjectures that, like Rabbath Ammon (q. v.), it consisted of two parts, or distinct cities; the one on the bank of the river, and the other in the valley beneath, surrounded, either naturally or artificially, by the waters of the river. For another explanation, see ARNON.

2. One of the towns “built,” or probably rebuilt, by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxxii. 34). It is said in Josh. xiii. 25, to be “before (בְּפְנֵי) Rabbah” [of Ammon]; but, as Raumer well remarks (Palästina, p. 249), this could not possibly have been in the topographical sense of the words (in which before means east of), seeing that Aroer, as a town on the eastern border of Gad, must have been west of Rabbah; while to a person in Palestine proper, or coming from the Jordan, Aroer would be before Rabbah in the ordinary sense. It is (see Ritter, Erdk. xv. 1130) apparently the place discovered by Burckhardt (Syria, p. 335), who, in journeying toward Rabbath Ammon, notices a ruined site, called Agra, about seven miles south-west from es-Salt; probably the same with the Aray el-Emir visited by Legh (p. 246) on his way from Heshbon to es-Salt (comp. Schwarz, Palest. p. 231). It is also called Airah in Robinson’s Researches (iii. App. p. 169). Aroer of Gad is also mentioned in Judg. xi. 33, and 2 Sam. xxiv. 5, in which latter passage it is stated to have been situated on the “river” (brook) of Gad, i. e. apparently on the Wady Nimrin (and not the Arnon, see Reland, Palest. p. 583). Keil (Comment. on Josh. p. 339), approved by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 288), fixes upon Kulat Zeska Gadda, as lying in a wady and east of Rabbah; but the passage in 2 Sam. “and they passed over Jordan, and pitched in Aroer, on the right side of the city, that lieth in the midst of the river of Gad, and toward Jazer” can only signify [if, indeed, the word אֲרוֹר, which, do not signify here merely “to wit,” or rather be not altogether spurious] that the party of Joab encamped just across the Jordan, in the bed of one of the brooks of Gad (the Wady Nimrin), south of Aroer and not far from Jaazer. Jerome speaks of it as Arur (Euseb. Onomast.), a village still found on a hill 20 Roman miles south of Jerusalem (Oriens. s. v.); but this, if correct, can only mean south-east.

3. A city in the south of Judah (i. e. in Simeon), to which David sent presents after recovering the spoil of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 26, 28). It appears to have been the native city of two of David’s warriors (1 Chron. xi. 41). At the distance of twenty geographical miles south by west from Hebron, Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii. 618) came to a broad wady where there are many pits for water, which are called Ararah, and which gave name to the valley. In the valley and on the western hill are evident traces of an ancient village or town, consisting only of foundations of unhewn stones, now much scattered, but yet sufficiently distinged to mark them as foundations. Small fragments of pottery are also everywhere visible. The same identification is proposed by Schwarz, who calls the place “the modern village Arar, two and a half English miles south of Moladah” (Palest. p. 113).

Aroer. See HEATH.

Ar’oërite (Heb. Ar’oëri’, אֲרוֹרִי, Sept. ’Αραρι), an inhabitant of one of the cities of AROER, probably that in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. xi. 44).

Ar’om (Αρόμ, prob. interpolated), the name of a man whose descendants (or of a place whose inhabitants), to the number of thirty-two, are said to have returned from the Babylonian captivity (1 Esdr. v. 16); but the genuine text (Ezra ii. 17, 18) has no corresponding name, unless it be a mistake for Asom, and represents the חַשְׁמֻת of Ezra xi. 19.

Aromatics (from the Gr. ἀρώμα, a pleasant smell) is a general term including all those odoriferous substances denoted by several Hebrew words, frequently designated as “spices” in the Auth. Vers., e. g. abalim (“aloes”), almug or almugim (“bedolach” (“bellium”), chibbenah (“galbanum”), basam, or balsam, kaneh (“calamus”), ketsioth and kiddah (“cassia”), cinnamon, lebanah (“frankincense”), lot and mor (“myrrh”), nard (“spikenard”), nutuf (“stacte”), tseri (“balm”), shechéleth (“onycha”), also rekach, bosen or bsen, sammim, and nekoth (“spice”), all which see in their alphabetical place, and compare “mint,” “rue,” “anise,” “thyme wood,” etc., mentioned in the N. T. It is difficult to determine the exact products which the most of the words refer to, but when they are separately noticed, especially when several are enumerated, their names may lead us to their identification. Dr. Vincent has observed that “in Exod. xxx we find an enumeration of cinnamon, cassia, myrrh, frankincense, stacte, onycha, and galbanum, all of which are the produce either of India or Arabia.” More correctly, cinnamon, cassia, frankincense, and onycha were probably obtained from India; myrrh, stacte, and some frankincense, from the east coast of Africa, and galbanum from Persia. More than 1000 years later, or about B.C. 588, in Ezek. xxvii, the chief spices are referred to, with the addition, however, of calamus. They are probably the same as those just enumerated. Dr. Vincent refers chiefly to the Perip’us, ascribed to Arrian, written in the second century, as furnishing a proof that many Indian substances were at that time well known to commerce, as aloë or agila wood, gum bellium, the googal of India, cassia and cinnamon, nard, costus, incense—that is, olibanum—ginger, pepper, and spices. If we examine the work of Dioscorides, we shall find all these, and several other Indian products, not only mentioned, but described, as schenanthus, calamus aromaticus cyperus, malobathrum, turmeric. Among others, Lycium indicum is mentioned. This is the extract of barberry root, and is prepared in the Himalayan Mountains (Royle, on the Lycium of Dioscorides, Linnæan Trans.). It is not unworthy of notice that we find no mention of several very remarkable products of the East, such as camphor, cloves, nutmeg, betel-leaf, cubebs, gamboge, all of which are so peculiar in their nature that we could not have failed to recognise them if they had been described at all, like those we have enumerated as the produce of India. These omissions are significant of the countries to which commerce and navigation had not extended at the time when the other articles were well known (Hindoo Medicine, p. 93). If we trace these up to still earlier authors, we shall find many of them mentioned by Theophrastus, and even by Hippocrates; and if we trace them downward to the time of the Arabs, and from that to modern times, we find many of them described under their present names in works current throughout the East, and in which their ancient names are given as synonyms. We have, therefore, as such assurance as is possible in such cases, that the majority of the substances mentioned by the ancients have been identified; and that among the spices of early times were included many of those which now form articles of commerce from India to Europe.—Kittó, art. 787. See SPICERY; PERFUME.

Ar'pad (Isa. xxxvi, 19; xxxvii, 13) or Ar'phad (Heb. Arpad', אַרְפַּד, perhaps a support; but see below; Sept. in 2 Kings Ἀρπαδ, elsewhere Ἀρπαδ, in Isa. x, 9 undistinguishable), a Syrian city, having its own king (2 Kings xix, 13; Isa. xxxvii, 13), in the neighborhood of Hamath (2 Kings xviii, 34; Isa. x, 9; xxxvi, 19) and Damascus (Jer. xlix, 23), with both of which it appears to have been conquered by the Assyrians under Sennacherib. Michaelis and others seek Arphad in Raphane or Raphanea of the Greek geographers (Ptol. v, 15; Steph. Byzant. in Ἐκφόρεια; Joseph. War, vii, 1, 3; vii, 5, 1), which was a day's journey west of Hamath (Mannert, VI, i, 431). Paulus (Comment. in Isa. x, 9) thinks it was a city in the neighborhood of the Tigris and Euphrates. Some, however, are content to find this Arphad in the Arpha (Ἀρφα) which Josephus (War, iii, 3, 5) mentions as situated on the north-eastern frontier of the northernmost province of Herod Agrippa's tetrarchy; also called Artha (Ἀρθᾶ) or Arfu by other ancient writers (Reiland, Palest. p. 584). But it seems best (with Döderlein and others) to refer it to the Phœnician island city Arvad or Aradus (q. v.), which was opposite Hamath (the interchange of D and R being very natural).

Arpha. See ARPAD.

Arphax'ad (Heb. Arpakshad', אַרְפַּכְשָׁד [on the signification see below]; Sept. and N. T. Ἀρφαξάδ; Josephus Ἀρφαξάδης), the name of two men.

1. The first antediluvian patriarch, son of Shem, and father of Salah; born one year after the end of the Deluge, and died B. C. 2075, at the age of 438 years (Gen. xi, 10-13; 1 Chron. i, 17, 18; Luke iii, 36). From Gen. x, 22, 24, it appears that the region settled by this patriarch's descendants likewise took his name. The conjecture of Bochart (Phleg. ii, 4) has been adopted by several others (Michaelis, Suppl. p. 129; Orient. Bibl. xvii, 77 sq.; Mannert, v, 439), that it is the province Arphaxathis (Ἀρφαξαθίτις), in northern Assyria, near Armenia (Ptol. vi, 1), the primitive country of the Chaldeans (Josephus, Ant. i, 6, 4; comp. Syncell. Chron. p. 46), whose national title (כְּשִׁיטִי, Kasitim) appears to form the latter part of the name Arphaxad (אַרְפַּכְשָׁד); the first part being referred by Michaelis (Spicileg. i, 73 sq.) to an Arabic root signifying boundary (q. d. "border of the Chaldeans"), but with as little felicity (see Tuch, Gen. p. 256) as the derivation (from Isr. Gesch. i, 333) from another Arabic root signifying to bind (q. d. "fortress of the Chaldeans"). (See Gesenius, Comment. üb. Jesu. xxiii, 13; and comp. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assur's, p. 414, note.) Bohlen (Gen. in loc.), with even less probability, compares the Sanscrit Arpakshata ("a land) by the side of Asia;" comp. Porussa, i. q. Porus, i. e. near the Russians. (See Schlözer in the Report. f. bibl. Lit. viii, 137; Lengerke, Kenan, i, 211; Knobell, Völker-tafel d. Genesis, Giess, 1856.)

2. A king of Media at Ecbatana, which city he fortified during an open campaign and siege by his contemporary Nebuchadnezzar (Judith i, 1 sq.). From the connection of his name with Ecbatana he has been frequently identified with Deioeces (Ctes. "Artaeus"), the founder of Ecbatana (Herod. i, 98); but as Deioeces died peaceably (Herod. i, 102), it seems better to look for the original of Arphaxad in his son Phraortes (Ctes. "Artynes"), who greatly extended the Median empire, and at last fell in a battle with the Assyrians, B. C. 633 (Herod. i, 102). But this would disagree with the date and circumstances of Nebuchadnezzar; moreover, the half-fabulous book of Judith abounds with statements respecting the Median kings scarcely reconcilable with genuine history. See MEDIA; JUDITH. Niebuhr (Gesch. Assur's, p. 32) endeavors to identify the name with "Astygar" = Ashdahak, the common title of the Median dynasty, and refers the events to a war in the twelfth year of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B. C. 592 (Ibid. p. 212, 285). See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

Arrhābon (ἀρραβών, earnest or pledge). The early church used a great variety of expressions to describe the elements of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and among the rest, the expressions ἀρραβών and ἀρραβών τῆς μελλούσης ζωῆς, earnest of the life to come, probably with reference to 2 Cor. i, 22; v, 5; and Eph. i, 14. See EARNEST. The Arrhobonarii were sacramentarians in the 16th century who held that the bread and wine in the Eucharist are neither the real body and blood of Christ, nor the signs of them, but only the pledge and earnest thereof.—Farrar, s. v.

Arriaga, Paul Joseph de, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Vergara in 1562. Having been sent by his superiors to Peru, he founded several educational institutions, and was, in succession, rector of the college of Arequipa and of that of Lima. He perished in a shipwreck, but it is not known in what year. He is the author of a work on the Indians in Peru (Extirpacion de la idolatría de los Indios del Peru, Lima, 1621), and of several other works.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, iii, 354.

Arriaga, Roderigo de, an eminent Spanish Jesuit, was born at Logroño, Spain, Jan. 17, 1592. At fourteen he entered the order of Jesuits, and afterward taught philosophy and theology at Valladolid and Salamanca. He was sent to Prague in 1624, and taught theology there till 1627. He was a man of great acuteness of mind, and had deservedly a great reputation in his day for learning and skill in dogmatic theology. He died at Prague June, 17, 1667. Bayle hints that he was inclined to Pyrrhonism. Among his writings are Cursus Philosophicæ (Antwerp, 1632, fol.); Disput. Theol. in summam Aquinatis (8 vols. fol., 1643-1655; and again at Lyons, 1669).—Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Walsh, Bibliotheca, i, 152; Sotuel, Script. Soc. Jesu, 729.

ARROW. There are several words thus rendered in the English Bible, namely, properly אֶרֶב (chets, from its sharpness), of frequent occurrence (rendered "dart" in Prov. vii, 23; "wound," i. e. of an arrow, Job xxxiv, 6; "staff" by an error of transcription for אֶרֶב, the haft of a spear, 1 Sam. xvii, 7), with its derivatives אֶרֶבֶת (chetsi, 1 Sam. xx, 36, 37, 38; 2 Kings ix, 24) and אֶרֶבֶתֶת (chatsats, 1 Sa. lxxvii, 17; elsewhere "gravel"); poetically אֶרֶבֶת (re'sheph, Psa. lxxvi, 31, lightning, as it is elsewhere rendered), and אֶרֶבֶתֶתֶת (ben-ke'sheh, i. e. son of a bow, Job xli, 28). Among the Hebrews arrows were probably at first made of reed, as common among the Egyptians; subsequently they were made from some light sort of wood, and tipped with an iron point. Whether they were ever dipped in poison is not clear from Job vi, 4; Deut. xxxii, 24. They were often composed, in part at least, of the shrub אֶרֶבֶת, "juniper," which, being discharged from the bow while on fire, kindled upon the baggage or armament of the enemy (Psa. cxx, 4; Job xxx, 4). Hence arrows are sometimes put tropically for lightnings (Deut. xxxii, 23, 42; Psa. vii, 13; Zech. ix, 14). Arrows were used in war as well as in hunting (Gen. xxvii, 3; xlvii, 22). See ARCHER. They were kept in a case called a quiver (q. v.), which was slung over the shoulder in such a position that the soldier could draw them out when needed (Psa. xci, 5; xxx, 4). See BOW. They were also used in divination (Ezek. xxi, 21). See DIVINATION. The arrows of the ancient Egyptians varied from 22 to 34 inches in length; some were of wood, others of reed; frequently tipped with a metal head, and winged with three feathers, glued longitudinally, and at equal distances, upon the other end of the shaft, as on modern arrows. Sometimes, instead of the metal head, a piece of hard wood was inserted into the reed, which terminated in a long tapering point; but these were of too light and powerless a nature to be employed in war, and could only have been intended for the chase; in others, the place of the metal was supplied by a small piece of flint or other sharp stone, secured by a firm black paste; and, although used occasionally in battle, they appear from the sculptures to have belonged particularly to the huntsman; while the arrows of archers are generally represented with bronze heads, some barbed, others triangular, and many with three or four projecting blades, placed at right angles and meeting in a common point (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 356). The ancient Assyrians appear also to have used arrows made of reeds, which were kept in a quiver slung over the back. The barbs were of iron and copper, several of which have been discovered among the ruins (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 263). See ARROW.

Metal Heads of Ancient Egyptian Arrows.

The word "arrow" is frequently used as the symbol of calamity or disease inflicted by God (Job vi, 4; xxxiv, 6; Psa. xxxviii, 2; Deut. xxxii, 23; comp. Ezek. v, 16; Zech. ix, 11). The metaphor thus applied was also in use among the heathen (Ovid, Ep. xvi, 275). It derived its propriety and force from the popular belief that all diseases were immediate and special inflictions from heaven. Lightnings are, by a very fine figure, described as the arrows of God (Psa. xviii, 14; cxlv, 6; Habak. iii, 11; compare Wisd. v, 21; 2 Sam. xxii, 15). "Arrow" is occasionally used to denote some sudden or inevitable danger, as in Psa. xci, 5: "The arrow that lieth by day." It is also figurative of any thing injurious, as a deceitful tongue (Psa. cxxx, 4; Jer ix, 7), a bitter word (Psa. lxi,

3), a false testimony (Prov. xxv, 18). As symbolical of oral wrong the figure may perhaps have been derived from the darting "arrowy tongue" of serpents. The arrow, however, is not always symbolical of evil. In Psa. cxxvii, 4, 5, well-conditioned children are compared to "arrows in the hands of a mighty man," i. e. instruments of power and action. The arrow is also used in a good sense to denote the efficient and irresistible energy of the word of God in the hands of the Messiah (Psa. xlv, 6; Isa. xlv, 2; comp. Lowth's note thereon). (See Wemyss, Clavis Symbolica, s. v.)

Arrowsmith, JOHN, D.D., a Puritan divine, was born at Newcastle, 1602, and died in 1659. He was educated at Cambridge, became minister at Lynn, and afterward in London. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly, and afterward master of St. John's College and of Trinity College, Cambridge. Of his numerous writings, the most important are Armilla Catechetica, a chain of theological aphorisms (Cambr. 1659, 4to); Tactica Sacra, de milite spirituali pugnant, vincente et triumphanti, dissertatio (Cantab. 1657, 4to). See Brook, Lives of the Puritans, iii, 315; Neal, History of the Puritans, iii, 115; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 71.

Ar'saces (Ἀρσάκης, prob. of Persian or Armenian origin, Pott, Etymol. Forschungen, ii, 172), the name of the founder of the Parthian empire (Justin. xli, 5, 5), and hence borne by his successors, the Arsacidae (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.). The name occurs in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xiv, 2, 3; xv, 22) as that of the king of Parthia and Media (Diod. Sic. Excerpt. p. 597, ed. Wessel, B.C. 138. The Syrian king Demetrius (II) Nicator, having invaded his country, at first obtained several advantages. Media declared for him, and the Elymaeans, Persians, and Bactrians joined him; but Arsaces having sent one of his officers to him, under pretence of treating for peace, he fell into an ambuscade, his army was cut off by the Persians, and he himself fell into the hands of Arsaces (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 5, 11). As Arsaces is the common name of all the Parthian kings (Strabo, xv, 702), and of many Armenian (see Kosegarten in the Hall. Encyclop. v, 408 sq.), the one here intended is probably Arsaces VI, properly named Mithridates (or Phraates) I, a prince of distinguished bravery, who conquered Bactria, penetrated India, reduced the Medes and Persians, and greatly improved the condition of the Parthian empire (Justin, xxxvi, 1; xxxviii, 9; xli, 6, Oros. v, 4; Strabo, xi, 516, 517, 524 sq.). Mithridates treated his prisoner Demetrius with respect, and gave him his daughter in marriage (App. Syr. 67), but kept him in confinement till his own death, cir. B.C. 130 (App. Syr. 68; Diod. ap. Müller, Fragm. Hist. ii, 19). The reference to him in the Maccabees is, however, somewhat confused (see Wernsdorf, De fide Maccab. p. 175).

Ar'sareth (Lat. Arsareth, for the Greek text is not extant), a region beyond the Euphrates, apparently of great extent if the fanciful passage (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. xiii, 45) where alone it occurs can be relied upon as historical.

Arsenal. The ancient Hebrews had each man his own arms, because all went to the wars; they had no arsenals or magazines of arms, because they had no regular troops or soldiers in constant pay. See ARMY. There were no arsenals in Israel till the reigns of David and Solomon. See ARMOR. David made a large collection of arms and consecrated them to the Lord in his tabernacle (1 Sam. xxi, 9; 2 Sam. viii, 7-12; 1 Chron. xxvi, 26, 27). The high-priest Jehoiada took them out of the treasury of the temple to arm the people and Levites on the day of the young king Joash's elevation to the throne (2 Chron. xxiii, 9). Solomon collected a great quantity of arms in his palace of the forest of Lebanon, and established well-provided arsenals in all the cities of Judah, which he fortified (2 Chron. xi, 12). He sometimes compelled the conquered and tributary people to forge arms for him (1 Kings x, 25). Uzziah not only furnished his arsenals with spears, helmets, shields, cuirasses, swords, bows, and slings, but also with such machines as were proper for sieges (2 Chron. xxvi, 14, 15). Hezekiah had the same precaution; he also made stores of arms of all sorts (see 2 Chron. xxxii, 5; comp. 2 Kings xx, 13). Jonathan and Simon Maccabæus had arsenals stored with good arms; not only such as had been taken from their enemies, but others which they had purchased or commissioned to be forged for them (1 Macc. x, 21; xiv, 23, 42; 2 Macc. viii, 27; xv, 21). See ARMORY.

Arsenius, an anchorite, born at Rome in 350; died in 445. While a deacon of the Church of Rome, he was chosen, in 383, by Pope Damasus as tutor of Arcadius, the elder son of Theodosius. As Arsenius did not succeed in the education of this prince, he quitted the court, and penetrated into the desert of Saïd (Thebais), where he remained until his death. Arsenius is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on July 19 (Hoefler, Biographie Générale, ii, 369).

Arsenius, ANTORIANUS, head of a monastery in Nicea, afterward a hermit on Mt. Athos. He was appointed Greek patriarch about 1255, and ordained deacon, priest, and patriarch in the same week. On the death of Th. Lascaris II he was charged with the tutelage of his son John. Michael Palæologus, aiming at the sole authority, put out the eyes of the young prince, and Arsenius excommunicated him, and refused to remit the sentence unless he would abdicate in favor of the legitimate heir. Palæologus refused. Arsenius remaining firm, a synod held in Constantinople, 1264, deposed him. He died on an island in the Propontis in 1267. Here he wrote his Ecclesia Græca Monumenta (Paris, 1681, 4to); and also Synopsis Dictionum Canonum, published in Justellus's Bibliotheca Jur. Canon. vol. ii (Paris, 1661).—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1255.

Arsenius OF ELASSO, a dignitary of the Greek Church, lived toward the close of the 17th century. He is the author of a "History of the Variations of the Greek Church." From the introduction of Christianity into Russia (992) until 1587, this church was governed by metropolitans dependent upon foreign patriarchs. In 1587, Job, the first Russian patriarch, was consecrated by Jeremiah II, patriarch of Constantinople; and this form of ecclesiastical government continued until 1700, when the Czar put himself at the head of the Russian Church. The details which Arsenius gives us on these "variations in the Greek Church" have been printed in 1749, in the first part of the Catalogue of Manuscripts of Turin. A Latin translation was given in 1820 by Wichmann, in his Sammlung kleiner Schriften.—Hoefler, Biographie Universelle, iii, 370.

Art, SACRED.—Art is the embodiment of æsthetic feeling in human productions. The Fine Arts—or the different methods of this embodiment—are classified into two grand divisions: (1) those that reach the soul through the channel of the eye, termed the formative arts (in German, the bildende Künste); and (2) those that reach the soul through the channel of the ear (termed in German the redende Künste, but for which we have no appropriate word in English). To the former belong architecture, sculpture, painting, engraving, etc.; to the latter, music, poetry, and oratory. The applied arts are those in which the ornamentation is applied to productions that are not, in their primary purpose, works of art. In all nations, and in all ages of the world, the emotions of the human soul have sought expression in æsthetic or artistic forms. Especially has this been the case with the highest emotions of the heart—the religious. In return, the propagators of all religions have availed themselves of æsthetic forms and modes of presenting their doctrines and creeds to the consciences and hearts of men; some employing all the fine arts, others only a part of them. Thus has been developed religious art, both pagan and sacred. Sacred art, or that of revealed religion, divides itself into (1) Jewish and (2) Christian.

I. Jewish.—Under the Old-Testament covenant, the arts of architecture, music, poetry, dancing (and, to a limited degree, sculpture and the applied arts), were used in the worship of God. For ARCHITECTURE, MUSIC, and POETRY, see the separate articles, as in this article we treat of art mostly in its restricted, popular signification, embracing only the formative arts of painting and sculpture. That the second commandment was not intended to prohibit the making of all artistic representations, as is often supposed, but that it referred to the making and worshipping of idols, is shown by the fact that Moses himself had images of cherubim made for the service of the tabernacle, and that in the Temple of Solomon the cherubim retained their place over the mercy-seat, and the molten sea rested upon twelve oxen, and the base of the sea was adorned with figures of cherubim, oxen, and lions, while carvings of cherubim, palms, and flowers covered many of the doors, pillars, and walls of the interior of the temple. The golden candlestick was also adorned with knops of flowers, and the garments of the priests were richly embroidered. In short, no pains were spared to make the temple glorious, not only by its rich and gorgeous construction, but also by its truly æsthetic character. See ARTS, JEWISH (below).

II. Christian.—1. First Period (1st to 4th centuries).—The earliest Christians made use, in their service, of only the arts of music, poetry, and oratory. In the second and third centuries they availed themselves of painting and sculpture in their retired places of worship and burial in the catacombs. As the societies increased in numbers and wealth, and, by the cessation of persecution, were permitted to build churches above-ground, and more especially on Christianity being declared the religion of the state, architecture was used, and soon, in its most impressive forms, gave dignity and attractiveness to the house of God. The first period of Christian art, as of all other arts, was one of symbolism. The letters X ρ and A ω were placed on the tombs and the vessels of the sanctuary. Then appeared the mystical word ΙΧΘΥΣ, afterward represented by a fish carved and painted. See ICHTHUS. Christ was introduced as the Good Shepherd, etc. See CHRIST, IMAGES OF. The parables of the New Testament were introduced with parallel scenes or subjects from the Old Testament, evincing a deep feeling for scriptural types and allegory. Plants and animals were used symbolically, and symbols of Christian doctrine and life were drawn from the pagan mythology of the Greeks and Romans. A study of the doctrine, customs, and spirit of the early church, as shown in its monuments of art, is a most useful complement to the study of the writings of its great minds. See ARCHÆOLOGY. The composition and execution of the paintings and sculptures in the catacombs are far superior to those of the immediately succeeding ages; but the artists lived among the finest works of Greek and Roman art, and drew from them their technical knowledge. At the same time, they were inspired by the deep emotions of the new Christian faith.

2. Second Period (4th to 12th centuries).—As church edifices were erected, the arts that had sprung up in the catacombs were transplanted to the stately house of God, and, though subordinate to the architecture, were developed into styles consistent with their monumental character and use, but not without remonstrance from some of the synods. See ICONOCLAST. Mosaic painting gradually supplanted the fresco style, and in the Byzantine churches was applied with all the splendor of the Oriental fancy. The Greek Church permitted no sculpture in its edifices of worship, but it developed a style of painting marked, in its best periods, by the dignity of its composition, the grandeur of the outlines, and the expressiveness of its figures and the brilliancy of its colors. Later, the composition of the mystic ecstasies of painting that adorned the walls of the churches, and even of the altar-pieces, was prescribed by the theologians; the colors to be used had their symbolical doctrinal significance, and were also prescribed. This led to the stiffness of drawing, and the deadness of all art-feeling, that marks the Byzantine school after the eighth century.

In the Western Church painting and sculpture rapidly sank to a most degraded technical condition. Among the most important works of the period are the mosaic paintings of Ravenna and Rome, and the bronze doors of Amalfi and Verona. Both in its technical knowledge, and in the rules of its composition, the Byzantine school influenced the arts, not only of Italy, but of all Europe, especially that of South France.

3. Third Period (12th to 16th centuries).—The extraordinary activity of the twelfth century in Europe extended to every department of life, and gave a great impulse to the fine arts, as a means in the hands of the church to teach its doctrines. The purest religious feeling still animated the artists, who, for piety of life, were often reckoned superior to many of the priests or other persons in holy orders. Indeed the artists often were themselves of the holy orders. Gradually (first in Tuscany) the sombre color, the formal composition and stiffness of figure of the decadent Byzantine style, gave way to better drawing, freer treatment, and brilliant coloring. In short, Christian art, for religious character and technical merits, reached its highest climax under such artists as Cimabue, Giotto, Orcagna, and Fra Angelico. In Italy fresco painting kept its predominance in the church edifice, and largely modified the architecture. In other parts of Europe, especially during the Gothic period, sculpture gained a large predominance over painting, and was confined mostly to adorning the windows with biblical scenes and subjects. The progress in sculpture was perhaps more tardy than that of painting. Its first works of excellence were carvings in ivory on vessels of the sanctuary (often of complicate composition). The doors, doorways, columns, pulpits, altars, and baptismal fountains were covered with bronze or marble works, often of great merit. Giotto and the Pisanos (13th century) marked the first great epoch of progress in sculpture, and introduced a perfection of composition and execution hardly excelled in later times, and never surpassed for religious spirit.

During the Gothic period of architecture schools of sculpture grew up in most countries of Europe, and sculpture was profusely distributed in every part of the church edifice, especially in the exterior.

4. Fourth Period (16th to 19th centuries).—The introduction of the use of oil in painting, the invention of chiaroscuro, the growing devotion of the age to classicism, the decadence of Christian life in the church, all contributed to change the character of Christian art. What was gained in technical knowledge was lost in inspiration. After the sublime compositions of the massive genius of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel and the Transfiguration by Raphael, religious art fell from its pure character of the preceding century into a depth of sensuousness and extravagance. For the next century, what then existed that was noble in art was to be sought mostly north of the Alps. During the eighteenth century an almost entire blank marks the history of religious art.

5. Fifth Period (19th century).—At the beginning of this century art had sunk (like the society of the age) to the lowest sensuousness, and was separated almost entirely from its divine mission. Overbeck, Cornelius, and Schnorr, in Germany, tried to stem the tide, and return art to the mission it filled from the second to the fifteenth centuries. Their labors were seconded later by such artists as Ary Scheffer and Flandrin in France, and Holman Hunt, and Millais in England. The Cyclus of Revelation, now being prepared by Cornelius at Berlin, is perhaps the most complete work of Christian art ever undertaken. Sculpture has not been imbued as much as painting with the religious feeling of its earlier history.

6. Protestant Art.—The Roman Church has always availed itself of all the fine arts in its worship. The Protestant Church in Germany, while cutting away every work of Roman tendency, has always retained a free use of the arts of painting and sculpture, which were rejected by the Reformers in England and Holland as inherently Popish in nature and tendency, and as opposed to the second commandment. America has inherited this feeling from the two countries (Holland and England) from which she was colonized. The art of engraving, however, is freely used in both countries to illustrate religious books and periodicals, and even the Bible itself, though the same work would give offence if painted upon the walls of a church. In the Church of England there is a strong tendency to return to the use of sculpture and painting in filling up the walls of the cathedral and other churches.

7. The history of religious art has recently been studied with great zeal. In the Roman Church generally the opinion prevails that a return to the art of the Middle Ages, and that alone, can bring back the golden age of art. Art associations are especially numerous in France and Germany, the literature on religious art is becoming very extensive, and periodicals exclusively devoted to it have been established in both countries. The Protestant churches of Germany are generally in favor of making a more extended use of art for religious purposes than has been the case heretofore. The church diet of Elberfeld, in 1851, discussed the question of Protestant Art Unions, and in 1853 several evangelical societies were established. In 1858, a paper (Christliches Kunstblatt) devoted to the cultivation of religious art from a Protestant point of view was established by Schnaase, the author of the best "History of Plastic Art," in connection with Schnorr von Karlsfeld, the director of the art-gallery in Dresden, and Grüneisen, court preacher at Stuttgart.

8. Literature.—The best work on the history of Christian art, though not extending over the entire field, is Schnaase, Geschichte der bildenden Künste (Dusseldorf, 1844-66). Other works: Kugler, Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart, 3d ed. 1855; English translation [partial] in Bohm's Library, Historical Manual of Sculpt., Paint., Arch., anc. and mod., Lond. 1852); Kinkel, Geschichte der bildenden Plastik bei den Christlichen Völkern (Pomm. 1845); Lord Lindsay, Sketches of the History of Christian Art (Lond. 1847, 3 vols. 8vo); Geschichte der Malerei (Berlin, 1847, translated into English); Lübke, Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart, 1864); Geschichte der Plastik (Leipzig, 1863); Piper, Mythologie und Symbolik der Christlichen Kunst (Weimar, 1851 66); Mrs. Jameson, Legends of Christian Art, etc. (Bost. 1866); Wornum, Epochs of Painting (London, 1865); Jarves, Art Studies (N. Y. 1861).

ARTS, JEWISH (אָרְט, maiseh', work, as elsewhere rendered), Exod. xxx. 25; 2 Chron. xvi. 14 (רָצוּן, elsewhere "craft," "occupation"), Acts xvii. 29; Wisd. xiv. 4; xvii. 7 (εργον, "work"), Eccles. xlix. 1 (προσσω, to do, "practise"), Acts xix. 19. (See Cleghorn, Hist. of Anc. and Mod. Art, Edinb. 1848; Rochette, Lectures on Anc. Art, Lond. 1854; Gungler, Kunst der Hebräer, Landshut, 1614; De Sauley, Hist. de l'Art Juhaïque, Par. 1858.) See ARTIFICER.

The rudiments of the arts, which are now among civilized nations brought to such an admirable state of perfection, exist also among the rudest nations, whence we infer that they must have originated partly in necessity and partly in accident. At first their processes were doubtless very imperfect and very limited; but the inquisitive and active mind of man, impelled by his wants, soon enlarged and improved them. Accordingly, in the fourth generation from Adam, we find mention made of "Tubal-Cain, an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron;" and also of Jubal, as "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ;" but in the fragments of antediluvian history preserved by Moses, there is nothing more explicit on this subject, as the book of Genesis appears to be designed chiefly as an introduction to the history of the Mosaic legislation. See ANTEDILUVIANS. The first man undoubtedly kept his children and other descendants about him as long as possible, and exercised paternal authority over them. Cain was the first who separated from his father's society, and he was impelled to this step through fear of punishment for the murder of his brother. In the course of time various motives, such as a desire to obtain land for cultivation or pasturage for cattle, might induce others to follow his example. Thus there arose separate families, which were governed by their own patriarchs. When families had increased to tribes and nations, we find that men were engaged in agriculture and in the improvement of the arts. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, 1st series, 4th week, Sat.) The family of Noah preserved the knowledge of the first principles of civil society and of the infant arts which had existed before the Deluge, and as early as the time of Jacob it appears that the laboring class comprehended husbandmen, mechanics, artists, and merchants. Egypt, in the early ages of the world, excelled all other nations in a knowledge of the arts, as may be sufficiently proved by the extraordinary magnitude and permanency of the Egyptian monuments, the magnificent temples dedicated to their gods, and the splendid obelisks erected in honor of their kings. The learning of the Egyptians has been made known to us by the sacred historian. By this record we have been taught to believe in the wisdom of this ancient people, and to feel astonishment at the nature of their institutions, the extent of their learning, and the perfection they had attained in the arts at so early a period. Moses, it is true, did not enact any special laws in favor of the arts among the Hebrews, nor did he interdict or endeavor to lessen them in the estimation of the people, but, on the contrary, speaks in praise of artificers (Exod. xxxv. 30, 35). The descendants of Jacob having lived on terms of amity with their neighbors of Mizraim, "until another king arose who knew not Joseph," they undoubtedly borrowed from them many of their instruments of agriculture, of commerce, and of luxury, and as the artists of Egypt descended to depict the minutest particulars of their household arrangements, and every circumstance connected with their national habits and observances was faithfully represented, we have the means of forming a judgment respecting the arts and usages which prevailed among the Hebrews. See EGYPT. No one can pretend to doubt that the scriptural narrative is singularly illustrated and confirmed by the monuments. A rich vein of illustration is thus opened by comparing the various processes depicted on those monuments with the statements scattered throughout the inspired records, more especially the numerous metaphors employed by the prophets in relation to many of these arts and manufactures; and we shall, therefore, in the order of the alphabetical series, give descriptive particulars of the various arts as practised among the Egyptians, presuming that those subsequently practised by the Hebrews differed but little from them. See CARPENTER.

Soon after the death of Joshua a place was expressly allotted by Joab to artificers; it was called the valley of craftsmen, אֲרָמִים (1 Chron. iv. 14; comp. Neh. xi. 35). See CRAFTSMAN. About this time mention is also made of artificers in gold and silver (Judg. xvii. 3, 5). See METAL. Some of the less complicated instruments used in agriculture every one made for himself. The women spun, wove, and embroidered; they made clothing, not only for their families, but for sale (Exod. xxxv. 25). See WOMAN. Artificers among the Hebrews were not, as among the Greeks and Romans, servants and slaves, but men of some rank, and as luxury increased, they became very numerous (Jer. xxiv. 1; xxix. 2). See HANDICRAFT. In the time of David and Solomon there were Israelites who understood the construction of temples and palaces, but they were still inferior to the Tyrians, from whom they were willing to receive instruction (1 Chron. xiv. 1; xxii. 15). See ARCHITECTURE. During the captivity many of the Hebrews applied themselves to the arts and merchandise; and subsequently, when they were scattered abroad among different nations, a knowledge of the arts became so popular that the Talmudists taught that all parents should have their children instructed in some art or handicraft. They mention many learned men of their nation who practised some kind of manual labor, or, as we should term it, followed some trade; and we find the circumstance frequently alluded to in the New Testament (Matt. xiii. 55; Acts iv. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 14, etc.). The Jews, like other nations of their time, reckoned certain trades infamous; among these, the Rabbins classed the drivers of asses and camels, barbers, sailors, shepherds, and inn-keepers, placing them on a level with robbers. See PUBLICAN. The more eminent Greek tradesmen in the apostolic age were united, it appears, in a sort of corporation or society (Acts xix. 25), and such was probably the case with the Jews also. See MECHANIC.

Artāba (Αρτάβα), a dry measure used by the Babylonians (Herod. i. 192), containing seventy-two sextarii according to Epiphanius (de Ponderib. et Mens.) and Isidore de Seville (lib. xvi. Origen); or, according to Dr. Arbutnot's tables, one bushel, one gallon, and one pint, allowing, with him, four pecks and six pints to the medimnus, and one pint to the chœnix (for it was equal to 1 medimnus + 2 chœnices). It is found only in the apocryphal Daniel, or Dan. xiv. 3, Vulg. (Auth. Vers. "measure," Bel. ver. 3). See MEASURE.

Artaxerxes, the Greek form (Ἀρταξέρξης) of the name, or rather title, of several Persian kings (on each of which see fully in Smith's Diet. of Class. Biog. s. v.), and applied in the Auth. Vers. to several of them occurring in the O. T. The Hebrew form (Artachshast', אֲרַחְשָׁשְׁתַּר, Ezra vii. 1, 7; or Artachshast', אֲרַחְשָׁשְׁתַּרְשָׁשְׁתַּר, Ezra iv. 8, 11, 26; vi. 14; once Artachshast', אֲרַחְשָׁשְׁתַּרְשָׁשְׁתַּר, Ezra iv. 7; Sept. Ἀρταξέρξης) is a slight corruption of אֲרַחְשָׁשְׁתַּרְשָׁשְׁתַּר, which Lewis De Sacy has deciphered in the inscriptions of Nakshi Rostam, and which he vocalizes Artabshetr (Aniq. d. l. Perse, p. 160). Gesenius pronounces them Artachshast'; and, by assuming the easy change of r into s, and the transposition of the s, makes Artachshast' very closely represent its prototype (Theol. Heb. p. 155). The word is a compound, the first element of which, arta—found in several Persian names—is generally admitted to mean great; the latter part being the Zend khshethra, King (Lassen, in the Zeitsch. zur Kunde d. Morgenl. vi, 161 sq.). Thus the sense of great warrior ($\mu\epsilon\gamma\alpha\varsigma\ \alpha\alpha\gamma\eta\alpha\iota$), which Herodotus (vi, 98) assigned to the Greek form Artaxerxes, accords with that which etymology (see Lassen, Kaiserschrift, p. 36) discovers in the original Persian title (particularly when we consider that as the king could only be chosen from the soldier-caste—from the Kshatrigas—warrior and king are so far cognate terms); although Pott, according to his etymology of Xerxes, takes Artaxerxes to be more than equivalent to Artachshatr—to be “magnus regum rex” (Etym. Fors. h. i, p. lxxvii). See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS; HEROGLYPHICS.

Ancient Assyrian and Egyptian forms of the name Artaxerxes.

1. The Persian king who, at the instigation of the adversaries of the Jews, obstructed the rebuilding of the Temple, from his time to that of Darius, king of Persia (Ezra iv, 7-24). The monarch here referred to is probably (see AHASUERUS) not Cambyses (as Josephus says, Ant. xi, 2, 1), but the immediate predecessor of Darius Hystaspis, and can be no other than the Magian impostor Smerdis ($\Sigma\mu\epsilon\rho\iota\varsigma$), who seized on the throne B.C. 522, and was murdered after an usurpation of less than eight months (Herod. iii, 61-78). Profane historians, indeed, have not mentioned him under the title of Artaxerxes; but neither do Herodotus and Justin (the latter of whom calls him Oropastes, i, 9) agree in his name (see Bertheau, Gesch. d. Isr. p. 397). See SMERDIS.

2. As to the second Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of whose reign Ezra led a second colony of the Jewish exiles back to Jerusalem (Ezra vi, 1 sq.), the opinions are divided between Xerxes (with Michaelis in loc.; Jahn, Eint. II, i, 276; Archäol. II, i, 259; De Wette, Eint. § 195, and others) and his son Artaxerxes Longimanus (so H. Michaelis; Offerhaus; Eichhorn, Eint. iii, 697; Bertholdt, Eint. iii, 989; Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 166; Kleinert, in the Doppl. Beitr. i, 1; Keil, Chron. p. 103; Archinard, Chronology, p. 128, and many others). Josephus (Ant. xi, 5, 6) calls him Xerxes; but, from various considerations (chiefly that because the first portion of the book of Ezra relates to Darius Hystaspis, it does not follow that the next king spoken of must be his successor Xerxes; that Nehemiah's absence of twelve years is ample to allow the confusion in the infant colony under the merely moral sway of Ezra; and that Josephus likewise confounds the Artaxerxes of Nehemiah with Xerxes, while the author of the apocryphal version of Esdras [1 Esdr. ii, 17; vii, 4; viii, 8] correctly calls both these kings Artaxerxes, a name, moreover, more like the Heb. form, and in that case not conflicting with the distinctive title of Xerxes in Esther), it is nearly certain that (as in Synell, Chron. p. 251) he is the same with the third Artaxerxes, the Persian king who, in the twentieth year of his reign, considerably allowed Nehemiah to go to Jerusalem for the furtherance of purely national objects, invested him with the government of his own people, and allowed him to remain there for twelve years (Neh. ii, 1 sq.; v, 14). It is almost unanimously agreed that the king here intended is Artaxerxes Longimanus ($\Lambda\omicron\rho\tau\alpha\chi\epsilon\rho\epsilon\varsigma\ \text{L}\omicron\gamma\mu\alpha\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$, [otherwise $\Lambda\omicron\rho\tau\alpha\chi\epsilon\rho\epsilon\varsigma$, Bähr ad Ctes. p. 166, 175]). See NEHEMIAH. As this prince began to reign B.C. 466, the restoration under Ezra will fall in B.C. 459, and the first under Nehemiah in B.C. 446. See the Meth. Quart. Review, July, 1850, p. 495. Others (as J. D. Michaelis) understand Artaxerxes Mnemon (reigned B.C. 404-359) to be meant (comp. Neh. xiii, 28, with Josephus, Ant. xi, 8, 3 and 4); but Bertholdt (Eint. iii, 1014) shows that the age of Eliashib (q. v.) will not allow this (comp. Neh. iii, 1, with xii, 1, 10); for Eliashib, who was high-priest when Nehemiah reached Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 1), i. e. on this last supposition, B.C. 385, was grandson of Jeshua (Neh. xii, 10), high-priest in the time of Zerubbabel (Ezra iii, 2), B.C. 535. We cannot think that the grandfathers and grandsons were separated by an interval of 150 years. Besides, as Ezra and Nehemiah were contemporaries (Neh. viii, 9), this theory transfers the whole history contained in Ezra vii, ad fin., and Nehemiah to this date, and it is hard to believe that in this critical period of Jewish annals there are no events recorded between the reigns of Darius Hystaspis (Ezra vi) and Artaxerxes Mnemon. As already observed, there are again some who maintain that as Darius Hystaspis is the king in the sixth chapter of Ezra, the king mentioned next after him, at the beginning of the seventh, must be Xerxes, and thus they distinguish three Persian kings called Artaxerxes in the Old Testament, (1) Smerdis in Ezra iv, (2) Xerxes in Ezra vii, and (3) Artaxerxes Longimanus in Nehemiah. But (in addition to the arguments above) it is almost demonstrable that Xerxes is the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther [see AHASUERUS], and it is hard to suppose that besides his ordinary name he would have been called both Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes in the O. T. It seems, too, very probable that the policy of Neh. ii, was a continuation and renewal of that of Ezra vii, and that the same king was the author of both. Now it is not possible for Xerxes to be the Artaxerxes of Nehemiah, as Josephus asserts (Ant. xi, 5, 6), for Xerxes only reigned 21 years, whereas Nehemiah (xiii, 6) speaks of the 32d year of Artaxerxes. Nor is it necessary to believe that the book of Ezra is a strictly continuous history. It is evident from the first words of ch. vii that there is a pause at the end of ch. vi. Indeed, as ch. vi concludes in the 6th year of Darius, and ch. vii begins with the 7th year of Artaxerxes, we cannot even believe the latter king to be Xerxes without assuming an interval of 56 years (B.C. 516-479) between the chapters, and it is not more difficult to imagine one of 56, which will carry us to B.C. 459, the 7th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. We conclude, therefore, that this is the king of Persia under whom both Ezra and Nehemiah carried on their work; that in B.C. 457 he sent Ezra to Jerusalem; that after 13 years it became evident that a civil as well as an ecclesiastical head was required for the new settlement, and therefore that in 446 he allowed Nehemiah to go up in the latter capacity. From the testimony of profane historians, this king appears remarkable among Persian monarchs for wisdom and right feeling, and with this character his conduct to the Jews coincides (Diod. xi, 71).

ARTAXERXES I, surnamed LONGIMANUS (Gr. $\Lambda\omicron\rho\tau\alpha\chi\epsilon\rho\epsilon\varsigma$, long-handed), from the circumstance that his right hand was longer than his left (Plutarch, Artax. 1), was king of Persia for forty years, B.C. 465-425 [strictly 466-425] (Diod. xi, 69; xii, 64; Thuc. iv, 50). He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I, had been murdered by Artabanus, and after he had himself put to death his own brother Darius, at the instigation of Artabanus (Justin, iii, 1; Ctesias ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 40, a, ed. Bekk.). His reign is characterized (Plut. ut sup.) as wise and temperate, but it was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps; and after the reduction of these, by a revolt of the Egyptians (B.C. 462 [Clinton, 460]), in the course of which the Athenians became involved, and gained two memorable victories over the forces of Artaxerxes (B.C. 449), the one by land and the other by sea (Diod. xii, 4; Thucyd. i, 104 sq.). This is said to have led to a treaty between the Greeks and Persians, on terms very favorable to the former (Thirlwall's History of Greece, i, 264; Smith's Hist. of Greece, p. 262). Artaxerxes appears to have passed the remainder of his reign in peace. He was succeeded by his son Xerxes II (Clinton, Fastii Hell. ii, 380).

Artēmas (Ἀρτεμῆς for Ἀρτεμῆτορος, Artemidorus, i. e. given by Diana) occurs once (Tit. iii, 12) as the name of an esteemed disciple in connection with Tychicus, one of whom Paul designed to send into Crete to supply the place of Titus, when he invited the latter to visit him at Nicopolis. A. D. 63. Ecclesiastical tradition makes him to have been bishop of Lystra.

Artemon, a heretic, toward the end of the second century. Little is known of his history; even his name is sometimes given Artemon and sometimes Artemas. The principal sources of our scanty information are Eusebius, Ecd. Hist. v, 28, where he uses the name Artemon, and vii, 30, where it is Artemas; Theodoret, Heret. Fab. Epit. ii, 4; Epiphanius, Her. lxxv, 1, 4; Photius, LL'oth. 48. Eusebius cites names of writers against Artemon, and gives some hints of his doctrine as being the same with that of Theodotus the tanner, viz. that Christ was a mere man. Theodoret (l. c.) says that Artemon believed in God the creator, but asserted Christ to be a mere man; born of a virgin, however, and superior to the prophets. Eusebius speaks of Artemon and his followers as abandoning the Scriptures for "syllogisms and geometry." He states also that Paul of Samosata received the heresy of Artemon. Schleiermacher (Theol. Zeitschrift, 1822, iii, 295 sq.; translated by Moses Stuart in Bibl. Repository, v, 331 sq.) goes into a careful examination of the fragments of our knowledge about Artemon, and adopts the view previously given out by Gemadius of Marseilles, that Artemon was, in reality, a Sabellian. See also Lardner, Works, ii, 403 sq.; Schaffhausen, Historia Artēmonis et Artemonitarum, Leipzig, 1737, 4to; Dorner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, 8; Neander, Church History, i, 580.

Artemonites, followers of Artemon (q. v.). A small remnant of the Artemonites existed in the third century.—Euseb. Ch. Hist. v, 28.

Article, in GRAMMAR. Of this part of speech, but one kind, the definite article, requires any consideration here, since the indefinite article in those languages where it is grammatically treated as a peculiar form is, after all, but a modification of the numeral for one (Gr. ἓν; ἕνός; Lat. unus; French, un; Germ. ein; En z. an, etc.). In Hebrew the definite article is denoted by the syllable ay prefixed to the noun (or other word so employed), and the Dagesh forte inserted in the following letter (whenever this will admit) shows that this was but a contraction for some older form, probably ay (or perhaps a modified form of the demonstrative pronoun ay), corresponding to the Arabic al or el, which in like manner assimilates its last letter to that of many words with which it is joined. In Chaldee and Syriac, however, this prefix is never employed, but in its stead the letter x (or syllable ah) is appended to the noun, which is then said to be in the "definite or emphatic state." In the Greek language, on the other hand, the article is pronominal in form and construction, being, in fact, originally (e. g. in Homer) actually a demonstrative pronoun. The point of the greatest importance in biblical criticism, and that for the interest connected with which the subject is here introduced, is the frequent omission of the definite article in the New Testament, where in classical Greek its presence is grammatically requisite. Bishop Middleton has treated copiously of this peculiarity (Doctrine of the Greek Article, Lond. 1821, and often since); but many of the "canons" that he lays down for its use or disuse, upon which important theological conclusions have often been made to depend, are highly fanciful, and unsupported by general Hellenistic usage. The idiom in question is, in fact, nothing more than a transfer of the Hebrew laws for the omission or insertion of the article prefix, which may be found clearly drawn out in Nordheimer's Heb. Gram. ii, § 716-729, especially § 717, 718; and depend upon this essential principle, that the article may be omitted before any word that is regarded as being already sufficiently definite, either by reason of being in construction with another noun, adjective, pronoun, or other qualifying term, or by being distinctive in itself, so as not to be specially liable to misinterpretation.

Articles of FAITH, statements of the main points of belief of any single church framed by authority of the church, and binding upon its ministers or members, or upon both. Some object to Articles of Faith. Among the grounds of objection are the following, viz. that they infringe Christian liberty, and supersede the Scriptures by substituting in their place a number of humanly-formed propositions; that to exhibit the Christian faith in any limited number of statements is virtually to declare that all besides is superfluous. It is objected, also, that such articles nourish hypocrisy, and hinder advancement in divine knowledge. "If employed at all," it is said, "they should be in the words of Scripture." The advocates for "articles of faith," on the other hand, affirm that it is not their purpose to sum up the whole of Christianity in any number of propositions, but merely to set forth the belief of a given church upon the leading truths of religion, as well as upon those matters which have at any period been subjects of heretical corruption or of controversy, and respecting which it is necessary that there should be agreement among such as are to be members of the same church; that articles are not intended to be guides through the whole voyage of Christian inquiry, but only beacon-lights to inform the mariner where lie those rocks and shoals on which preceding voyagers have made shipwreck. It is clear that there is a necessity for such articles, because the sense of Scripture upon any one point of faith lies scattered over too large a surface to be easily collected for himself by every individual member of the church; that scriptural truths are as capable as any other of being translated into common language; and that controversies within the church upon the meaning of Scripture would abound, if the church itself should give no interpretation of them (comp. Rom. vi, 17; 2 Tim. i, 13).—Buck, Theol. Dict.; Eden, Theol. Dict. See CONFESSIONS; CREEDS.

ARTICLES, LAMBETH. The Calvinistic doctrine concerning Predestination, Free-will, etc., which had been the cause of vehement disputes on the Continent, had been brought into England by the refugees, and gained great footing, about the year 1594, at Cambridge, by the influence of Cartwright, the Lady Margaret professor. Barret, a fellow of Caius College, preached ad clerum against Calvin's doctrines. Archbishop Whitgift at first took Barret's part; but at last, urged by the heads of colleges, sent for him to Lambeth, and directed him not to preach such doctrine again. Dr. Whittaker, the regius professor, supported the novel doctrines; and this party, having stated the controversy to their own liking, drew up nine articles into form, and laid them before Archbishop Whitgift, who called, November 10th, an assembly at Lambeth to consider the question, consisting of Fletcher, the elect of London; Vaughan, elect of Banzer; Trindall, dean of Ely; and Whittaker and the Cambridge divines. They drew up the following nine articles, known as the "Lambeth Articles:" "1. God hath from eternity predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death. 2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated, but the alone will of God's good pleasure. 3. The predestinati are a predetermined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased. 4. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins. 5. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not utterly fail, doth not vanish away in the elect, either finally or totally. 6. A true believer—that is, one who is endued with justifying faith—is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastingly saved by Christ. 7. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not granted to all men, by which they may be saved if they will. 8. No man is able to come to Christ unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to his Son. 9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved." The archbishop approved the articles Nov. 20, 1555, and sent them to Cambridge; but the queen ordered them to be recalled, and censured Whitgift severely. As the meeting at Lambeth was not a lawful synod, its resolutions cannot be regarded as the act of the church of that day; nor, indeed, in any other light than as declaring the opinion of some of the church authorities of that period upon the subject of predestination. The very effort to enact them seems to show that the Calvinistic bishops of the time were not satisfied that the Thirty-nine Articles were Calvinistic.—Collier, Eccl. Hist. vii, 187; Hardwick, Hist. of 39 Articles, ch. vii, and Appendix, No. vi; Strype's Writings, p. 462; Browne On 39 Articles, p. 375.

ARTICLES OF PERTH, five articles agreed upon at a General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, convened at Perth by command of James VI on the 25th of August, 1618. These articles enjoined kneeling at the Lord's Supper, the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost, and confirmation, and sanctioned the private administration of baptism and of the Lord's Supper. They were highly obnoxious to the Presbyterians of Scotland, not only on their own account, but as part of an attempt to change the whole constitution of the church; and because they were adopted without free discussion in the Assembly, and in mere compliance with the will of the king, who was also regarded as having unduly interfered with the constitution of the Assembly itself. They were, however, ratified by the Parliament on the 4th of August, 1621—a day long remembered in Scotland as Black Saturday—were enforced by the Court of High Commission, and became one of the chief subjects of that contention between the king and the people which produced results so grave and sad for both in the subsequent reign. The General Assembly of Glasgow in 1638 declared that of Perth to have been "unfree, unlawful, and null," and condemned the Five Articles.—Chambers's Encyclopædia, s. v.; Calderwood, History of Church of Scotland, vol. ii; Hetherington, Church of Scotland, i, 239.

ARTICLES OF SCHMALKALD.—The Protestants had formed the Schmalkaldic League (q. v.) in 1531, and the emperor, by the Religious Peace of 1552, had agreed to maintain the status quo until a council should meet to settle all questions. He endeavored to have a papal council called in 1557; but the Wittenberg divines, not willing to trust such a body, agreed to certain articles drawn up by Luther, and presented at the meeting of the electors, princes, and states at Schmalkald (Feb. 15, 1537). They were principally designed to show how far the Lutherans were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture with Rome, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. In these articles opposition to the Romish doctrine is very strongly expressed. The articles afterward became one of the authoritative symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. Dr. Murdoch, in his notes to Mosheim (Ch. History cent. xvi, sec. i, ch. iii, § 9), gives the following account of them: "The Augsburg Confession was intended to soften prejudice against the Lutherans, and to conciliate the good-will of the Catholics. Of course, the gentle Melancthon was employed to write it. The Articles of Schmalkald, on the contrary, were a preparation for a campaign against an enemy with whom no compromise was deemed possible, and in which victory or death was the only alternative. Of course, all delicacy toward the Catholics was dispensed with, and Luther's fiery style was chosen, and allowed full scope. In words the Articles flatly contradict the Confession in some instances, though in some they are the same. Thus the Confession (article 24) says: 'We are unjustly charged with having abolished the mass. For it is manifest that, without boasting, we may say the mass is observed by us with greater devotion and earnestness than by our opposers.' But in the Articles of Schmalkald, part ii, art. II, it is said 'that the popish mass is the greatest and most horrid abomination, as militating directly and violently against these articles; and yet it has become the chief and most splendid of all the popish idolatries.' In the Confession they applied the name of the mass to the Lutheran form of the Eucharist; but in these Articles they confine that term to the proper import, the ordinary public service among the Catholics. The Articles of Schmalkald cover 28 folio pages, and are preceded by a preface, and followed by a treatise on the power and supremacy of the pope. The first part contains four concise articles respecting God, the Trinity, and the incarnation, passion, and ascension of Christ, in accordance with the Apostles' and the Athanasian Creeds. On these articles the Protestants professed to agree together with the Papists. The second part also contains four articles of fundamental importance, but in which the Protestants and Papists are declared to be totally and irreconcilably at variance. They relate to the nature and to the grounds of justification, the mass and saint worship, ecclesiastical and monkish establishments, and the claims of the pope. The third part contains fifteen articles, which the Protestants considered as relating to very important subjects, but on which the Papists laid little stress. The subjects are sin, the law, repentance, the Gospel, baptism, the sacrament of the altar, the keys (or spiritual power), confession, excommunication, ordination, celibacy of the clergy, churches, good works, monastic vows, and human satisfaction for sin. When the Protestants subscribed these articles, Melancthon annexed a reservation to his signature purporting that he could admit of a pope, provided he would allow the Gospel to be preached in its purity, and would give up his pretensions to a divine right to rule, and would found his claims wholly on expediency and human compact. In consequence of this dissent from Luther, Melancthon was requested to draw up an article on the power and supremacy of the pope. He did so, and the Protestants were well pleased with it, and subscribed to it. It is annexed to the Articles of Schmalkald." See J. G. Walch's Introd. to Biblioth. Theol. i, 317, 362.

The first edition of the Articles of Schmalkald appeared in Wittenberg, 1538, 4to, in German; in Latin (by Generaux), 1541, 8vo. Schuecker afterward made a new Latin version, which is the one adopted in the collection of Lutheran creeds in Latin. A new edition of the German text, with the literature of the subject, was published by Marheineke (Berlin, 1817, 4to). See also, for the text and history, Francke, Libri Symbolici Eccl. Lutheranae (Lips. 1847, 12mo); Guericke, Christl. Symbolik, § 14; Banke, History of the Reformation, vol. iii.

ARTICLES, SIX. This was an act (known as "the bloody statute") passed during that period of reaction against the Reformation in the mind of Henry VIII, which lasted from 1538 to 1544. Gardner and Tomstall took advantage of this mood of the king's mind, and procured the enactment, in 1539, of the "six articles for the abolishing of diversity of opinions;" in reality, a law to punish with death all persons who should adopt the doctrines of the Reformers on the points covered by it. These points were, that in the sacrament of the altar, after consecration, there remains no substance of bread and wine, but the natural body and blood of Christ; that communion in both kinds is not necessary; that priests, according to the law of God, may not marry; that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession is expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the church. Cramer strenuously opposed this act, but afterward complied. Latimer and Shaxton resigned their bishoprics. It was under this act that Anne Askew (q. v.), or Ascough, was executed in 1546; Burnet, Hist. Engl. Reform. i. 416; ii. 63; Maitland, Essays of the Reformation, essay xii; Hardwick, Church History, iii, 205; Neal, History of the Puritans, vol. i, ch. i.

ARTICLES, TWENTY-FIVE, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They are as follows:

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.—There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, visible and invisible. And in unity of this God-head there are three persons, of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II. Of the Word, or Son of God, who was made very Man.—The Son, who is the Word of the Father, the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men.

III. Of the Resurrection of Christ.—Christ did truly rise again from the dead, and took again his body, with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day.

IV. Of the Holy Ghost.—The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

V. The Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Salvation.—The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scripture, we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the church.

The Names of the Canonical Books: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, The First Book of Samuel, The Second Book of Samuel, The First Book of Kings, The Second Book of Kings, The First Book of Chronicles, The Second Book of Chronicles, The Book of Ezra, The Book of Nehemiah, The Book of Esther, The Book of Job, The Psalms, The Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, or the Preacher, Cantica, or Songs of Solomon, Four Prophets the greater, Twelve Prophets the lesser, the books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account canonical.

VI. Of the Old Testament.—The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard who feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, doth not bind Christians, nor ought the civil precepts thereof of necessity be received in any commonwealth; yet, notwithstanding, no Christian whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

VII. Of Original or Birth Sin.—Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually.

VIII. Of Free Will.—The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and works, to faith, and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.

IX. Of the Justification of Man.—We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore, that we are justified by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.

X. Of Good Works.—Although good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins and endure the severity of God's judgments, yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and spring out of a true and lively faith, inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree is discerned by its fruit.

XI. Of Works of Supererogation.—Voluntary works, besides over and above God's commandments, which are called works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety. For by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required; whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that is commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

XII. Of Sin after Justification.—Not every sin willingly committed after justification is the sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore, the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after justification; after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given and fall into sin, and, by the grace of God, rise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be commended who say they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.

XIII. Of the Church.—The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

XIV. Of Purgatory.—The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardon, worshipping, and adoration, as well of images as of relics, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warrant of scripture, but repugnant to the Word of God.

XV. Of speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the People understand.—It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have public prayer in the church, or to minister the sacraments in a tongue not understood by the people.

XVI. Of the Sacraments.—Sacraments ordained of Christ are not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but, rather, they are certain signs of grace, and God's good will toward us, by which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel; that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, are to be counted for sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have partly grown out of the corrupt following of the apostles, and partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not the like nature of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; because they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a whole some effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves condemnation, as St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. xi. 29.

XVII. Of Baptism.—Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christians are distinguished from others that are not baptized, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or the new birth. The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church.

XVIII. Of the Lord's Supper.—The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; inasmuch that, to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the Supper of our Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; and the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the sacrament is faith.

The supper of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XIX. Of both Kinds.—The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people; for both the parts of the Lord's Supper, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be administered to all Christians alike.

XX. Of the one Oblation of Christ, finished upon the Cross.—The offering of Christ, once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in the which it is commonly said that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, is a blasphemous fable and dangerous deceit.

XXI. Of the Marriage of Ministers.—The ministers of Christ are not commended by God's law either to vow the state of single life, or to abstain from marriage; therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christians, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve best to godliness.

XXII. Of the Rites and Ceremonies of Churches.—It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same, or exactly alike; for they have been always different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word. Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely doth openly break the rites and ceremonies of the church to which he belongs, which are not repugnant to the Word of God, and are ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, that others may fear to do the like, as one that offendeth against the common order of the church, and woundeth the consciences of weak brethren.

Every particular church may ordain, change, or abolish rites and ceremonies, so that all things may be done to edification.

XXIII. Of the Powers of the United States of America.—The President, the Congress, the General Assemblies, the governors, and the Councils of State, as the delegates of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America, according to the division of power made to them by the Constitution of the United States, and by the Constitutions of their respective states. And the said states are a sovereign and independent nation, and ought not to be subject to any foreign jurisdiction. As far as it respects civil affairs, we believe it the duty of Christians, and especially all Christian ministers, to be subject to the supreme authority of the country where they may reside, and to use all lawful means to enjoin obedience to the powers that be; and therefore it is expedient that all our preachers and people, who may be under the British or any other government, will behave themselves as peaceable and orderly subjects.

XXIV. Of Christian Men's Goods.—The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as some do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesseth, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXV. Of a Christian Man's Oath.—As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ and James his apostle, so we judge that the Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

These are, in substance, the Articles of the Church of England, omitting the 3d, 8th, 13th, 15th, 17th, 18th, 20th, 21st, 23d, 26th, 29th, 33d, 34th, 36th, and 37th. On comparison, it will be found that these omissions are nearly all made in order to greater comprehension and liberality in the Creed. The 23d article (adopted in 1804) is especially to be noted, as giving the adhesion of the church at that early period to the doctrine that the "United States" constitute "a sovereign nation." The articles, in their present form, are a modification of those originally framed for the church by Wesley, and printed in the Sunday Service of the Methodists. They were adopted, with the Liturgy, at the Christian Conference of 1784. The changes made in them since that period (except the political one above referred to, made necessary by the adoption of the national Constitution) are chiefly verbal; and some of them appear to be due to typographical errors in successive reprints of the Book of Discipline. For a list of the changes, see Emory, History of the Discipline, ch. I. § 2. See also Jameson, Notes on the 25 Articles (Cincinnati, 1853, 12mo); Comfort, Exposition of the Articles (N. Y., 1847, 12mo); Stevens, History of the Methodist Episcopal Church (N. Y., 1865, 3 vols., 8vo). See METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

ARTICLES (THE THIRTY-SIX) of the Church of England contain what may be called the "symbol," "creed," or "confession of faith" of the Church of England, especially as to the points on which, at the time of the adoption of the articles, disputes existed. They constitute also, substantially, the Creed of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (see below).

The history of their origin, as nearly as can be ascertained, is about as follows. As early as 1549 Crammer drew up and circulated a series of articles designed "to test the orthodoxy of preachers and lecturers in divinity." Hooper objected to them because of the expression that "the sacraments confer grace," and for other reasons (Hooper, Original Letters, p. 71). About this time three eminent Continental reformers were domiciled in England, viz. John à Lasco or Laski (q. v.), as preacher in London, Bucer (q. v.), as theological lecturer at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr (q. v.), as professor at Oxford. The influence of these great men went all in the current of thoroughly Protestant reformation, and was especially felt in the revision of the Prayer-book and of the Articles, in which they were consulted to a greater or less extent. Calvin, Melancthon, Bullinger, and other eminent Continental Protestants were in correspondence with Crammer on the settlement of doctrinal points. In 1549, an act of Parliament was passed empowering the king to appoint a commission of 32 persons to make ecclesiastical laws. Under this act a commission of 8 bishops, 8 divines, 8 civilians, and 8 lawyers (among whom were Crammer, Ridley, Hooper, Coverdale, Scory, Peter Martyr, Justice Hales, etc.), was appointed in 1551. Crammer seems to have laid before this body, as a basis, a series of 13 articles, chiefly from the Augsburg Confession (reported in Hardwick, History of the Articles, App. iii). Finally, "Forty-two articles" were laid before the royal council, Nov. 24, 1552 (text given in Burnet, iv, 311). In March, 1553, they were laid before Convocation, but whether adopted by that body or not is undecided. Strype and others assert that they were; Burnet, that they were not (Hist. Ref. iii, 316). Fuller, speaking in his quaint way of this convocation, declares that it had "no commission from the king to meddle with church business, and," he adds, "every convocation in itself is born deaf and dumb, so that it can neither hear nor speak concerning complaints in religion till first Ephphatho. 'Be thou opened,' be pronounced unto it by royal authority. However," he continues, "this barren convocation is entitled the parent of those forty-two articles which are printed with this title, Articuli de quibus in Synodo Londinensi 1552 A. D. inter Episcopos et alios convenerat." To these articles was prefixed the Catechism, and the preparation of them was chiefly the work of Crammer and Ridley, on the basis of the Augsburg Confession (Laurence, Bampton Lecture, p. 230). Immediately after their publication Edward died (July 6, 1553). Under Queen Mary, Crammer and Ridley went to the stake, and Gardner and the Papists took their places as authorities in religion. In 1558 Mary died. Soon after the accession of Elizabeth, Matthew Parker (q. v.) was made archbishop of Canterbury (1559). One of his first tasks was to restore and recast the XLII articles. He expunged some parts and added others, making special use of both the Augsburg and Württemberg Confessions (Laurence, Bampton Lect. 233; Browne, XXXIX Articles, 15). The revised draught was laid before Convocation, which body made some minor alterations, and finally adopted the Thirty-eight Articles (January, 1562-3). They are given in Hardwick, History of the Articles, p. 124.

In 1566 a bill was brought into Parliament to confirm them. The bill passed the Commons, but by the queen's command was dropped in the Lords. In 1571 the Convocation revised the articles of 1562, and made some alterations in them. In the same year an act was passed "to provide that the ministers of the church should be of sound religion." It enacted that all ecclesiastical persons should subscribe to "all the articles of religion which only contained the confession of the true faith and of the sacraments, comprised in a book imprinted, entitled 'Articles,' whereupon it was agreed by the archbishops and bishops, and the whole clergy in convocation holden in London, in the year of our Lord God 1562, according to the computation of the Church of England, for the avoiding of diversities of opinions, and for the establishing of consent touching true religion, put forth by the queen's authority." In 1628 an English edition was published by royal authority, to which is prefixed the declaration of Charles I.

The following are the Articles in full, as found in the Prayer-book of the Church of England :

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.—There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passion; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, both visible and invisible. And in unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II. Of the Word or Son of God, which was made very Man.—The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God and very Man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men.

III. Of the going down of Christ into Hell.—As Christ died for us, and was buried, so also is it to be believed that he went down into hell.

IV. Of the Resurrection of Christ.—Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all men at the last day.

V. Of the Holy Ghost.—The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, yet another and eternal God.

VI. Of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Salvation.—Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scripture we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the church.

Of the names and number of the Canonical Books: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, The First Book of Samuel, The Second Book of Samuel, The First Book of Kings, The Second Book of Kings, The First Book of Chronicles, The Second Book of Chronicles, The First Book of Esdras, The Second Book of Esdras, The Book of Esther, The Book of Job, The Psalms, The Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, or Preacher, Cantica, or Songs of Solomon, Four Prophets the greater, Twelve Prophets the less. And the other Books (as Hierome saith) the church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine; and such are these following: The Third Book of Esdras, The Fourth Book of Esdras, The Book of Tobias, The Book of Judith, The rest of the Book of Esther, The Book of Wisdom, Jesus the Son of Sirach, Baruch the Prophet, The Song of the Three Children, The Story of Susanna, Of Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, The First Book of Maccabees, The Second Book of Maccabees. All the Books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive, and account them canonical.

VII. Of the Old Testament.—The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, do not bind Christian men, nor the civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received in any commonwealth, yet, notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

VIII. Of the Three Creeds.—The Three Creeds, Nicene Creed, Athanasian's Creed, and that which is commonly called the Apostles' Creed, ought thoroughly to be received and believed, for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.

IX. Of Original or Birth Sin.—Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit; and therefore, in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation. And this infection of nature doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated; whereby the lust of the flesh, called in the Greek phronema saikos, which some do expound the wisdom, some sensuality, some the affection, some the desire of the flesh, is not subject to the law of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the apostle doth confess that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin.

X. Of Free Will.—The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God: wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.

XI. Of the Justification of Man.—We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings; wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the Homily of Justification.

XII. Of Good Works.—Albeit that good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment, yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith; inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit.

XIII. Of Works before Justification.—Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the school-authors say) deserve grace of congruity; yea, rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin.

XIV. Of Works of Supererogation.—Voluntary works besides, over and above God's commandments, which they call works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety; for by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required; whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that are commanded to you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

XV. Of Christ alone without Sin.—Christ, in the truth of our nature, was made like unto us in all things, sin only except, from which he was clearly void, both in his flesh and in his spirit. He came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world, and sin, as Saint John saith, was not in him. But all we the rest, although baptized and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

XVI. Of Sin after Baptism.—Not every deadly sin willingly committed after baptism is sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and by the grace of God we may arise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned which say they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.

XVII. Of Predestination and Election.—Predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honor. Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God be called according to God's purpose by his Spirit working in due season: they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.

As the godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love toward God, so, for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living no less pernicious than desperation.

Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture, and, in our doings, that will of God is to be followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the Word of God.

XVIII. Of obtaining eternal Salvation only by the Name of Christ.—They also are to be had accused that presume to say, That every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the light of nature; for Holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ whereby men must be saved.

XIX. Of the Church.—The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.

As the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith.

XX. Of the Authority of the Church.—The church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith; and yet it is not lawful for the church to obdain any thing that is contrary to God's Word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another. Wherefore, although the church be a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ, yet, as it ought not to decree any thing against the same, so, besides the same, ought it not to enforce any thing to be believed for necessity of salvation.

XXI. Of the Authority of General Councils.—General councils may not be gathered together without the commandment and will of princes. And when they be gathered together, (forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and Word of God) they may err, and some-times have erred, even in things pertaining unto God. Wherefore things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of Holy scripture.

XXII. Of Purgatory.—The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshiping and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

XXIII. Of Ministering to the Sick.—It is not lawful for any person to take upon him the office of public preaching or ministering the sacraments in the congregation, before he be lawfully called, and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard.

XXIV. Of speaking in the Congregation in such a tongue as the people understandeth.—It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive church to have public prayer in the church, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not understood of the people.

XXV. Of the Sacraments.—Sacraments ordained of Christ be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace and God's good will toward us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are not to be counted for sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not like nature of sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as St. Paul saith.

XXVI. Of the Unworthiness of the Ministers, which hinders not the effect of the Sacrament.—Although in the visible church the evil be ever mingled with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the administration of the word and sacraments, yet forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and authority, we may use their ministry, both in hearing the Word of God and in receiving the sacraments. Neither is the effect of Christ's ordinance taken away by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such as by faith and rightly do receive the sacraments ministered unto them; which be effectual, because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be administered by evil men.

Nevertheless, it appertaineth to the discipline of the church that inquiry be made of evil ministers, and that they be accused by those that have knowledge of their offences; and finally, being found guilty, by just judgment be deposed.

XXVII. Of Baptism.—Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are separated from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promise of forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God. The baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ.

XXVIII. Of the Lord's Supper.—The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; inasmuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, litted up, or worshipped.

XXIX. Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper.—The wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather, to their condemnation, do eat and drink the sign and sacrament of so great a thing.

XXX. Of both kinds.—The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people, for both the parts of the Lord's sacrament, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike.

XXXI. Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross.—The offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifices of masses, in the which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits.

XXXII. Of the Marriage of Priests.—Bishops, priests, and deacons are not commanded by God's law either to avow the estate of single life or to abstain from marriage; therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve better to godliness.

XXXIII. Of excommunicate Persons, how they are to be avoided.—That person which by open denunciation of the church is rightly cut off from the unity of the church and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful as an heathen and publican until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the church by a judge that hath authority thereunto.

XXXIV. Of the Traditions of the Church.—It is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one and unchangeable, for at all times they have been divers, and may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word. Whosoever through his private judgment, willingly and purposely, doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the church, which be not repugnant to the Word of God, and be ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly (that others may fear to do the like), as he that offendeth against the common order of the church, and hurteth the authority of the magistrate, and woundeth the consciences of the weak brethren.

Every particular or national church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the church ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying.

XXXV. Of the Homilies.—The second Book of Homilies, the several titles whereof we have joined under this article, doth contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and necessary for these times, as doth the former Book of Homilies, which were set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth; and therefore we judge them to be read in churches by the ministers, diligently and distinctly, that they may be understood of the people.

Of the names of the Homilies.—1. Of the right Use of the Church; 2. Against peril of Idolatry; 3. Of repairing and keeping clean of Churches; 4. Of good Works; first, of Fasting; 5. Against Gluttony and Drunkenness; 6. Against Excess of Apparel; 7. Of Prayer; 8. Of the Place and Time of Prayer; 9. That Common Prayers and Sacraments ought to be ministered in a known tongue; 10. Of the reverend estimation of God's Word; 11. Of Alms-doing; 12. Of the Nativity of Christ; 13. Of the Passion of Christ; 14. Of the Resurrection of Christ; 15. Of the worthy receiving of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ; 16. Of the Gifts of the Holy Ghost; 17. For the Beggarly days; 18. Of the state of Matrimony; 19. Of Repentance; 20. Against Idleness; 21. Against Rebellion.

XXXVI. Of consecration of Bishops and Ministers.—The Book of Consecration of Archbishops and Bishops, and Ordering of Priests and Deacons, lately set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth, and confirmed at the same time by authority of Parliament, doth contain all things necessary to such consecration and ordering; neither hath it any thing that of itself is superstitious and ungodly. And therefore whosoever any consecration or ordering according to the rites of that book, since the second year of the famous King Edward unto this time, or hereafter shall be consecrated or ordered according to the same rites, we decree all such to be rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated and ordered.

XXXVII. Of the Civil Magistrates.—The queen's majesty hath the chief power in this realm of England, and other her dominions, unto whom the chief government of all estates of this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all cases doth appertain, and is not, nor ought to be, subject to any foreign jurisdiction.

Where we attribute to the queen's majesty the chief government, by which titles we understand the minds of some slanderous folks to be offended, we give not to our princes the ministering either of God's Word or of the sacraments, (which thing the injunctions also lately set forth by Elizabeth our queen do most plainly testify), but that only prerogative which we see to have been given always to all godly princes in Holy Scriptures by God himself; that is, that they should rule all states and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil-doers.

The Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England.

The laws of the realm may punish Christian men with death for heinous and grievous offences.

It is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the magistrate, to wear weapons and serve in the wars.

XXXVIII. Of Christian men's Goods, which are not common.—The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesseth, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXXIX. Of a Christian man's Oath.—As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ and James the apostle, so we judge that Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States adopted in convention, September 12, 1801, the Thirty-nine Articles, except the 21st, with certain modifications, which are stated as follows by the American editor of Hook's Church Dictionary:

"In the eighth article we have left out the words 'three creeds' and 'Athanasius creed,' having rejected that creed as an exponent of our faith. The 21st article, 'Of the authority of general councils,' is left out altogether; and, though the No. xxi and title is retained, an asterisk refers us to a foot-note which says, 'the 21st of the former articles is omitted because it is partly of a local and civil nature, and is provided for as to the remaining part of it in other articles.' After the 55th article, 'Of homilies,' our reviewers have inserted the following explanation in bracket. 'This article is received in this church so far as it declares the books of homilies to be an explication of Christian doctrine, and instructive on piety and morals. But all references to the constitution and laws of England are considered as inapplicable to the circumstances of this church, which also suspend the order for the reading of said homilies in churches, until a revision of them may be conveniently made, for the clearing of them, as well from obsolete words and phrases as from the local references.' The 36th article, 'Of the consecration of bishops and ministers,' is altered to suit the peculiarities of the American Church. The 37th article 'Of the power of the civil magistrates,' is a new one entirely superseding that of the Church of England, which sets forth the queen's supremacy in church and state, the annulling of papal jurisdiction in England, the power of the laws of the realm to punish with death, and the lawfulness of wearing weapons and serving in wars at the commandment of the magistrates. The American article is a biblical statement of a great and fundamental principle, applicable to all men, and under all circumstances. The American articles were ordered to be set forth by the General Convention assembled in Trenton, New Jersey, in September, 1801."

As to the sources of the English articles, besides what has been said above, it may not be amiss to add that the 1st, 2d, 25th, and 31st agree not only in their doctrine, but in most of their wording, with the Confession of Augsburg. The 9th and 16th are clearly due to the same source. Some of them, as the 19th, 20th, 25th, and 34th, resemble, both in doctrine and language, certain articles drawn up by a commission appointed by Henry VIII, and annotated by the king's own hand. The 11th article, on justification, is ascribed to Cranmer, but the latter part of it only existed in the articles of 1552. The 17th, on predestination, has afforded matter of great dispute as to the question whether it is meant to affirm the Calvinistic doctrine or no. On this point, see Laurence, Bampton Lectures; Browne On 39 Articles, p. 420 sq., and our articles ARMINIANISM, CALVINISM, with further references there. The Thirty-nine Articles have been described as "containing a whole body of divinity." This can-hardly be maintained. They contain, however, what the Church of England holds to be a fair scriptural account of the leading doctrines of Christianity, together with a condemnation of what she considers to be the principal errors of the Church of Rome and of certain Protestant sects. As far as they go (and there are many things unnoticed by them), they are a legal definition of the doctrines of the Church of England and Ireland, though the members of that communion look to the Prayer-book as well as to the articles for the genuine expression of her faith. The articles are far more thoroughly Protestant than the Prayer-book, taken as a whole. Although the articles expressly assert that the Church of Rome has erred, attempts have repeatedly been made by the High-Church party of the Church of England to show that there is no irreconcilable difference between the Thirty-nine Articles and the decrees of the Council of Trent, and that a construction can be put upon them fully harmonizing them. To show this was, in particular, the object of Dr. Newman's celebrated tract (Tracts for the Times, No. 90, Oxf. 1839), and more recently of Dr. Pusey's Eirenicon (Lond. 1865; N. Y. 1866). See also Christ. Remembr. Jan. 1866, art. vi. The articles were adopted by the Convocation of the Irish Church in 1635, and by the Scotch Episcopal Church at the close of the 18th century. Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, contains the only copies of the articles in manuscript or print that are of any authority. Among them are the Latin manuscript of the articles of 1562 and the English manuscript of the articles of 1571, each with the signatures of the archbishops and bishops who subscribed them. See Lamb, Account of the Thirty-nine Articles (Camb. 2d ed. 1835). One of the best accounts of the origin of the Thirty-nine Articles is given by Hardwick, History of the Articles of Religion (Lond. 1855, 8vo). For expositions of them, see Burnet On the Thirty-nine Articles (N. Y. 1845, 8vo); Welchman, XXXIX Articles (Lond. 1834, 8vo, 13th ed.); Sworde, The first Seventeen Articles (Lond. 1847, 8vo); Wilson, XXXIX Articles Illustrated (Oxf. 1840, 8vo); Dimock, XXXIX Articles Explained (Lond. 1845, 2 vols. 8vo); Browne, Exposition of Thirty-nine Articles (Lond. 1851, 8vo; N. Artificer (some form of the verb עָשָׂה, chavash', to engrave, as elsewhere), a person engaged in any kind of trade or manual occupation [see CARPENTER, MASON, etc.], Gen. iv, 22; Isa. iii, 3. See HANDICRAFT. In the early periods to which the scriptural history refers, we do not meet with those artificial feelings and unreasonable prejudices against hand-labor which prevail and are so banefully influential in modern society. See LABOR. Accordingly, even the creation of the world is spoken of as the work of God's hands, and the firmament is said to show his handiwork (Psa. viii, 3; xix, 1; Gen. ii, 2; Job xxxiv, 19). The primitive history, too, which the Bible presents is the history of hand-laborers. Adam dressed the garden in which God had placed him (Gen. ii, 15). Abel was a keeper of sheep, Cain a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv, 3), Tubal-Cain a smith (Gen. iv, 22). See ART. The shepherd-life which the patriarchs previously led in their own pasture-grounds was not favorable to the cultivation of the practical arts of life, much less of those arts by which it is embellished. Egypt, in consequence, must have presented to Joseph and his father not only a land of wonders, but a source of rich and attractive knowledge. Another source of knowledge to the Hebrews of handicrafts were the maritime and commercial Phœnicians. Commerce and navigation imply great skill in art and science; and the pursuits to which they lead largely increase the skill whence they emanate. See COMMERCE. It is not, therefore, surprising that the origin of so many arts has been referred to the north-eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea; nor is there any difficulty in understanding how arts and letters should be propagated from the coast to the interior, conferring high advantages on the inhabitants of Syria in general, as well before as after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in the land of promise. At first the division of labor was only very partial. The master of the family himself exercised such arts as were found of absolute necessity. Among these may be reckoned not only those which pasturage and tillage required, but most of those which were of that rough and severe nature which demand strength as well as skill; such, for instance, as the preparation of wood-work for the dwelling, the slaying of animals for food, which every householder understood, together with the art of extracting the blood from the entire carcass. The lighter labors of the hand fell to the share of the housewife; such as baking bread—for it was only in large towns that baking was carried on as a trade (2 Sam. xiii, 8)—such also as cooking in general, supplying the house with water—no very easy office, as the fountains often lay at a considerable distance from the dwelling; moreover, weaving, making of clothes for males as well as females, working in wool, flax, hemp, cotton, tapestry, richly-colored hangings, and that not only for domestic use, but for “merchandise,” were carried on within the precincts of the house by the mistress and her maidens (Exod. xxxv, 25; 1 Sam. ii, 19; 2 Kings xxiii, 7; Prov. xxxi). See WEAVING.

The skill of the Hebrews during their wanderings in the desert does not appear to have been inconsiderable; but the pursuits of war and the entire absorption of the energies of the nation in the one great work of gaining the land which had been given to them, may have led to their falling off in the arts of peace; and from a passage in 1 Sam. (xiii, 20) it would appear that not long after they had taken possession of the country they were in a low condition as to the instruments of handicraft. A comparatively settled state of society, however, soon led to the revival of skill by the encouragement of industry. A more minute division of labor ensued. Trades, strictly so called, arose, carried on by persons exclusively devoted to one pursuit. Thus, in Judg. xvii, 4, and Jer. x, 14, “the founder” is mentioned—a trade which implies a practical knowledge of metallurgy; the smelting and working of metals were well known to the Hebrews (Job xxxvii, 18); brass was in use before iron; arms and instruments of husbandry were made of iron. In Exodus (xxxv, 30-35) a passage occurs which may serve to specify many arts that were practised among the Israelites, though it seems also to intimate that at the time to which it refers artificers of the description referred to were not numerous: “See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, and hath filled him with the spirit of God, in knowledge and all manner of workmanship, and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work; and he hath put in his heart that he may teach; both he and Aholiab; them hath he filled with wisdom of heart to work all manner of work of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen, and of the weaver.” From the ensuing chapter (ver. 7) it appears that gilding was known before the settlement in Canaan. The ark (Exod. xxxvii, 2) was overlaid with pure gold within and without. The cherubim were wrought (“beaten,” Exod. xxxvii, 7) in gold. The candlestick was of beaten gold (verses 17, 22). Wire-drawing was probably understood (Exod. xxxviii, 4; xxxix, 3). Covering with brass (Exod. xxxviii, 2) and with silver (Prov. xxvi, 23) was practised. Architecture and the kindred arts do not appear to have made much progress till the days of Solomon, who employed an incredible number of persons to procure timber (1 Kings v, 13 sq.); but the men of skill for building his temple he obtained from Hiram, King of Tyre (1 Kings v sq.; 1 Chron. xiv, 1; 2 Chron. ii, 7). Without pursuing the subject into all its details (see Scholz, Handb. der Bib. Archæol. p. 390 sq.; De Wette, Lehrb. der Archæol. p. 115 sq.), we remark that the intercourse which the Babylonish captivity gave the Jews seems to have greatly improved their knowledge and skill in both the practical and the fine arts, and to have led them to hold them in very high estimation. The arts were even carried on by persons of learning, who took a title of honor from their trade (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi, 42). It was held a sign of a bad education if a father did not teach his son some handicraft: “Whoever does not teach his son a trade, teaches him robbing” (Lightfoot, p. 616; Mishna, Pirke Aboth, ii, 2; Wagenseil’s Sota, p. 597; Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 491).

In the Apocrypha and New Testament there are mentioned tanners (Acts ix, 43), tent-makers (Acts xviii, 3); in Josephus (War, v, 4, 1), cheese-makers; domestics (κομψις, Ant. xvi, 11, 5); in the Talmud, with others, we find tailors, shoe-makers, blood-letters, glaziers, goldsmiths, plasterers. Certain handicraftsmen could never rise to the rank of high-priest (Mishna, Kühush, lxxxii, 1), such as weavers, barbers, fullers, perfumers, cuppers, tanners; which pursuits, especially the last, were held in disesteem (Mishna, Megillah, iii, 2; Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 155; Weststein, N. T. ii, 516). In large cities particular localities were set apart for particular trades, as is the case in the East to the present day. Thus in Jeremiah (xxxvii, 21) we read of “the bakery’s street.” So in the Talmud (Mishna, v, 169, 225) mention is made of a flesh-market; in Josephus (War, v, 4, 1), of a cheese-market; and in the New Testament (John v, 2) we read of a sheep-market, or at least a sheep-gate, which, like several other gates [see JERUSALEM], appears to have been named from some special tazaar (q. v.) adjoining. (See Iken, Antiq. Hebr. iii-ix, p. 578 sq.; Bellermann, Handb. i, 22 sq.)—Kitto, ii, 808. See MECHANIC.

Artillery (ἄρτε, kal’, apparatus, elsewhere rendered “vessel,” “instrument,” etc.) occurs in 1 Sam. xx, 40, where it signifies collectively any missile weapons, as arrows and lances. See ARMOR. In 1 Mac. vi, 51, the term so rendered is βελῳναρις, i. e. ballista, or “catapult,” a machine for hurling darts or stones. See ENGINE.

Artomächy (q. d. ἀγορευμαχία, dispute respecting bread, from ἄροτος and μάχη), a controversy respecting the bread of the Eucharist, originated in 1053 by Michael Cerularius. This dispute existed between the Greek and Latin churches; the former contending that the bread used should be leavened, the latter urging the necessity of being unleavened bread. Protestant writers have taken part with the Greek Church in this controversy. Early Christian writers make no mention of the use of unleavened bread; the same kind of bread was eaten in the agape that was consecrated for the Eucharist, viz., common bread. Leavened bread appears to have been in use when Epiphanius and Ambrose wrote. Unleavened bread was generally discontinued at the Reformation; but the Lutherans retain it; Farrar, Ecol. Diet. s. v. See AZYMITES.

Artotyritæ (q. d. ἀροτοτυριται, from ἄροτος, bread, and τυρις, cheese), a branch of the Montanists, who first appeared in the second century. They used bread and cheese in the Eucharist; or, perhaps, bread baked with cheese. The reason assigned was, according to Augustine (Har. cap. xxviii), that the first men offered to God not only the fruits of the earth, but of their flocks also. The Artotyritæ admitted women to the priesthood, and even consecrated them bishops.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xv, 2, 8; Epiphanius, Har. xlix; Farrar, Ecol. Diet. s. v.

Arts, one of the faculties in which degrees are conferred in the universities. The circle of the arts was formerly divided into the Trivium, viz. grammar, rhetoric, and logic; and the Quadrivium, viz. arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. It now includes all branches not technical or professional.—Hook, Church Dict. s. v. See DEGREES; UNIVERSITIES.

Ar'uboth (Heb. Aruboth, אֲרֻבוֹת, a lattice; Sept. Ἀροῦβόθ), a city or district, probably in the tribe of Judah (or Simeon), being the third of Solomon's purveyors, under the charge of Heseed or Ben-Heseed, and including Socoh and Hepher within its limits (1 Kings iv, 10). Schwarz (Palest. p. 237) fancies it is represented by the modern village and wady Robith in the limits of Zebulun; but the associated names indicate the region Jebel Khalil, S. W. of Hebron.

Aruch (Heb. Aruch, אֲרוּחַ, arranged, sc. in alphabetical order), the title of a Talmudical lexicon, compiled by R. Nathan ben-Jechiel, who was rector of the synagogue at Rome A. D. 1106, according to the Chronicon "Zemach David", and who is usually styled by the Jewish writers אֲרוּחַ הַבַּיִת, Auctor Aruch (Buxtorf, Lex Talm. col. 1665). It was first published by Soucijn (Pesaro, 1517, fol.), and edited by Archinotti (Venice, 1531, 1533, fol.), Eekendorf (Basle, 1599, fol.), Musafia (Amst. 1655, fol.), and with Germ. notes by Landau (Prague, 1819-24, 5 vols. 8vo). See Fürst, Bib. Jud. iii, 29 sq.; Berlin, Addimenta zum Aruch (Vien. 1830-59, 2 vols. 8vo).

Aru'mah (Heb. Arumah, אֲרֻמָּה, prob. for Ramah, with א prosthetic; Sept. Ἀρῦμᾶ), a city apparently near Shechem, in which Abimelech the son of Gideon resided (Judg. ix, 41). It has been conjectured that the word in ver. 31, אֲרֻמָּה, rendered "privily," and in the margin "at Tornah," may signify "at Arumah" by changing the ט to an א. It seems to be confounded with Ramah (2 Kings xxiii, 36) by Euseb. and Jerome, who state (Onomat. s. v. Ruma) that it (Arvi, Arimv) was then called Rempis or Arimathra! The suggestion of Van de Veldt (Memoir, p. 288) appears to be correct that it is represented by the modern ruin El-Oremah, on the brow of a mountain S. E. of Shechem.

Arundel, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, was second son of Robert Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel and Warren, and was born at Arundel Castle in 1353. His powerful family connections gave him early promotion: at 20 he was archdeacon of Taunton, and in 1374 the pope nominated him to the vacant see of Ely, the king and the monks of Ely having, at the same time, respectively nominated two others; but Arundel was consecrated without dispute. In 1388 he was removed to the see of York, and was the first archbishop of that see who was translated to Canterbury, which was the case in 1396. Very shortly after Arundel was forced into banishment by Richard II, as an accomplice of his brother, the earl of Arundel (executed as a partisan of the duke of Gloucester), and Roger Walden was put into the chair of Canterbury, and acted as archbishop for about two years. (Johnson, Ecol. Canons, ii, A. D. 1398.) The archbishop, in the mean time, went to Rome, and afterward to Cologne. He figured largely in the political intrigues by which Richard was deposed, and on the accession of Henry IV, 1399, he was restored to his see. He was a great persecutor of the Wickliffites, and in 1408 he published, in convocation at Oxford, "Ten Constitutions against the Lollards." He established in that year an inquisition for heresy at Oxford, and put in force the statute de heretico comburendo (2 Hen. IV, ch. xv), and prohibited the circulation of the English Scriptures. He built the tower called the "Arundel Tower," and gave to the cathedral of Canterbury a chime of bells, known as "Arundel's ring," and was a great benefactor in many ways to the cathedral establishments. He died February 26th, 1413.—Collier, Ecol. Hist. of England, iii, 213-301.

Ar'vad (Heb. Arvad, אֲרָוָד, wandering; Sept. Ἀράδοι, but properly Ἀραῶδος, 1 Macc. xv, 23, or, as it might be spelt, ARUD, אֲרֻד, whence the present name Ruad), a small island and city on the coast of Syria, called by the Greeks Arabus (q. v.), by which name it is mentioned in the above passage of the Apocrypha. It is a rocky islet, opposite the mouth of the river Eleutherus (Mel. ii, 7), 50 miles to the north of Tripoli (Hin. Antou.), about one mile in circumference (Curt. iv, 1, 6), and two miles (Pliny, v, 17) from the shore (Rosenmüller, Handb. Bibl. Alt. II, i, 7; Mannert, VI, i, 398; Pococke, East. ii, 292 sq.; Hamesveld, iii, 44 sq.). Strabo (xvi, p. 753) describes it as a rock rising in the midst of the waves; and modern travellers state that it is steep on every side. (See Volney, ii, 131; Niebuhr, Reisen, iii, 92; Buckingham, ii, 435; Chesney, Euphrat. Exped. i, 451; Shaw, p. 232.) Strabo also describes the houses as exceedingly lofty, and they were doubtless so built on account of the scantiness of the site; hence, for its size, it was exceedingly populous (Pomp. Mel., ii, 7, 6). Those of the Arvadites whom the island could not accommodate found room in the town and district of Antaradus (q. v.), on the opposite coast, which also belonged to them (Targ. Hieros. in Gen. x, 18). Arvad is usually regarded as the same with Arpad (q. v.) or Arphad (but see Michaelis, Oriental. Bibl. viii, 45). It is mentioned in Ezek. xxvii, 8, 11, as furnishing mariners and soldiers for Tyre, which was situated on the shore opposite. In agreement with this is the mention of "the Arvadite" (q. v.) in Gen. x, 18, and 1 Chron. i, 16, as a son of Canaan, with Zidon, Hamath, and other northern localities. It was founded, according to Strabo (xvi, 2, § 13), by fugitives from Sidon (comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 6, 2); hence probably the etymology of the name as above. Tarsus was settled by a colony from it (Dion Chrys. Orat. Tarsen. ii, 20, ed. Reiske). Although originally independent (Arrian, Alex. ii, 90), and, indeed, the metropolis of the strip of land adjoining it, it eventually fell under the power of Persia, but assisted the Macedonians in the siege of Tyre (Arrian, Anab. i, 13, 20). It thence passed into the hands of the Ptolemies (B. C. 320); but, regaining its liberty under Seleucus Callinicus (B. C. 242), it attained such importance as to form an alliance with Antiochus the Great (Eckhel, Doctr. num. i, 393). Antiochus Epiphanes, Coin of Aradus.

however, took forcible mastery over it (Jerome in Dan. xi), and after becoming involved in the broils of his successors, it finally came under the power of Tigranes, and with his fall became subject to Rome, into whose triumphal wars its history enters (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv, 69; v, 1). Under the Emperor Constans, Muawiyeh, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, destroyed the city and expelled its inhabitants (Cedren, Hist. p. 355; Theophan. p. 227). It was not rebuilt in mediæval times (Mignot, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscrip. xxxiv, 229). The curious submarine springs from which the ancient city was supplied with water (Strabo, ed. Groskurd, p. 754 n.) have been partially discovered (Walpole, Insularii, iii, 391). The site is now covered, except a small space on the east side, with heavy castles, within which resides a maritime population of about 2000 souls. On the very margin of the sea there are the remains of double Phœnician walls, of huge bevelled stones, which mark it as being anciently a very strong place (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1818, p. 251). The nautical pursuits of the inhabitants, attested also by Strabo (ut sup.), remain in full force (see Allen's Dead Sea, ii, 183, at the end of which vol. may be found a plan of the island, from the Admiralty Charts, 2050, "Island of Kud"). See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

Arvadite (Heb. Arvad', אַרְוַדִּי, Sept. Ἀρᾶδιος, Gen. x, 18; 1 Chron. i, 16), an inhabitant of the island Aradus or ARVAD (q. v.) (so Josephus explains Ἀρῶται, Ant. i, 6, 2), and doubtless also of the neighboring coast. The Arvadites were descended from one of the sons of Canaan (Gen. x, 18). Strabo (xvi, 731) describes the Arvadites as a colony from Sidon. They were noted mariners (Ezek. xxvii, 8, 11; Strabo, xvi, 754), and formed a distinct state, with a king of their own (Arrian, Exped. Alex. ii, 90); yet they appear to have been in some dependence upon Tyre, for the prophet represents them as furnishing their contingent of mariners to that city (Ezek. xxvii, 8, 11). The Arvadites took their full share in Phœnician maritime traffic, particularly after Tyre and Sidon had fallen under the dominion of the Græco-Syrian kings. They early entered into alliance with the Romans, and Aradus is mentioned among the states to which the consul Lucius formally made known the league which had been contracted with Simon Maccabæus (1 Macc. xv, 23).

Ar'za (Heb. Artsa', אַרְצָא, an Aramæan form, the earth; Sept. Ἐρᾶά v. r. Ἀρᾶά), a steward over the house of Elah, king of Israel, in whose house at Tirzah, Zimri, the captain of the half of the chariots, conspired against Elah, and killed him during a drinking debauch (1 Kings xvi, 9), B.C. 926.

Arzan, an Armenian writer (died A. D. 459), who translated into the lan. arm. of his country the works of Athanasius.—Hoefer, Bing. Gén. iii, 409.

As'a (Heb. Asa', אֲסָא, healing, or physician), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀσά, Josephus, Ἀσαρος.) The son of Abijah, grandson of Rehoboam, and third king of the separate kingdom of Judah (1 Kings xv; 2 Chron. xiv-xvi; Matt. i, 7, 8). He began to reign two years before the death of Jeroboam, in Israel, and he reigned forty-one years (B.C. 953-912). As Asa was very young at his accession, the affairs of the government were administered by his mother, or, according to some (comp. 1 Kings xv, 1, 10), his grandmother Maachah, who is understood to have been a granddaughter of Absalom. See MAACHAH. But the young king, on assuming the reins of government, was conspicuous for his earnestness in supporting the worship of God, and rooting out idolatry with its attendant immoralities, and for the vigor and wisdom with which he provided for the prosperity of his kingdom. In his zeal against heathenism he did not spare his grandmother Maachah, who occupied the special dignity of "King's Mother," to which great importance was attached in the Jewish court, as afterward in Persia, and to which parallels have been found in modern Eastern countries, as in the position of the Sultana Valide in Turkey (see 1 Kings ii, 19; 2 Kings xxiv, 12; Jer. xxix, 2; also Calmet, Frogs, xvi; and Bruce's Travels, ii, 537, and iv, 244). She had set up some impure worship in a grove (the word translated "idol," 1 Kings xv, 13, is אֲשֵׁרָה, a frigit or horrible image, while in the Vulg. we read ne esset [Maachah] principes in sacris Priap); but Asa burnt the symbol of her religion, and threw its ashes into the brook Kidron, as Moses had done to the golden calf (Exod. xxxii, 20), and then deposed Maachah from her dignity. He also placed in the Temple certain gifts which his father had dedicated, probably in the earlier and better period of his reign [see AELJAH], and which the heathen priests must have used for their own worship, and renewed the great altar which they apparently had desecrated (2 Chron. xv, 8) during his minority and under the preceding reigns, and only the altars in the "high-places" were suffered to remain (1 Kings xv, 11-13; 2 Chron. xiv, 2-5). He neglected no human means of putting his kingdom in the best possible military condition, for which ample opportunity was afforded by the peace which he enjoyed for ten years (B.C. 938-928) in the middle of his reign. His resources were so well organized, and the population had so increased, that he fortified cities on his frontiers, and raised an army amounting, according to 2 Chron. xiv, 8, to 580,000 men; but the uncertainty attaching to the numbers in our present text of Chronicles has been pointed out by Kennicott and by Davidson (Introduction to the O. T. p. 686), who consider that the copyists were led into error by the different modes of marking them, and by confounding the different letters which denoted them, bearing as they do a great resemblance to each other. See NUMBER. Thus Asa's reign marks the return of Judah to a consciousness of the high destiny to which God had called her, and to the belief that the Divine power was truly at work within her. The good effects of this were visible in the 13th year of his reign, when, relying upon the Divine aid, Asa attacked and defeated the numerous host of the Cushite king Zerah (q. v.), who had penetrated through Arabia Petraea into the vale of Zephathab with an immense host, reckoned at a million of men (which Josephus reduces, however, to 90,000 infantry and 100,000 cavalry, Ant. viii, 12, 1) and 300 chariots (2 Chron. xiv, 9-15). As the triumphant Judahites were returning, laden with spoil, to Jerusalem, they were met by the prophet Azariah, who declared this splendid victory to be a consequence of Asa's confidence in Jehovah, and exhorted him to persevere. Thus encouraged, the king exerted himself during the ten ensuing years of tranquillity to extirpate the remains of idolatry, and caused the people to renew their covenant with Jehovah (2 Chron. xv, 1-15). It was this clear knowledge of his dependent political position, as the vicergerent of Jehovah, which won for Asa the highest praise that could be given to a Jewish king—that he walked in the steps of his ancestor David (1 Kings xv, 11). Nevertheless, toward the latter end of his reign (the numbers in 2 Chron. xv, 19, and xvi, 1, should be 25th and 26th) the king failed to maintain the character he had thus acquired. When Baasha, king of Israel, had renewed the war between the two kingdoms, and had taken Ramah, which he was proceeding to fortify as a frontier barrier, Asa, the conqueror of Zerah, was so far wanting to his kingdom and his God as to employ the wealth of the Temple and of the royal treasury to induce the King of Syria (Damascus) to make a diversion in his favor by invading the dominions of Baasha (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). By this means he recovered Ramah, indeed; but his treasures were squandered, and he incurred the rebuke of the prophet Hanani, whom he cast into prison, being, as it seems, both alarmed and enraged at the effect his address was calculated to produce upon the people. Other persons (who had probably manifested their disapprobation) also suffered from his anger (1 Kings xv, 16-22; 2 Chron. xvi, 1-10). The prophet threatened Asa with war, which appears to have been fulfilled by the continuance for some time of that with Baasha, as we infer from an allusion, in 2 Chron. xvii, 2, to the cities of Ephraim which he took, and which can hardly refer to any events prior to the destruction of Ramah. In the last three years of his life Asa was afflicted with a grievous "disease in his feet," probably the gout [see DISEASE]; and it is mentioned to his reproach that he placed too much confidence in his physicians (q. v.), i. e. he acted in an arrogant and independent spirit, and without seeking God's blessing on their remedies. At his death, however, it appeared that his popularity had not been substantially impaired, for he was honored with a funeral of unusual cost and magnificence (2 Chron. xvi, 11-14; with which 1 Kings xv, 24, does not conflict). He was succeeded by his son Jehoshaphat. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

2. (Sept. 'Ossá.) A Levite, son of Elkana and father of Berechiah, which last was one of those who returned in the villages of the Netophathites on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 16). B.C. ante 536.

Asadías (Ασαΐας, i. e. Hasadiah), the son of Cheleias and father of Sedecias in the ancestry of Baruch (q. v.), according to the apocryphal book that bears his name (Bar. i, 1). Comp. 1 Chr. iii, 21.

Asæ'as (or rather Asai'as, 'Ασαιας), one of the "sons" of Annas that divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (1 Esdr. ix, 32); evidently the ISHTAIH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 31).

As'aëli (or rather A'siel, 'Ασιήλ, prob. for Jahziel), the father of Gabaël, of the tribe of Naphtali, among the ancestors of Tobit (Tob. i, 1).

As'ahel (Heb. Asub-el', אֲשׁוּב־עֵל, creature of God), the name of four men.

1. (Sept. 'Ασαιήλ, Josephus, 'Ασαιήλος, Ant. vii, 3, 1.) The youngest son of David's sister Zeruiah (2 Sam. ii, 18), and brother of Joab and Abishai (1 Chron. ii, 16). He was one of David's early adherents (2 Sam. xxiii, 24), and with his son Zebadiah was commander of the fourth division of the royal army (1 Chron. xxvii, 7). He was noted for his swiftness of foot, a gift much valued in ancient times (comp. Iliad, xv, 570; Plutarch, Vit. Romuli, 25; Liv. ix, 16; Curt. vii, 7, 32; Veget. Mil. i, 9); and after the battle at Gibeon he pursued and overtook Abner (q. v.), who, with great reluctance, in order to preserve his own life, slew him by a back-thrust with the sharp iron heel of his spear, B.C. cir. 1051 (2 Sam. ii, 18-23). To revenge his death, his brother Joab some years after treacherously killed Abner, who had come to wait on David at Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 26, 27). See JOAB.

2. (Sept. 'Ασαιήλ v. r. 'Ισαιήλ.) One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people of Judah the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xvii, 8). B.C. 909.

3. (Sept. 'Ασαιήλ.) One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah as overseer of the contributions to the house of the Lord (2 Chron. xxxi, 13). B.C. 726.

4. (Sept. 'Ασαιήλ.) The father of Jonathan, which latter was one of the elders who assisted Ezra in putting away the foreign wives of the Jews on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 15). B.C. ante 459.

Asai'ah. See ASALAH, 3.

Asai'ah (Heb. Asayah', אֲסַיָּה, constituted by Jehovah; Sept. 'Ασαια or 'Ασαιας v. r. 'Ασά in 1 Chron. ix, 5), the name of four men.

1. The son of Hag-ziah (1 Chron. vi, 30) and chief of the 220 Levites of the family of Merari, appointed by David to remove the ark of the covenant from the house of Obed-edom, and afterward to take charge of the singing exercises (1 Chron. xv, 6, 11). B.C. cir. 1043.

2. The head of one of the families of the tribe of Simeon, mentioned in 1 Chron. iv, 36, as dispossessing the descendants of Ham from the rich pastures near Gedor in the time of Hezekiah, B.C. cir. 712.

3. A servant of Josiah, sent with others to consult the prophetess Huldah concerning the book of the law found in the Temple (2 Kings xxii, 12, 14 [where the name is less correctly Anglicized "Asahiah"]; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 20). B.C. 623.

4. The "first-born" of the Shilonites (q. v.) who returned to Jerusalem after the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 5). B.C. 536. See MAASELAH 9.

Asámon (Ασαμών), a mountain in the central part of Galilee, opposite Sepphoris, where the rebels from this city having taken refuge, were destroyed by the Roman general Gallus (Josephus, War, ii, 18, 11).

It is thought by Robinson (Later Bib. Res. p. 77) to be the broken ridge which commences with the high summit of Jebel Kaukab on the W. and runs eastward along the N. side of the plain El-Buttauf (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 288).

Asamonean, Asamonæus. See ASMONEAN.

As'ana (Ασανά), a man (or place) whose "sons" (servants of the Temple) returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the ASNAH (q. v.) of Ezra ii, 50, rather than the ASNAH (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 33 or 43.

A'saph (Heb. Asaph', אֲסַפֵּה, assembler; Sept. 'Ασάφ), the names of three persons. See ELIASAPH.

1. A Levite of the family of Gershon (see below), son of Barachiah (1 Chron. vi, 39; xv, 17), eminent as a musician, and appointed by David to preside over the sacred choral services which he organized (1 Chron. xvi, 5). B.C. 1014. The "sons of Asaph" are afterward mentioned as chorists of the Temple (1 Chron. xxv, 1, 2; 2 Chron. xx, 14; xxix, 13; Ezra ii, 41; iii, 10; Neh. vii, 44; xi, 22); and this office appears to have been made hereditary in his family (1 Chron. xxv, 1, 2). Asaph was celebrated in after times as a prophet (תַּיִר, seer) and poet (2 Chron. xxix, 30; Neh. xii, 46), and the titles of twelve of the Psalms (l, lxxiii, to lxxxiii) bear his name, in some of which he evidently stands (as a patronymic, Neh. xi, 17) for the Levites generally (see Huettli Demonstr. cr. p. 332; Berthold, v, 1956; Herder, Ebr. Poësie, ii, 331; comp. Niemeyer, Charakterist. iv, 356 sq.; Carpoz, Introd. 103 sq.; Eichhorn, Ebd. v, 17 sq.); or he may have been the founder of a school of poets and musical composers, who were called after him "the sons of Asaph" (comp. the Homeridae). See PSALMS. The following is his ancestry (see Reinhard, De Asapho, Vien. 1742).

2. The "father" of Joah, which latter was "recorder" in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 18, 37; Isa. xxxvi, 3, 22). B.C. ante 726. Perhaps i. q. No. 1.

3. A "keeper of the king's forests" (prob. in Lebanon), to whom Nehemiah requested of Artaxerxes Longimanus an order for timber to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem (Neh. ii, 8). B.C. 446.

Asaph's, Sr., a bishop's see in Flintshire, Wales, founded in the 6th century. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, three canons, two archdeacons, seven curial canons, and two minor canons. The present incumbent is Thomas Vowler Short, D.D., transferred from Sodor and Man in 1846.

Asar'eël (Heb. Asarel', אֲסַרְעֵל, bound by God, sc. under a vow; Sept. 'Εσραήλ v. r. 'Εσραήλ), the last named of the four sons of Jehaleleel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 16). B.C. prob. post 1618.

Asare'lah (Heb. Asharelah', אֲשַׁרְעֵלָה, upright before God; Sept. 'Εσραήλ v. r. 'Εραήλ, 'Ασαιήλ, 'Ασεραήλ), the last named of the four sons of the Levite Asaph, who were appointed by David in charge of the Temple music in connection with others (1 Chron. xxv, 2); elsewhere (ver. 14) called by the equivalent name JESHABELLAH (q. v.).

Asbury, Daniel, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Fairfax county, Va., Feb. 18, 1762. He served in the war of the Revolution, and soon after its close was converted. In 1786 he entered the itinerant ministry, and continued in it, with an interval of nine years, up to 1824, and during this long service his fidelity and diligence were signally manifest. He died suddenly in 1827.—Minutes of Conferences, i, 506; Sprague, Annals, vii, 127.

Asbury, Francis, the first bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church ordained in America, was born at Handsworth, Staffordshire, England, Aug. 20, 1745. His parents were pious Methodists, and trained him with religious care, so that it is no wonder that he was converted at thirteen. In his youth he sat under the ministry of Ryland, Hawes, and Venn, as well as of the Methodist preachers. He obtained the rudiments of education at the village school of Barre, and in his fourteenth year was apprenticed to a maker of "buckle-chapes." At sixteen he became a local preacher; at twenty-two he was received into the itinerant ministry by Mr. Wesley. In 1771 he was appointed missionary to America, and landed at Philadelphia, with the Rev. Richard Wright as his companion, on the 27th October in that year. The first Methodist church in America had been built three years before; and in 1771 the whole number of communicants was about 600, chiefly in Philadelphia and New York. The country was disturbed by political agitation, soon to develop into revolution. In 1772 Asbury was appointed Mr. Wesley's "general assistant in America," with power of supervision over all the preachers and societies, but was superseded in the year following by an older preacher from England, Mr. Rankin. When the war broke out Rankin returned to England; but Asbury, foreseeing the great work of the church in America, remained. He thought it would be an eternal disgrace to forsake in this time of trial the thousands of poor sheep in the wilderness who had placed themselves under the care of the Methodists, and, fully sympathizing with the cause of the struggling colonies, he resolved to remain and share the sufferings and the fate of the infant connection and of the country. Like many religious people of those times, he was, from conscientious scruples, a non-juror, as were all the other Methodist preachers, and also many of the clergy of the Episcopal Church, who yet chose to remain in the country. As their character and motives were not understood, they were exposed to much suffering and persecution. The Rev. F. Garretson and Joseph Hartley were imprisoned on the Eastern Shore of Maryland; Mr. Chew, also one of the preachers, being brought before the sheriff of one of the counties of the same state, and required to take the oath of allegiance, replied that scruples of conscience would not permit him to do so. The sheriff then informed him that he was bound by oath to execute the laws, and if he persisted in his refusal, no alternative was left but to commit him to prison. To this the prisoner answered very mildly that he by no means wished to be the cause of perjury, and was therefore perfectly resigned to hear the penalty. "You are a strange man," said the sheriff; "I cannot bear to punish you, and therefore my own house shall be your prison." He accordingly formally committed him to his own house, and kept him there three months. In the course of this time this gentleman and his wife were both converted to God, and joined the Methodist Church. On the 20th of June, 1776, Mr. Asbury, notwithstanding his extreme prudence, was arrested near Baltimore, and fined five pounds; and in March, 1778, he retired to the house of his friend, Thomas White, a judge of one of the courts of Delaware, where he remained comparatively secluded for ten months. Although his movements were now circumscribed, yet he was by no means idle, and remarks that it was "a season of the most active, the most useful, and the most suffering part of his life." Indeed, two years elapsed before he presumed to leave his retreat, and to travel extensively in the performance of his duties as superintendent; when, the authorities becoming convinced that there was no treason in the Methodist preachers, but that their scruples were of a religious, not of a political nature, and that they were merely intent upon preaching the gospel of peace as humble evangelists, they were permitted to exercise their functions unmolested. At the close of the war in 1783 there were 83 Methodist ministers in the work, with nearly 14,000 members. In 1784 the Methodist societies were organized into an Episcopal Church, four years before the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Mr. Asbury was elected bishop, and consecrated by Dr. Coke, who had been ordained in England by Wesley. From this time to the day of his death his whole life was devoted to the preaching of the Gospel and to the superintendence of the churches. His personal history is almost the history of the growth of Methodism in his time. His Journals (3 vols. 8vo) contain a wonderful record of apostolic zeal and fidelity, of a spirit of self-sacrifice rivalling that of the saints and martyrs of the early church, of an industry which no toils could weary, of a patience which no privations could exhaust. He remained unmarried through life, that he might not be hindered in his work. His salary was sixty-four dollars a year. His horses and carriages were given by his friends, all donations of money from whom he assigned to his fellow-sufferers and fellow-laborers. At one of the early Western Conferences, where the assembled itinerants presented painful evidences of want, he parted with his watch, his coat, and his shirts for them. He was asked by a friend to lend him fifty pounds. "He might as well have asked me for Peru," wrote the bishop. "I showed him all the money I had in the world, about twelve dollars, and gave him five." In spite of his defective education, he acquired a tolerable knowledge of Greek and Hebrew; but his wisdom was far greater than his learning. As early as 1785 he laid the foundation of the first Methodist college; and some time after he formed a plan for dividing the whole country into districts, with a classical academy in each. As a preacher, he was clear, earnest, pungent, and often powerfully eloquent. The monument of his organizing and administrative talent may be seen in the discipline and organization of the Methodist Church, which grew under his hands, during his lifetime, from a feeble band of 4 preachers and 316 members to nearly 700 itinerants, 2000 local preachers, and over 214,000 members. Within the compass of every year, the borderers of Canada and the planters of Mississippi looked for the coming of this primitive bishop, and were not disappointed. His travels averaged 6000 miles a year; and this not in a splendid carriage, over smooth roads; not with the ease and speed of the railway, but often through pathless forests and untravelled wildernesses; among the swamps of the South and the prairies of the West; amid the heats of the Carolinas and the snows of New England. There grew up under his hands an entire church, with fearless preachers and untrained members; but he governed the multitude as he had done the handful, with a gentle charity and an unflinching firmness. In diligent activity, no apostle, no missionary, no warrior ever surpassed him. He rivalled Melancthon and Luther in boldness. He combined the enthusiasm of Xavier with the far-reaching foresight and keen discrimination of Wesley. With a mind untrained in the schools, he yet seemed to seize upon truth by intuition; and though men might vanquish him in logic, they could not deny his conclusions. His unemit-ting labors exhausted a constitution originally frail; yet, with the old martyr spirit, he continued to travel and to preach, even when he was so weak that he had to be carried from the couch to the pulpit. He died in Spotsylvania, Va., March 31, 1816.

In Church History Francis Asbury deserves to be classed with the greatest propagators of Christianity in ancient or in modern times; and when the secular history of America comes to be faithfully written, his name will be handed down to posterity as having contributed, in no small degree, to the progress of civilization in the United States. In the language of Dr. Stevens, in the Knickerbocker Magazine (January, 1850), "He sent his preachers across the Alleghanies, and kept them in the very van of the westward march of emigration. The first 'ordination' in the valley of the Mississippi was performed by his hands; and it is a grave question what would have been the moral development of the mighty states throughout that imperial domain, had it not been for the brave 'itinerant' corps of Asbury, which carried and expounded the Bible among its log cabins at a time in our national history when it was absolutely impossible for the American churches to send thither regular or educated clergymen in any proportion to the growth of its population. If what is called the 'Methodist itinerancy' has done any important service for the moral salvation of that vast region, now the theatre of our noblest states, the credit is due, in a great measure, to the unparalleled energy of Francis Asbury. He not only pointed his preachers thither, but led the way. No records of American frontier adventure show greater endurance or courage than Asbury's travels beyond the mountains. Armed hunters, twenty-five or fifty in number, used to escort him from point to point to protect him from the Indians, and great were the gatherings and grand the jubilees wherever he appeared."—Asbury, Journals (N. Ascension of CHRIST, his visible passing from earth to heaven in the presence of his disciples, on the Mount of Olives, forty days after the resurrection (Mark xvi, 19; Luke xxiv, 50, 51; Acts i, 1-11). (1) The ascension was a necessary consequence of the resurrection. Had Christ died a natural death, or simply disappeared from view in obscurity, the resurrection, as a proof of Divine power, would have gone for nothing. It was essential that He should "die no more," so as to demonstrate forever his victory over death. (2) It was predicted in the O. T. in several striking passages (e. g. Psa. xxiv, lxxviii, ciii, cx); and also by Christ himself (John vi, 62; xx, 17). (3) It was pre-figured in the patriarchal dispensation by the translation of Enoch (Gen. v, 24; Heb. xi, 5); and in the Jewish, by the translation of Elijah (2 Kings ii, 11); so that each of the three dispensations have had a visible proof of the immortal destiny of human nature. (4) The fact of the ascension is given by two evangelists only; but John presupposes it in the passages above cited. It is referred to, and doctrines built upon it, by the apostles (2 Cor. xiii, 4; Eph. ii, 6; iv, 10; 1 Pet. iii, 22; 1 Tim. iii, 16; Heb. vi, 20). "The evidences of this occurrence were numerous: the disciples saw him ascend (Acts i, 9); two angels testified that he did ascend (Acts i, 10, 11); Stephen, Paul, and John saw him in his ascended state (Acts vii, 55, 56; ix, 3-5; Rev. i, 9-18); the ascension was demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Ghost (John xvi, 7-14; Acts ii, 33); and had been prophesied by our Lord himself (Matt. xxvi, 64; John viii, 21). (5) The time of Christ's ascension was forty days after his resurrection. He continued that number of days upon earth in order that he might give repeated proofs of the fact of his resurrection (Acts i, 3), and instruct his apostles in every thing of importance respecting their office and ministry, opening to them the Scriptures concerning himself (Mark xvi, 15; Acts i, 5-8). (6) As to the manner of his ascension, it was from Mt. Olivet, not in appearance only, but in reality, and that visibly and locally. It was sudden, swift, glorious, and in a triumphant manner. See GLOBIFICATION. He was parted from his disciples while he was solemnly blessing them, and multitudes of angels attended him with shouts of praise (Psa. xxiv, 7-10; xvii, 5, 6; lxxviii, 18)" (Watson, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.). (7) Its results to the church are: (a) the assumption of regal dominion by Christ, the head of the church (Heb. x, 12, 13; Eph. iv, 8, 10; Psa. lxxviii); (b) the gift of the Holy Spirit (John xvi, 7, 14; Acts ii, 33; John xv, 16-19); (c) the intercession of Christ, as mediator, at the right hand of God (Rom. viii, 34; Heb. vi, 20).

The 3d Article of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church runs thus: "Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all men at the last day." The corresponding article of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the same, omitting the words "with flesh, bones, and;" an omission which does not affect the substance of the article. Browne's note on this article is as follows: "It is clear" (from the account in the Gospel) that "our Lord's body, after he rose from the grave, was that body in which he was buried, having hands and feet, and flesh and bones, capable of being handled, and in which he spoke, and ate, and drank (Luke xxiv, 42, 43). Moreover, it appears that our Lord thus showed his hands and feet to his disciples at that very interview with them in which he was parted from them and received up into heaven. This will be seen by reading the last chapter of St. Luke from verse 36 to the end, and comparing it with the first chapter of the Acts, verse 4-9; especially comparing Luke xxiv, 49, 50, with Acts i, 4, 8, 9. In that body, then, which the disciples felt and handled, and which was proved to them to have flesh and bones, these disciples saw our Lord ascend into heaven; and, immediately after his ascent, angels came and declared to them that that 'same Jesus whom they had seen taken up into heaven should so come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven' (Acts i, 11). All this, connected together, seems to prove the identity of our Lord's body after his resurrection, at his ascension, and so on, even till his coming to judgment, with the body in which he suffered, and in which he was buried, and so fully justifies the language used in the article of our church. But because we maintain that the body of Christ, even after his resurrection and ascension, is a true human body, with all things pertaining to the perfection of man's nature (to deny which would be to deny the important truth that Christ is still perfect man as well as perfect God), it by no means, therefore, follows that we should deny that his risen body is now a glorified, and, as St. Paul calls it, a spiritual body.

"But, after his ascension, we have St. Paul's distinct assurance that the body of Christ is a glorious, is a spiritual body. In 1 Cor. xv, we have St. Paul's assertion that, in the resurrection of all men, the body shall rise again, but that it shall no longer be a natural body, but a spiritual body; no longer a corrupt-ble and vile, but an incorruptible and glorious body (1 Cor. xv. 42-53); and this change of our bodies from natural to spiritual is expressly stated to be bearing the image of our glorified Lord—the image of that heavenly man the Lord from heaven (ver. 47-49). So, again, the glorified state of the saint's bodies after the resurrection, which in 1 Cor. xv. had been called the receiving a spiritual body, is in Phil. iii. 21 said to be a fashioning of their bodies to the likeness of Christ's glorious body: 'who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.' We must therefore conclude that, though Christ rose with the same body in which he died, and that body neither did nor shall cease to be a human body, still it acquired, either at his resurrection or at his ascension, the qualities and attributes of a spiritual as distinguished by the apostle from a natural body, of an incorruptible as distinguished from a corruptible body" (On Thirty-nine Articles, p. 115).

Ascension Day, or HOLY THURSDAY, a festival of the church held in commemoration of the ascension of our Lord, forty days after Easter, and ten before Whitsuntide. Augustine (Ep., 54.) supposed it to be among the festivals instituted by the apostles themselves, but it was not observed in the church until the third century. It is also noticed in the Apostolical Constitutions. It is especially observed in the Roman Church, and also, though with less form, in the Church of England. It is one of the six days in the year for which the Church of England appoints special psalms.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl., bk. xx. cap. 6, § 5; Procter, On the Common Prayer-book, p. 288.

Asceterium (ἀσκητήριον), the place of retreat of ascetics; in later times, often applied to monasteries.—Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.

Asceticism, Ascetics. The name ἀσκητήριον (from ἀσκήω, to exercise) is borrowed from profane writers, by whom it is generally employed to describe the athletes, or men trained to the profession of gladiators or prize-fighters. In the early Christian church the name was given to such as injured themselves to greater degrees of fasting and abstinence than other men, in order to subdue or mortify their passions. See EXERCISE. The Christian ascetics were divided into abstinentes, or those who abstained from wine, meat, and agreeable food, and continentes, or those who, abstaining from matrimony also, were considered to attain to a higher degree of sanctity. Many laymen as well as ecclesiastics were ascetics in the first centuries of our era, without retiring on that account from the business and bustle of life. Some of them wore the pallium philosophicum, or the philosophic mantle, and were therefore called Christian philosophers, and formed thus the transition link to the life of hermits and monks. Romanist writers pretend that the ascetics were originally the same with monks; the monastic life, however, was not known till the fourth century (Pagi, Crit. in Bar., A.D. 62, N. 4). The difference between ascetics and monks may be thus stated: 1. The monks were such as retired from the business and conversation of the world to some desert or mountain; but the ascetics were of an active life, living in cities as other men, and only differing from them in the ardor of their devotional acts and habits. 2. The monks were only laymen; the ascetics were of any order. 3. The monks were bound by certain laws and disciplinary regulations; but the ancient ascetics had no such laws. The habits and exercises of the ascetics may nevertheless be regarded as the introduction of monasticism. The root of asceticism in the early Christian church is to be found in a Gnostic leaven, remaining from the early struggle of the church with Gnosticism (q. v.). The open Gnosticism was crushed; but its more seductive principle was imbibed, to a large extent, even by the best of the church fathers, and remained to plague Christianity for hundreds of years in the forms of asceticism, celibacy, monasticism, and the various superstitions of the same class in the Romish Church. That principle makes the "conditions of animal life, and the common alliances of men in the social system, the antithesis of the Divine perfections, and so to be escaped from, and derided by all who pant after the highest excellence." See Taylor, Ancient Christianity, vol. i. where this subject is treated at length and with great mastery of both history and philosophy. See ABSTINENCE; FASTING; MONKS.

As soon as the inward and spiritual life of the Christians declined, the tendency to rely on external acts and forms increased; and if the previous bloody persecutions had driven individuals from human society into the deserts, the growing secularization of the church, after Christianity became the state religion, had the same effect to a still greater degree. All this paved the way for monasticism (q. v.); and the church thought herself compelled by the overwhelming tide of opinion within and without to recognise this form of asceticism, and to take it under her protection and care. From the African Church a gloomy and superstitious spirit spread over the Western Church, intensifying the ascetic tendencies. There were not wanting healthier minds—as Vigilantius (q. v.) and others—to raise their voices against fasting, monkery, and the outward works of asceticism generally; but such protests were vain, and became ever rarer. From the 11th century, the Cathari, Waldenses, and other sects assailed the external asceticism of the church; the classic Petrarch fought on the same side; and so did Wickliffe, Huss, and Jerome of Prague, in their struggles at reformation. After a preliminary skirmish by Erasmus, the struggle was decided in the Reformation of the 16th century. The fundamental principle of that movement, that salvation is secured by justification through faith, and not through dead works, struck at the root of monkery and mortification in general. But the victory has not been so complete as is often assumed. The ascetic spirit often shows itself still alive under various disguises even in Protestantism. See SHAKERS. The great error of asceticism is to hold self-denial and suffering to be meritorious in the sight of God, in and for itself. Its germinant principle, in all ages of the church, has been, as stated above, a Gnostic way of viewing the relations between God, man, and nature, tending to dualism and to the confounding of sin with the very nature of matter. ASCŌITÆ (q. d. ἀσκήται, repleti) or ASCODGITÆ, heretics who appeared in Galatia about 173. They pretended to be filled with the "paraclete" of Montanus, and introduced bacchanalian indecencies into the churches, where they brought a skin of wine, and, marching round it, declared that they were the vessels filled with new wine of which the Lord speaks in the Gospels. Hence their name from the Greek ἀσκή, which means "a skin."—Augustine, Har. 62; Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 566. See MONTANISTS.

Ascough, or, according to Godwin, "WILLIAM AYSOUTH, doctor of laws and clerk of the council, was consecrated in the chapel of Windsor, July 20, 1438. The year 1450 it happened the commons to arise in sundry parts of the realm, by the stirring of Jack Cade, naming himself John Mortimer. A certain number of lewd persons (tenants for the most part to this bishop), intending to join themselves to the rest of that crew, came to Evendon, where he was then saying of mass. What was their quarrel to him I find not. But certain it is, they drew him from the altar in his alms, with his stole about his neck, to the top of a hill not far off, and there, as he knelt on his knees praying, they cleft his head, spoiled him to the skin, and, rending his bloody shirt into a number of pieces, took every man a rag to keep for a monument of their worldly exploit. The day before they had robbed his carriages of 10,000 marks in ready money. This barbarous murder was committed June 29th, the year aforesaid." Dr. Fuller supposes that the bishop was attacked because he was "learned, pious, and rich, three capital crimes in a clergyman." He also gives us the following distich, which may be applicable in other times:

"Sic concusso editi populari mitra tumultu, Protogat optatum nunc diadema Deus.

"By people's fury mitres thus cast down
We pray henceforward God preserve the crown."

Asebebi'a (Ἀσεβηβία), one of the Levites who, with his sons, joined the caravan under Ezra (1 Esdr. viii, 47); evidently the SHEREBIAH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra viii, 18).

Asebi'a (Ἀσεβία), another of the Levites who returned in Ezra's party to Palestine (1 Esdr. viii, 48); evidently the HANABIAH (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra vii, 19).

As'enath (Heb. Asenath, אֲסַנַּת, on the signification see below; Sept. Ἀσενθ v. r. Ἀσενθίς), the daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, whom the king of Egypt bestowed in marriage upon Joseph (Gen. xli, 45; xlvii, 20), with the view probably of strengthening his position in Egypt by this high connection, B. C. 1883. See JOSEPH. She became the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xli, 50). No better etymology of Asenath has been proposed than that by Jablonski, who (Panth. Egypt. i, 56; Opuscul. ii, 208) regards it as representative of a Coptic compound, Asshenit. The latter part of this word he takes to be the name of Neith, the titular goddess of Sais, the Athene of the Greeks, and considers the whole to mean worshipper of Neith. Gesenius, in his Thesaurus, suggests that the original Coptic form was Asneith, which means who belongs to Neith. That the name refers to this goddess is the generally received opinion (in modern times Von Bohlen alone has, in his Gausis, proposed an unsatisfactory Shemitic etymology [see Lepsius, Chron. d. Egypt. i, 382]); it is favored by the fact that the Egyptians, as Jablonski has shown, were accustomed to choose names expressive of some relation to their gods; and it appears liable to no stronger objection than the doubt whether the worship of Neith existed at so early a period as that of the composition of the Book of Genesis (see Champollion, Pantheon Egyptienne, No. 6). Even this doubt is now removed, as it appears that she was really one of the primitive deities of Lower Egypt (Bunsen, Egypt's Place, i, 399), for her name occurs as an element in that of Nitocris (Neith-akri), a queen of the sixth dynasty (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 142, note 2).

A'ser (Ἀσίρη), the Græcized form of ASHER (q. v.), both the tribe (Luke ii, 36; Rev. vii, 6) and the city (Tobit i, 2).

Ase'rer (Σεράρ), one of the heads of the temple-servants that returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 32); evidently the SISERA (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 53).

Asgill, JOHN, member of the Irish Parliament, and author of an eccentric book entitled An Argument proving that, according to the Covenant of eternal Life revealed in the Scriptures, Man may be translated hence into that eternal Life without passing through Death, although the humane Nature of Christ himself could not thus be translated till he had passed through Death (Dublin, 1698, 8vo). The Irish Parliament voted it a blasphemous libel, and expelled Asgill from the House after four days. In 1705 he entered the English Parliament as member for Bramber, in Sussex. But the English House, resolving to be not less virtuous than the Irish, condemned his book to be burnt by the common hangman as profane and blasphemous, and expelled Asgill on the 18th December, 1707. After this his circumstances rapidly grew worse, until at last he found something like peace in the King's Bench and the Fleet, between which two places his excursions were confined for the term of his natural life. He died in November, 1738. See Southey, The Doctor, pt. ii; Coleridge, Works (Harpers' ed.), vol. v; Allibone, i, 73.

Ash (אֵשׁ, ó'ren, probably tremulous, from the motion of the leaves) occurs only once in Scripture as the name of a tree, in connection with other trees, of whose timber idols were made, Isa. xlv, 14: "He beweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest; he planteth an ash (oren), and the rain doth nourish it." Others consider pinu-tree to be the correct translation; but for neither does there appear to be any decisive proof, nor for the rubus or bramble adopted for oren in the fable of the Cedar and Rubus, translated from the Hebrew of R. Berechiah Hannakdan by Celsius (Microbot. i, 186). Oren is translated pinu-tree both in the Sept. (πινυρ) and the Vulg., and this has been acquiesced in by several of the most learned critics, and among them by Calvin and Bochart. Celsius (at sup. p. 191) states, moreover, that some of the rabbins also consider oren to be the same as the Arabic sunaber (which is no doubt a pine), and that they often join together orenim, orenim, and beroshim, as trees of the same nature (אֲשֵׁי הָעֵץ הַיָּבֵשׁ אֲשֵׁי הָעֵץ הַיָּבֵשׁ אֲשֵׁי הָעֵץ הַיָּבֵשׁ, "cedars" and "ash-trees" and "cypresses," Talmud Babyl. Para. fol. xcvi, 1). Luther and the Portuguese version read cedar. Rosenmüller (Alberth. IV, i, 243 sq.; comp. Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 152) contends that it is not the common wild pine (Pinus sylvestris) which is intended, but what the ancients called the domestic pine, which was raised in gardens on account of its elegant shape and the pleasant fruit it yields, the Pignole nuts of the Italians (Panus pinea of Linnaeus), and quots Virgil (Ecl. vii, 65; Georg. iv, 112). The English version, in the translation of oreo, follows those interpreters who have adopted ornus, apparently only because the elementary letters of the Hebrew are found also in the Latin word. See PIXE. Celsius objects to this as an insufficient reason for supposing that the ash was introduced; and there does not appear to be any other proof. Ornus Europaea, or manna ash (Frazæus ornus, Linnaeus, Fl. rossensis, ii, 516), does, however, grow in Syria, but, being a cultivated plant, it may have been introduced. See MANNA. The common ash was anciently associated with the oak (Stat. Theb. vi, 102) as a hard (Ovid, Met. xii, 337; Lucan. vi, 390; Colum. xi, 2) and durable (Horace, Od. i, 9, 2) tree (Pliny, xvi, 30; Virg. Geo. ii, 65 sq.), of hardy growth (Virg. Geo. ii, 111; Æn. ii, 626). Celsius (ut sup. p. 192) quotes from the Arab author 'Abu-l-Fadli the description of a tree called aram, which appears well suited to the passage, though it has not yet been ascertained what tree is intended. The aram is said to be a tree of Arabia Petraea, of a thorny nature, inhabiting the valleys, but found also in the mountains, where it is, however, less thorny. The wood is said to be much valued for cleaning the teeth. The fruit is in bunches like small grapes. The berry is noxious while green, and bitter like galls; as it ripens it becomes red, then black and somewhat sweetish, and when eaten is grateful to the stomach, and seems to act as a stimulant medicine. Sprengel (Hist. reiherb. i, 14) supposes this to be the caper plant (Capparis spinosa of Linnaeus). Faber thought it to be the Rhamnus siculica pentaphyllus of Shaw. Link (in Schrader's Journ. f. Botan. iv, 252) identifies it with Flacourtia sepium of Roxburgh, a tree, however, which has not been found in Syria. It appears to agree in some respects with the Saleadora Persica, but not in all points, and therefore it requires further investigation by some traveller in Syria conversant both with plants and their Oriental names and uses.—KITTO. See BOTANY.

Ash. See ACTURUS; MOTH.

Ash, St. George, bishop of Derry, was born in 1658, became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, 1679, and provost of Trinity, 1692. He was appointed bishop of Cloyne in 1695, was translated to Clogher, 1697, and thence to Derry in 1716. He died in Dublin in 1717. He published a number of separate sermons, and contributed to the papers of the Royal Society, of which he was a member.

Ash, John, LL.D., an independent minister, was born in Dorsetshire, 1724. He devoted himself at first to mathematics, but afterward studied theology, and entered the ministry. He was associated with Dr. Caleb Evans in founding the "Bristol Education Society." He settled as pastor at Pershore, Worcester-shire, and devoted a large part of his time to the preparation of A New and Complete Dictionary of the English Language (2 vols. large 8vo, 1775), on an extended plan, and the best work of its class at the time. He also published Sentiments on Education (1777, 2 vols. 12mo);—The Dialogues of Erasmus;—Gentleman's Magazine, xlix, 215; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliograph. i, 113.

A'shan (Heb. אֲשָׁח, אֲשָׁח, smoke; Sept. Ἀσῶν; in 1 Chron. iv, 32, Ἀσῶν v. r. Ἀσῶ; in Josh. xv, 42, omits), a Levitical city in the low country of Judah named in Josh. xv, 42 with Libnah and Ether. In Josh. xiv, 7, and 1 Chron. iv, 32, it is mentioned again as belonging to Simeon, but in company with Ain and Rimmon, which (see Josh. xv, 31) appear to have been much more to the south. In 1 Chron. vi, 59, it is given as a priests' city, occupying (perhaps by error of transcription) the same place as the somewhat similar word Ash (אֲשָׁח) does in the list of Josh. xxi, 16. In 1 Sam. xxx, 30, the fuller form Chor-ashan is named with Hormah and other cities of "the South,"

Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) mention a village named Bechason as 15 or 16 miles west of Jerusalem; but this, though agreeing sufficiently with the position of the place in John xv, 42, is not far enough south for the indications of the other passages; and indeed this is a doubtful intimation (Cellar, Notit. ii, 496). See ASINAH. It appears to have been situated in the southern part of the hilly region adjoining the plain (Keil, Comment. on Josh. xv, 42); perhaps not far from the present Deir Samil. See ARIS. The above conflicting notices of its position would almost seem to require two cities of the name of Ashan, one in Judah (? = Eshean), and the other in Simeon (distinctively Chor-ashan); but, on the whole, they may best be reconciled by supposing one locality, properly in the plain of Judah, but assigned (with Ether, q. v.) to Simeon. See TRIBE.

Ash'beā (Heb. אֲשֵׁבְעָא, adjuration, otherwise swelling; Sept. Ἐσῶβᾶ), the head of a family mentioned as working in fine linen, a branch of the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 21). B. C. prob. cir. 1017. The clause in which the word occurs is obscure (see Bertheau, Comment. in loc.). Houbigant and Boottroyd understand a place to be meant by the expression Beth-ashbea. The Targum of R. Joseph (ed. Wilkins) paraphrases it "the house of Esbiah."

Ash'bel (Heb. אֲשֵׁבֶל, אֲשֵׁבֶל, prob. for Eshbaal; Sept. Ἀσβήλ; in Num. Ἀσῶβήλ v. r. Ἀσῶβήλο), the second son of Benjamin (Num. xvi, 21; 1 Chron. viii, 1). B. C. 1856. See JEDIAEL. His descendants were called Ashbelites (Num. xxvi, 38). See BECHER.

Ash'belite (Heb. with the art. ha-Ashbelit, אֲשֵׁבֶלִיתִי; Sept. ὁ Ἀσῶβήλιτι v. r. Ἀσῶβήλιτι, Vulg. Asbelite, A. V. "the Ashbelites"), the descendants of Ashbel (q. v.), son of Benjamin (Num. xxvi, 38).

Ash-cake (אֲשָׁח, ugah, or אֲשָׁח, ugguh, "cake," "cake baked on the hearth," Gen. xviii, 6; xix, 9; 1 Kings xvii, 13; Ezek. iv, 12, etc.; Sept. ἄσπυρῶν), a thin round pancake baked over hot sand or a slab of stone by means of ashes or coals put over them, or between two layers of hot embers of the dung of cows or camels (see Schubert, iii, 28; Arvieux, iii, 227). Such are still relished in the East (by the Arabs of the desert) as a tolerably delicious dish (see Thevenot, ii, 32, p. 235; Schweigger, p. 283; Niebuhr, Deschr. p. 52). See CAKE. Such cake is made especially when there is not much time for baking. It must be turned in order to be baked through and not to burn on one side (Hos. vii, 8). It was made commonly of wheat flour (Gen. xviii, 6). Barley-cakes are mentioned (for the time of scarcity) in Ezek. iv, 12.—Winer. See BREAD.

Ash'chenaz (Heb. אֲשֵׁכְנַז, אֲשֵׁכְנַז; Vulg. Ascenez), a less correct form (1 Chron. i, 6; Sept. Ἀσχαζαῖ v. r. Ἀσχαζᾶζ; Jer. li, 27, Sept. οἱ Ἀσχαζαῖοι v. r. Ἀσχαζαῖοι, Ἀσχαζαῖοι, Ἀσκαζαῖοι) of Anglicizing the name ASHKENAZ (q. v.).

Ash'dod (Heb. אֲשְׁדוֹד, אֲשְׁדוֹד, a stronghold; Sept. and N. T. Ἀσδοτος), the Asotus of the Greeks and Romans, and so called in 1 Macc. iv, 15; Acts viii, 40 (see also Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 14; Ptolem. v, 16); a city of the Philistine Pentapolis, on the summit of a grassy hill (Richardson, Travels, ii, 206), near the Mediterranean coast (comp. Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4), nearly midway between Gaza and Joppa, being 18 geographical miles north by east from the former (270 stadia north, according to Diod. Sic. xix, 85), and 21 south from the latter; and, more exactly, midway between Askelon and Ekron, being 10 geographical miles north by east from the former, and south by west from the latter (see Cellar, Notit. ii, 599; Mannert, VI, i, 261 sq.). Ashdod was a city of the Philistines, and the chief town of one of their five confederate states (Josh. xiii, 3; 1 Sam. vi, 17). It was the seat of the worship of Dagon (1 Sam. v, 5; 1 Macc. xi, 4), before whose shrine in this city it was that the captured ark was deposited and triumphed over the idol (1 Sam. v, 1-9). Ashdod was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv, 47); but many centuries passed before it and the other Philistine towns were subdued (1 Kings iv, 24) [see PHILISTINES]; and it appears never to have been permanently in possession of the Judahites, although it was dismantled by Uzziah, who built towns in the territory of Ashdod (2 Chron. xxvi, 6). It is mentioned to the reproach of the Jews after their return from captivity that they married wives of Ashdod; the result of which was that the children of these marriages spoke a mongrel dialect, compounded of Hebrew and the speech of Ashdod (Neh. xiii, 23, 24). It was a place of great strength; and being on the usual military route between Syria and Egypt, the possession of it became an object of importance in the wars between Egypt and the great northern powers. Hence it was secured by the Assyrians under Tartan (B.C. 715) before invading Egypt (Isa. xx, 1 sq.); and about B.C. 630 it was taken by Psammetichus, after a siege of twenty-nine years, the longest on record (Herodot. ii, 157). That it recovered from this blow appears from its being mentioned as an independent power in alliance, after the exile, with the Arabians and others against Jerusalem (Neh. iv, 7). The destruction of Ashdod was foretold by the prophets (Jer. xxv, 20; Amos i, 8; iii, 9; Zeph. ii, 4; Zach. ix, 6), and was accomplished by the Maccabees (1 Macc. v, 68; x, 77-84; xi, 4). It is enumerated among the towns which Pompey joined to the province of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4; War, i, 7, 7), and among the cities ruined in the wars, which Gabinus ordered to be rebuilt (Ant. xiv, 5, 5). It was included in Herod's dominion, and was one of the three towns bequeathed by him to his sister Salome (War, xvii, 8, 1; xi, 5). The evangelist Philip was found at Ashdod after he had baptized the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii, 30). Azotus early became the seat of a bishopric; and we find a bishop of this city present at the councils of Nice, Chalcedon, A.D. 359, Seleucia, and Jerusalem, A.D. 536 (Retand, Palästina, p. 609). Ashdod subsisted as a small unwall'd town in the time of Jerome. It was in ruins when Benjamin of Tudela visited Palestine (Itin. ed. Asher, i, 79); but we learn from William of Tyre and Vitruvius that the bishopric was revived by the Latin Christians, at least Titularly, and made suffragan of Treves. Sandys (Travels, p. 151) describes it "as a place of no reckoning;" and Zuallart (Voyage, iv, 132) speaks of it as an Arab village (comp. Van Troilo, 1666, p. 349). Irby and Mangles (p. 180) describe it as an inhabited site marked by ancient ruins, such as broken arches and partly-buried fragments of marble columns; there is also what appeared to these travellers to be a very ancient khan, the principal chamber of which had obviously, at some former period, been used as a Christian chapel. The place is still called Eshdud (Volney, Trav. ii, 251; Schwarz, Paläst. p. 120). The name occurs in the cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.). The ancient remains are few and indistinct (Hackett, Illustra. of Script. p. 135). The ruined khan to the west of the village marks the Acropolis of the ancient town, and the grove near it alone protects the site from the shifting sand of the adjoining plain, which threatens, at no distant day, entirely to overwhelm the spot (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 319).—Kitto, s. v.

The inhabitants are styled Ashdodites (אַשְׁדּוֹדִי, Neh. iv, 7; "Ashdohites," Josh. xiii, 3; the dialect is the fem. אַשְׁדּוֹדִיָּה, Ashdodith), Sept. Ἀζωδιώται, Vulg. Azotice, A. V. "in the speech of Ashdod," Neh. xiii, 24).

Ash'dodite (Heb. in the plur. with the art. ha-Ashdodim, הַאֲשְׁדּוֹדִיִּם; Sept. omits, but some copies have ἡ Ἀζωδιώται, Vulg. Azotici, A. V. "the Ashdodites"), the inhabitants (Neh. iv, 7 [Heb. 1]) of ASHDOD (q. v.).

Ash'dothite (Heb. with the art. ha-Ashdodi, אַשְׁדּוֹתִי; Sept. ἡ Ἀζωδιώται, Vulg. Azotici, A. V. "the Ashdohite"), a less correct mode (Josh. xiii, 3) of Anglicizing the name Ashdodite (Neh. iv, 7), or inhabitant of ASHDOD (q. v.).

Ash'doth-Pis'gah (Heb. Ashdoh' hay-Pisgah, אֲשְׁדּוֹת־פִּיִּסְגָּה; Sept. Ἀσθὸθ Πισγάδ [Ἰσθ] Φασγά, and Ἀσ. ἰσθ λαζερῖη); apparently the water-courses running from the base of Mount Pisgah, which formed the southern boundary of the territory of Sihon, king of the Amorites ("Springs of Pisgah," Deut. iv, 49); transferred as a proper name in Josh. xii, 3; xiii, 20; Deut. iii, 17). See PISGAIH. This curious and (since it occurs in none of the later books) probably very ancient term in the two passages from Deut. forms part of a formula by which, apparently, the mountains that enclose the Dead Sea on the east side are defined. Thus in iii, 17, we read, "the 'Arabah' also (i. e. the Jordan valley) and the 'border,' from Cinnereth (Sea of Galilee) unto the sea of the 'Arabah,' the Salt Sea, under Ashdoh hay-Pisgah eastward;" and so also in iv, 49, though here our translators have chosen to vary the formula for English readers. The same intention is evident in the passages cited from Joshua; and in x, 40, and xii, 8, of the same book, Ashdoh is used alone—"the springs," to denote one of the main natural divisions of the country. The only other instance of the use of the word is in the highly poetical passage, Num. xxi, 15, "the 'pouring forth' of the 'torrents,' which extendeth to Shebeth-Ar." This undoubtedly refers also to the east of the Dead Sea. Doubtless, like the other topographical words of the Bible, it has a precise meaning; but whether it be the streams poured forth at the foot of the mountains of Moab, or the roots or spurs of those mountains, or the mountains themselves, it is impossible, in our present ignorance of the country east of the Dead Sea, to determine with certainty.

Ashè. See ASSER.

Ashè, Simeon, a Nonconformist and Presbyterian, was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, and afterward settled in Staffordshire, from whence he removed to London, where he exercised his ministry twenty-three years. He was one of the deputies who went to congratulate Charles II on his restoration at Breda. He died in 1662; "a man of holy life, cheerful mind, and fluent elegance" (Baxter). He published a treatise on the Power of Godliness, and several single sermons.—Hook, Ecd. Biog. s. v.; Orme, Life of Baxter, i, 217.

Ashé. See ASSER.

Asher Ben-Jechiel, called Magister Asher, a Jewish writer, was born at Rothenburg toward the end of the 13th century, and died in 1327. He was considered one of the most learned of the Spanish Jews, and taught with high repute at Toledo; but he did not escape the persecuting spirit of the time, and was driven from Toledo. He published chiefly (1.) various commentaries or special tracts of the Talmud (printed at different times and places, especially Prague, 1725, and Leghorn, Berlin, Amst. etc. later); (2.) a general collection of decisions relating to the entire Talmud, entitled אֲשֶׁר בְּיָדֵינוּ (usually contained in extended editions of the Talmud), more commonly denominated, from him, אֲשֶׁרִי, the Asheri, abstracts of which, under the title of אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם (Constantinople, 1520, fol. and later). אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם, etc. have been made; (3.) אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם, etc. questions and answers on Jewish ceremonies (Venice, 1552, fol. and since): (4.) אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם, moral precepts or institutes (Ven. 1579, 4to, and often since).—Bartolucci, Bibl. Mogu. Piblin. i, 46; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 437; Fürst, Bib. Jud. i, 57 sq.

Ash'er (Heb. אֲשֵׁר, אֲשֵׁר, happiness; Sept. and New Test. Ἀσπ), the name of a man (and the tribe descended from him), and of one or two places.

1. The eleventh of the sons of Jacob, and his third by Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah (Gen. xxxv, 26), and founder of one of the twelve tribes (Num. xxvi, 44-47). Born B.C. 1914. The name is interpreted in a passage full of the paronomastic turns which distinguish these very ancient records: "And Leah said, 'In my happiness am I (אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם), for the daughters have called me happy' (אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם), and she called his name Ash'er" (אֲשֵׁרֵי הַיָּם), i. e. "happy" (Gen. xxx, 13). A similar play occurs in the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii, 24). Gad was Zilpah's other and elder son, but the fortunes of the brothers were not at all connected. Ash'er had four sons and one daughter (Gen. xlix, 20; Deut. xxxiii, 24).

TRIBE OF ASHER.—Of the tribe descended from Ash'er no action is recorded during the whole course of the sacred history. Its name is found in the various lists of the tribes which occur throughout the earlier books, as Gen. xxxv, xlvi, Exod. i, Num. i, ii, xiii, etc., and like the rest, Ash'er sent his chief as one of the spies from Kadesh-barnea (Num. xiii). During the march through the desert his place was between Dan and Naphtali, on the north side of the tabernacle (Num. ii, 27); and after the conquest he took up his allotted position without any special mention. On quitting Egypt the number of adult males in the tribe of Ash'er was 41,500, which made it the ninth of the tribes (excluding Levi) in numbers—Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin only being below it. But before entering Canaan an increase of 11,900—an addition exceeded only by Manasseh—raised the number to 53,400, and made it the fifth of the tribes in population (comp. Num. i, 40, 41; xxvi, 47). The genealogy of the tribe appears in some instances to have been preserved till the time of Christ (Luke ii, 36, "Aser").

The limits of the territory assigned to Ash'er are, like those of all the tribes, and especially of the northern tribes, extremely difficult to trace. This is partly owing to our ignorance of the principle on which these ancient boundaries were drawn and recorded, and partly from the absence of identification of the majority of the places named. The general position of the tribe was on the sea-shore from Carmel northward, with Manasseh on the south, Zebulun and Issachar on the south-east, and Naphtali on the north-east (Josephus, Ant. v, 1, 22). The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. xix, 24-31; xvii, 10, 11; and Judg. i, 31, 32. From a comparison of these passages it seems plain that Dor (Tantura) must have been just without the limits of the tribe, in which case the southern boundary was probably one of the streams which enter the Mediterranean north of that place, apparently the embouchure of Wady Milbeh. Crossing the promontory of Carmel, the tribe then possessed the maritime continuation of the rich plain of Esdraelon, probably for a distance of five or six miles from the shore. The boundary then ran northward from the valley of Jiphthah-el (Jefet) to that of the Leontes, and reaching Zidon, it turned and came down by Tyre to Achzib (Eedippa, now es-Zib). See TRIBE. It is usually stated that the whole of the Phœnician territories, including Sidon, were assigned to this tribe (comp. Josephus, Ant. v, 1, 22; see Reland, Palæst. p. 575 sq.). But there are various considerations which militate against this conclusion (see the Pictorial Bible, Num. xxvi, 24; Josh. xix, 24; Judg. i, 31), and tend to show that the assigned frontier-line was drawn out to the sea south of Sidon. The strongest text for the inclusion of Sidon (Tyre was not then founded) is that in which it is mentioned to the reproach of the Asherites, that they did not drive out the Sidonians (Judg. i, 31). This Michaelis is disposed to reject as an interpolation; but Kitto (Pict. Bib. in loc.) conceives it to denote that the Asherites were unable to expel the Sidonians, who by that time had encroached southward into parts of the coast actually assigned to the Asherites; and he strengthens this by referring to the subsequent foundation of Tyre, as evincing the disposition of the Sidonians to colonize the coast south of their own proper territories. The Asherites were for a long time unable to gain possession of the territories actually assigned them, and "dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land" (Judg. i, 32); and, "as it is not usual to say of a larger number that it dwells among the smaller, the inference is that they expelled but comparatively few of the Canaanites, leaving them, in fact, a majority of the population" (Bush, note on Judg. i, 32). See SIDON.

This territory contained some of the richest soil in all Palestine (Stanley, p. 265; Kenrick, Thæn. p. 35), and in its productiveness it well fulfilled the promise involved in the name "Ash'er," and in the blessings which had been pronounced on him by Jacob and by Moses. Here was the oil in which he was to "dip his foot," the "bread" which was to be "fat," and the "royal dainties" in which he was to indulge (for the crops, see Robinson, new ed. of Researches, iii, 102; for the oil, Kenrick, p. 31; Reland, p. 817); and here in the metallic manufactures of the Phœnicians (Kenrick, p. 28) were the "iron and brass" for his "shoes." The Phœnician settlements were even at that early period in full vigor (Zidon was then distinguished by the name Rabbah = "the Strong," Josh. xix, 28); and it is not surprising that Ash'er was soon contented to partake their luxuries, and to "dwell among them" without attempting the conquest and extermination enjoined in regard to all the Canaanites (Judg. i, 31, 32). Accordingly he did not drive out the inhabitants of Achho, nor Dor (Sept. adds this name), nor Zidon, nor Ahlab, nor Achzib, nor Helbah, nor Aphik, nor

Map of the Tribe of Asher.

Rehob (Judg. i, 31), all which seem to have been in the shore-strip preoccupied by the Phœnicians, and the natural consequence of this inert acquiescence is immediately visible. While Zebulun and Naphtali "jeopardied their lives unto the death" in the struggle against Siserah, Asher was content to forget the peril of his fellows in the creeks and harbors of his new allies (Judg. v, 17, 18). At the numbering of Israel at Sinai, Asher was more numerous than either Ephraim, Manasseh, or Benjamin (Num. i, 32-41), but in the reign of David, so insignificant had the tribe become, that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii, 16-22); and it is with a kind of astonishment that it is related that "divers of Asher and Manasseh and Zebulun" came to Jerusalem to the Passover of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx, 11). With the exception of Simeon, Asher is the only tribe west of the Jordan which furnished no hero or judge to the nation. "One name alone shines out of the general obscurity—the aged widow, Anna, the daughter of Phannuel of the tribe of Aser, who, in the very close of the history, departed not from the Temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (Stanley, Palest. p. 261).

The inhabitants of the tribe were also called Asherites (Heb. Asheri, אַשְׁרֵי, Sept. by Asip, Judg. i, 32).

2. A city on the boundary of the tribe of Manasseh, near Michmethah and east of Shechem (Josh. xvii, 7); according to Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. Asip) a village 15, according to the Itin. Hieros., 9 Roman miles from Shechem toward Scythopolis, near the highway. This position nearly corresponds to that of the modern village Yasir, containing ruins, about half way between Nablous and Beisan (Van de Velde, Memoir. p. 289); the Tegusir suggested by Porter (Haub. p. 348).

3. A city in Galilee near Thesbe (Tobit i, 2, Engl. Vers. "Aser"), possibly a corruption for Hazor (q. v.), a city in the tribe of Naphtali (see Fritzsche, Comment. in loc.), or perhaps identical with the foregoing place.

Ashērah (אֲשֵׁרָה, Asherah; Auth. Vers. "grove," after the Sept. άλσος; Vulg. lucus), a Canaanitish (Phœnician) divinity, whose worship, in connection with that of Baal, spread among the Israelites already in the age of the judges (Judg. iii, 7; vi, 25), was more permanently established later by the Queen Jezebel in the land of Ephraim (1 Kings xvi, 23; xviii, 19), but at times prevailed in the kingdom of Judah also (2 Kings xviii, 4; xxi, 3; xxiii, 4; 2 Chron. xxxi, 1 sq.). See Grove. She had prophets, like Baal (1 Kings xviii, 19), and her rites were characterized by licentiousness (2 Kings xxiii, 7; Ezek. xxiii, 42). Her images, אֲשֵׁרֹת, or אֲשֵׁרֹתִים, were of wood (Judg. vi, 26), (as appears ever from the words used to express their annihilation, Gesen. Thes. p. 162; Movers, Phœniz. p. 567), which were erected sometimes together with those of Baal, as θεοὶ στήμβωτοι, over the altar of the latter (Judg. vi, 25); at one time even in the Temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem (2 Kings xxi, 7; xxiii, 6); besides, there is mention of אֲשֵׁרֹת (houses), tents or canopies, woven by the women for the idol (2 Kings xxiii, 7), which circumstance in itself would be indicative of a connection with the worship of Baal (Judg. iii, 7; vi, 25; 1 Kings xvi, 32 sq.; xviii, 19). That Asherah is an identical divinity with Astoreth or Astarte is evident from the translation of the Sept. at 2 Chron. xv, 16; xxiv, 18, from that of Symmachus or Aquila at Judg. iii, 7; 2 Kings xvii, 10 (as also from the Syriac at Judg. iii, 7; vi, 25; see Gesen. Thes. p. 163); and this was the prevailing opinion of the Biblical antiquarians up to Movers, who (Phœniz. p. 560) thinks that Asherah should be distinguished from Astoreth, and declares Asherah to be a sort of Phallus erected to the telluric goddess Baaltis (Dea Syria, whence the goddess herself was then called Asherah, i. e. δοῦλα), while Astarte should be considered a sidereal divinity. See ASTARTE. It may appear strange that the same divinity is mentioned under two names in the historical books of the O. T., and it remains doubtful in what sense Astarte might have been called Asherah; the identity of the two idols, however, is evident from Judg. ii, 13 (see iii, 7); and this invalidates also the objection that there is no mention of obscene rites in the worship of Astarte (2 Kings xxiii, 7). It does not appear from 2 Kings xxiii, that Asherah and Astoreth were two distinct divinities, for the only distinction made here is between the different places of worship; ver. 6 mentions an Asherah erected in the Temple in Jerusalem (see 2 Kings xxi, 7), and ver. 13 speaks of the idols which were on the high-places before Jerusalem (since the times of Solomon? see 1 Kings xi, 7); ver. 14 is connected with ver. 13, and treats of the same idols, while ver. 15 refers to another locality (see 2 Kings xxiii, 10). Finally, though Asherah is never expressly called a Sidonian divinity like Astarte, yet she is mentioned (1 Kings xvi, 33; xviii, 19) with the idols introduced by Jezebel (see De Wette, Archäol. p. 323 sq.). Hence Bertheau (Richt. p. 66 sq.) declares himself also in favor of the identity of Astoreth with Asherah, supposing, however, that the former might have been the name of the goddess, and the latter that of her idol (see Movers, p. 565), and agrees with Movers in thinking that אֲשֵׁרָה signifies erect (pillar), and is indicative of the Phallus worship. But though Asherim and Asheroth are so often mentioned separately from statues that we could hardly think these terms to have been used likewise to signify carved idols, but are rather inclined to suppose they must have been something more rough and simple (though, perhaps, not a mere tree, as in Deut. xvi, 21; see Dan. xi, 45); yet from this it does not follow that the word should originally have signified the (wooden) fetish; and against the translation with recta we might adduce, that to be erect is more properly expressed in the Hebrew by the verb אָשַׁר than by אֲשֵׁרָה; and if we would grant the above distinction in such passages as 1 Kings xviii, 19; 2 Kings xxiii, 4, undoubtedly אֲשֵׁרָה should have been written. Consequently we must let the Phallus character of Asherah also rest as it is; and until more correct explanations can be given, we must be content with the result that Asherah is essentially identical with Astarte; and both these are not differing from the Syrian goddess, whose rites were of obscene character, who is certainly reflected in the Cyprian Aphrodite, and is furthermore blended with the Western mythological representations. Dei*, iv, 10; ii, 3.) —Winer, s. v. See ASHTORETH.

Ash'erite (Judg. i, 32). See ASHER.

Ashes (properly אֲשֵׁר, aphar', from its whiteness, σποδός; twice אֲשָׁף, aphar', Num. xix, 17; 2 Kings xxiii, 4, elsewhere "dust"; also אֲשֵׁר, de'shen, lit. fatness, i. e. the fat ashes from the victims of the altar, Lev. i, 16; iv, 12; vi, 10, 11; 1 Kings xiii, 3, 5; or of corpses burnt, Jer. xxxi, 40, ashes being used as a manure for land, Plin. xvii, 9. In 1 Kings xx, 38, 41, אֲשֵׁר, aph' r', incorrectly rendered "ashes," signifies a covering for the head or turban, Sept. τελαμών, and so the Chaldee and Abulwalid represent it by this latter word, which in Syriac means a priestly tiara; New Test. σποδία). See ASH-CAKE.

In general, respecting the Biblical mention of ashes (אֲשָׁף, de'shen; אֲשֵׁר, aph' r'), the following things deserve notice: (1.) As the ashes of the sacrifices consumed upon the altar of burnt-offerings accumulated continually (Lev. vi, 3 sq.), they were from time to time removed so as to cleanse (אָשַׁף) the altar. For this purpose there were in the sanctuary shovels (אֲשָׁפִים) and ash-pots (אֲשָׁפִים) of brass (Exod. xxvii, 3; xxxviii, 3). The performance of this office (by the priests) is not prescribed in the law; but, according to the Mishna (Tamid, i and ii), the scouring of the altar was assigned by lot to a priest, who, after the top of the altar had been cleared of coals, etc., swept the ashes together into a heap (אֲשָׁפִים, apple, from its shape), and (according to the rabbins) took the greatest part of it away (for some of the ashes must always be allowed to remain), in order that they might be carried out of the city to a spot undisturbed by the wind. Only on high festivals the ashes were suffered to lie upon the altar as an ornament (Mishna, Tamid, ii, 2). Also upon the altar of incense ashes gradually accumulated; and the removal of these was likewise apportioned among the priests by lot. The priest to whom this function fell gathered them in a basket, and then, after another priest had used a part in cleansing the candlestick, carried out and poured the contents on the floor of the porch (Mishna, Tamid, iii, 9; vi, 1; i, 4). See ALTAR. (2.) On the expiatory ashes of the red heifer (אֲשָׁף, Num. xix), see PTERIFICATION. (3.) In deep affliction persons were accustomed, as an act suitable to the violence of internal emotions, to scatter dust or ashes (אֲשָׁף) on their heads or in their hair, and to sit, or lie, or even roll in ashes, whence ashes became the symbol of penitential mourning (Job xlii, 6; Matt. xi, 21). See GRIEF. The Mishna (Taanith, ii, 1) mentions a custom of covering the ark that contained the law with ashes on fast-days, and the rabbins even allude to a ceremonial sprinkling of persons with ashes on the same occasions (see Bartenora, on Taanith ii). (See generally Reinhard, De sacco et cinere, Vitum, 1698; Plade, De cineris usu luguberrimo, Hafn. 1713; Schmid, De cinerum in sacris usu, Lips. 1722; Carpov, Cinrum ap. Heb. usus, lost. 1739; Qunat, De cinere in sacris Hebr. Region. 1713; Goetze, De cinerum in sacris usu, Lips. 1722.) (4.) The ancient Persians had a punishment which consisted in executing certain criminals by stifling them in ashes (Valerius Maximus, ix, 2). Thus the wicked Menelaus was despatched, who caused the troubles which had disquieted Judaea (2 Macc. xiii, 5, 6), being thrown headlong into a tower fifty cubits deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself plunged him still deeper in the whirling ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which kept them in continual movement till he was entirely choked.—Winer. See EXECUTION.

Ashes were a symbol of human frailty (Gen. xviii, 27); of deep humiliation (Esth. iv, 1; Jon. iii, 6; Matt. xi, 21; Luke x, 13; Job xlii, 6; Jer. vi, 26; Dan. ix, 3); a ceremonial mode of purification (Heb. ix, 13; Num. xix, 17); they are likened to hoar-frost (Psa. cxlvii, 16). In Ezek. xxvii, 30, we find the mourning Tyrians described as wallowing in ashes; and we may remark that the Greeks had the like custom of strewing themselves with ashes in mourning (Homer, Iliad, xviii, 22; Odys. xxiv, 315; comp. Virgil, Æn. x, 844, and Ovid's Metam. viii, 528). Job ii, 8, "And he sat down among the ashes." So Ulysses in Odyssey, vii, 153 (see also Iliad, xviii, 26). Psa. cii, 9, "I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping," i. e. I have eaten the bread of humiliation, and drunk the water of affliction; ashes being the emblem of the one, and tears the consequence of the other (see Horne, in loc.). So Isa. lxi, 3, "A beautiful crown instead of ashes" (see Lowth's note). See 2 Sam. xiv, 2; Judith x, 3. Isa. xlv, 20, "He feedeth on ashes," i. e. on that which affords no nourishment; a proverbial expression for using ineffectual means, and bestowing labor to no purpose. In the same sense Hosea says (xii, 1), "Ephraim feedeth on wind" (see Lowth, in loc.). See MOURNING.

Ash'ima (Heb. Ash'ima', אֲשִׁימָה, etymology unknown; Sept. Asyphat), is only once mentioned in the Old Testament as the god of the people of Hamath, whose worship the colonists settled by Shalmanezar introduced into Samaria (2 Kings xvii, 30). The Babylonian Talmud, in the treatise Sanhedrin (cited in Carpzov's Apparatus, p. 516), and the majority of Jewish writers (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 236), assert that Ashima was worshipped under the form of a goat without wool; the Talmud of Jerusalem (Carpzov, ib.) says under that of a lamb. Elias Levita, a learned rabbi of the sixteenth century, assigns the word the sense of ape; in which he was, in all probability, deceived by the resemblance in sound to the Latin simia. Jurien and Calmet have proposed other fanciful conjectures. Aben Ezra's ascription (Prof. ad Esth.) of the name to the Samaritan Pentateuch at Gen. i, 1, may be seen in Hottinger's Exercit. Antiquariorum, p. 40. The opinion, however, that this idol had the form of a goat appears to be the one best supported by arguments as well as by authorities (see Socyflarh, Systema astron. p. 154 sq.). This agrees with the Egyptian worship of Pan (see Selden, De diis Syp. p. 327, 305 sq.), as well as the appearance of the goat among the sacred animals delineated on the Babylonian relics (Millin, Monumens inédits, i, tab. 8, 9). Some have compared the Samaritan Ashmath (אֲשֵׁמַת) of Deut. xiv, 5 (see Castell, Annot. Samar.), a kind of buck. Barkey, on the other hand (in the Biblioth. Erasm. nor. I, i, 125 sq.; II, iii, 572 sq.), refers to the Phœnician god Esnuu (Ἐσνούριος, Damasc. in Photii Biblioth. p. 242, 573; in Phœnician γουσσιν, Gesenius, Monum. Phœn. i, 136), corresponding to the god of health, the Greek Esculapius (see Movers, Phœnic. i, 529 sq.). Hiller (Onomast. p. 609) proposes a Semitic etymology from the Arabic asunat, a title of the lion applied to the sun; and Lette (in the Biblioth. Erasm. nor. I, i, 60 sq.) compares Asan, the Arabic name for a valley or river of the infernal regions. Gesenius (Comment. ub. Jesa. ii, 348) refers to Ashuna, or the genius (star) of Jupiter (the heaven), i. e. Mercury, of the Zend-Avesta (Bundehesh, iii, 66); but against this Kleuker (in loc.) objects that in the Paris edition (ii, 356) the name is Anhounar. (See Schulte, De Asima Hamathæor. idolo, Viteb. 1722.)

Ash'kelon (Heb. Ashkelon', אֲשֶׁקֶלֶן, prob. migration [the usual form would be אֲשֶׁקֶלֶן, Ashkel'; Röddiger (in Gesenius, Thes. p. 1476) suggests that the uncommon termination is a Philistine form]; Sept. and Josephus, ἡ Ἀσκάλων; Auth. Vers. "Askelon," in Judg. i, 18; 1 Sam. vi, 17; 2 Sam. i, 20; the Ascalon of the Greeks and Romans and mediæval writers), a city of the Philistines, and the seat of one of their five states (Judg. xiv, 19; 1 Sam. vi, 17; 2 Sam. i, 20), but less often mentioned, and apparently less known to the Jews than the other four. This, doubtless, arose from its remote situation, alone, of all the Philistine towns, on the extreme edge of the shore of the Mediterranean (Jer. xlvi, 7), and also well down to the south. Gaza, indeed, was still farther south, but then it was on the main road from Egypt to the centre and north of Palestine, while Ashkelon lay considerably to the left. The site fully bears out the above inference; but some indications of the fact may be traced, even in the scanty notices of Ashkelon which occur in the Bible. Thus, the name is omitted from the list in Josh. xv of the Philistine towns falling to the lot of Judah (but comp. Joseph. Ant. v, 1, 22, where it is specified), although Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are all named; and considerable uncertainty rests over its mention in Judg. i, 18 (see Bertheau in Ezra. Handb. in loc.). Samson went down from Timnah to Ashkelon, when he slew the thirty men and took their spoil, as if to a remote place whence his exploit was not likely to be heard of; and the only other mention of it in the historical books is in the formalistic passages, Josh. xiii, 3, and 1 Sam. vi, 17, and in the casual notices of Jud. ii, 28; 1 Macc. x, 86; xi, 60; xii, 33. The other Philistine cities are each distinguished by some special occurrence or fact connected with it, but except the one exploit of Samson, Ashkelon is to us no more than a name. In the poetical passage 2 Sam. i, 20, it is named among heathen foes. The inhabitants were called Ashkelonites (Heb. Ashkeloni', אֲשֶׁקֶלֶנִי, Sept. Ἀσκαλωνίτης, Auth. Vers. "Ashkalumites," Josh. xiii, 3).

It was a port on the Mediterranean coast between Gaza and Jamnia (Joseph. War. iv, 11, 5), 12 geogr. miles N. of the former, 10 S. by W. from Ashdod, and 37 W.S.W. from Jerusalem (comp. Ireland, Palest. p. 443). Ashkelon was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xiii, 13; comp. Judg. i, 18); but it was never for any length of time in possession of the Israelites (comp. 1 Kings iv, 24). It is farther mentioned in the denunciations of the prophets (Jer. xxv, 20; xlvii, 5, 7; Amos i, 8; Zeph. ii, 4, 7; Zech. ix, 5). The part of the country in which it stood abounded in aromatic plants (Plin. xii, 51), and especially onions (shallots, ascalonia, Plin. xix, 32; Strabo, xvi, 759; Athen. ii, 68; Theophr. Plant. vii, 4; Dioscor. i, 124; Colum. xii, 10), and vines (Alex. Trall. viii, 3). The soil around the town was remarkable for its fertility; the wine of Ashkelon was celebrated, and the Alchemia plant flourished better than in any other place except Canopus (Kenrick, p. 28). It was also celebrated for its cypresses, for figs, olives, and pomegranates, and for its bees, which gave their name to a valley in the neighborhood (Ibn Batuta in Ritter, Palæstina, 88). It was well fortified (Joseph. War. iii, 21; comp. Mela, i, 11), and early became the seat of the worship of Perceus (Diod. Sic. ii, 4), the Syrian Venus, whose temple was plundered by the Scythians (Herod. i, 105). She represented the passive principle of nature, and was worshipped under the form of a fish with a woman's head (comp. Ovid, Fast. ii, 406). See ATERGATIS. "The sacred doves of Venus still fill with their cooings the luxuriant gardens which grow in the sandy hollow within the ruined walls" (Stanley, p. 257). After the time of Alexander, Ashkelon shared the lot of Phœnicia and Judæa, being tributary sometimes to Egypt (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 5), and at other times to Syria (1 Macc. x, 86; xi, 60; xii, 33). Herod the Great was born at Ashkelon, and although the city did not belong to his dominion, he adorned it with fountains, baths, and colonnades (War. i, 21, 11); and after his death Salome, his sister, resided in a palace at Ashkelon which Cæsar bestowed upon her (Ant. xvii, 11, 5). It suffered much in the Jewish war with the Romans (War. ii, 18, 5; iii, 2, 1-3); for its inhabitants were noted for their dislike of the Jews, of whom they slew 2500 who dwelt there (ii, 18, 5; iii, 2, 1). After this Ashkelon again revived, and in the Middle Ages was noted not only as a stronghold, but as a wealthy and important town (Will. Tyr. xvii, 21). In the fourth century it was the see of a bishop, but in the seventh century it fell into the hands of the Saracens. Abulfeda (Tab. Sgr.) speaks of it as one of the famous strongholds of Mohammedanism; and the Orientals call it the Bride of Syria (Schultens, Index Geogr. s. v.; Edrisi, ed. Jaubert, i, 340). It shared with Gaza an infamous reputation for the steadfastness of its heathenism and for the cruelties there practised on Christians by Julian (Ireland, p. 588, 590). As a sea-port merely it never could have enjoyed much advantage, the coast being sandy and difficult of access. There is no bay or shelter for ships, but a small harbor toward the east advanced a little way into the town, and anciently bore, like that of Gaza, the name of Majanus (Kenrick, p. 28). In the time of Origen some wells of remarkable shape were shown near the town which were believed to be those dug by Isaac, or, at any rate, to be of the time of the patriarchs. In connection with this tradition may be mentioned the fact that in the Samaritan version of Gen. xx, 1, 2, and xxvi, 1, Ashkelon (אֲשֶׁקֶלֶן) is put for the "Gerar" of the Hebrew text. The town bears a prominent part in the history of the Crusades (see Ibn Ferath, in Reimund's Extracts, p. 525). After being several times dismantled and re-fortified in the times of Saladin and Richard, its fortifications were at length totally destroyed by the Sultan Bilbars A.D. 1270, and the port filled up with stones, for fear of future attempts on the part of the Crusaders (Wilkin, Gesch. der Kreuz. vii, 586). This, no doubt, sealed the ruin of the place (see Cellar, Notit. ii, 600 sq.; Rosenmüller, Alberth. II, ii, 377 sq.). Sandys (Travels, p. 151, A.D. 1610) describes it as "now a place of no note, more than that the Turke doth keepe there a garrison." Fifty years after (A.D. 1660), Von Troilo found it still partially inhabited. But its desolation has long been complete, and little now remains of it but the walls, with numerous fragments of granite pillars (Arvieux, ii, 59; Jolliffe, p. 270). The situation is described as strong; the thick walls, flanked with towers, were built on the top of a ridge of rock that encircles the town, and terminates at each end in the sea (Robinson's Researches, ii, 368 note). The ground within sinks in the manner of an amphitheatre (Richardson, ii, 202-204; Eli Smith, in Missionary Herald for 1827, p. 341). The place still bears the name of Askutan, and is inhabited by Arabs and Christians (Schwarz, Palest. p. 120). The modern village is a little north of the old site, and the houses are built of the fragments of the ancient city. It is situated in a cove formed by a lofty ridge rising abruptly near the shore, running up eastward, then bending to the south, next to the west, and finally to the north-west again. The position, now surrounded with desolate ruins of its former grandeur, is still beautiful, the whole interior being planted with orchards (Thomson, Laud and Book, ii, 327 sq.). See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

Ash'kenaz (Heb. Ashkenaz', אֲשֶׁכְנַז, signif. unknown [comp. ASHPENAZ]; Sept. Ἀσκανάζ, Gen. x, 3, v. r. Ἀσκανάζ in 1 Chron. i, 6; Ἀσκαναζαίου v. r. Ἀσκαναζαίου in Jer. li, 27; in both the latter passages Auth. Vers. "Ashchenaz"), the first named of the three sons of Gomer, son of Japhet (B.C. cir. 2478), and of a tribe of his descendants. In Jeremiah it is placed with Ararat and Minni, provinces of Armenia; whence it is probable that Ashkenaz was a province of Armenia (q. v.), or, at least, that it lay not far from it, near the Caucasus, or toward the Black Sea (see Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. I, i, 258). Among other less probable conjectures may be named the following: Bochart (Philog. iii, 9) refers it to the lake Ascanius in Bithynia (Strabo, xii, 563 sq.; Plin. v, 43; xxxi, 46, 2), and the city and region of Ascania in Phrygia Minor (Arrian, Alex. i, 30; Plin. v, 40; see Michaelis, Spicilg. i, 58 sq.); Calmet to the Aschantians at Tanais and the marsh Maotic (Plin. vi, 7, where, however, the best editions read "Conteaptas" for "Ascentios"); Schullhess (Paral. p. 178) to the district Astamitis (in the vicinity of Ararat and the neighboring city of Astuvaca). Hase (Endeck. i, 19) regards the word as a corruption for "Pontus Arcus," so as to designate the inhabitants of the province of Pontus; Josephus (Ant. i, 6, 1) merely says "Ashkenaz (Ἀσκαναζαίο) founded the Aschmazians (Ἀσκαναζαίοι), whom the Greeks now call Bh gimus (Βηγιμοί);" but this latter name does not occur in classical geography (Joseph Mede conjectures the Rhathians, Ῥαθιαι, but these are as far from probability as the supposition of the modern Jews that the Germans are meant, see Vater, Com. i, 100). The Targum of Jonathan understands Adiabae (אֲדִיבָא, a province of Assyria; and the Arabic in Gen. the Schari, in J.-r. the inhabitants near the Caspian Sea. Assuming that the Japhetic tribes migrated from their original seats westward and northward [see JAPHET], thus peopling Asia Minor and Europe, we may perhaps recognise the tribe of Ashkenaz (as having migrated along the northern shore of Asia Minor) in Europe in the name Scand-ia, Scand-inavia. Knobel (Falkertfol, p. 35) regards the word as a compound (אֲשֶׁכְנַז), the latter element being equivalent to the Gr. γένος, Lat. gens, genus, Eng. kind, kin; the meaning, therefore, being the As-race. If this were so, it might seem that we here find the origin of the name Asia, which has subsequently been extended to the whole eastern part of the world. The slightness of the foundation, however, of all these identifications is evident. The opinion of Görres (Falkertfol, p. 92) that Ashkenaz is to be identified with the Cymry or Gaelic race seems even less probable than that of Knobel. See ETHNOLOGY.

Ashmead, WILLIAM, a Presbyterian minister, born at Philadelphia in 1798, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1818. After studying under Dr. J. P. Wilson, he was licensed to preach in 1820. He labored in Lancaster till 1828, when he accepted a call to Charleston, S.C., and entered on his duties there in May, 1829. Returning to the north for his family, he was taken ill, and, after one or two relapses, died at Philadelphia, Dec. 2, 1829. He was an accomplished scholar and a devoted minister. After his death appeared Sermons, with Sketch of Life (Philad. 1830, 8vo).—Sprague, Annals, iv, 643.

Ashmun, JEHUDI, agent of the American Colonization Society, was born at Champlain, N. Y., in April, 1794. He was educated at Burlington, where he graduated in 1816. Some time after he was made a professor in the "Maine Charity School," where his stay was brief. He afterward removed to the District of Columbia, where he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and edited the "Theological Repository." Being appointed to take charge of a re-enforcement to the colony at Liberia, he embarked for Africa June 19, 1822, and arrived at Cape Mesurado August 8. About three months after his arrival, while his whole force was 35 men and boys, he was attacked by 800 armed savages, but by his energy and desperate valor the assailants were repulsed, and again, in a few days, when they returned with redoubled numbers, were utterly defeated. When ill-health compelled him in 1828 to take a voyage to America, he left behind him in Africa a community of 1200 freemen. He died at New Haven August 25, 1828. He was a person of great energy of character, and most devoted piety, and his services to the infant colony were invaluable.—Gurley, Life of Ashmun (Washington, 1835); Quarterly Christian Spectator, vii, 330; North Amer. Review, xli, 565.

Ash'nah (Heb. Ashnah', אֲשֶׁנַח, fortified, otherwise bright; Sept. Ἀσνά), the name of two cities, both in the "plain" of the tribe of Judah.

1. One mentioned between Zorah and Zanoah (Josh. xv, 33), apparently in the region north of Eleutheropolis and west of Jerusalem (see Keil, Comment. in loc.), and near the boundary-line, almost within the territory afterward assigned to Dan (see Josh. xix, 41), and probably near Beth-Shemesh, possibly at the site of the modern "large village Deir Abin'" (Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 154). It is probably the Asm (Ἀσών) or Bethsan (Βηθσανά) placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) at 15 or 16 Roman miles west of Jerusalem.

2. Another town, certainly in Judah, mentioned between Jiphthah and Neziel (Josh. xv, 43); apparently in the region immediately south and east of Eleutheropolis (comp. Keil, Comment. in loc.), probably not very far from this last; possibly the present Beit Anan, a ruined village on a low mound (Robinson, Researches, ii, 403). Eusebius and Jerome also speak of an Asna (Ἀσνά, Onomast. s. v.), but without any particulars.

Ash'penaz (Heb. Ashpenaz', אֲשֶׁפְנַז, perh. from Persic and Sanscrit apnas, horse, and nasa, nose, i. q. "horse-nose;" Sept. Ἀσφαναζ), the master of the eunuchs, or, rather, one of the principal chamberlains of Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 604), who was commanded to select certain Jewish captives to be instructed in the literature and science of the Chaldeans (Dan. i, 3). In this number he included Daniel and his three companions, whose Hebrew names he changed to Chaldee (Dan. i, 7). Their refusal to partake of the provisions sent from the monarch's table filled Ashpenaz with apprehension, for at that time, as in our days, the Asiatic despots frequently punished with death the least infraction of their will. He had, however, the generosity not to use constraint toward them. In acceding to the request of Daniel, Ashpenaz had every thing to apprehend; and the grateful prophet specially records that God had disposed Ashpenaz to treat him with kindness (ver. 8-16). See DANIEL.

Ash'riël (1 Chron. vii, 14). See ASRIEL.

Ash'taroth (Heb. Ashtaroth', אַשְׁתָּרוֹת, plur. of Ashtaroth, Josh. ix, 10; xii, 4; xiii, 12, 31; Sept. Ἀστάρωθ; but Auth. Vers. "Astaroth," in Deut. i, 4; Sept. in 1 Chron. vi, 71, v. r. Ἀστροῦθ and Παμῶθ), a city on the east of Jordan, in Bashan, in the kingdom of Og, doubtless so called from being a seat of the worship of the goddess of the same name. See ASHTORETH. It is generally mentioned as a description or definition of Og, who "dwelt in Astaroth in Edrei" (Deut. i, 4), "at Ashtaroth and at Edrei" (Josh. xii, 4; xiii, 12), or "who was at Astaroth" (ix, 10). It fell into possession of the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii, 31), and was given with its suburbs or surrounding pasture-lands (בְּרִיגָתָם) to the Gershonites (1 Chron. vi, 71 [56]), the other Levitical city in this tribe being Golan. In the list in Josh. xxi, 27, the name is given as BESHITERAH ("house of Astaroth;") Reland, p. 621). Nothing more is heard of Ashtaroth, except that Uzziah, an Ashterathite, is named in 1 Chron. xi, 44. It is not named in any of the lists, such as those in Chronicles, or of Jeremiah, in which so many of the trans-Jordanic places are enumerated; and hence it has usually been considered the same with the place elsewhere called ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM (q. v.). Eusebius and Jerome, however (Onomast. s. v. Astaroth, Ἀστάρωθ), mention it as situated 6 Roman miles from Adraa or Adar (Edrei), which again was 25 from Bostra; and the former adds that it lay on higher ground (ἀνωτέρον) than Ashteroth-karnaim, which they farther distinguish by stating (in the next art.) that there were two villages (σκῆπαι, castella) lying 9 miles apart, between Adara and Abila. One of these was probably that called Ashtaroth simply, and the other may have been Ashteroth-karnaim. The only trace of the name yet recovered in the region indicated is Tell-Ashterah or Asherah (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 819; Porter, ii, 212); and as this is situated on a hill, it would seem to correspond to the Ashtaroth in question.—Smith, s. v.

Ash'terathite (Heb. Ashterathi', אַשְׁתָּרֹתִי; Sept. Ἀστέρωθῖ), an epithet of Uzziah, one of David's braves (1 Chron. xi, 44), prob. as being an Ashterathite, or citizen of ASHTAROTH (q. v.) in Bashan.

Ash'teroth-Kar'na'im (Heb. Ashteroth' Karnal'-yim, אַשְׁתָּרוֹת־כַּרְנַיִם, Ashtaroth of the two horns, from the horned image of Ashtoreth, Gen. xiv, 5; Sept. Ἀστάρωθ [καί] Καρναίμ), a place of very great antiquity, the abode of the Rephaim at the time of the incursion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv, 5), while the cities of the plain were still standing in their oasis. Its name of Ashtaroth appears to be derived from the worship of the moon under that name [see ASTARTE]; there is little need to look further than the crescent of that luminary and its symbolical image for an explanation of the addition KARNAIM, "horned" (San-choniathon, in Euseb. Prep. Ev. i, 10; ed. Orelli, p. 35). In 2 Macc. xii, 21, 26, mention is made of the temple of Atergatis (Asht'oreth) in Carnium (Καρνίον), which is described as a strongly fortified town of difficult access, but which was taken by Judas Maccabæus, who slew 25,000 of the people therein. The same place is doubtless that called Carnain (Καρναίμ) in 1 Macc. v, 43 (comp. Καρναίμ; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 4). These notices, however, give us no indication of its locality beyond its being in "the land of Galaad;" the inference of Ritter (Erdk. xv, 822) that the Carnion of the Apocrypha was in a narrow valley, is not sustained by the passages themselves. It is usually assumed to be the same place as the preceding ASHTAROTH, but the few facts that can be ascertained are all against such an identification. (1.) The affix "Karnaim," which certainly indicates some distinction, and which in the time of the Maccabees, as quoted above, appears to have superseded the other name. (2.) The fact that Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon, though not very clear on the point, yet certainly make a distinction between Ashtaroth and A.-Carnain, describing the latter (s. v. Καρναίμ, Carnaim) as a "large village" (σκῆπη μεγάλη τῆς Ἀραβίας, vicus grandis in angulo Batanæ). (3.) Some weight is due to the rendering of the Samaritan version, and of the Arabic version of Saadiab, which give Ashtaroth as in the text, but A.-Karnaim by entirely different names; the former rendering it Aphînâh, which does not appear to have been yet recognised; but the latter, es-Samain, apparently meaning the still important place which continues to bear precisely the same name, on the Haj rout, about 25 miles south of Damascus, and to the N.W. of the Lejah (Burekh. p. 55; Ritter, Erdk. xv, 812), but which seems to be identical with another place [see AREE], and is too far from Edrei. See ASHTAROTH. Astaroth-Karnaim is now usually identified with Mezzerib, the situation of which corresponds accurately enough with the distances given by Eusebius (Leake, Preface to Burckhardt's Travels, p. xii). Here is the first castle on the great pilgrim road from Damascus to Mecca. It was built about 340 years ago by the Sultan Selim, and is a square structure, about 100 feet on each side, with square towers at the angles and in the centre of each face, the walls being 40 feet high. The interior is an open yard, with ranges of warehouses against the castle wall to contain stores of provisions for the pilgrims. There are no dwellings beyond the castle, and within it only a few mud huts upon the flat roofs of the warehouses, occupied by the peasants who cultivate the neighboring grounds. Close to this building on the north and east side are a great number of springs, whose waters at a short distance collect into a lake or pond about a mile and a half in circumference. In the midst of this lake is an island, and at an elevated spot at the extremity of a promontory advancing into the lake stands a sort of chapel, around which are many remains of ancient buildings. There are no other ruins. (Burekhardt, Travels, p. 211 sq.; Buckingham's Arab Tribes, p. 162; Chesney, Enghat. Exped. i, 511; Capt. Newbold, in the Lond. Geog. Jour. xvi, 323; comp. Ashton, WM. EASTERLY, a Baptist minister, was born May 18, 1793, in Philadelphia, licensed as a preacher in 1814, and was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Hopewell, N. J., the following year. In 1816 he removed to Blockley, Philadelphia county, Pa., where he labored successfully for seven years. Mr. Ashton devoted part of his time to teaching, establishing a female school in Philadelphia, which soon became very popular. In 1823 he accepted a call from the third Baptist Church in Philadelphia, which charge he held till the year before his death, when disease compelled him to relinquish it. He died July 26, 1836.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 631.

Asht'oreth (Heb. Asht'oreth, אַשְׁתָּרֹת, 1 Kings xi, 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii, 13; Sept. Ἀστάρωθ), also in the plur. ASHTAROTH (Heb. Ashtaroth', אַשְׁתָּרוֹת, Sept. in Judg. x, 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4; Ἀστάρωθ; in Judg. ii, 13, αἱ Ἀστάρωθαι; in 1 Sam. vii, 3; xii, 10, τὰ ἄλσῃ; in 1 Sam. xxxi, 10, τὸ Ἀστροῖον), the name of a goddess of the Sidonians (1 Kings xi, 5, 35), and also of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 10), whose worship was introduced among the Israelites during the period of the judges (Judg. ii, 13; 1 Sam. vii, 4), was celebrated by Solomon himself (1 Kings xi, 5), and was finally put down by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii, 13). She is frequently mentioned in connection with Baal, as the corresponding female divinity (Judg. ii, 13); and, from the addition of the words "and all the host of heaven," in 2 Kings xxiii, 4 [see ASHERAH], it is probable that she represented one of the celestial bodies. There is also reason to believe that she is meant by the "queen of heaven," in Jer. vii, 18; xlv, 17; whose worship is there said to have been solemnized by burning incense, pouring libations, and offering cakes. Further, by comparing the two passages 2 Kings xxiii, 4, and Jer. viii, 2, which last speaks of the "sun and moon, and all the host of heaven, whom they served," we may conclude that the moon was worshipped under the names of queen of heaven and of Ash-toreth, provided the connection between these titles is established. See IDOLATRY.

The worship of Astarte was very ancient and very widely spread. We find the plural Ashtaroth united with the adjunct Karnaïm, as the name of a city, so early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv, 5), and we read of a temple of this goddess, apparently as the goddess of war, among the Philistines in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxxi, 10). From the connection of this goddess with BAAL or BEL, we should, moreover, naturally conclude that she would be found in the Assyrian Pantheon, and, in fact, the name Ishbar appears to be clearly identified in the list of the great gods of Assyria (Layard, Nin. and Bab., p. 352, 629; Rawlinson, Early History of Babylon, Lond. 1854, p. 23; Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 634). There is no reason to doubt that this Assyrian goddess is the Ashtoreth of the Old Testament and the Astarte of the Greeks and Romans. The worship of Astarte seems to have extended wherever Phœnician colonies were founded. Thus we find her name in inscriptions still existing in the island of Cyprus, on the site of the ancient Citium, and also at Carthage (Gesenius, Mon. Phœn., p. 125, 449), and not unfrequently as an element in Phœnician proper names, as Ἀσταρτος, Ἀβδαστάρτος, Δελιαστάρτος (Joseph, Ap. i, 18). The name occurs, moreover, written in Egyptian hieroglyphics, as Astart (Gesenius, Thes. s. v. For evidence of her wide-spread worship, see also Eekhel, Dact. Num. iii, 369 sq.). It is worthy of remark that Rüdiger, in his recently published Addenda to Gesenius' Thesaurus (p. 106), notices that in the inscription on the sarcophagus of a king named Esmunazar, discovered in January, 1855 (see Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 36 note), the founding, or at least restoration of the temple of this goddess, at Sidon, is attributed to him and to his mother, Amashtoreth, who is farther styled priestess of Ashtoreth. According to the testimonies of profane writers, the worship of this goddess, under different names, existed in all countries and colonies of the Syro-Arabian nations. She was especially the chief female divinity of the Phœnicians and Syrians—the Eualtis or female Baal; Astarte the Great, as Sanchoniathon calls her (ed. Orelli, p. 34). She was known to the Babylonians as Mylitta (i. e. possibly אֲשֶׁת־יָמִין, the emphatic state of the fem. participle act. Aphel of אָשַׁת, genetrix) (Herod. i, 31); to the Arabians as Mitta or Milat (Herod. iii, 8) (i. e. according to Pouchek's etymology [Specim. p. 110], al-Nahat, the goddess [which may, however, also mean the crescent moon—see Freytag's Lex. Ar.]; or al-Milat, the moon; or, according to Kleuker's suggestion, al-Walid, genetrix [see Berzmann, De Relig. Arab. Antiquissima, Argentor. 1834, p. 7]). The supposed Punic name Tholath, תֹּלַת, which Münter, Hamaker, and others considered to mean genetrix, and to belong to this goddess, cannot be adduced here, as Gesenius has recently shown that the name has arisen from a false reading of the inscriptions (see his Monum. Ling. Phœnic. p. 114). But it is not at all open to doubt that this goddess was worshipped at ancient Carthage, and probably under her Phœnician name. The classical writers, who usually endeavored to identify the gods of other nations with their own, rather than to discriminate between them, have recognised several of their own divinities in Ashtoreth. Thus she was considered to be Juno (Augustin. Quest. in Jud. xvi); or Venus, especially Venus Urania (Cicero, Nat. Deor. iii, 23; Theodoret, In Libr. iii, log. Quæst. 1; and the numerous inscriptions of Bona Dea Cœlestis, Venus Cœlestis, etc., cited in Münter's Religion der Karthager, p. 75); or Luna (Herodian, v, 13, where she is named Ἀστροάσχη; Lucian, De Dea Syria, iv). A part of the Phœnician mythos respecting Astarte is given by Sanchoniathon (Euseb. De Præp. Evang. i, 10): "Astarte the most high, and Jupiter Demouras, and Adodus, king of the gods, reigned over the country, with the assent of Saturn. And Astarte placed the head of a lull upon her own head, as an emblem of sovereignty. As she was journeying about the world, she found a star wandering in the air, and having taken possession of it, she consecrated it in the sacred island of Tyre. The Phœnicians say that Astarte is Venus."

This serves to account for the horned figure under which she was represented, and affords testimony of a star consecrated as her symbol. The fact that there is a connection between all these divinities cannot escape any student of ancient religions; but it is not easy to discover the precise link of that connection. Ashtoreth was probably confounded with Juno, because she is the female counterpart to Baal, the chief god of the Syrians—their Jupiter, as it were; and with Venus, because the same lascivious rites were common to her worship and to that of Ashtoreth and her cognate Mylitta (Crenzer, Symbolik, ii, 23). But so great is the intermixture and confusion between the gods of pagan religions, that Münter further identifies Ashtoreth—due allowance being made for difference of time and place—with the female Kalir, Asio-kersa, with the Egyptian Isis, with the Paphian Venus, with the Tantrian and Ephesian Diana, with the Bellona of Comana, with the Armenian Anahid, and with the Samian, Maltesian, and Lacinian Juno. She has also been considered to be the same as the Syrian fish-deity, the Atargatis of 2 Macc. xii, 26, whose temple appears, from 1 Macc. v, 43, to have been situated at Ashtoreth-Karnaïm. See ATARGATHS. Her figure

(in various forms) is certainly found on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 169); which likewise contain illustrations of most of the attributes ascribed to her in scriptural as well as profane authorities (see Jour. Sac. Lit. Oct. 1852, p. 88 sq.). As for the power of nature, which was worshipped under the name of Ashtoreth, Creuzer and Münster assert that it was the principle of conception and parturition—that subordinate power which is fecundated by a superior influence, but which is the agent of all births throughout the universe. As such, Münster maintains (Religion der Babylonier, p. 21), in opposition to the remarks of Gesenius (Jesaias, iii, 337), that the original form under which Ashtoreth was worshipped was the moon; and that the transition from that to the planet Venus (which we will immediately notice) was unquestionably an innovation of a later date. It is evident that the moon alone can be properly called the queen of heaven; as also that the dependent relation of the moon to the sun makes it a more appropriate symbol of that sex, whose functions as female and mother, throughout the whole extent of animated nature, were embodied in Ashtoreth. See BAAL. Movers (Phön. 607) distinguishes two Astartes, one Carthaginian-Sidonian, a virgin goddess symbolized by the moon, the other Syro-Phœnician, symbolized by the planet Venus. But it seems most likely that both the moon and the planet were looked upon as symbols, under different aspects and perhaps at different periods, of the goddess, just as each of them may in different aspects of the heavens be regarded as the "queen of heaven" (q. v.).

The rites of her worship, if we may assume their resembling those which profane authors describe as paid to the cognate goddesses, in part agree with the few indications in the Old Testament, in part complete the brief notices there into an accordant picture. The cakes mentioned in Jer. vii, 18, which are called in Hebrew קֶמֶחַ, kamechim', were also known to the Greeks by the name καβδόμεναι, and were by them made in the shape of a sickle, in reference to the new moon. Among animals, the dove, the crab, and, in later times, the lion were sacred to her, and among fruits the pomegranate. No blood was shed on her altar; but male animals, and chiefly kids, were sacrificed to her (Tacit. Hist. ii, 3). Hence some suppose that the reason why Judah promised the harlot a kid was that she might sacrifice it to Ashtoreth (see Tuch's note to Gen. xxxviii, 17). The most prominent part of her worship, however, consisted of those libidinous orgies which Augustine, who was an eye-witness of their horrors in Carthage, describes with such indignation (De Civit. Dei, ii, 3). Her priests were eunuchs in women's attire (the peculiar name of whom is קִלְשִׁימַי, kal'shim', male devotees, sacri, i. e. cinædi, Galli, 1 Kings xiv, 24), and women (קֶלְשִׁימַי, kel'shoth', female devotees, sacrae, i. e. meretrices, IIos. iv, 14, which term ought to be distinguished from ordinary harlots, קִלְשִׁימַי), who, like the Bayaderes of India, prostituted themselves to enrich the temple of this goddess. See SODOMITE. The prohibition in Deut. xxiii, 18, appears to allude to the dedication of such funds to such a purpose. As for the places consecrated to her worship, although the numerous passages in which the Auth. Vers. has erroneously rendered אֲשֵׁרָה, Asherah, by grove, are to be deducted [see GROVE], there are yet several occasions on which gardens and shady trees are mentioned as peculiar seats of (probably her) lascivious rites (Isa. i, 29; Ixv, 3; 1 Kings xiv, 23; Hos. iv, 13; Jer. ii, 20; iii, 13). She also had celebrated temples (1 Sam. xxxi, 10). As to the form and attributes with which Ashtoreth was represented, the oldest known image, that in Paphos, was a white conical stone, often seen on Phœnician remains in the figure which Tacitus thus describes, l. c.: "The statue of the goddess bears no resemblance to the human form: you see a round figure, broad at the base, but growing fine by degrees, till, like a cone, it lessens to a point." In Canaan she was probably represented as a cow. It is said in the book of Tobit, i, 5, that the tribes which revolted sacrificed "to the heifer Baal." In Phœnicia she had the head of a cow or bull, as she is seen on coins. At length she was figured with the human form, as Lucian expressly testifies of the Syrian goddess, which is substantially the same as Ashtoreth; and she is so found on coins of Severus, with her head surrounded with rays, sitting on a lion, and holding a thunderbolt and a sceptre in either hand. What Kimchi says of her being worshipped under the figure of a sheep is a mere figment of the rabbins, founded on a misapprehension of Deut. vii, 13. As the words "flocks (Ashtaroth) of sheep" there occurring may be legitimately taken as the loves of the flock (Jænes pecoris), i. e. either the ewes or the lambs, the whole foundation of that opinion, as well as of the notion that the word means sheep, is unsound.

Medal of the Female Baal.

The word Ashtoreth cannot be plausibly derived from any root or combination of roots in the Syro-Arabian languages. The best etymology, that approved by Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 1083), deduces it from the Persian sîtrâh, star, with a prosthetic guttural (i. q. שֵׁטֶרֶשׁ, "Esther," אֵסְתֵר). Ashtoreth is feminine as to form; its plural ASHTAROTH also occurs (Judg. ii, 13; x, 16; 1 Sam. vii, 4; xii, 10; xxxi, 10), as is likewise the case with Baal, with which it is in this form often associated (Judg. x, 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4; xii, 10); and this peculiarity of both words is thought (by Gesenius, Thesaur. s. v.) to denote a plurality of images (like the Greek Hermæ), or to belong to that usage of the plural which is found in words denoting lord (Ewald, Hebr. Gram. § 361). Movers, however, contends (Phön. i, 175, 602) that the plurals are used to indicate different modifications of the divinities themselves. In the earlier books of the O. T. only the plural, Ashtaroth, occurs, and it is not till the time of Solomon, who introduced the worship of the Sidonian Astarte, and only in reference to that particular goddess, Ashtoreth of the Sidonians, that the singular is found in the O. T. (1 Kings xi, 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii, 13).—Kitto; Smith. See ASTARTE.

Ash'ûath (Heb. Ashath', אֲשֵׁת, perh. for אֲשֵׁת, bright; Sept. 'Ασιζ v. r. 'Ασιζ, Vulg. Asoth), the last name of the three sons of Japhlet, great-grandson of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 33). B. C. cir. 1612.

Ash'ur (Heb. Ashchur', אֲשֻׁר, perh. black, otherwise man of nobility; Sept. 'Ασϋό v. r. 'Ασιόω, and 'Ασούρ v. r. 'Αγούω), a posthumous son of Hezron (grandson of Judah), by one of his wives (the daughter of Machir, Abiah (1 Chron. ii, 24). He had several sons by each of his two wives (1 Chron. iv, 5), and through these he is called (in both passages) the "father" (founder) of Tekoa, which appears to have been the place of their eventual settlement. B. C. cir. 1658. Schwarz suggests (Paläst. p. 119) that the name may be connected with the Both-Zacharias (q. v.) of Josephus (War, i, 1, 5); but this lies at some distance from Tekoa. See also ASSUR.

Ash'urite (Heb. Ashuri', אֲשֻׁרִי, prob. originally from אֲשֵׁת, a step; Sept. 'Ασπί, Vulg. Gessuri; Auth. Vers. "Ashurites"), apparently the designation of a tribe in the vicinity of Gilead, one of the trans-Jordanic districts over whom the revolting Abner made Ish-boseth king (2 Sam. ii, 9). The Chaldee paraphrast (Targum of Jonathan) supposes the inhabitants of Asher (אֲשֵׁר אֲשֵׁרִים, "of the house of Asher"), which is supported by several MSS. that read אֲשֵׁרִים (Davidson, Hebr. Text, ad loc.). "The Asherites" will then denote the whole of the country west of the Jordan above Jezreel (the district of the plain of Esdraeion), and the enumeration will proceed regularly from north to south, Asher to Benjamin. The form "Asherite" occurs in Judg. i, 32. See ASHER. By some of the old interpreters—Arabic, Syriac, and Vulgate versions—and in modern times by Ewald (Gesch. Isr. iii, 145), the name is taken as meaning the Geshurites, the members of a small kingdom to the S. or S.E. of Damascus, one of the petty states which were included under the general title of Aram (q. v.). The difficulty in accepting this substitution is that Geshur had a king of its own, Talmi, whose daughter, moreover, was married to David somewhere about this very time (1 Chron. iii, 2, compared with 4), a circumstance not consistent with his being the ally of Ishbosheth, or with the latter being made king over the people of Geshur. Talmi was still king many years after this occurrence (2 Sam. xiii, 37). In addition, Geshur was surely too remote from Mahanaim and from the rest of Ishbosheth's territory to be intended here. See GESHUR. Still others understand that the clan referred to are the same with the Asshurites (Heb. Asshurim, אֲשׁוּרִים; Sept. Ἀσσοῦριται, Vulg. Assurim; Auth. Vers. "Asshurim"), an Arab tribe said (with the Lotushim and Lemunim) to be descended from Dedan (Gen. xxv, 3), and who appear from these notices to have settled in the south-western part of the Hauran, where they became somewhat incorporated with the Israelites. See ARABIA.

In Ezek. xxvii, 6, Ashur (אֲשׁוּרִים, plur. Ashurim'), in the expression, אֲשׁוּרִים בְּרֵעֵי עֵץ אֵיבֹרִים, they benches [or desks] they have made of ivory, the daughter of the ashur-trees, i. e. inlaid or bordered with that wood; Sept. ῥά ἰσά σου ἐποίησαν ἱεῖ ἰλιφάρως, οἰκὼν ἀλωάτους, Vulg. et transtra tua fecerunt tibi ex ebor Indico et praterioli, Auth. Vers. "the company of the Ashurites have made thy benches of ivory") evidently stands for teāshur' (אֲשׁוּרִים), or box-wood. See BOX-TREE.

Ash-Wednesday (dies cinerum), the first day of Lent. It is so called from the custom observed in the ancient Church of penitents expressing their humiliation at this time by appearing in sackcloth and ashes. But it is not certain that this was always done precisely on Ash-Wednesday, there being a perfect silence in the most ancient writers about it. The discipline used toward penitents in Lent, as described by Gratian, differed from their treatment at other times; for on Ash-Wednesday they were presented to the bishop, clothed in sackcloth, and barefooted; then the seven penitential psalms were sung; after which the bishop laid his hands on them, sprinkled them with holy water, and poured ashes upon their heads, declaring to them that as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they, for their sins, were cast out of the Church. Then the inferior ministers expelled them out of the doors of the church. In the end of Lent, on the Thursday before Easter, they were again presented for reconciliation by the deacons and presbyters at the gates of the church. But this method of treating penitents in Lent carries with it the marks of a more modern practice; for there was no use of the holy water in the ancient discipline, nor seven penitential psalms in their service, but only one, viz. the fifty-first. Neither was Ash-Wednesday anciently the first day of Lent, till Gregory the Great first added it to Lent to make the number of fasting-days completely forty, which before were but thirty-six. Nor does it appear that anciently the time of imposing penance was confined to the beginning of Lent, but was granted at all times, whenever the bishop thought the penitent qualified for it. In Rome the spectacle on this occasion is most ridiculous. After giving themselves up to all kinds of gayety and licentiousness during the Carnival, till twelve o'clock on Tuesday night, the people go on Ash-Wednesday morning into the churches, when the officiating priests put ashes on their head, repeating the words, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." The day is kept in the English Church by proper collects and lessons, but without the ashes ceremony.—See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xviii, ch. ii, § 2; Procter, Common Prayer, p. 278; Burnet, Hist. of Eng. Ref. ii, 94; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Ritibus, lib. iv, cap. xvii. Treatises on this observance have been written by Gleich (Viteb, 1689), Mittwoch (Lips. 1693), Schmid (Helmst. 1702), Siber (Lips. 1709). See ASHES.

Asia (Ἀσία, referred by the Greeks to a person, Herod. iv, 45, but by moderns to an Eastern, usually Shemitic etymology, comp. Bochart, Phaleg, iv, 33, p. 3379; Sackler, Alte Geogr. p. 89; Wahl, in the Hall. Encycl. vi, 76 sq.; Forbiger, Alte Geogr. ii, 39; Hitzig, Philist. p. 93), a geographical name which is employed by the writers of antiquity to denote regions of very different extent, designating as early as the time of Herodotus (iv, 36) an entire continent, in contrast with Europe and Africa (comp. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 10, 1), the boundaries of which have been clearly defined (Forbiger, Alte Geogr. ii, 39) since the descriptions of Strabo (i, 35) and Ptolemy (iv, 5); in the Roman period, however, it was generally applied only to a single district of Western Asia (Asia Minor). It is in the latter sense alone that the word occurs in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. viii, 6; xi, 13; xii, 39; xiii, 32; 2 Macc. iii, 3; x, 24) and New Test. (Acts ii, 9; vi, 9; xvi, 6; xix, 10, 22, 26, 27; xx, 4, 16, 18; xxi, 27; xxvii, 2; Rom. xvi, 5 [where the true reading is 'Asia']; 1 Cor. xvi, 19; 2 Cor. i, 8; 2 Tim. i, 15; 1 Pet. i, 1; Rev. i, 4, 11).

1. CONTINENT OF ASIA.—The ancient Hebrews were strangers to the division of the earth into parts or quarters, and hence we never find the word Asia in any Hebrew book. It occurs first in Biblical writers in the books of the Maccabees, and there in a restricted sense. In its widest application, however, as designating in modern geography a leading division of the globe, it is of the deepest interest in sacred literature. This part of the world is regarded as having been the most favored. Here the first man was created; here the patriarchs lived; here the law was given; here the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; and from hence the first founders of cities and nations in other parts of the world conducted their colonies. In Asia our blessed Redeemer appeared, wrought salvation for mankind, died, and rose again; and from hence the light of the Gospel has been diffused over the world. Laws, arts, sciences, and religions almost all have had their origin in Asia. See ETYMOLOGY.

1. Geographical Description.—Asia, which forms the eastern and northern portion of the great tract of land in the eastern hemisphere, is the oldest known portion of the globe, and is usually called the cradle of the human race, of nations, and of arts. It is separated from Australia by the Indian and Pacific Oceans; from America on the north-east by Behring's Straits, and on the east by the great Eastern or Pacific Ocean; from Africa by the Arabian Sea (at the west by the Mediterranean Sea) and by the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, with the Straits of Babelmandeb; from Europe by the Ka-kaia Gulf (at the extreme north-west), by the Caspian Sea and the River Ural, by the Black Sea and the Bosphorus, by the Sea of Marmora and the Dardanelles, and by the Grecian Archipelago. It is united with Africa by the desert Isthmus of Suez, and with Europe by the lofty Caucasian Mountains and the long Ural range. The area is about 16,175,000 square miles.

The inhabitants of Asia (whose number is variously estimated at from 500,000,000 to 800,000,000) are divided into three great branches: The Tatar-Caucasian, in the Western Asia, exhibits the finest features of our race in the Circassian form; the Mongolian race is spread through Eastern Asia; the Malay in Southern Asia and the islands. The north is inhabited by the Samoiedes, Tchoukches, and others. The following tribes, of different language and origin, may be distinguished, some of which are relics of scattered tribes of nomades: Kamtschatdales, Ostiaks, Samoiedes, Koriaks, Kurilians, Aleutians, Coreans, Mongols, and Kalmaucks, Mantchoos (Tungoos, Daurians, and Mantchoos Proper), Finns, Circassians, Georgians, Greeks, Syrians and Armenians, Tatars and Turks, Persians and Afghans, Thibetans, Hindoos, Siamese, Malays, Annamites (in Cochin China and Tonquin), Burmese, Chinese and Japanese, besides the indigenous inhabitants of the East Indian islands, Jews and Europeans. The principal languages are the Arabian, Persian, Armenian, Turkish, Tatar, Hindoo, Malayan, Mongol, Mantchoo, Chinese, and Sanscrit. The principal religions which prevail are Mohammedanism in the western parts, the worship of the Lama of Thibet in the central region, Buddhism in the Burmese territory, and Hindooism or Brahminism in India. For farther details and statistics of the Asiatic countries, see each in its alphabetical place, especially Turkey, Persia, China, and India.

From this great continent must undoubtedly have issued at some unknown period that extraordinary emigration which peopled America. It cannot be questioned that the inhabitants of the north-eastern parts of Asia, little attached to the soil, and subsisting chiefly by hunting and fishing, might pass either in their canoes in summer, or upon the ice in winter, from their own country to the American shore. Or a passage of this kind may not be necessary, for it is by no means unlikely that the Straits of Behring were formerly occupied by the land, and that the isthmus which joined the old world to the new was subverted and overwhelmed by one of those great revolutions of nature which shake whole continents, and extend the dominion of the sea to places where its waters are unknown. Dr. Prichard, in his Researches into the Physical History of Man, is decidedly of opinion that America was peopled by an Asiatic migration; and in the examples he gives of the coincidences of words, he has fully established the fact of an intercourse between the nations of Northern Asia and those of America, long before the very existence of the latter continent was known to modern Europe. Later investigations have, almost without exception, tended to confirm this conclusion.

The Scriptures make no mention of many of the empires and nations of Asia, such as the Chinese empire, the Hindoos, and the numerous tribes inhabiting the extensive region of Siberia or Asiatic Russia. India is mentioned in the Book of Esther, but only in reference to the extensive dominions of Ahasuerus. The Medo-Persian branch of the Indo-European nations who inhabited Asia, of whom were the Medes and ancient Persians, Parthians, and Armenians, are, however, mentioned in sacred history; and among the nations of Asia Minor we have the Phrygians, the Mysians, and the Bithynians. Of the ancient western Asiatic nations, those connected with sacred history are the Elamites, or descendants of Elam; the Assyrians, or descendants of Asshur; Hebrews and Idumæans, or Edomites; Beni-Jaktan, or Arabs; the Chasdim, or Chaldeans; the Arameans, who inhabited Syria and Mesopotamia; the Phœnicians, or descendants of Canaan; the Mizraim, or the Egyptians; the Cushites, or Ethiopians; and the Philistines. Of the ancient empires mentioned in the Scriptures, the Assyrian is the earliest, so called from Asshur, the son of Shem. Out of the empire founded by Nimrod at Babylon sprung the Babylonian or Chaldean, the capital of which was Babylon, while that of Assyria was Nineveh. The empire of the Medes also sprung from the Assyrian, and was at length united by Cyrus with Persia, a country which, previous to the reign of that great prince, did not contain more than a single province of the present extensive kingdom, and which continued to rule over Asia upward of two centuries, until its power was overthrown by Alexander the Great. Elam, which originally denoted the country of the Elymaei in the modern Khusistan, afterward became the Hebrew term for Persia and the Persians, who were allied to the Madai or Medes. The other nations of Asia mentioned in the Scriptures have each their appropriate designations, such as the Arphaxad, or Arph-Chesad, supposed to be the Chaldeans; the Lud or Ludim, alleged by Josephus and Bochart to be the Lydians; and the Aramites or the Syrians. The Asiatic countries more especially mentioned as the scenes of great events and important transactions are Arabia, Armenia, Assyria, Babylonia, Syria, and Judæa or Palestine, Phœnicia and Persia. See each in its alphabetical order.

II. Church History.—Christianity spread rapidly in the first centuries in Western Asia, which, after the times of Constantine, belonged among the Christian countries. The apostolic churches of Antioch (q. v.) and Jerusalem (q. v.) received along with Rome and Alexandria the rank of patriarchates. The diocese of Asia, of which Ephesus was the metropolis, was reckoned next in rank to the four patriarchates up till the council of Chalcedon, which subordinated the diocese to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries the Nestorians and Monophysites were excluded by œcumenical synods from the Church, and organized themselves as independent denominations, which still exist. See NESTORIANS; ARMENIANS; JACOBITES. Down to the twelfth century the churches of Western Asia were still in a moderately flourishing condition; but about that time the Saracens succeeded in establishing several principalities, which were the cause of sad desolation to the Church. The Turks, who succeeded, completed the wreck. For the Church history of the following centuries, we refer, besides to the articles already mentioned, to TURKEY; GREEK CHURCH. Also in other portions of Asia the Gospel was early proclaimed, and Christianity flourished for some time in Persia, till it succumbed to the rising power of Mohammedanism. The outposts of Christianity in China and India, which probably reach back to an early period, were lost sight of by the Latin and Greek churches. The Roman Church, in the Middle Ages and modern times, made great effort to unite with itself the churches of Western Asia, and to convert the pagans in various Asiatic countries. She succeeded in most of the Portuguese and Spanish possessions, and founded a number of dioceses in other countries. The history of Protestantism begins with the establishment of the rule of the East India Company; and in the nineteenth century its missions have developed on so large a scale that the time appears to be near when it will have the ascendancy in a large portion of Eastern Asia. For more details on the history of both the Roman and the Protestant churches, we refer to the articles PERSIA; CHINA; INDIA; FARTHER INDIA; INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO; JAPAN.

III. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The following tabular survey of the statistics of the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and total Christian population is taken from Schem's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859.

	Total.	Rom. Cath.	Protestant.	Christian.
Asiatic Russia	7,000,000	6,000	40,000	4,500,000
China	400,000,000	337,000	10,000	360,000
East India	171,000,000	1,023,000	200,000	2,200,000
Farther India	15,000,000	520,000
Turkey	15,000,000	260,000	6,100	3,206,000
Archipelago	80,000,000	2,000,000	50,000	2,500,000
Japan	35,000,000
Tartary	8,000,000
Persia	13,000,000	10,000	1,000	70,000
Afghanistan	4,000,000
Beloochistan	2,000,000
Arabia	5,000,000	1,000	52,000	2,000
Total	755,000,000	4,165,000	401,000	12,810,000

The Greek Church is the largest Christian body in Asiatic Russia and Asiatic Turkey, and is at present spreading, together with Russian influence, in Central Asia and China. Armenians are numerous in Russia, Turkey, and Persia, and scattered in India. Nestorians and Jacobites are mostly found in Turkey and India, the former also in Persia. By many it is believed that there are still numerous descendants of Christians in various parts of Asia as yet unknown to the rest of the Christian world. In 1855 a report spread that, at a distance of eighteen days' journey from Calul, there existed 12,000 Christian villages, and in 1859 it was asserted that 30,000 native Christians had been discovered in the island of Celebes. Buddhism, Brahminism, and the other religious systems of India, China, and Japan, count together a population of about 600 millions. Mohammedanism prevails in Asiatic Turkey, Arabia, Persia, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Tartary, and is, in general, professed by a population of about 50 millions. The Jews in Asiatic Turkey are estimated at about 350,000; small numbers live scattered in nearly every country. The rest belong to a great variety of pagan systems.

2. ASIA MINOR was the name anciently given to the region nearly inclosed by the Euxine, Egean, and Mediterranean Seas, and now forming a part of Turkey. Respecting the Biblical notices of this district we have to remark: (a) Antiochus the Great is called king of Asia in 1 Macc. viii, 6; a title that he assumed as master (not only of Syria, but also) of the greater part of Asia Minor (which had passed over to the Macedonian princes as a Persian province), but was compelled (B.C. 189) to relinquish all the Asiatic districts west of the Taurus to the Romans (Liv. xxxviii, 38; 1 Macc. viii, 8), who committed Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia to Eumenes (II), king of Pergamus (Liv. xxxvii, 55; xxxviii, 39). Hence (b) the kingdom of Pergamus was called the Asiatic empire, although the Syrian Seleucida, who only occupied Cilicia, likewise (perhaps only out of empty pretence) assumed this title (1 Macc. xii, 39; xiii, 32; 2 Macc. iii, 3), and so the empires of Egypt and Asia are found in contrast (1 Macc. xiii, 13). (c) By the will of Attalus (III) Philometor (q. v.), the kingdom of Pergamus passed over (B.C. 133) as a province into the hands of the Romans, in whose diplomatic phraseology Asia was now termed simply "Asia eis Taurum" (comp. Cicero, Flacc. 27; Nep. Attic. 54; Plin. 40), i. e. including the districts Mysia, Lydia, Phrygia, and Caria (which last the Rhodians obtained after the conquest of Antiochus the Great). It was governed by a praetor until the Emperor Augustus made it a proconsular province. In this extent it is styled Asia Proper (ἡ ἴσως καλονομένη Ἀσία, Ptolem. v, 2; comp. Strabo, xii, 577). To this connection appears to belong the following passages of the N. T.: Acts vi, 9 (where Asia and Cilicia are names of Roman provinces in Asia Minor); xx, 16; 1 Pet. i, 1 (see Steiger, in loc.); Rev. i, 4; comp. ii and iii, where letters to the Christian communities in the seven cities of (proconsular) Asia designate those in Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (q. v. severally) (see Lücke, Oñbar. Joh. p. 201; comp. T. Smith, Septem Asiæ ecclesiar. notitia, Lond. 1671, Utr. 1694; Arundell, Visit to the Seven Churches of Asia, Lond. 1828). On the other hand, in Acts ii, 9 (comp. xvi, 6; see Wiggers, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1838, i, 169), it appears to denote Phrygia, or, as the commentators will have it, only Ionia (see Kuinol, in loc.); but it is not certain that in Roman times Ionia was called Asia by pre-eminence (see Pliny, v, 28; comp. Solin. 43). The extent in 2 Cor. i, 8, is uncertain, and, moreover, the boundaries of Asia Minor varied at different periods (see Mannert, VI, ii, 15 sq.; Wetstein, ii, 464). Thus it may be regarded as pretty well settled: (1.) That "Asia" denotes the whole of ASIA MINOR, in the texts Acts xix, 26, 27; xxi, 27; xxiv, 18; xxvii, 2; but (2.), that only ASIA PROPER, the Roman or Proconsular Asia, is denoted in Acts ii, 9; vi, 9; xvi, 6; xix, 10, 22; xx, 1, 16, 18 [Rom. xvi, 5]; 1 Cor. xvi, 19; 2 Cor. i, 8; 2 Tim. i, 13; 1 Pet. i, 1; Rev. i, 4, 11. ASIA MINOR comprehended Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia, Mysia, Troas (all of which are mentioned in the New Testament), Lydia, Ionia, Æolis (which are sometimes included under Lydia), Caria, Doris, and Lycia. ASIA PROPER, or Proconsular Asia, comprehended the provinces of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia (Cicero, Ep. Fam. ii, 15). But it is evident that Luke uses the term Asia in a sense still more restricted; for in one place he counts Phrygia (Acts ii, 9, 10), and in another Mysia (xvi, 6, 7), as provinces distinct from Asia. Hence it is probable that in many, if not all, of the second set of references above, the word Asia denotes only Ionia, or the entire western coast, of which Ephesus was the capital, and in which the seven churches were situated. See generally, Usher, De Asia proconsulari (Lond. 1681); id. De episcop. metropol. in Asia proconsulari (Lond. 1687); Carpzov, De Asia ecclesiastica (Lips. 1638); Cellarius, id. (Hal. 1701); Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i, 237; Penny Cyc. s. v. Anatolia; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. i, 232 sq., 238 sq.; Texier, Asie Mineure (Paris, 1863); Le Bas and Chéron, Hist. Ancienne de l'As. Min. (Par. 1864); Perrot, Voyage en As. Min. (Paris, 1864).

3. PROCONSULAR ASIA, therefore, seems to be usually that designated in the New Test., being a Roman province which embraced the western part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, and of which Ephesus was the capital. This province originated in the bequest of Attalus, king of Pergamus, or king of Asia, who left by will to the Roman Republic his hereditary dominions in the west of the peninsula (B.C. 133). Some rectifications of the frontier were made, and "Asia" was constituted a province. Under the early emperors it was rich and flourishing, though it had been severely plundered under the republic. In the division made by Augustus of senatorial and imperial provinces, it was placed in the former class, and was governed by a proconsul. (Hence ἀποβίταροι, Acts xix, 38, and on coins.) It contained many important cities, among which were the seven churches of the Apocalypse, and it was divided into assize districts for judicial business. (Hence ἀγοπώροι, i. e. ἡγεῖται, Acts, ibid.) It is not possible absolutely to define the inland boundary of this province during the life of the Apostle Paul; indeed, the limits of the provinces were frequently undergoing change; but generally it may be said that it included the territory anciently subdivided into Æolis, Ionia, and Doris, and afterward into Mysia, Lydia, and Caria. See MYRIA; LYCIA; BITHYNIA; PHRYGIA; GALATIA. These were originally Greek colonies (see Smith's Smaller Hist. of Greece, p. 40 sq.). Meyer (in his Comment. on Acts xvi, 6) unnecessarily imagines that the divine intimation given to Paul had reference to the continent of Asia, as opposed to Europe, and that the apostle supposed it might have reference simply to "Asia cis Taurum," and therefore attempted to penetrate into Bithynia. The view of Meyer and De Wette on Acts xxvii, 2 (and of the former on Acts xix, 10), viz. that the peninsula of Asia Minor is intended, involves a bad geographical mistake; for this term "Asia Minor" does not seem to have been so applied till some centuries after the Christian era. Neither is it strictly correct to speak of Asia in the N. T. as being at that time called A. proconsularis; for this phrase also was of later date, and denoted one of Constantine's subdivisions of the province of which we are speaking. (See Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ch. xiv; Marquardt's Rom. Alterthümer, iii, 130-136.) See ASIARCH.

4. SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA.—These, celebrated in the Apocalypse, in the apostolic times, and in ecclesiastical history, were, as they are classified by the writer of the book of Revelation (ch. i-iii), Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, which see under the respective names. See ASIA MINOR (No. 2, above); REVELATION.

Asiarch (Ἀσιάρχης, ruler of Asia Minor, in the plur., Acts xix, 31; Vulg. Asia principes; Auth. Vers. "the chief of Asia"), the title of the ten persons annually chosen in Proconsular Asia as chief presidents of the religious rites (presides sacerdotales, Tertull. De Spect. 2), and whose office it was to exhibit solemn games in the theatre every year, in honor of the gods and of the Roman Emperor (Cod. Theodos. xv, 9, 2). This they did at their own expense (like the Roman ædiles), whence none but the most opulent persons could bear the office, although only of one year's continuance (see Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 83). The appointment was much as follows: at the beginning of every year (i. e. about the autumnal equinox), each of the cities of Asia held a public assembly, in order to nominate one of their citizens as asiarch (Spanheim, De usu et præstant. num. p. 694). A person was then sent to the general council of the province, at some one of the principal cities, as Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, etc., to announce the name of the individual who had been selected (Æl. Arist. p. 344 sq., ed. Jebb; p. 613 sq., ed. Cant.). Of the persons thus nominated by the cities the council designated ten. As the asiarchs are repeatedly mentioned in the plural, some suppose that the whole ten presided as a college over the sacred rites (comp. Strabo, xiv, 649). But in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iv, 15) Polycarp is said to have suffered martyrdom when "Philip was asiarch and Statius Quadratus proconsul of Asia;" from which and other circumstances it is deemed more probable that, as in the case of the iremarch, the names of the ten nominated by the general council were submitted to the proconsul, who chose one of the number to be asiarch (see Vales, in loc.; Deyling, Observ. iii, 579 sq.). Kuinoel (at Acts xix, 31) admits that one chosen by the proconsul was pre-eminently the asiarch, but conceives that the other nine acted as his assessors, and also bore that title. Others, however, think the plurality of asiarchs sufficiently served for by supposing that those who had served the office continued to bear the title, as was the case with the Jewish high-priests; but the other branch of the alternative is usually preferred. It is probable that in the course of time changes were made in the office, which our fragmentary information does not enable us to trace; and that the solitary testimony of Eusebius amounts to no more than that one asiarch, Philip, then and there presided at the public games, but not that the arrangements of all the games were made and provided by that one asiarch. Even the college of these officers appear to have had jurisdiction in Proconsular Asia (q. v.) only, for we find mention of similar functionaries in the other provinces of Asia Minor, e. g. Bithyniarch, Galatarch, Lyciarch, Cariarch, etc. (Strabo, xiv, 3; Malalas, p. 285, 2r, ed. Bonn), and likewise in other parts of the Roman empire, e. g. Syriarch (Liban. Ep. 1217), Phœniciarch, Cyriarch (2 Macc. xii, 2), etc., each charged with similar duties in their respective districts (see the Hall. Encycl. iii, 284 sq.). There is no ground for the supposition of Schöttgen (Mittheil. Lips. v, 178 sq.), that the asiarchs were city magistrates, having appellate or superior jurisdiction over the decisions of local courts; they should by no means be confounded with the archon, or chief magistrate of Ephesus; for they were representatives, not of a single city, but of many cities united. This notion of the asiarchs is confirmed by a medal of Rhodes, struck under Hadrian, on the reverse of which we read, "A coin struck in common by thirteen cities, in honor of the magistrate of Rhodes, Claudio Fronto, asiarch and high-priest of the thirteen cities." The office might be filled by the same person several times (Ackerman, Num. Ill.

p. 51). Their place of residence was at Ephesus, Smyrna, Sardis, Cyzicus, or at any other city where the council was held. Their office was thus, in a great measure at least, religious, and they are, in consequence, sometimes called "priests" (ἀρχιερείς), and their office a "priesthood" (ἱερωσύνη) (Mart. S. Poly-carp. in Patr. Ap. c. 21). Probably it represented the religious element of the ancient Panionian League, to the territorial limits of which also the circle of the functions of the asiarchs nearly corresponded (see Herod. i, 142). Coins or inscriptions bearing the names of persons who had served the office of asiarch one or more times, are known as belonging to the following cities: Aphrodisias, Cyzicus, Hypæpa, Laodicea, Pergamos, Philadelphia, Sardis, Smyrna, Thyatira. (Aristid. Or. xxvi, 518, ed. Dind. i; Eekhel, ii, 507; iv, 207; Böckh, Inscr. vol. ii; Krause, Viriatus Neocæsar, p. 71; Wetstein, On Acts XIX; Herod. v, 38; Hammond, On X. T. in loc.)

These chiefs, then holding such games at Ephesus, out of friendly consideration for Paul, restrained him from appearing, as he proposed, in the theatre, during the sedition raised by Demetrius, the gold-mith, respecting Diana of Ephesus (Acts xix, 31). The consideration of these asiarchs for the Apostle Paul, during the tumult, is not only extremely honorable to his character and to theirs, but is also a strong confirmation of the remark made by the evangelist (ver. 10), that "all they who dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks" (see Conybeare and Howson, ii, 86). It shows also in what light the tumult of Demetrius was beheld, since he took especial care to observe that "all Asia" worshipped their goddess. Yet were the very asiarchs, now engaged in this worship, intent on saving the man whom Demetrius represented as its most formidable enemy (Carstens, De Asiarchis Paulo quondam amicis, Lubec. 1744). See generally Salmas, ad Solm. 40, p. 566; Van Dale, Disert. ad antiq. et marmor. p. 273 sq.; Carstens, Meditat. subsecq. spec. ii (Lubec. 1744); Ziebeck, Obscrv. e numis antiq. sacris. (Viteb. 1745), p. 36 sq.; *Smith's Dict. of Class. Asiatic Brethren, a secret society greatly resembling the Rosicrucians (q. v.). It arose in Austria in 1780, spread throughout Germany, applied itself chiefly to cabalistics and theosophy, and occasioned many frauds. Baron Ecker von Eckhofen and one Boheman at Stockholm were the principal defenders of this order. See Die Brüder St. Johannis des Evangelii aus Asien (Berl. 1830).

Asibi'as (Ἀσιβίας, comp. Aselia, 1 Esdr. viii, 48), one of the Israelites who renounced his Gentile wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 26); doubtless a corruption for the MALULIAN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 25).

A'siël, the name of two men.

1. (Heb. Asi'el, אֲשִׁיֵּל, created by God; Sept. Ἀσιήλ.) The father of Seraiah, and progenitor of one of the Simeonite chiefs that expelled the Hamite aborigines from the fertile valleys near Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv, 35). B. C. ante 712.

2. (Vulg. Asiel, for the Greek text is not extant.) The last named of the five scribes whom the divine voice is represented, in the fanciful vision of 2 Esdr.

xiv, 24, as directing Ezra to bring for the purpose of recording the revelation about to be communicated to him.

Asinæus (Ἀσινᾶος), a Jew during the captivity at Babylon, of whose exploits, in connection with his brother Anileus (Ἀνιλαῖος), in raising himself from obscurity to the chief power in the province of Mesopotamia, and of whose reverses afterward in consequence of an idolatrous marriage, Josephus gives a detailed but apparently apocryphal account (Ant. xviii, 9).

As'ipha (Ἀσιφά), one of the family-heads of the "temple-servants" that returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 29); evidently the ΗΑΣΥΦΙΑ (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 43).

As'kelon (Ἰδγ, i, 18). See ASKHELON.

Askew, ANNE (otherwise Aseough or Aseuc), born in 1521, was second daughter of Sir Wm. Askew, of Lincolnshire. By the study of the Scriptures she became a convert to the opinions of the Reformers, at which her husband, one Kyme, a papist, turned her out of doors. She came up to London to sue for a separation, and appears to have attracted the favorable notice of some ladies high at court. She was soon accused of heresy and committed to prison. Being examined before the Bishop of London and others, she is said to have replied boldly to the lord-mayor's question, "Whether the priests cannot make the body of Christ?" "I have read that God made man; but that man can make God I never yet read" (Styrye, Memorials, i, 287). Yet it is said by Burnet that "after much pains she set her hand to a recantation, by which she acknowledged that the natural body of Christ was present in the sacrament after the consecration, whether the priest were a good or an ill man; and that, whether it was presently consumed or reserved in the pix, it was the true body of Christ" (Hist. of Reformation, bk. iii). Her recantation, however, was not effectual, for she was soon apprehended again and committed to Newgate, where she was again strictly questioned as to what ladies at court had shown her favor and encouragement. She was placed on the rack and cruelly tortured in the sight, and, as Fox says, by the hand of the Lord Chancellor Wriethley, whose eagerness in this matter is ascribed to his desire to gain some ground of offence against the Duchess of Suffolk, the Countess of Hertford, or some other ladies. But her patience and fortitude could not be shaken. She was burnt with four others at the stake in Smithfield, July 16, 1546. She wrote several works, one of which is entitled Examinations pie.—Penny Cyclop. s. v.; Fox, Book of Martyrs, p. 600-614; Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, bk. i, p. 547.

Aslac, CONRAD, a learned Danish divine, born at Bergen, in Norway, in 1564, studied at Copenhagen, and in the years 1592-99 travelled through Germany, Switzerland, France, England, and Ireland. He returned to Copenhagen in 1600, and professed the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and theology. He died in 1624, leaving among other works: 1. A Treatise on Election (Danish, Copenhagen, 1612, 8vo);—2. Physica et Ethica Mosæica (Hanau, 1613);—3. De Decendi et Dissendi Ratione, lib. iii (Copenhagen, 1612, 4to). This book is placed on the Roman Index;—4. De Christo vero Deo et Homine in una Indivisa Persona, etc. (Frankfort, 1620, 8vo);—5. De Statu Christi ante Incarnationem et in Incarnatione (Copenhagen, 1622, 4to);—6. Oratio de Statu Religionis in Dania, ab 1517 ad 1628 (Copenhagen, 1631, 4to);—7. De Religione per Lutherum Plantatione in Dania et Norvegiam (Copenhagen, 1620, 4to); besides many disputations, etc., on Free Will, Original Sin, the Creation, etc.

Asmodæus (Ἀσμοδαῖος), a demon or evil spirit mentioned in the apocryphal book of Tobit (iii, 8) as having become enamored of Sara, the daughter of Raguel, and killed the seven husbands whom she had married (Tob. vi, 14), but as being put to flight by the charm used by Tobias on his marriage with her (Tob. viii, 2, 3). The rabbins have a number of absurd traditions respecting Asmodeus (אֲשֹׁמֶדֶס or אֲשֹׁמֶדֶס, Talm. Getten, lxxviii, 1) as a libidinous demon (comp. Gen. vi, 1), and indeed the Talmudists represent him as the prince of devils, even Satan himself (see Eisenmenger, Endl. Juchoth, ii, 440; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr., ad Luc. xi, 15). Hence Beelzebub has been supposed to refer to the same demon. But a similar title they also give to "the angel of death," as the destroyer of all mankind; hence some derive the name Asmodeus from the Hebrew שָׁמַד, shamad', to exterminate, which identifies it also with Abaddon (q. v.), the same as Apollyon (Rev. ix, 11, where he is called "a king, the angel of the bottomless pit"), and ὁ Ὄλοθρεῖων, Wisd. xviii, 25, where he is represented as the "evil angel" (Psa. lxxviii, 49) of the plague (Schleuser's Thesaur., s. v.), the angel of death (see Ilgen, zu Tob., p. 42). Thus the story in Tobit means no more than that the seven husbands died successively on their marriage with Sara. (For other interpretations, see Fritzsche, Comment., p. 38.) Others, however (Gesenius, Alg. Lit. Zeit. 1815, No. 123; De Wette, Bibl. Theol., p. 146; Reland, Ant. Sacr. iv, 6), rather refer it to the Persian word asmodan, to tempt (Castelli Lex. Pers. col. 24 sq.). In the book of Tobit, this evil spirit is represented as causing, through jealousy, the death of Sara's seven husbands in succession on the bridal night; gaining the power to do so (as is hinted) through their incontinence. Tobias, instructed by Raphael, burns on "the ashes of perfume" the heart and liver of the fish which he caught in the Tigris; "the which smell when the evil spirit had smelled, he fled into the utmost parts of Egypt, and the angel bound him" (Tob. viii, 3). It is obviously a vain endeavor to attempt to rationalize this story, since it is throughout founded on Jewish demonology, and "the loves of the angels," a strange fancy derived from Gen. ii, 2. Those, however, who attempt this task make Asmodeus the demon of impurity, and suppose merely that the fumes deadened the passions of Tobias and his wife. The rabbins (among other odd fables) make this demon the offspring of the incest of Tubalcain with his sister Noema, and say (in allusion to Solomon's many wives) that Asmodeus once drove him from his kingdom, but, being dispossessed, was forced to serve in building the Temple, which he did noiselessly, by means of a mysterious stone Shamir (Calmet, s. v. and Fragm. ant., p. 271, where there is a great deal of fanciful and groundless speculation). See generally Wichmann, De Asmodeo spiritu maligno ἀσμοδεμόνιον (Lub. 1666); Hosius, D. Asmodeus demonio maligno (Hafn. 1709); Neubauer, De angelis mortis ex mente Ebr. et Mith. unmelatorum (Hal. 1732); Hezel, Schriftforscher (Giesl. 1792), ii, 1 sq.; Calmet's Dissertation on the demon Asmodeus (translated in Arnold's Commentary on the Apocrypha); Ode, De Angelis, p. 611 sq. Asmonæan (Ἀσμοναῖος, Ἀσμοναῖος, Joseph. Ant. xii, 6, 1 sq.; in Joseph. Gorionid. plur. אֲשֹׁמֶדֶסִים, Chetshonimim'; more fully אֲשֹׁמֶדֶסִים בְּרֵי חַשְׁמוּנַיִם, Jonathan's Targ. on 1 Sam. ii, 4; comp. Arab. chashim, noble; אֲשֹׁמֶדֶסִים, Psa. lxxviii, 32; fit ones, i. e. opulent), the proper designation of the family of the priest Mattathias, whose sons became better known by the surname of the Maccabees. (For the lineage and history of the Asmonæans in full, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.) See JUDAS MACCABEES. With Mattathias (B.C. 167) began the exploits of the Asmonæans in delivering the Jewish people from the oppressive yoke of the Syrian Seleucide, which was accomplished by Jonathan, son of Mattathias, already a high-priest in rank—a dignity that was now attached to that of Syrian "mercenary." Simon, another son of Mattathias, became himself hereditary prince of the Jews. His grandson Aristobulus assumed the diadem, and the royal dynasty of the Asmonæans continued on the Jewish throne till the interference of Pompey in Jewish affairs. Aristobulus II, the third king of the Asmonæan line, was dethroned by the Romans, and upon his sons devolved the perilous endeavor of regaining their ancestral crown, but without permanence. They both paid therefor the penalty of their lives, the last being Antigonus (whom Antony caused to be beheaded at Antioch, Joseph. Ant. xv, 1, 2), with whom the Asmonæan dynasty expired, after a duration of 126 years, in the consulship of M. Vips. Agrippa and Canin. Gallus, i. e. B.C. 37 (see Joseph. Ant. xiv, 16, 4). The two surviving members of the family, Aristobulus and Mariamne, grandchildren of Aristobulus II, appear, it is true, at first to have striven to maintain a position in life under the Herodian sway suitable to their rank; but they soon fell under the suspicion of King Herod, and, with the assassination of Mariamne, the family of the Asmonæans likewise became extinct (apparently after Herod's return from Antioch, where he had met Octavianus on his return from Egypt, B.C. 29; Joseph. Ant. xv, 7, 4). The exploits of the Maccabees under Simon are related in the books of the Apocrypha that bear their name (1 and 2 Macc. among the Jews, סְפֵרֵי הַחֲשֻמוֹנַיִם, books of the Chashmonæans; see Eichhorn, Eind. in die Apokr. Schr. A. T. p. 208 sq.; Jahn, II, iv, 949 sq.; Berthold, iii, 1036); but the complete history of the Asmonæans is given by Josephus (Ant. xii, 6 to xiv, 16), who was himself a descendant of their lineage (Ant. xvi, 7, 1). See MACCABEES.

As'nah (Heb. Asnah', אֲשָׁנָה, perh. hateful, or thorn, otherwise store-house; Sept. Ἀσνά), the head of one of the families of the Nethinim that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 50). B.C. ante 536.

Asnap'per (Chald. Osnappar', אֲסַנְפַּר; some MSS. אֲסַנְפַּר, Aseppappar', whence Sept. Ἀσναπαρῶ v. r. Ναδῶ; Vulg. Aseppaphar), the name of an Assyrian king or satrap who is said to have planted colonies (probably from some distant conquered territory) in Samaria, or perhaps other parts of Palestine and Syria (Ezra iv, 10). On the supposition that a king of Assyria is meant, and by comparison with 2 Kings xvii, 24, many (with Grotius) identify him with Shalmaneser; others (as Rosenmüller, Ather. I, ii, 109; Hengstenberg, Authent. Dan. p. 178) understand Esarhaddon (comp. Ezra iv, 2; so Michaelis; but see on the contrary Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Volks Israel, i, 473); while most of the Jewish interpreters assume Sennacherib to be meant. He was probably, however, only a satrap of some of the Assyrian provinces (B.C. cir. 712), and the epithet applied to him in the passage in Ezra (אֲסַנְפַּר הַגָּדֹל, the great and the excellent, i. e. most eminent [comp. κοδίσσατος, Luke i, 3]; Auth. Vers. "the great and noble") is apparently the usual title of persons in that capacity, being indeed perhaps the translation of the official title Osnapper itself (אֲסַנְפַּר = Sanscrit osna, great; אֲפַר = Sanscrit para, noble; see Luzath, Le Sanscritisme de la langue Assyrienne, p. 38-40). Bohlen, on the other hand, compares Sanscrit Senapa, leader of an army; according to which the name would become merely a designation of an Assyrian general.

A'som (Ἀσόμ), one of the Israelites whose "sons" had taken foreign wives on the return from Babelon (1 Esdr. ix, 33); evidently the HAsITHAM (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 33).

A'sor (Ἀσόρ), a plain in Galilee near the Sea of Gennesaret (1 Macc. xi, 67, according to the Vulg. and Syr.; the common Greek has Νασσώ, Auth. Vers. "Nasor;" but the initial r has apparently been borrowed from the preceding πείριον), probably Hasor (אֲסַפִּי, which is thus Græcized in the Sept.), in the tribe of Naphtali (comp. Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 7). See HAZOR.

Asp (אֲסַפִּי, pe'thun, so called probably from extending itself, Deut. xxxii, 33; Job xx, 14, 16; Isa. xi, 8; "adder," Psa. lviii, 4; xci, 13; ἄσπις, Rom. iii, 3), a venomous kind of serpent, perhaps correctly designated by this rendering, since the Chald., Syr., and Arabic equivalents appear to denote some member of the Colebræ family (see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1140). Boehart (Hieroz. iii, 156, ed. Lips.) incorrectly refers to the Syr. name for dragon (comp. his treatise De aspide surda ad Psa. lviii, 5, ibid. p. 161 sq.). Kitto (Pict. Bible, at Job xx, 14) compares the barren of the Arabs, called by the Cyprians kufi (κωφίη, deaf, comp. Psa. lviii, 4). This reptile, which more exactly corresponds in name to the Heb., is thus described by Forskål (Descr. Anim. p. 15): "Spotted all over with black and white; a foot long, and about twice as thick as one's thumb; oviparous; the bite instantly fatal, causing the body to swell." See ADNER. The "asp" is often mentioned by ancient authors (see Smith's brown, and closely allied to the celebrated cobra-de-capello of India in its power of swelling the neck when irritated, and of rising on its tail in striking its prey (see Panny Cyclopaedia, s. v.). It is often figured as a sacred symbol on the Egyptian monuments under the name Kaph (Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 105). See SERPENT.

Asp as Anathodæmon, or tutelary Spirit, at the entrance of an ancient Egyptian Store-house.

Aspalathus (ἀσπλάθος), a word which occurs only in Ecclus. xxiv, 15, of the Apocrypha, where the substance which it indicates is enumerated with other spices and perfumes to which wisdom is compared. It was no doubt one of the drugs employed by the ancients as a perfume and incense, as it is described by Dioscorides (i, 19), as well as enumerated by Theophrastus (ix, 7), and by both among aromatic substances. It forms one of the ingredients of the cygê, or compound incense made use of by the Egyptian priests, as related both by Plutarch and Dioscorides. From the notices in the classical authors (comp. Theogn. 1193; Theocr. xxiv, 87; Plin. xii, 24, 52) we can only gather that it was a thorny shrub, whose bark, especially of the roots, yielded a fragrant oil. In the Arabian works on husbandry the plant is stated to have an acid taste, and to bear a purple flower, but no fruit (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). Lignum Rhodium is sometimes considered to be one of the kinds of aspalathus described by Dioscorides, but this is a produce of the Canary Islands, and of the plant called Convolvulus separius. By others aspalathus, which has been supposed to be the same thing as Syrian aloe, or that of Rhodes and of Candia, is thought to have been yielded by species of the genus which has been called Aspalathus, and especially by the species A. Creticus, which is now called Anthyllis Hermannia; but there does not seem to be sufficient proof of this. Others again have held that aspalathus was a kind of agallochum [see ALOE], and Dr. Harris (sub. Lign.—aloe) seems to have thought that he got rid of a difficulty by suggesting that ahalim, which was probably agallochum, should be rendered Aspalathus. Arab authors, as Avicenna and Serapion, give Dar-shishan as the Arabic synonym of aspalathus. They quote some of their own countrymen as authorities respecting it, in addition to Galen and Dioscorides. Hence it would appear to have been a product of the East rather than of the West, as for such they usually give only the Greek name or its translation, and quote only Greek authorities. Avicenna, in addition to his description, says that some think it may be the root of Indian nard. Hence it may justly be inferred that Dar-shishan, which the Arabians thought to be aspalathus, must have come to them from India, or they would not have hazarded this supposition. In India the name Dar-shishan is applied to the bark of a tree which is called kaiphul or kyphul. This tree is a native of the Himalayan Mountains from Nepal to the Sutlej, and has been figured and described by Dr. Wallich, in his Tentamen Floræ Nepalesis, p. 59, t. 45, by the name Myricea sapida, in consequence of its fruit, which is something like that of the arbutus, being edible. The leaves, on being rubbed, have a pleasantly aromatic though faint smell. The bark forms an article of commerce from the hills to the plains, being esteemed in the latter as a valuable stimulant medicine. It may be seen mentioned by the name ka-i-phul in Gladwin's translation of the Persian Uftaz-i-Udwich, No. 884, as a synonym of Dar-sheshan, which is described as an aromatic bark, while at No. 157 Dar-shishan is considered to be a synonym of ishtelayus, which seems to be a corruption of aspalathus from the errors of transcribers in the diacritical points. Kaiphul has, moreover, been long celebrated

The Asp (Haje): 1, at rest; 2, aroused.

Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Aspis), but in such vague terms (except that they agree in its extreme venom, whence it was selected by Cleopatra as the surest and speediest means of her suicide) that little can be positively determined respecting it, if indeed several species of serpent are not thus designated. From the description of Pliny, however (Hist. Nat. viii, 35), naturalists have generally fixed upon the el-Haje (or Nasher, described by Forskål, Anim. p. 14) of the Arabs (Vipera Haje of Daudin, p. 14) of the ancient asp. It is from three to five feet in length, of a dark green color, marked obliquely with bands of by Sanscrit authors, and it may therefore have easily found one of the early articles of commerce from the East to the West, together with nard, costus, and lycium from these mountains.—Kitto, s. v. See SPICERY.

As'patha (Heb. Aspatha', אֲסַפְתָּה, prob. Sanscrit Aspadata, given by a horse, i. e. by Brahma in the form of a horse [comp. the Persian name Aspa-čārah or Aspāčāh, Diod. Sic. ii, 33]; Sept. φασγά, etc.), the third of the sons of Haman slain by the Jews of Babylonia (Esth. ix, 7). B. C. 473.

Aspergillum or Aspersorium, the brush or mop from which holy water (q. v.) is sprinkled in the Roman Church.

Aspersio, (1.) a name given by the early writers to baptism by pouring or sprinkling. See BAPTISM.

(2.) In the Roman Church, sprinkling of person or things with the so-called holy water is called "aspersion." The water is mixed with salt, and blessed by a given form of benediction for use in the church or at the altar.—Boissonnet, Diet. des Cérémonies, p. 105. See HOLY WATER.

Asphaltites. See DEAD SEA.

Asphaltum is probably the substance denoted by the Heb. אֲסַפְתָּה, chemar'; Arab. chemar (Sept. ἀσφαλτος, Auth. Vers. "slime," Gen. xi, 3; xiv, 10; Exod. ii, 3, where Luther, like the modern rabbins, translates by "clay"). The Hebrew and Arabic names probably refer to the reddish color of some of the specimens (Dioscorides, i, 99). (The Greek name, whence the Latin asphaltum, has doubtless given name to the Lake Asphaltites [Dead Sea], whence it was abundantly obtained.) Usually, however, asphaltum, or compact bitumen, is of a shining black color; it is solid and brittle, with a conchoidal fracture, altogether not unlike common pitch. Its specific gravity is from 1 to 1.6, and it consists chiefly of bituminous oil, hydrogen gas, and charcoal. It is found partly as a solid dry foss. it, intermixed in layers of plaster, marl, or slate, and partly as liquid tar flowing from cavities in rocks or in the earth, or swimming upon the surface of lakes or natural wells (Burchardt, ii, 77). To judge from Gen. xiv, 10, mines of asphaltum must have existed formerly on the spot where subsequently the Dead Sea, or Lake Asphaltites, was formed, such as Mariti (Travels, iv, 27) discovered on the western shore of that sea. The Palestine earth-pitch, however, seems to have had the preference over all the other sorts (Plin. xviii, 23; Discor. i, 190). It was used among the ancients partly for covering boats, paying the bottoms of vessels (comp. Niebuhr, ii, 336; Gen. vi, 14; Exod. ii, 3; Josephus, War, iv, 8, 4; Buckingham, Mesopot., p. 346), and partly as a substitute for mortar in buildings; and it is thought that the bricks of which the walls of Babylon were built (Gen. xi, 3; Strabo, xvi, 743; Herod. i, 179; Plin. xxxv, 51; Ammian. Marcell. xliii, 6; Vitruv. viii, 3; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 4, 3) had been cemented with hot bitumen, which imparted to them great solidity. In ancient Babylon asphaltum was made use of also for fuel, as the environs (in the place called Is or Hit, see D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Hit) have from the earliest times been renowned for the abundance of that substance (Diod. Sic. ii, 12; Herod. i, 179; Dion. Cass. lxxvii, 26; Strabo, xiv, 8, 4; Plut. Alex. c. 35; Theodorot, Quæst. in Gen. 59; Ritter, Erdk. ii, 545; Buckingham, Mesopot., p. 346). Neither were the ancient Jews unacquainted with the medicinal properties of that mineral (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 4). Asphaltum was also used among the ancient Egyptians for embalming the dead. Strabo (xvi) and many other ancient and modern writers assert that only the asphalt of the Dead Sea was used for that purpose; but it has in more recent times been proved, from experiments made on mummies, that the Egyptians employed slaggish mineral pitch in embalming the dead. This operation was performed in three different ways: first, with slaggish mineral pitch alone; second, with a mixture of this bitumen and a liquor extracted from the cedar, called cedoria; and third, with a similar mixture, to which resinous and aromatic substances were added (Haüy, Mineral. ii, 315). See BITUMEN.

Asphaltum is found in masses on the shore of the Dead Sea, or floating on the surface of its waters. Dr. Shaw (Travels in Barbary and the Levant) was told that this bitumen, for which the Dead Sea is so famous, rises at certain times from the bottom of the sea in large pieces of semi-globular form, which, as soon as they touch the surface and the external air operates upon them, burst asunder in a thousand pieces with a terrific crash, like the pulvis fulminans of the chemists. This, however, he continues, only occurs along the shore; for in deep water it is supposed that these eruptions show themselves in large columns of smoke, which are often seen to rise from the lake. The fact of the ascending smoke has been much questioned by naturalists; and although apparently confirmed by the testimonies of various travellers, collected by Büsching in his Erdbeschreibung, it is not established by the more observant travellers of recent years. Pococke (Description of the East, etc., ii, 46) presumes that the thick clumps of asphalt collected at the bottom of the lake have been brought up by subterranean fire, and afterward melted by the agitation of the waters. Also Strabo (xvi, 764) speaks of subterraneous fires in those parts (comp. Burchardt, Syria, 294). Dr. Robinson, when in the neighborhood, heard from the natives the same story which had previously been told to Setzen and Burchardt, namely, that the asphaltum flows down the face of a precipice on the eastern shore of the lake until a large mass is collected, when, from its weight or some shock, it breaks off and falls into the sea (Setzen, in Zach's Monatl. Correspond. xviii, 441; Burchardt, p. 394; Robinson, ii, 229). This, however, he strongly doubts for assigned reasons, and it is agreed that nothing of the kind occurs on the western shore. He rather inclines to receive the testimony of the local Arabs, who affirm that the bitumen only appears after earthquakes. They allege that after the earthquake of 1834 huge quantities of it were cast upon the shore, of which the Jehalin Arabs alone took about 60 kuntars (each of 98 lbs.) to market; and it was corroboratively recollectcd by the Rev. Eli Smith that a large amount had that year been purchased at Beirut by the Frank merchants. There was another earthquake on January 1, 1837, and soon after a large mass of asphaltum (compared by one person to an island, and by another to a house) was discovered floating on the sea, and was driven aground on the western side near Usdum. The neighboring Arabs assembled, cut it up with axes, removed it by camel loads, and sold it at the rate of four piastres the rutl, or pound; the product is said to have been about £3000. Except during these two years, the sheik of the Jehalin, a man fifty years old, had never known bitumen appear in the sea, nor heard of it from his fathers (Robinson's Bib. Researches, ii, 230). This information may serve to illustrate the account of Josephus that "the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum, which float on the surface, having the form and size of headless oxen" (War, ix, 8, 4); and that of Diodorus (ii, 48), who states that the bitumen is thrown up in masses, covering sometimes two or three plethra, and having the appearance of islands.—Kitto, s. v. See PITCH.

As'phar (Ασφάρ v. r. Ασφάρι, 1 Macc. ix, 33), a "pool" (λάκκος, not sea, as the Vulg. and some other versions render, but which often stands in the Sept. for פֶּתַח, a pit, or פְּעוּלָה, a well), i. e. fountain or cistern in the south or south-east of Palestine (in the "wilderness of Thecoe" or Tekoa), where the Jews under Jonathan Maccabæus had an encampment at the beginning of their struggle with Bacchides (see Joseph.

Ant. xiii, 1, 2); meaning doubtless (if the Dead [Asphaltic] Sea, as Grotius and others suppose) some considerable reservoirs in the direction of Arabia (comp. ver. 35), near the territory of the Nabathæans (see Diod. Sic. xix, 94).

Asphar'asus (Ἀσφάρασος; Vulg. Mechsator), one of the associates of Zerubbabel in the return from Babylon (1 Esd. v, 8); doubtless a corruption of the MIZPAR (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 2).

Aspland, ROBERT, an English Unitarian minister, born in 1742, educated for the Calvinistic ministry at Highgate and Hackney, and afterward at Aberdeen, where he threw up his beneficiary scholarship on becoming a Unitarian in 1800. At 20 he was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Newport, Isle of Wight, with liberty to preach Unitarianism. In 1805 he was installed at Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, where he remained pastor till his death, Dec. 30, 1845. For years he was a leader among English Unitarians, edited the "Monthly Repository" and the "Christian Reformer," and published a number of sermons and pamphlets. His Life, Works, and Correspondence were published by his son (London, 1850, 8vo).

As'ri'el (Heb. Asri'el, אַסְרִיֵּל, a fuller form of Asarel; Sept. Ἐσριήλ), a son of Manasseh (Josh. xvii, 2), apparently his first by a Syrian concubine (1 Chron. vii, 14, where the name is improperly Anglicized "Ashriel"). B. C. post 1856. His descendants were called Asri'elites (Heb. Asri'el, אַסְרִיֵּלִי; Sept. Ἐσριήλι, Num. xxvii, 31).

Ass (properly אֲשָׁוֶר, chamor', from the red lish dun color of the hair of the wild ass; female אֲשָׁוֶרֶת, athon'; Gr. ὄνος), (1.) a domestic animal (Gen. xii, 16; xxiv, 35; xxx, 43; xxxii, 5; Josh. vi, 21; vii, 24; comp. Exod. xx, 17; xxii, 4; xxxiii, 4 sq.; 1 Sam. viii, 16; Luke xiii, 15; xiv, 5), found generally in the East (comp. 1 Chron. xxvii, 30; for Mosaic precepts respecting the animal, see Exod. xx, 17; xxi, 33; xxii, 10; xxiii, 4 sq.; Deut. xxii, 2 sq.; comp. Mishna, Baba Mezai, i, 3; Baba Buthra, v, 2), and very serviceable (particularly in the cultivation of the soil, Varro, R. R. ii, 6; Pallad. xviii, 14), although not to be compared with the modern ass of northern countries, but by far more stately (Olear, Trav. p. 301, estimates a Persian ass to be worth nearly $100; comp. Plin. viii, 68; see Hasselquist, Trav. p. 67), more active, more mettlesome, and quicker (according to Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 311, an ass of ordinary speed will go over 1750 double paces of a man in half an hour; comp. Abdallatif, Denkw. p. 1375; Soniui, ii, 89 sq.). Asses were therefore (as still) held in great estimation; so that while with us the word ass is a low term of contempt, with the Orientals anciently as now the very opposite was the case (Gen. xlix, 14; comp. Iliad, ii, 578 sq.; see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Or. s. v. Hemar; Freytag, ad select. ex histor. Habbi, p. 59; Gessner, in the Commentar. Soc. Gott. ii, 32 sq.; Jablonski, Panth. Æg. iii, 45; Michælis, in the Commentar. Soc. Gott. iv, 6 sq.). The ass (perhaps the young ass, Job i, 3; Num. xxii, 21; 2 Kings iv, 24; Matt. xxi, 2 sq.), was on account of his sure step over hilly tracts, the usual animal for riding (Exod. iv, 20; Num. xxii, 21; Judg. x, 4; xii, 14; 1 Kings ii, 40; xiii, 27; 2 Sam. xix, 26), even for ladies (Josh. xv, 18; Judg. i, 14; 1 Sam. xxv, 23; 2 Kings iv, 22, 24; comp. Fabric, Cod. Apogr. i, 104; see Niebuhr, Besch. p. 44; Schweitzer, Reisen, p. 272; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 222) and nobles (2 Sam. xvii, 23; 1 Kings xiii, 13, 23; Zech. ix, 9; comp. Matt. xxi, 2 sq. [see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loc. p. 408; Schöttgen, i, 169 sq.]; Mark xi, 1 sq.; Luke xix, 29 sq.; John xii, 14 sq.; see Russel, Aleppo, ii, 49; Pococke, East, i, 309). The last preferred dappled asses, i. e. such as had a brownish-red skin marked with white streaks (Judg. v, 10; comp. Morier, Trav. p.

136; Paulus, Samml. i, 244). No saddle, however, was used from the earliest time (Hasselquist, Trav. p. 66), but simply a covering consisting of a piece of cloth or a cushion (hence אֲשָׁוֶרֶת הַבִּיטָה, a bound or girt ass, means a beast saddled and bridled, Gen. xxi, 3; Num. xxii, 21; Judg. xix, 10), so that the driver (Judg. xix, 3; 2 Kings iv, 24; Talm. אֲשָׁוֶרֶת, chammar', Mishna, Erub. iv, 10, etc.) ran beside or behind the rider (Hasselquist, Trav. p. 66). The ass, moreover, was not only employed for bearing burdens (Neh. xiii, 15; Josh. ix, 4; 1 Sam. xvi, 20; xxv, 18), but even for distant journeys (Gen. xliii, 26; xlv, 3, 13; xlv, 23; comp. Josephus, Life, 24; Mishna, Parah. xii, 9), and also for drawing the plough (Deut. xxii, 10; comp. Exod. xxxiii, 12; Isa. xxx, 24; xxxii, 20; so, too, among the Romans, Plin. viii, 68; xvii, 3; Varro, R. R. ii, 6; Colum. vii, 1) and in mills (Matt. xviii, 6; Luke xvii, 2; "asinus melarius," Colum. vii, 2; אֲשָׁוֶרֶת הַמִּלְחָמָה, Buxtorf, Floril. Hebr. p. 308; comp. Brouckhus, ad Tibull. ii, 1, 8). In war they carried the baggage (2 Kings vii, 7; comp. Pelluc. Onom. i, 10); but, according to Isa. xxi, 7, the Persian king Cyrus had cavalry mounted on asses; and not only Strabo (xv, 726) assures us that the Caramanians, a people forming part of the Persian empire, rode on asses in battle, but Herodotus (iv, 129) expressly states that Darius Ilystaspis made use of the ass in a fight with the Scythians (comp. Ælian, Anim. xii, 32). See, generally, Bochart, Hieroz. i, 148 sq.; ii, 214 sq.; Lenzgerke, Keidan, i, 140 sq., 146, 165.—Winer, i, 346.

The domestic ass, being an animal of a patient, laborious, and stupid nature, the emblem of persons of a similar disposition. Issachar is called a strong ass (Gen. xlix, 14), in reference to his descendants, as being a settled agricultural tribe, who cultivated their own territory with patient labor, emblemized by the ass. We rarely read of Issachar being engaged in any war, which is ever hostile to agriculture. Of Jehoiakim it is said, in Jer. xxii, 19, "With the burial of an ass shall he be buried, dragged along, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem;" an event mentioned by Josephus, who says that "the king of Babylon advanced with an army, that Jehoiakim admitted him readily into Jerusalem, and that Nebuchadnezzar, having entered the city, instantly put him to death, and cast his dead body unburied without the walls." It is recorded of Christ in Zech. ix, 9, and quoted thence in Matt. xxi, 5, that he should be "humble, and sitting on an ass, even on a colt the foal of an ass." As horses were used in war, Christ may be supposed, by this action, to have shown the humble and peaceable nature of his kingdom. On the contrary, Ephraim is compared to a wild ass, in Hos. viii, 9, i. e. he was untamed to the yoke, and traversed the desert as earnestly in the pursuit of idols as the onager in quest of his mates.

In the gospels is mentioned the πύλος ἑκαστικῆς (Matt. xviii, 6; Mark ix, 41), to express a large mill-stone, turned by asses, heavier than that turned by women or by slaves. See Jahn's Archæol. § 178, 179.

(II.) The ass is the Equus Asinus of Linnaeus; by some formed into a sub-genus, containing that group of the Equidae which are not striped like zebras, and have forms and characters distinguishable from true horses, such as a peculiar shape of body and limbs, long ears, an upright mane, a tail only tufted at the end, a treak along the spine, often crossed with another on the shoulders, a braying voice, etc. To designate these animals the Hebrews used various terms, by which, no doubt, though not with the strict precision of science, different species and distinct races of the group, as well as qualities of sex and age, were indicated; but the contexts in general afford only slight assistance in discriminating them; and reliance on cognate languages is often unavailing, since we find that similar words frequently point to secondary and not to identical acceptations. The name is assigned by the Auth. Vers. to several distinct Heb. words, viz. אֲשָׁלָה, אֲשָׁלָה, אֲשָׁלָה, אֲשָׁלָה, and אֲשָׁלָה, and the Greek words ὄνος and ὄνος. It occurs also in two passages of Ecclus. xiii. 19; xxxiii. 21, in the first of which it stands for ὄνος. See HE-ASS; SHE-ASS; FOAL.

1. The ordinary term אֲשָׁלָה (chamar', ὄνος) we take to be the name of the common working ass of Western Asia, an animal of small stature, frequently represented on Egyptian monuments with panniers on the back, usually of a reddish color (the Arabic hamar and cha-nara denoting red), and the same as the Turkish hymar. It appears to be a domesticated race of the wild ass of Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Southern Persia, where it is denominated gour. In Scripture this wild original variety is distinguished by the name אֲרָדָה (arad', Job xxxix, 5; Chald. אֲרָדָה, arad', Dan. v. 21; both rendered "wild ass"), a term most likely derived from the braying voice of the animal. In its natural state it never seeks woody, but upland pasture, mountainous and rocky retreats; and it is habituated to stand on the brink of precipices (a practice not entirely obliterated in our own domestic races), whence, with protruded and asses thus painted occur frequently in Oriental illuminated MSS., and although the taste may be puerile, we conceive that it is the record of remote conquest achieved by a nation of Central Asia, mounted on spotted or clouded horses, and revived by the Parthians, who were similarly equipped (see Introduct. to the Hist. of the Horse, in the Naturalist's Library, vol. xii). No other primeval invasion from the East by horsemen on such animals than that of the so-called Centaurs is recorded; their era coincides nearly with that of the judges (see Kitto, Pict. Bible, at Judg. v, 10).

Asses have always been in extensive use in the East (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 407); and they were employed by Joseph's brethren to carry grain from Egypt—a journey to which they are competent, notwithstanding the intervening deserts (Hackett's Illustrat. of Script. p. 29). They were abundant in Ancient Egypt (as donkeys still are, Lane's Mod. Eg. i, 209), where they were employed in treading out grain, and for other purposes (Wilkinson's Anc. Eg. i, 231). They are not represented on the Assyrian monuments (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 325), although the ounger or wild ass is still celebrated in that region for its swiftness (ib. i, 265).

2. אֲשָׁלָה, pe're, rendered likewise "wild ass," is a derivative of the same root which in Hebrew has produced paras, horse, and parasim, horsemen, Persians and Parthians. Though evidently a generic term, the Scripture uses it in a specific sense, and seems to intend by it the horse-ass or wild mule, which the Greeks denominated hemionos, and the moderns jiggetai; though we think there still remains some commixture in the descriptions of the species and those of the koulan, or wild ass of Northern Asia. Both are ears, it surveys the scene below, blowing and at length braying in extreme excitement. This habit is beautifully depicted by Jeremiah (xvii, 6; xlviii, 6). Varieties of this species are designated by the following terms: אֲשָׁלָה (a'yir) is translated in the Auth. Vers. "young ass," "colt," "foal;" but this rendering does not appear on all occasions to be correct, the word being sometimes used for animals that carry loads and till the ground, which seems to afford evidence of at least full growth (Isa. xxx, 6, 24). אֲשָׁלָה (athon', usually "ass" simply) is sometimes unsatisfactorily rendered "she-ass," unless we suppose it to refer to a breed of greater beauty and importance than the common, namely, the silver-gray of Africa, which, being large and indocile, the females were anciently selected in preference for riding, and on that account formed a valuable kind of property. From early ages a white breed of this race was reared at Zobeir, the ancient Dossora and capital of the Oreheui, from which place civil dignitaries still obtain their white asses and white mules. It is now the fashion, as it was during the Parthian empire, and probably in the time of the judges, to dapple this breed with spots of orange or crimson, or of both colors together; and this is probably the meaning of the word אֲשָׁלָה (checked?), rendered "white" in Judg. v, 10; an interpretation which is confirmed by the Babylonian Sanhedrin, who, in answer to King Sapor's offer of a horse to convey the Jewish Messiah, say, "Thou hast not a hundred-spotted horse, such as his (the Messiah's) ass." Horses nearly of the same stature, and not unlike in the general distribution of colors and markings, but the hemionos is distinguished from the other by its neighing voice and the deficiency of two teeth in the jaws. The species is first noticed by Aristotle, who mentions nine of these animals as being brought to Phrygia by Pharnaces the satrap, of which three were living in the time of his son Pharnabazus. This was while the ounger still roamed wild in Cappadocia and Syria, and proves that it had until then been considered the same species, or that from its rarity it had escaped discrimination; but no doubt remains that it was the gourkhour, or horse-ass, which is implied by the name hemionos. The allusion of Jeremiah, in speaking of the pere (xiv, 6), most forcibly depicts the scarcity of food when this species, inured to the desert and to want of water, are made the prominent example of suffering. See MULE. They were most likely used in traces to draw chariots. The animals so noticed in Isa. xxi, 7, and by Herodotus, are the same which Pliny, Strabo, and Arnobius make the Caramanians and Scythians employ in the same way. We claim the pere, and not the arod, to be this species, because the hemionos, or at least the gourkhour, does not bray, as before noticed; and because, notwithstanding its fierceness and velocity, it is actually used at present as a domestic animal at Lucknow, where it was observed by DuRoi. The hemionos is little inferior to the wild horse; in shape it resembles a mule, in gracefulness a horse, and in color it is silvery, with broad spaces of flaxen or bright bay on the thigh, flank, shoulder, neck, and head; the ears are wide like the zebra's, and the neck is clothed with a vertical dark mane prolonged in a stripe to the tuft of the tail. The company of this animal is liked by horses, and, when domesticated, it is gentle. It is now found wild from the deserts of the Oxus and Jaxartes to China and Central India. In Cutch it is never known to drink, and in whole districts which it frequents water is not to be found; and though the natives talk of the fine flavor of the flesh, and the gour in Persia is the food of heroes, to a European its smell is abominable.—Kitto, s. v. See WILD ASS.

ASS'S HEAD.—1. By the law of Moses the ass was declared unclean, and therefore was not used as food, excepting, as it would appear, in cases of extreme famine. This inference, however, is drawn from a case where the term "ass's head" may be explained to mean not literally the head of an ass, but a certain measure or weight so called, as in 1 Sam. xvi, 20, where it is said that Jesse sent to Saul "an ass of bread;" for, in our version, "laden with" is an addition to the text. Although, therefore, the famine in Samaria may possibly have compelled the people to eat asses, and a head may have been very dear, still the expression may denote the measure or weight which bore the same name. The prohibition, however, had more probably an economical than a religious purpose; hunting was thus discouraged, and no horses being used, it was of importance to augment the number and improve the qualities of the ass. This example of the use of asses' flesh (an "ass's head") in extreme famine (sometimes the flesh was regarded as a delicacy, Apul. Metam. vii, p. 158, Bip. ed.; comp. Galen, Facult. anim. i, 2, p. 486, ed. Kühn; Plin. viii, 68) occurs in 2 Kings vi, 25 (comp. Plutarch, l'it. Artax. 24; Barhebr. Chron. p. 149, 488), although it was unclean (Philo, Opp. ii, 400; comp. Exod. xiii, 13; xxxiv, 20), and the ass could not be offered in sacrifice (Porphyr. Abst. ii, 25; but it was otherwise among the Persians, Strabo, xv, 727; even in magic its flesh was used, Ammian. Marc. xxx, 5, p. 228, Bip. ed.). See FOOD.

2. As this animal was most serviceable to man, its name was held in respect rather than contempt. The slander, therefore, current among the Romans, and directed against the Jews, that they adored the head of an ass in secret, may not have originated in direct malice or misinterpretation, but have arisen out of some Gnostic fancies, in which the Alexandrian Jews, who had nearly forsaken the Scriptures in search of the magical delusions of the Cabala, and new semi-Christians in that city so deeply indulged during the first centuries of our era. Hence the Ophite sect figured in the circles of Behemoth, the last genius or Æon (?), under the name of Onoel, shaped like an ass; and there exists an engraved abraxas, or talisman, of Gentile or Gnostic origin, bearing the whole length form of a man in flowing robes with an ass's head, and holding an open book with the inscription "Deus Christianorum menenychytes." It is not likely that mere malice would engrave its spite upon amulets, although, if Jablonski be correct, the ass was held in contempt in Egypt, and, therefore, in Alexandria; but among the Arabs and Jews we have "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," a solemn allusion derived from the wild ass, almost the only voice in the desert; and in the distinguishing epithet of Mirvan II, last Omniad caliph, who was called Hymar al-Gezerah, or wild ass of Mesopotamia—proofs that no idea of contempt was associated with the prophet's metaphor, and that, by such a designation, no insult was intended to the person or dignity of the prince. In more remote ages Tartak or Tarhak was an ass-god of the Avim, and Yauk was the Arabian name of another equine divinity, or a different name for the same Tartak, whose form may possibly be preserved to the present day in the image of the Borak, or mystical camel, which, according to the Koran, bore Mohammed, and is now carried in processions at the Nurus. It is shaped like a horse, having a white body with red legs, a peacock's tail, and a woman's instead of an ass's head. Yet this attributing of the worship of the ass (ass's head) to the Jews (Plut. Sympos. iv, 5; Tacit. Hist. v, 4; Diod. Sic. Exc. ii, 225; comp. Josephus, Apion. ii, 7) was a highly odious misconception (see Bernhold, in the Erlang. Anzeig. 1744, No. 52). The historical foundation of this tradition cannot be traced to the well-known legend of a fountain of water discovered in the desert by an ass (Tacit. ut supra), for the arguments adduced by Creuzer (Comment. Herod. i, 270 sq.) lead to no clear result (see Fuller, Miscell. iii, 8, p. 332 sq.), and the etymological reference by Hase (De lapide fundamenti, in Ugolini Theaur. viii) to the idol Ashimam (q. v.) is as little satisfactory (see Müller, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1843, iv, 509 sq.; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 199 sq.; comp. Minuc. Fel. ix, 4; and the Talmud, Shabb. v, 1). ASS OF BALAAM.—Here we shall only inquire whether it were a reality or an allegory; an imagination, or a vision of Balaam. Augustine, with the greater number of commentators, supposes it was a certain fact, and takes it literally (Quæst. in Gen. 48, 50). He discovers nothing in the whole relation more surprising than the stupidity of Balaam, who heard his ass speak to him, and who replied to it, as to a reasonable person; and adds, as his opinion, that God did not give the ass a reasonable soul, but permitted it to pronounce certain words, to reprove the prophet's covetousness. Gregory of Nyssa (in Vita Moysis) seems to think that the ass did not utter words; but that, having brayed as usual, or a little more than usual, the diviner, practised in drawing presages from the voices of beasts and of birds, easily comprehended the meaning of the ass; and that Moses, designing to ridicule this superstitious art of augury, relates the matter as if the ass really spoke articulately. (But see 2 Peter ii, 16.) Maimonides asserts the whole dialogue to be but a kind of fiction and allegory, whereby Moses relates what passed only in Balaam's imagination as real history. Philo, in his life of Moses, suppresses it entirely. So most Jewish authors (not Joseph. Ant. iv, 6, 3) consider it, not as a circumstance which actually took place, but as a vision, or some similar occurrence. Le Clerc solves the difficulty by saying Balaam believed in the transmigration of souls, passing from one body into another, from a man into a beast, reciprocally; and, therefore, he was not surprised at the ass's complaint, but conversed with it as if it were rational. Others have imagined different ways of solving the difficulties of this history. In considering this question, Mr. Taylor (in Calmet, Dict.) assumes as facts, (1.) That Balaam was accustomed to augury and presages. (2.) That on this occasion he would notice every event capable of such interpretation, as presages were supposed to indicate. (3.) That he was deeply intent on the issue of his journey. (4.) That the whole of his conduct toward Balak was calculated to represent himself as an extraordinary personage. (5.) That the behavior of the ass did actually PREFIGURE the conduct of Balaam in the three particulars of it which are recorded. First, the ass turned aside, and went into the field, for which she was smitten, punished, reproved; so Balaam, on the first of his perverse attempts to curse Israel, was, as it were, smitten, reproved, punished, [1.] by God, [2.] by Balak. The second time the ass was more harshly treated for hurting Balaam's foot against the wall; so Balaam, for his second attempt, was, no doubt, still farther mortified. Thirdly, the ass, seeing inevitable danger, fell down and was smitten severely; in like manner, Balaam, the third time, was overruled by God to speak truth, to his own disgrace, and escaped, not without hazard of his life, from the anger of Balak. Nevertheless, as Balaam had no sword in his hand, though he wished for one, with which to slay his ass, so Balak, notwithstanding his fury, and his seeming inclination, had no power to destroy Balaam. In short, as the ass was opposed by the angel, but was driven forward by Balaam, so Balaam was opposed by God, but was driven forward by Balak, against his better knowledge. Were we sure that Balaam wrote this narrative, and that Moses copied it, as the rabbins affirm, this view of the subject would remove the difficulties which have been raised against it. It might then be entitled "a specimen of Balaam's augury." See BALAAM.

Assabi'as (Ἀσάβιας v. r. Σαβίας), one of the "captains over thousands" who presented victims for the Passover under Josiah (1 Esdr. i, 9); evidently the HASHABIAH (q. v.) of 2 Chron. xxxv, 9.

Assal'imoth (Ἀσσαλιμῶθ v. r. Σαλιμῶθ), son of Josaphias of the "sons" of Bania, who returned with 169 retainers from their exile (1 Esdr. viii, 36); evidently the SHELOMITH (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra viii, 10).

Assam, a British province of Farther India, having an area estimated at 18,200 square miles, and a population of 602,500 souls. It was an independent state until 1822, when it was incorporated with Burmah. In 1826 it was ceded to the English. The prevailing religion is Brahminism, which in this province has superseded Buddhism. Among the tribes which inhabit the country, the Assamese, the Khamtis, the Singphos, and the Nagas are the most important. The first mission in Assam was established by the American Baptist Union in 1837, on the invitation of Captain Jenkins, commissioner general of India for Assam. It was at first intended to embrace all the four principal tribes in the missionary operations, but insurrectionary movements in 1839 and 1842 induced them to restrict their labors to the Assamese. In 1844 the missionaries established an orphan institution at Nowgong, which numbered for several years from 50 to 75 members. In 1849 the translation of the New Testament in Assamese was completed, and printed at Silsagar, in Assam, in 1849. There were in Assam, in 1859, 7 American and 3 native missionaries, 3 churches, 50 church-members, 1 boarding-school with 45 pupils.—Newcomb, Cyclopaedia of Missions; (Boston) Missionary Magazine, 1859, p. 276. See INDIA.

Assani'as (Ἀσσησίας v. r. Σησίας, Vulg. Assan-nas), one of the twelve priests selected by Ezra to transport the sacred vessels to Jerusalem (1 Esdr. viii, 54); a corruption for HASHABIAH (q. v.) of the original text (Ezra, viii, 24).

Assassins, a secret military and religious order in Syria and Persia, a branch of the "Ismaelites" (q. v.) or "Shiites." They were suppressed in the 11th and 12th centuries, but their principles to some extent survive in the Ansarians (q. v.). The secret doctrines of the Ismaelites, who had their headquarters in Cairo, declared the descendants of Ismael, the last of the seven so-called imams, to be alone entitled to the caliphate; and gave an allegorical interpretation to the precepts of Islam, which led, as their adversaries asserted, to considering all positive religions equally right, and all actions morally indifferent. The atrocious career of the Assassins was but a natural sequence of such teaching. The founder of these last, Hassan ben-Sabbah el-Homairi, of Persian descent, about the middle of the 11th century, studied at Nishpur, under the celebrated Mowasek, and had subsequently obtained from Ismaelite dais, or religious leaders, a partial insight into their secret doctrines, and a partial consecration to the rank of dai. But, on betaking himself to the central lodge at Cairo, he quarreled with the sect, and was doomed to banishment. He succeeded, however, in making his escape from the ship, and reaching the Syrian coast, after which he returned to Persia, everywhere collecting adherents, with the view of founding, upon the Ismaelite model, a secret order of his own, a species of organized society which should be a terror to his most powerful neighbors. The internal constitution of the order, which had some resemblance to the orders of Christian knighthood, was as follows: First, as supreme and absolute ruler, came the Sheikh-al-Jebal, the Prince or Old Man of the Mountain. His vicegerents in Jebal, Kuhistan, and Syria were the three Dai-al-kebir, or grand priors of the order. Next came the dais and refiks, which last were not, however, initiated, like the former, into every stage of the secret doctrines, and had no authority as teachers. To the uninitiated belonged, first of all, the fedavis or fedais—i. e. the devoted; a band of resolute youths, the ever ready and blindly obedient executioners of the Old Man of the Mountain. Before he assigned to them their bloody tasks, he used to have them thrown into a state of ecstacy by the intoxicating influence of the hashish (the hemp-plant), which circumstance led to the order being called Hashishim, or hemp-eaters. The word was changed by Europeans into Assassins, and transplanted into the languages of the West with the signification of murderers. The Lasiks, or novices, formed the sixth division of the order, and the laborers and mechanics the seventh. Upon these the most rigid observance of the Koran was enjoined; while the initiated, on the contrary, looked upon all positive religion as null. The catechism of the order, placed by Hassan in the hands of his dais, consisted of seven parts, of which the second treated, among other things, of the art of worming themselves into the confidence of men. It is easy to conceive the terror which so unscrupulous a sect must have inspired. Several princes secretly paid tribute to the Old Man of the Mountain. Hassan, who died at the age of 70 (1125 A. D.), appointed as his successor Kia-Busurg-Omid, one of his grand priors. Kia-Busurg-Omid was succeeded in 1138 by his son Mohammed, who knew how to maintain his power against Nureddin and Jusuf-Salaheddin. In 1163, Hassan II was rash enough to extend the secret privilege of the initiated—exemption, namely, from the positive precepts of religion—to the people generally, and to abolish Islam in the Assassin state, which led to his falling a victim to his brother-in-law's dagger. Under the rule of his son, Mohammed II, who acted in his father's spirit, the Syrian Dai-al-kebir, Sinan, became independent, and entered into negotiations with the Christian king of Jerusalem for coming over, on certain conditions, to the Christian faith; but the Templars killed his envoys and rejected his overtures, that they might not lose the yearly tribute which they drew from him. Mohammed was poisoned by his son, Hassan III, who reinstated Islamism, and thence obtained the surname of the New Moslem. Hassan was succeeded by Mohammed III, a boy of nine years old, who, by his effeminate rule, led to the overthrow of the order, and was eventually murdered by command of his son, Rokn-eddin, the seventh and last Old Man of the Mountain. In 1256, the Mongolian prince, Hulagu, burst with his hordes upon the hill-forts of Persia held by the Assassins, which amounted to about a hundred, capturing and destroying them. The Syrian branch was also put down about the end of the 13th century, but remnants of the sect still lingered for some time longer in Kubistan. In 1552 the Assassins reappeared in Syria, and, indeed, they are still reported to exist as a heretical sect both there and in Persia. The Persian Ismaelites have an imam, or superintendent, in the district of Kum, and still inhabit the neighborhood of Alamut under the name of Housseinis. The Syrian Ismaelites live in the district of Massiat or Massiyad. Their castle was taken in 1809 by the Nossaries, but restored.—Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.; Withof, das Reich der Assassinen (Cleve, 1765); Hammer, Geschichte der Assassinen (Stuttg. and Tub. 1818).

Assemani, the family name of three of the most eminent Orientalists of the eighteenth century. They were Maronites (q. v.), born in Mt. Lebanon, Syria.

1. JOSEPH SIMONIS, came to Rome toward the beginning of the eighteenth century, was made archbishop in partibus of Tyre, and librarian of the Vatican, by Clement XI. He was sent by that pontiff on a literary mission to Egypt and Syria in the years 1715-1716, and he brought back to Rome 150 valuable MSS. On a second visit to the East (1735-1738) he obtained many more MSS., with 2000 ancient coins, medals, etc. Assemani was a man of immense erudition and industry. His most important publications were: 1. Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementinae Vaticanae (Rome, 1719-1728, 4 vols. fol.), a biographical account of the Syrian writers, divided into three classes, i. e. Orthodox, Jacobites, and Nestorians, with copious extracts in the Syriac text, and a Latin version, lists of their works, and comments on the same. He intended to proceed with the Arabian, Copt, and other Eastern writers, but nothing appeared in print beyond the Syriac. The fourth volume of the Bibliotheca is engrossed by a learned dissertation on the Syrian Nestorians. 2. St. Ephraem Syri Opera omnia quae extant (Rome, 1732-1746, 6 vols. fol.). This edition of the works of St. Ephraim, one of the old Syrian fathers, containing the Syriac text and a Latin translation, was begun by Ambarach, another learned Maronite, living at Rome, and better known as Father Benedetti, being a member of the society of the Jesuits, and after his death was completed by Assemani. This work is much esteemed, and the Latin is better than that of the other works of Assemani, who was more skilled in the Oriental than in the Latin language. 3. Kalendaria Ecclesiae universae, in quibus Sanctorum nomina, imagines, festi dies, Ecclesiarum Orientis ac Occidentis, praemissis unius cujusque Ecclesiae originibus, recensentur, describuntur, et notis illustrantur (Rome, 1755-1757, 6 vols. 4to). 4. Bibliotheca Juris Orientalis Canonici et Civilis (Rome, 1762-1764, 4 vols. 4to). Besides these, he published Rudimenta Linguae Arabicae (Rome, 1732, 4to) and other works. Many of his writings were burnt in a fire at the Vatican in 1768. He died at Rome in 1768, at the age of eighty. He left MSS., several historical dissertations, and other fragments, on the Christian population of the ancient patriarchate of Antioch, on the nation of the Copts, on the Nestorians, and other Eastern sects, etc., which have been published by Mai. It is said that there are still at Rome MSS. in his handwriting enough to fill 100 volumes.

2. JOSEPH ALOYSIUS, nephew of the preceding, professor of Oriental languages at Rome, where he died, Feb. 9, 1782. His most important work is the Code de Liturgie Ecclesiae Universae (Rome, 1749-1766, 13 vols. 4to). This vast work was intended to include all Oriental and Western liturgies, but was never completed. Still it is of great value. He also wrote a Commentarius hist.-theologicus de Catholicis seu Patriarchis Chaldaeorum et Nestorianorum (Rome, 1775, 4to):—Dissertatio de Sacris Ritibus (Rome, 1757, 4to):—Comment. de ecclesiis, earum reverentia et asylo (1766, fol.).

3. STEPHEN EVODIUS, another nephew of Joseph Assemani, was born at Tripoli in Syria about 1707. He studied at Rome, and returned to Syria as a missionary of the Propaganda. He was present at the Synod of Lebanon, 1736, at which his uncle acted as legate. Subsequently he spent some months in England, where he was elected a member of the Royal Society. Having established himself at Rome, he was employed as assistant to his uncle at the Vatican, and on his uncle's death succeeded him as upper keeper of the library. He also became titular Bishop of Apamea. He died in 1784. His literary reputation is not very high. The only works of any consequence which he published are the following: Bibliotheca Medico-Latentiana et Palatinae Collicium MSS. Orientalium Catalogus (Flor. 1742, fol.), with notes by Gori—Acta Sanctorum Martyrum Orientalium et Occidentalium (Rome, 1748, 2 vols. fol.). To this work, which he compiles from manuscripts in the Vatican, he added the Acts of St. Simon, called "Stylite" in Chaldaic and Latin. He also began a general catalogue of the Vatican manuscripts, divided into three classes, Oriental, Greek and Latin, Italian and other modern languages, of which, however, he published only the first volume, in 1776, the fire in the Vatican having destroyed his papers. Mai has continued parts of this catalogue in his Scriptorum Veterum nova collectio.—Herzog, i, 560.

Assembly (in Heb. מוֹעֵד, mo'ed, etc.; in Gr. ἐκκλησία), a term used in the New Testament to denote a convocation or congregation of persons legally called out or summoned. See CONGREGATION. (1.) In the usual or secular sense (Acts xix, 39). Asia Minor, in the time of the apostles, was divided into several districts, each of which had its own legal assembly. See ASIARCH. Some of these are referred to by Cicero, and others by Pliny, particularly the one at Ephesus. The regular periods of such assemblies, it appears, were three or four times a month; although they were convoked extraordinarily for the dispatch of any urgent business. See ASIA MINOR. (2.) In the Jewish sense, the word implies a religious meeting, as in a synagogue (Matt. xviii, 17); and in the Christian sense, a congregation of believers (1 Cor. xi, 18); hence a church, the Christian Church, and is used of any particular church, as that at Jerusalem (Acts viii, 1) and Antioch (Acts xi, 26). See SYNAGOGUE; CHURCH.

MASTERS OF ASSEMBLIES (בְּנֵי הַבַּיִת, ba'iley' asaphoth, lords of the gatherings; Sept. αἱ παρὰ τὸν συναγωγῶν, Vulg. per magistrorum consilium), is a phrase occurring in Eccles. xii, 11, and supposed to refer to the master-spirits or associates of the meetings of the wise and curious (בְּנֵי הַבַּיִת, of the parallel clause), held in Eastern countries, and where sages and philosophers uttered their weighty sayings. See MASTER. The preacher endeavored to clothe the infinitely wise and perfect doctrines which he taught in proper language. They were the words of truth, and were designed to prove quickening to the sluggish soul as goads are to the dull ox (Acts ii, 37). They were received from the one great shepherd or teacher, and came with great power as the sayings of the most wise and eloquent of their learned assemblies; and they would take hold of the hearts and consciences of men, holding them to the obedience of the truth, as nails driven through a sound board firmly bind and fasten it where we will (see Stuart, Comment, in loc.). Hengstenberg, however (Comment, in loc.), fancifully understands the participants in the sacred collection (or apostles of Scripture) to be meant. See ECCLESIASTES.

Assembly, General, in Scotland, Ireland, and the United States, denotes the highest court of the Presbyterian Church. It differs from the Anglican Convocation at once in its constitution and in its powers, representing as it does both the lay and the clerical elements in the Church, and possessing supreme legislative and judicial authority in all matters purely ecclesiastical. The General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland consists of representatives, clerical and lay, from all the presbyteries of the Church. The royal burghs of Scotland also return elders to the General Assembly of the Established Church, and each of the Scottish universities sends a representative. The Assembly meets once a year in the middle of May, at Edinburgh, and sits for ten days. Its deliberations are presided over by a moderator, whose election is the first step in the proceedings, after a sermon by his predecessor. In former times this office was sometimes filled by laymen; among others, in 1567, by George Buchanan. In modern times the moderator is always a clergyman. 84 presbyteries, composing 16 synods, return members to the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland. Its relation to the state is represented by a royal commissioner, who exercises no function in the Assembly beyond that of adding by his presence the sanction of the civil authority to its proceedings. The other functionaries are a principal and a deputy clerk, both clergymen, a procurator, and an agent. All business not dispatched during the session of the Assembly is referred to a commission, with the moderator as convener, which meets immediately after the dissolution of the Assembly, and again quarterly. The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, which has 16 synods, comprising 71 presbyteries, and of the Irish Presbyterian Church, are similarly constituted, the principal point of difference being the absence of the royal commissioner. See PRESBYTERY; SYNOD; FREE CHURCH. For the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, see PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Chambers, Encyclopædia, s. v.

Asser, or more correctly Ashè, the principal author of the Babylonian Talmud. He was born at Babylon A.D. 353 (A.M. 4113). His Jewish biographers relate that he was appointed head of the college of Sori, in Babylon, at the age of fourteen! He held this post till his death in 426. Rabbi Abraham ben-Dior asserts, in his Kabbalah, p. 68, that since the days of Rabbi Jehuda-Hannasi, or Rabbenu-Hakkadosh, in no one but Ashè had been combined at once knowledge of the law, piety, humility, and magnificence. His fame attracted to his lectures many thousands of students. The expositions of the Mishna which he delivered in his lectures were collected, and form the basis of the Babylonian Talmud. The continuation was the work of his disciples and followers; it was completed seventy-three years after the death of Ashè by R. José, president of the college of Pumbedita in Babylon. (Compare the Tsemach David, first part, in the years 4127 and 4187; Sepher Suckasin, fol. 117; Hilichoth Ohan, p. 18; Wolfii Bibliotheca Hebraea, i, 224.) See TALMUD.

Asser, a learned monk of St. David's, whence (the name of that place in Latin being written Menapia or Menavia) he obtained the appellation of ASSERI'S MENEVENSIS. Asser was invited to the court of Alfred the Great, as is generally believed, in or about the year 880, but probably earlier, merely from the reputation of his learning. His name is preserved by his Annales Rerum Gestarum Ælfredi Magni.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 890; Eng. Cyclop. See ALFRED.

Assessment (שְׁמֵרָה or שְׁמֵרָה; also שְׁמֵרָה and שְׁמֵרָה) among the Israelites was of two kinds: (a) ECCLESIASTICAL.—According to Exod. xxx, 13, each Israelite (over twenty years old) was obliged to contribute yearly a silver half-shekel (a didrachm, about 35 cents) to the Temple (2 Chron. xxiv, 6). This tax existed still in full force after the Babylonian exile (Matt. xvii, 24; comp. Philo, Opp. iii, 224; Josephus, War, vii, 6, 6), and all Jews residing in Palestine were under the obligation of paying it (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 9, 1). See generally the Mishna (Shekalim, ii, 4), according to which this payment became due between the 15th and 25th of Adar (in March or April). See TEMPLE. After the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, the Jews were obliged by a decree of the Emperor Vespasian to pay this sum yearly for the maintenance of the Capitoline at Rome (Joseph. War, vii, 6, 6; Dio Cass. lxxvi, 7, p. 1082). An increase of the temple-tax, which the pressure of circumstances appears to have compelled, is mentioned in Neh. x, 32 (see Rambach, in loc.). Besides this, there were for the support of the Temple certain definite assessments (2 Kings xii, 4), such as the tithes, first-fruits, and first-born offerings (see each of these in alphabetical order). Yet, on account of the great fertility of the soil and the original proprietorship of each Israelite over it, these sacred laws were certainly not onerous, however much they may resemble direct imposts upon the citizens of modern states. (b) CIVIL.—Of these no trace appears prior to the introduction of royalty. But the kings not only required liege duties (1 Sam. viii, 12, 16), but also tribute in kind (1 Sam. xvii, 15), from which exemption was allowed only in certain cases (1 Sam. xvii, 25), and likewise personal service (Amos vi, 1), as well as a capitation-tax in extraordinary emergencies (2 Kings xv, 20; xxiii, 35). They also received voluntary presents from their subjects and chief vassals (1 Sam. x, 27; xvi, 20; 1 Kings x, 25; 2 Chron. ix, 24; xvii, 5), as is still customary in the East. See KING; GIFT. Crown-lands (or royal private property?) seem also to be alluded to (1 Kings iv, 27 sq.; 1 Chron. xxvii, 26 sq.; xxvi, 10 sq.), as well as tolls on goods in transit (1 Kings x, 15), and even regal privileges and monopolies of a commercial character (1 Kings x, 28; comp. ix, 26 sq.; xxii, 49). During the exile and later, the Jews of Palestine paid taxes of various kinds to their foreign masters, and so the remnant of the Jews under the Chaldaean regents (see Josephus, Ant. x, 9, 1 and 3). As Persian taxes levied upon the new Jewish colonies are mentioned (Ezra iv, 13, 20; vii, 24), תְּרִיבָה, tribute, עֲרִיסָה, and תְּרִיבָה, toll (Sept. and Joseph. Ant. xi, 2, 1, in general gōpat, duties; as the Auth. Vers. "tribute" for the first two, "custom" for the last). The distinction between these terms, it is true, is not at all clear; the foregoing renderings follow the etymology; the last term (תְּרִיבָה, halak') signifying way-money (from תְּרִיבָה, to go), the second (עֲרִיסָה, bol'o), consumption-tax (from תְּרִיבָה, to consume); the first (תְּרִיבָה, middah') the direct (ground or income) tax (apportionment, from תְּרִיבָה, to measure out), which individuals had to pay (comp. Lat. demensum), as Grotius and Cocecius have supposed (see Gesenius, Heb. Lex. s. v. severally). Aben-Ezra's interpretation of this last by cattle-tax has no good foundation. The governors increased the severe taxation of the people (Neh. ix, 37) by many additional assumptions of extortion (Neh. v, 15). We find mention (Ezra vi, 8; vii, 20 sq.) of royal exchequers. The priests and Levites were (under Artaxerxes?) exempt from taxes (Ezra vii, 24). In the Ptolemaic period of the Egyptian rule over Palestine instances occur of the farming or leasing out of the collection of the public revenues (tolls?) to the highest bidder (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 1, 4 and 5). The yearly rent of all such dues in Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine amounted under Ptolemy Evergetes to 16 talents of silver; and we may easily imagine what vexation it occasioned when the taxes reached so enormous a sum (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 5). Imposts by the Syrian rulers of Palestine are also named (1 Macc. x, 29; xi, 35; xiii, 39). They consisted in the levy of duties (φόροι) upon salt (σπιγὴ ἀλάτις); the royal tribute (στέφανοι, crown dues, comp. the Lat. "aurum coronarium," see Adams's Rom. Ant. i, 295; in a rescript of Antiochus the Great [Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3] this assessment is called technically στέφανιτῆς φόρος. At first the Jews were obliged to bring a gold "crown-piece" as the [expected] "gift," but afterward it might be rendered in any coin; such a regal due is indicated in 2 Macc. iv, 9; the third of the seed (τρίτον τῆς σποράς); and the half of the produce of the trees (ἡμισυ τοῦ καρποῦ τοῦ ἔλαιου), these latter being payments in kind common to most nations of antiquity (comp. Pausan. iv, 14, 3; see the Hall. Encyclop. xxi, 9^b). There existed also tolls and poll-taxes (Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 3; xiii, 8, 3), as these are not classed under the usual name (φόροι) of imposts (on 1 Macc. x, 33, see Michaelis in loc.). The priests and Levites mostly enjoyed an exemption from these assessments (Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 5). Letting out of the (royal) ground-rents (of single districts) was also, at this time, not uncommon (1 Macc. xi, 28; xiii, 15). A species of forced contribution also appears to be referred to (1 Macc. xv, 31). Judea was first brought under tribute (ἰσποτελής φόροι, Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4; perhaps, however, this refers to Jerusalem only) to the Romans by Pompey, although the country as yet does not seem to have been subject to a yearly payment, but rather to occasional exactions at the caprice of the governor in power at the time. The regular taxes were raised by the native princes (whether yearly is uncertain, comp. Appian, Civ. v, 75; but the Romans were accustomed to impose tribute upon their dependencies, 1 Macc. viii, 7; 2 Macc. viii, 10), and Julius Cæsar ordained this by a special decree (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 5 sq.; comp. 22). These revenues were not inconsiderable (Joseph. Ant. xix, 8, 2), and were derived partly from royal lands (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 6), partly from the ground and income taxes (Joseph. Ant. xv, 9, 1; 10, 4; xvii, 2, 1; 8, 4. Josephus, Ant. xix, 6, 3, likewise mentions a house-tax, either a duty upon the simple dwelling, or the premises in general), and partly from tolls (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 6, 22); and under the Herods were also added very oppressive city taxes (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 8, 4; comp. xviii, 4, 3). In addition to all these, the Jews, in consequence of their partisan warfare against the Romans, were compelled to pay many special war taxes (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 11, 2). As at first single parts of Judea, and finally the whole country, came under the immediate Roman government, the Jews were obliged (Plin. Hist. Nat. xii, 51), like other Roman provinces (see Savigny, in the Abhandl. der Berl. Akademie, 1822 and 1823, Historiophil. Class. p. 27 sq.), to pay the ground and head tax (Matt. xxii, 17), with a view to which a census and assessment had already been made out by Augustus (Luke ii, 1, 2; comp. Acts v, 37; see Joseph. Ant. xviii, 1, 1); moreover, the city consumption excise (in Jerusalem) continued still for a long time (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 4, 3), and the tolls (on φόρος and τέλος, the Lat. tributum and rectigal, Rom. xiii, 7, see Kypc. Observ. ii, 183 sq.), which were considerable along the commercial routes (especially between Damascus and Ptolemais) and at the sea-ports, and also from the export of balsam and cotton, were exacted as elsewhere. See CUSTOM. These united imposts, but especially the capitation-tax (Appian, Syr. 50), severely oppressed the people (Tacit. Annals, ii, 42), particularly, no doubt, because they were not apportioned according to an exact ratio of taxation; and, in addition, the procurators, who superintended the collection, and were responsible for the return of the duties into the imperial treasury, as well as the principal collectors themselves (one such, φόρων ἐκλογεῖς, under the Emperor Caius, by the name of Capito, is depicted in Philo, ii, 575, comp. 325 sq.), in various ways made use of extortion. See PUBLICAN. The power of remitting taxes, where circumstances rendered it reasonable, belonged, under the direct Roman rule, only to the President of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 4, 3). As'shur' (Heb. Ashshur', אַשּׁוּר, prob. i. q. אֲשּׁוּר, a step; Sept. Ἀσσοῦρ and Ἀσσοῖοι; Auth. Vers. "Asshur," in Gen. x, 11; Num. xxv, 22, 24; 1 Chron. i, 17; Ezek. xxvii, 23; xxxii, 22; Hos. xiv, 3; "Assur" in Ezra iv, 2; Psa. lxxxiii, 8; "Assyrian" or "Assyrians" in Psa. xiv, 25; xix, 23; xxx, 31; xxxi, 8; lii, 4; Lam. v, 6; Ezek. xvi, 28; xxiii, 9, 12, 23; Hos. v, 13; xi, 5; xii, 1; Mic. v, 5, 6; elsewhere and usually "Assyria" in very many occurrences) appears in the O. T. to be the name (1.) properly (Gen. x, 11; see Michaelis, Spic. i, 235 sq.; Vater, Comm. i, 125, in loc.) of a state in Western Asia, different from Babylonia (Shinar), of which it was accented a colony. The metropolis was Nineveh (q. v.), i. e. the Ninus of the Greeks; besides which the cities Resen, Ribbotho, and Calnah (q. v. severally) are named, apparently as included in the same district, although the signification and application of these names are uncertain. (2.) In the books of the Kings (and the prophets) it designates a victorious and tyrannical kingdom, which (according to 2 Kings xviii, 11) included also Mesopotamia, Media (comp. Isa. vii, 20; x, 8, 9; xxii, 26), as well as (according to 2 Kings xvii, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 11) Babylonia, and whose inhabitants are described (Ezek. xxiii, 6, 17, 23) as wealthy (Nineveh being a mart, Nah. iii, 16, the entrepôt between the eastern and western trade), but also arrogant (Isa. x, 9 sq.; Zach. x, 11), and occupying a fertile tract (Isa. xxvii, 2, 7; Nah. iii, 1). It is the region also well known to the Greeks as Assyria (once, Mic. v, 5, called "the land of Nimrod"), which, together with its capital Ninus, was destroyed by the Medes and Chaldeans. As in the Bible, we find likewise (a.) in Greek and Roman writers Assyria (Ἀσσυρία, Ptol. vi, 1; oftener Ἀρρωσία, Strabo, xvi, 507, or Ἀρρωσία, Dio Cass. lxxviii, 28) named as the country shut in on the north by the high mountain range (Mt. Niphates) of Armenia, on the south almost entirely level, watered by several rivers, and hence very fruitful; which was bounded on the east by Media, on the south by Susiana and Babylonia, on the west (by means of the Tigris) by Mesopotamia, and now forms the greater part of the province of Karlistan (comp. Plin. v, 13; Strabo, xvi, 506; see Bernhard, ad Dionys. Periegr. p. 739). (b.) Far oftener Assyria was the name given by the ancients to the provincial satrapy of the Persian empire, consisting of the joint districts Assyria and Babylonia (Herod. i, 178; comp. 106; Strabo, xvi, 507; Ammian. Marc. xxiii, 20), including Mesopotamia (Arrian, Alex. vii, 21, 2; Ammian. Marc. xxiv, 2), and even extended at times its name to a part of Asia Minor (Dionys. Periegr. 975; comp. Mannert, V, ii, 424 sq.). Assyria Proper (Herod. i, 102, "the Assyrians who live in Ninus") is, on the other hand, called Adiabene (Plin. v, 13, 6; Strabo, xvi, 512; Ammian. Marc. xxiii, 6; in the Syriac, Chedib, Assemani, Biblioth. Or. III, ii, 708; by the Talmudists, Chadib, חַדִּיב; comp. ibid., the Arabic name of two streams of this province, Ro-senmüller, Alterth. I, ii, 113), which was only a province of Assyria, lying between Arrapachitis and the Garamaens (Plin. vi, 16; Mannert, V, ii, 450 sq.). See BABYLONIA; MESOPOTAMIA.

Little is known of the early history of the Assyrian empire, for the ancient accounts are not only scanty, but confused, and in some cases contradictory, so that the most deserving efforts of modern (especially recent) scholars have scarcely availed to clear it up (see Schröer, Imperium Babylon. et Nini ex monument. antiq. Freck. 1726; Uhland, Chronologia sacra in præcip. chron. et hist. Babylon. Assy. monumentis vâdicata, Tubing, 1763). The Biblical notices, which embrace but a small part of its history, do not form a connected whole with those of profane (Greek) authors. According to the former (Gen. x, 10) the kingdom of Assyria was founded by Nimrod (q. v.) of Babylon, but its princes are not named earlier than the Israelitish king Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19 sq.), and they appear subsequently in the hostile collisions with the two Hebrew kingdoms (comp. Hos. v, 13; vii, 11). Those thus mentioned are the following: (1.) Pul (2 Kings, as above), who exacted tribute (B.C. 769) of Israel (under Menahem). (2.) Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xvi, 7-19; 1 Chron. xxviii, 16 sq.), in the time of Ahaz of Judah and Pekah of Israel, the latter of whom, with his ally Rezin (of Damascus Syria), was beaten by him (as a mercenary ally of Ahaz), and many of their subjects carried into captivity (B.C. 739). (3.) Shalmaneser, who (B.C. 720) overthrew the kingdom of Israel and carried away the rest of the inhabitants into exile (2 Kings xvii, 5 sq.; xviii, 9). Judah was also tributary to him (2 Kings xviii, 7). Media and Persia formed part of this Assyrian king's dominions (2 Kings xviii, 11), and he made successful incursions against Phœnicia (Joseph. Ant. ix, 14, 2). (4.) Sennacherib, who (B.C. 713) appeared before Jerusalem under Hezekiah after an attack upon Egypt (2 Kings xviii, 13 sq.; xix, 39; Isa. xvii, xviii). (5.) Esarhaddon (B.C. post 712), the son of the preceding (2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38; Ezra iv, 2). There is, moreover, mention made of Strym (only Isa. xx, 1), who probably reigned but for a short time between Shalmaneser and Sennacherib (B.C. 715). None of these names except Sennacherib (Sanacharib, Σαβαχάρηθ, Herod. ii, 141), the contemporary of the Egyptian king Setho (comp. Berosus, in Joseph. Ant. x, 1, 4), occur in Grecian authors (allusion is made to Shalmaneser in the passage cited by Joseph. Ant. ix, 14, 2, from Menander the Ephesian, although the name does not occur in the extract). Moreover, Ctesias (in Diod. Sic. ii; comp. Agathias, De rebus Justiniani, 2), Julius Africanus, Eusebius (Chron. Armen. i, 98 sq., 599; ii, 15 sq.), and Syncellus begin their series of proper Assyrian kings, whose empire extended during its prime to the Euphrates (although the notices in the Hebrew writers from the time of David are silent respecting its growth), with Ninus (Belus), and close it (269 years before Cyrus) with Sardanapalus (after a duration of 6520 years, according to Herod. i, 95, 130; of 1306 [1360] years according to Ctesias, in Diod. Sic. ii, 21, 28; of 1460 years according to Syncellus, p. 165; of 1240 years according to Eusebius, Chron. Armen. ii, 16, 167) or (in Syncellus) Thouscon-Colerus (Euseb. Chron. ii, 167, places this Sardanapalus in the time of Jeroboam II, and makes him a contemporary of Lycurgus). From this point they begin, with Arbaces, the conqueror of Sardanapalus, a new Median dynasty (comp. Athen. xii, 528 sq.), which is continued down to Astyages (Marshall, Ann. Chron. p. 517 sq., 525 sq.; Vignoles, Chronologie, ii, 161 sq.). Herodotus, who, however, gives merely general references to Assyrian history, names (i, 98 sq.) as the first independent king of Media, Dejoeces (comp. Joseph. Ant. x, 2, 2), and reckons to Astyages only four (comp. Dion. Hal. i, 2) Median princes, including Astyages (according to him, these four Median kings reigned 150 years; according to Diod. Sic. the Median kingdom lasted from Arbaces over 282 years; according to Syncellus, 275 years, according to Eusebius, 259 years; the statements of Ctesias can hardly be reconciled with those of Herodotus; see Larcher, Chronolog. zu Herod. p. 144 sq.; Volney, Chronol. d'Herod. p. 199 sq.). Now, in order to reconcile the Biblical notices with those of the Greek historians and chronographers, nearly all modern investigators of history have been compelled to assume a new Assyrian empire (subsequent to this Sardanapalus), which Herodotus appears to sustain, in as much as after the revolt of the Medes under Dejoeces he still constantly speaks of a not inconsiderable (comp. i, 102) Assyrian kingdom, with Ninus as its capital, which (but with the exception of the Babylonian portion, παῖς τῆς Βαβυλωνίως μοίρης) Cyaxares first (i, 106) subdued (comp. Gatterer, Handb. p. 288 sq.; Beck, Weltgesch. i, 695 sq.; Jahn, Archæol. II, i, 184; Enl. II, ii, 635; Bredow, Handb. p. 192 sq.; Kannegiesser, in the Hall. Encyclop. vi, 131 sq.; Raumer, Vorles. i, 98; in vain opposed by Hartmann, in the Ally. Lit. Zeit. 1813, No. 39; and Lingvist. Einl. p. 145 sq.). The late independence of Assyria, which, in consequence of this Median revolution, had become for a long time merely a satrapy (comp. Syncellus, Chron. p. 205), must have been established before B.C. 759, which is the latest date assignable to Pul; Tiglath-Pileser succeeded in conquering Western Asia; Shalmaneser (B.C. cir. 728) was already master of Babylon and Media (2 Kings xvii, 24; xviii, 11), and extended the Assyrian rule (Menander Ephes. in Joseph. ut sup.) in the west (as far as Phœnicia); and Sennacherib even attacked Egypt (Herod. ii, 141), but was compelled to retire. The attempt of the Babylonians to free themselves from the dominion of the Assyrians was not yet successful (Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 42 sq.); but under Esarhaddon the empire appears to have declined. Babylonia renewed her efforts to free herself from the Assyrian yoke, as Media (under Dejoeces, according to Herod.) had earlier done (perhaps during Sennacherib's campaigns in the West), and finally (B.C. 625) the Median king Cyaxares (probably with Babylonian aid; see Abyden. in Euseb. Chron. p. 54) took and destroyed Ninus (Herod. i, 103, 106; Offenhans, De regno Assy. IIans. 1700). See NINEVEH.

The lately discovered abstract of Assyrian history in the Armenian Chronicle of Eusebius enables us to connect it more closely with the Biblical notices, although they by no means agree entirely with each other. In the extracts by Alexander Polyhistor from Berosus (in Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 44 sq.), Assyrian kings (of the later period) are named in the following series: Phul (more than 520 years after Semiramis); Sanherib, 18 years; Asordam, 8 years; Sammughes, 21 years; his brother, 21 years; Nabupalassar, 20 years; Nabucodrossor (Nebuchadnezzar), 43 years. Yet Sardanapal is mentioned (p. 44) as having engaged his son Nabucodrossor in a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of the Median king Asdahages (Astyages). Abydenus gives (Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 53 sq.) the Assyrian princes in the following order: Sanherib, Nergilus (Adramcles), Axerdis, Sardanapallus, Saracus. This last introduced a barbarian army from beyond the sea, and sent his general, Busalossor (Nabopolassar), to Babylon; but the latter set himself up as King of Babylonia, and married his son Nabucodrossor to the daughter of the Median Prince Astyages, and thus Nineveh was overthrown. With the position which both these references assign to Sardanapalus (after Sennacherib) essentially agrees Moses Chorenensis (who, however, probably makes Sardanapalus a contemporary of the Median Arbaces). This so disagrees with the accounts of Herodotus, Ctesias, and Syncellus (see Baumgarten, Allgem. Weltkhist. iii, 549), as to lead to the supposition of a second Sardanapalus (see Suidas, s. v.; the name is perhaps rather a royal title than a personal appellation; comp. Rosenmüller, Alterth. I, ii, 129). Otherwise the revolution of De-joces will fall during the reign of Sennacherib, about the same time when the Babylonians also revolted under Merodach-Baladan (q. v.). See CHALDEAN; SENNACHERIB. In Persian cuneiform (q. v.) the name is written , or Athura; comp. the Ἀρούα of Dio Cass., Ἀρούα of Strabo. (See Hertz, Cat. of Assy. and Bab. Ant. Lond. 1852.) —Wiener, i, 102. Comp. Asshu'rim (Gen. xxv, 3). See ASHURITE.

Assidæ'an (only in the plur. Ἀσιδαῖοι, Vulg. Assidai, prob. for אַסִּידַי, chasidim', saints) occurs only in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. ii, 42; vii, 13; 2 Macc. xiv, 18), where it is applied to the body of zealous and devoted men who rose at the signal for armed resistance given by Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, and who, under him and his successors, upheld with the sword the great doctrine of the unity of God, and stemmed the advancing tide of Grecian manners and idolatries. The epithet evidently designates a section of the orthodox Jews (1 Macc. ii, 42, v. r. Ἰουδαίων probably by correction), as distinguished from "the impious" (οἱ ἀσεβῆτε, 1 Macc. iii, 8; vi, 21; vii, 5, etc.), "the lawless" (οἱ ἄνομοι, 1 Macc. iii, 6; ix, 23, etc.), "the transgressors" (οἱ παράνομοι, 1 Macc. i, 11, etc.); that is, the Hellenizing faction. When Baechides came against Jerusalem, they used their influence (1 Macc. vii, 13, πρῶτοι οἱ Ἀσιδ. ἦσαν ἐν ἐκείῃ τῇ ἰσχυρίᾳ) to conclude a peace, because "a priest of the seed of Aaron" (Alcimus) was with him, and sixty of them fell by his treachery. See ALCIMUS. The Jews at a later period gave the name of Chasidim to those pious persons who devoted themselves to a life of austerities and religious exercises in the hope of hastening the coming of the Messiah, and of making an atonement for their own sins and for the sins of others (see Solomon Maimon. Memoirs, Berlin, 1792). The name of Chasidim has also been assumed by a Jewish sect which originated in Poland about a hundred years since, who took as the basis of their mystical system the doctrines of the cabalistic book Zohar (Beer, in Ersch and Gruber, s. v. Chasidæer), and which still subsists (see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. Assidians). The ideas connected with this later appropriation of the term have, by an obvious association, been carried back to and connected with the Chasidim or Assidæans who joined Mattathias, and who have generally been regarded as a sect subsisting at that time. No such sect, however, is mentioned by Josephus in treating of the affairs of that period; and the texts in the books of the Maccabees which refer to them afford no sufficient evidence that the Assidæans formed a sect distinct from other pious and faithful Jews. Yet they may have existed as an undefined party before the Maccabean rising, and were probably thereupon bound by some peculiar vow to the eternal observance of the Law (1 Macc. ii, 42, ἐκονοιάζεσθαι τῷ νόμῳ). They seem afterward to have been merged in the general body of the faithful (2 Macc. xiv, 6, οἱ λεγόμενοι τῶν Ἰουδαίων Ἀσιδαῖοι, ὡν ἀνήγγεταν Ἰούδας ὁ Μασκαβταῖος . . .). The analogous Hebrew term Chasidim (= οἱ ἀσεβῆτε, οἱ ὄνιοι) occurs in various passages of Scripture appellatively for good and pious men (Psa. cxlv, 10; cxlix, 1; Isa. lvii, 1; Mic. vii, 2), but is never applied to any sect or body of men. Upon the whole, in the entire absence of collateral information, it seems the safest course to conclude that the Assidæans were a body of eminently zealous men, devoted to the Law, who joined Mattathias very early, and remained the constant adherents of him and his son Judas—not, like the mass of their supporters, rising occasionally and then relapsing into the ordinary pursuits of life. It is possible that, as Jennings conjectures (Antiq. p. 298), the name ἀσιδαῖοι, or "saints," came to be applied to them by their enemies as a term of reproach, like "Puritans" formerly, and "saints" very often in the present day.—Kitto, s. v. See SAINT; CHASIDIM.

As'sir (Heb. Assir', אַסִּיר, prisoner), the name of two or three men.

1. (Sept. Ἀσῖρ v. r. Ἀσῖρ.) A son of Korah (of the Kohathite Levites), father (brother) of Elkanah, and grandfather (brother) of Abiasaph (q. v.) or Ebi-asaph (Exod. vi, 24; 1 Chron. vi, 22). B. C. cir. 1740.

2. (Sept. Ἀσῖρ v. r. Ἰασαῖοι or Ἰασαῖοι and Ἀσῖρ.) A great-grandson of the preceding, and father of Tathath (1 Chron. vi, 23, 37). B. C. cir. 1620. See SAMUEL. There is some suspicion, however, that the name here has crept in by repetition from the preceding (see Jour. of Sac. Lit. Apr. 1852, p. 200; comp. Bertheau, Comment. in loc.).

3. 'Assir' (אַסִּיר, Sept. Ἀσῖρ v. r. Ἀσῖρ) occurs (1 Chron. iii, 17) as the name of a son of Jeconiah the king, but it is more likely an appellative, referring to the captivity of that prince at Babylon (see Strong's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, note 1, at the close of § 9). As'sos or Assus (Ἄσσοσ, also Ἄσσοσ, and Apolonia, Plin. v, 32), a town and sea-port of the Roman province of ASIA, in the district anciently called Mysia. It was situated on the northern shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium (Ptol. v, 2; Plin. ii, 98; Strabo, xiii, 581, 614; Athen. ix, 375; Pausan. vi, 45). It was only about seven miles from the opposite coast of Lesbos (or Mitylene), near Methymna (Strab. xiii, p. 618). A good Roman road, connecting the towns of the central parts of the province with Alexandria Troas (q. v.), passed through Assos, the distance between the two latter places being about 20 miles (Itin. Anton.). These geographical points illustrate the Apostle Paul's rapid passage through the town, as he came hither on foot from Troas to meet with his friends, in order to take shipping for Mitylene (Acts xx, 13, 14). The ship in which he was to accomplish his voyage from Troas to Casarea went round Cape Lectum, while he took the much shorter journey by land. Thus he was able to join the ship without difficulty, and in sufficient time for her to anchor off Mitylene at the close of the day on which Troas had been left (see Conybeare and Howson, ii, 209). It was noted for its wheat (Strabo, p. 735) and for a peculiar stone (lapis Assius) that was used for sarcophagi, on account of its flesh-consuming properties (Plin. ii, 96). It was founded (according to different authors) by a colony from Lesbos, by Gargara, the Æolian, and by the Methymnæi, and was the birthplace of Cleanthes the stoic. Strabo (p. 610) describes it as well fortified both by nature and art. The chief characteristic of Assos was that it was singularly Greek. Fellows found there "no trace of the Romans." It is now a miserable village (the neighborhood of which still bears the name Assos), built high upon the rocks on the side toward the land (Richter, p. 465 sq.). The remains are numerous and remarkably well preserved, partly because many of the buildings were of granite. The citadel, above the theatre, commands a glorious view, and must itself have been a noble object from the sea. The Street of Tombs, leading to the Great Gate, is one of the most remarkable features of Assos.

Coin of Assos.

Leake (Travels in Asia Minor, p. 128) says: "The ruins of Assos at Bhrim or Berim Kaleli are extremely curious. There is a theatre in very perfect preservation, and the remains of several temples lying in confused heaps upon the ground. An inscription upon an architrave belonging to one of these buildings shows that it was dedicated to Augustus; but some figures in low relief on another architrave appear to be in a much more ancient style of art, and they are sculptured upon the hard granite of Mount Ida, which forms the materials of several of the buildings. On the western side of the city the remains of the walls and towers, with a gate, are in complete preservation; and without the walls is seen the cemetery, with numerous sarcophagi still standing in their places, and an ancient causeway leading through them to the gate. Some of these sarcophagi are of gigantic dimensions. The whole gives, perhaps, the most perfect idea of a Greek city that anywhere exists." See also Fellows's Asia Minor, p. 46; Wetstein, ii, 592; comp. Quandt, De Asso (Regiom. 1710); Amnell, De Ἀσσοῦ (Upsal. 1758).

Assuë'rus (Ἀσούρος v. ῥ. Ἀσούρηρος), the Græcized form (Tobit xiv, 15) of the Persian royal title usually Anglicized ASSUERUS (q. v.).

Assumption of the Virgin, a festival instituted in the Roman Church in commemoration of the death and pretended resurrection of the Virgin Mary, and her triumphant entry into heaven. The apocryphal tradition upon which this festival is founded is as follows: "That the Blessed Virgin died at the age of seventy-two (one hundred and fifty-nine, according to Nicephorus), and that at her death all the apostles of our Lord, except St. Thomas, were miraculously present, having been conveyed in clouds from the various countries where they were preaching; that they buried her at Gethsemane; and that St. Thomas, upon his return from Ethiopia at the end of three days, expressed such a longing desire to see her face once again, that they opened her tomb, but found there nothing but the grave-clothes, although the grave had been fastened and watched, day and night, by some of the apostles and many other Christians." The Assumption of Mary was not always a point of faith in the Roman Church, but is now universally received. The day of celebration is Aug. 15. It is also celebrated in the Greek Church. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, vii, 367; Landon, Ecol. Diet., s. v.

Assumption of Moses, an apocryphal book so called, said to contain an account of the death of Moses and of the translation of his soul to Paradise. Some have supposed that the particulars of the combat between St. Michael and the devil, alluded to in the Epistle of Jude (ver. 9), were contained in this book (Moreri, who cites Calmet).—J. A. Fabric. Cod. Pseul-p. V. T. i, 829-847. See MOSES.

As'sur, a less correct form of two names.

1. (Heb. Ashshur', אַשּׁוּר, Sept. and Apoc. Ἀσσοίρα.) An inaccurate method of Anglicizing (Ezra iv, 2; Psa. lxxiii, 8) or Græcizing (2 Esd. ii, 8; Jud. ii, 14; v, 1; vi, 1, 17; vii, 20, 24; xiii, 15; xiv, 3; xv, 6; xvi, 4) the original [see ASSHUR] word for ASSYRIA (q. v.).
2. (Ἀσού v. ῥ. Ἀσούβ), while other copies omit; Vulg. Asi.) One of the heads of the "temple servants," whose descendants are said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 31), doubtless a corruption for the ASSURUS (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 51).

(1.) "The doctrine itself has been matter of dispute among divines, and when considered as implying not only that we are now accepted of God through Christ, but that we shall be finally saved, or when it is so taken as to deny a state of salvation to those who are not so assured as to be free from all doubt, it is in many views questionable. Assurance of final salvation must stand or fall with the doctrine of personal unconditional election, and is chiefly held by divines of the Calvinistic school. The 18th article of the Westminster Confession (Of the Assurance of Grace and Salvation) says, 'Although hypocrites, and other unregenerated men, may vainly deceive themselves with false hopes and carnal presumptions of being in the favor of God and estate of salvation; which hope of theirs shall perish; yet such as truly believe in the Lord Jesus, and love him in sincerity, endeavoring to walk in all good conscience before him, may in this life be certainly assured that they are in a state of grace, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, which hope shall never make them ashamed. This, certainly, is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, grounded upon a fallible hope, but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the divine truth of the promises of salvation, the inward evidence of those graces unto which these promises are made, the testimony of the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God; which Spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption. This infallible assurance doth not so belong to the essence of faith but that a true believer may wait long, and conflict with many difficulties before he can be a partaker of it; yet, being enabled by the Spirit to know the things which are freely given him of God, he may, without extraordinary revelation, in the right use of ordinary means, attain thereunto. And, therefore, it is the duty of every one to give all diligence to make his calling and election sure, that thereby his heart may be enlarged in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, in love and thankfulness to God, and in strength and cheerfulness in the duties of obedience, the proper fruits of this assurance: so far is it from inclining men to looseness. True believers may have the assurance of their salvation divers ways shaken, diminished and intermitted; as by negligence in preserving it; by falling into some special sin, which woundeth the conscience, and grieveth the Spirit; by some sudden or vehement temptation; by God's withdrawing the light of his countenance, and suffering even such as fear him to walk in darkness and to have no light. Yet are they never utterly destitute of that need of God, and life of faith, that love of Christ and the brethren, that sincerity of heart and conscience of duty out of which, by the operation of the Spirit, this assurance may in due time be revived, and by the which, in the mean time, they are supported from utter despair.'

"On the other hand, that nothing is an evidence of a state of present salvation but so entire a persuasion as amounts to assurance in the strongest sense, might be denied upon the ground that degrees of grace, of real saving grace, are undoubtedly mentioned in Scripture. Assurance, however, is spoken of in the New Testament, and stands prominent as one of the leading doctrines of religious experience. We have 'full assurance of understanding;' that is, a perfect knowledge and entire persuasion of the truth of the doctrine of Christ. The 'assurance of faith,' in Hebrews ix, 22, is an entire trust in the sacrifice and priestly office of Christ. The 'assurance of hope,' mentioned in Hebrews vi, 11, relates to the heavenly inheritance, and must necessarily imply a full persuasion that we are the children of God, and therefore 'heirs of his glory;' and from this passage it must certainly be concluded that such an assurance is what every Christian ought to aim at, and that it is attainable. This, however, does not exclude occasional doubt and weakness of faith from the earlier stages of his experience.

(2.) "A comforting and abiding persuasion of present acceptance by God, through Christ, we may therefore affirm, must in various degrees follow true faith. In support of this view the following remarks may be offered: If the Bible teaches that man is by nature prone to evil, and that in practice he violates God's law, and is thereby exposed to punishment; that an act of grace and pardon is promised on condition of repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; that repentance implies consideration of our ways, a sense of the displeasure of Almighty God, contrition of heart, and consequently trouble and grief of mind, mixed, however, with a hope inspired by the promise of forgiveness, and which leads to earnest supplication for the actual pardon of sin so promised; it will follow from these premises either, 1. that forgiveness is not to be expected till after the termination of our course of probation, that is, in another life; and that, therefore, this trouble and apprehension of mind can only be assuaged by the hope we may have of a favorable final decision on our case; or, 2. that sin is, in the present life, forgiven as often as it is thus repented of, and as often as we exercise the required and specific acts of trust in the merits of our Saviour; but that this forgiveness of our sins is not in any way made known unto us; so that we are left, as to our feelings, in precisely the same state as if sin were not forgiven till after death, namely, in grief and trouble of mind, relieved only by hope; or, 3. that (and this is the scriptural view) when sin is forgiven by the mercy of God through Christ, we are by some means assured of it, and peace and satisfaction of mind take the place of anxiety and fear. The first of these conclusions is sufficiently disproved by the authority of Scripture, which exhibits its justification as a blessing attainable in this life, and represents it as actually experienced by true believers. 'Therefore being justified by faith.' 'There is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus.' 'Whosoever believeth is justified from all things,' etc. The quotations might be multiplied, but these are decisive. The notion that, though an act of forgiveness may take place, we are unable to ascertain a fact so important to us, is also irreconcilable with many passages, in which the writers of the New Testament speak of an experience not confined personally to themselves, or to those Christians who were endowed with spiritual gifts, but common to all Christians. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God.' 'We joy in God, by whom we have received the reconciliation.' 'Being reconciled unto God by the death of his Son.' 'We have not received the spirit of bondage again unto fear, but the spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father.' To these may be added innumerable passages which express the comfort, the confidence, and the joy of Christians; their 'friendship' with God; their 'access' to him; their entire union and delightful intercourse with him; and their absolute confidence in the success of their prayers. All such passages are perfectly consistent with deep humility and self-diffidence, but they are irreconcilable with a state of hostility between the parties, and with an unascertained and only hoped-for restoration of friendship and favor. An assurance, therefore, that the sins which are felt to 'be a burden intolerable' are forgiven, and that the ground of that apprehension of future punishment which causes the penitent to 'bewail his manifold sins,' is taken away by restoration to the favor of the offended God, must be allowed, or nothing would be more incongruous and impossible than the comfort, the peace, the rejoicing of spirit, which in the Scriptures are attributed to believers.

"Few Christians of evangelical views have, therefore, denied the possibility of our becoming assured of the favor of God in a sufficient degree to give substantial comfort to the mind. Their differences have rather respected the means by which the contrite become assured of that change in their relation to Almighty God, whom they have offended, which in Scripture is expressed by the term justification. The question has been (where the notion of an assurance of eternal salvation has not been under discussion), by what means the assurance of the divine favor is conveyed to the mind. Some have concluded that we obtain it by inference, others by the direct testimony of the Holy Spirit to the mind" (Watson, s. v.).

(3.) With regard to the history of the doctrine, Wesley remarks: "I apprehend that the whole Christian Church in the first centuries enjoyed it. For, though we have few points of doctrine explicitly taught in the small remains of the ante-Nicene fathers, yet I think none that carefully read Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Origen, or any other of them, can doubt whether either the writer himself possessed it, or all whom he mentions as real Christians. And I really conceive, both from the Harmonia Confessionum and whatever else I have occasionally read, that all reformed churches in Europe did once believe, 'Every true Christian has the divine evidence of his being in favor with God.'" "I know likewise that Luther, Melancthon, and many other (if not all) of the reformers frequently and strongly assert that every believer is conscious of his own acceptance with God, and that by a supernatural evidence" (see below).

Thomas Aquinas supposed (Summ. pt. ii, l. quest. 112, art. 5) a threefold way in which man could ascertain whether he was a subject of divine grace or not: 1. By direct revelation on the part of God; 2. By himself (certitudinaliter); 3. By certain indications (conjecturaliter per aliqua signa). But the last two were, in his opinion, uncertain; as for the first, God very seldom makes use of it, and only in particular cases (revelat Deus hoc aliquando aliquibus ex speciali privilegio), so that no one can have perfect certainty on the subject; only there are signs, if proper attention be paid, such as that a man has his joy in God, that he despises the world, and is conscious of no gross sins. A presage may thus be formed of his forgiveness (nullus certitudinaliter potest scire se habere caritatem, sed potest e aliquibus signis probabilibus coningere.—In lib. i. Sentt. dist. 17, quest. 1, art. 4). Alexander of Hales contended that on this point there was a peculiar knowledge—since neither the cause nor the effect fell within the province of human knowledge, yet a certain feeling of knowledge might be possessed upon it; only it is not infallible, but verifies itself by experience in the feelings when these three signs concur, light, peace, and joy. God does not will either to give to us complete certainty, or to leave us wholly in uncertainty. If man experienced nothing of the sweetness of the divine life, he would not be attracted to the love of God; if he had perfect assurance it would easily seduce him into pride. Luther denounced the notion of the uncertainty of man being in a state of grace (in his Comment. upon Gal. iv, 6) as a dangerous and sophistical doctrine. The doctrine that personal assurance is involved in saving faith is taught in the Augsburg Confession (art. iv), and also in the Apologia Confessionis. The doctrine of the certitudo salutis (certainty of salvation) is taught by Calvin (Institutes, iii, c. 24, § 4).

Sir W. Hamilton, in a foot-note to his article on the English Universities (Discussions on Philosophy, etc.), while speaking on religious tests as a term of admission, has the following passage: "Assurance, personal assurance (the feeling of certainty that God is propitious to me, that my sins are forgiven, fiducia, pleniphoria fidei), was long universally held in the Protestant communities to be the criterion and condition of a true or saving faith. Luther declares that he who hath not assurance spews faith out; and Melancthon makes assurance the discriminating line of Christianity from heathenism. It was maintained by Calvin, nay, even by Arminius, and is part and parcel of all the confessions of all the churches of the Reformation down to the Westminster Assembly. In that synod assurance was, in Protestantism, for the first time declared not to be of the essence of faith; and, accordingly, the Scottish General Assembly has subsequently, once and again, condemned the holders of this, the doctrine of Luther, of Calvin, and of the older Scottish Church itself. In the English, and more particularly in the Irish Establishment, it still stands a necessary tenet of belief. The doctrine is now, however, disavowed, when apprehended, by Anglican churchmen." These strong statements are controverted in the Brit. and For. Evangelical Review (Oct. 1856), by Cunningham (see the article, enlarged, in Cunningham, Theology of the Reformation, Essay iii), who shows that Sir William Hamilton has greatly mistaken the reformed doctrine in representing assurance as, in the opinion of all the re-forming churches, an essential part of saving faith. Dr. Cunningham proves, on the contrary, from several of the confessions of the churches of the Reformation, and from the writings of some leading reformers, that, in their opinion, "this assurance was not the proper act of justifying and saving faith, and did not belong to its essence; . . . that it was a result or consequence of faith, posterior to it in the order of nature, and frequently also of time." Regarded as an exposure of Sir William Hamilton's historical inaccuracies, this essay is complete, but as an exhibition of the scriptural doctrine of assurance it is seriously defective. It not only encumbers the doctrine by adding the assurance of final salvation to that of present forgiveness—a mistake full both of embarrassment to timid consciences, and of peril to the interests of practical religion—but it almost puts out of sight that direct and blessed witness of the Spirit to the believer's acceptance which is so prominent a feature of the experimental theology of the Bible, and without which the Christian life must be one of distressing uncertainty and doubt. But Sir William was quite right in saying that the Westminster Assembly was the first Protestant synod that formally declared assurance not to be of the essence of faith. Yet it declares that assurance is practicable and obligatory in very strong language, and calls it "an infallible assurance" [see above, (1)].

Wesley, and the Methodist theologians generally, advocate the doctrine of assurance of present (not of eternal) salvation in the sense stated above (2), connecting it with the "witness of the Spirit," as in the following practical passage: "Every man, applying the scriptural marks to himself, may know whether he is a child of God. Thus, if he know, first, 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God' into all holy tempers and actions, 'they are the sons of God' (for which he has the infallible assurance of Holy Writ); secondly, 'I am thus 'led by the Spirit of God,' he will easily conclude, therefore I am a son of God. Agreeably to this are those plain declarations of John in his first epistle: 'Hereby we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments' (ch. ii, 3). 'Whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him;' that we are indeed the children of God (ver. 5). 'If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him' (ver. 29). 'We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren' (ch. iii, 14). 'Hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him' (ver. 19), namely, because we 'love one another, not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.' See also ch. iii, 24, and iv, 13. It is highly probable there never were any children of God, from the beginning of the world unto this day, who were further advanced in the grace of God, and the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, than the apostle John at the time when he wrote these words, and the fathers in Christ to whom he wrote. Notwithstanding which, it is evident both the apostle himself, and all those pillars in God's temple, were very far from despising these marks of their being the children of God; and that they applied them to their own souls for the confirmation of their faith. Yet all this is no other than rational evidence, the witness of our spirit, our reason, our understanding. It all resolves into this: Those who have these marks are children of God; but we have these marks, therefore we are children of God. But how does it appear that we have these marks? This is a question which still remains. How does it appear that we do love God and our neighbor, and that we keep his commandments? Observe that the meaning of the question is, How does it appear to ourselves? not to others. I would ask him, then, that proposes this question, How does it appear to you that you are alive? and that you are now in ease, and not in pain? Are you not immediately conscious of it? By the same immediate consciousness you will know if your soul is alive to God; if you are saved from the pain of proud wrath, and have the ease of a meek and quiet spirit. By the same means you cannot but perceive if you love, rejoice, and delight in God. By the same you must be directly assured if you love your neighbor as yourself; if you are kindly affectioned to all mankind, and full of gentleness and long-suffering. And with regard to the outward mark of the children of God, which is, according to John, the keeping his commandments, you undoubtedly know in your own breasts if, by the grace of God, it belongs to you. Now this is properly the testimony of our own spirit, even the testimony of our own conscience, that God hath given us to be holy of heart, and holy in outward conversation. It is a consciousness that we are inwardly conformed, by the Spirit of God, to the image of his Son, and that we walk before him in justice, mercy, and truth, doing the things which are pleasing in his sight" (Wesley, Sermons, i, 86, 87). See SPIRIT, WITNESS OF.

The Council of Trent (sess. vi, ch. ix. De Justificatione) decided that "it is on no account to be maintained that those who are really justified ought to feel fully assured of the fact, without any doubt whatever; or that none are absolved and justified but those who believe themselves to be so; or that by this faith only absolution and justification are procured; as if he who does not believe this doubts the promises of God, and the efficacy of the death and resurrection of Christ. For, while no godly person ought to doubt the mercy of God, the merit of Christ, or the virtue and efficacy of the sacraments, so, on the other hand, whoever considers his own infirmity and corruption may doubt and fear whether he is in a state of grace, since no one can certainly and infallibly know that he has obtained the grace of God."

Assyria (Assyria). We must here distinguish between the country of Assyria and the Assyrian empire. They are both designated in Hebrew by אַשּׁוּר, ASSUR, the people being also described by the same term, only that in the latter sense it is masculine, in the former feminine. In the Septuagint it is commonly rendered by Ἀσσυρία or Ἀσσυρία, and in the Vulgate by Assur and Assyria, and seldom or never by Assyria, or Assyria. The Asshurim (Ἀσσυριμῶν) of Gen. xxi, 3, were an Arab tribe; and at Ezek. xxvii, 6, the word ashurim (in our version "Ashurites") is only an abbreviated form of teashur, box-wood. Assyria derived its name from the progenitor of the aboriginal inhabitants—Asshur, the second son of Shem (Gen. x, 22; 1 Chron. i, 17), a different person from Ashchur, son of Hezron, and Caleb's grandson (1 Chron. ii, 24; iv, 5). In later times it is thought that Asshur was worshipped as their chief god by the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. and Bab., p. 537).

See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. The extent of Assyria differed greatly at different periods. Probably in the earliest times it was confined to a small tract of low country between the Jebel Maklûb, or Taurus range on the N., and the Lesser Zab (Zab Asfal) toward the S., lying chiefly on the immediate bank of the Tigris. Gradually its limits were extended, until it came to be regarded as comprising the whole region between the Armenian mountains (lat. $37^{\circ} 30'$) upon the north, and upon the south the country about Bagdad (lat. $33^{\circ} 30'$). Eastward its boundary was the high range of Zagros, or mountains of Kurdistan; westward it naturally retained the Tigris as its boundary, although, according to the views of some, it was eventually bounded by the Mesopotamian desert, while, according to others, it reached the Euphrates. Taking the greatest of these dimensions, Assyria may be said to have extended in a direction from N.E. to S.W. a distance of nearly 500 miles, with a width varying from 350 to 100 miles. Its area would thus a little exceed 100,000 square miles, or about equal that of Italy.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

I. ASSYRIA PROPER.—1. Ancient Notices of its Position.—This was a great and powerful country, lying on the east of the Tigris (Gen. ii, 14), the capital of which was Nineveh (Gen. x, 11, etc.). Its exact limits in early times are unknown; but when its monarchs enlarged their dominions by conquest, the name of this metropolitan province was extended to the whole empire. Hence, while Homer calls the inhabitants of the country north of Palestine Arimoi (evidently the Aramim or Arameans of the Hebrews), the Greeks of a later period, finding them subject to the Assyrians, called the country Assyria, or (by contraction) Syria, a name which it has ever since borne. It is on this account that, in classical writers, the names Assyria and Syria are so often found interchanged (Henderson, On Isa. p. 173; Hitzig, Begriff d. Krit. Alt. Test. p. 98); but it may be questioned whether in Hebrew "Asshur" and "Aram" are ever confounded. The same, however, cannot be affirmed of those parts of the Assyrian empire which lay east of the Euphrates, but west of the Tigris. The Hebrews, as well as the Greeks and Romans, appear to have spoken of them in a loose sense as being in Assyria, because in the Assyrian empire. Thus Isaiah (vii, 20) describes the Assyrians as those "beyond the river," i. e. east of the Euphrates, which river, and not the Tigris, is introduced at viii, 7, as an image of their power. In Gen. xxv, 18, the locality of the Ishmaelites is described as being east of Egypt, "as thou goest to Assyria," which, however, could only be reached through Mesopotamia or Babylonia, and this idea best reconciles the apparent incongruity of the statement in the same book (ii, 14), that the Hiddekel, or Tigris, runs "on the east of Assyria," i. e. of the Assyrian provinces of Mesopotamia and Babylonia; for there can be no doubt that, not only during the existence of the Assyrian monarchy, but long after its overthrow, the name of Assyria was given to those provinces, as having once formed so important a part of it. For example, in 2 Kings xxiii, 29, Nebuchadnezzar is termed the king of Assyria, though resident at Babylon (comp. Jer. ii, 18; Lament. v, 6; Judith i, 7; ii, 1); even Darius, king of Persia, is called, in Ezra vi, 22, king of Assyria (comp. Hist. Nat. xix, 19); and, on a similar principle, in 2 Macc. i, 19, the Jews are said to have been carried captive to Persia, i. e. Babylonia, because, as it had formerly been subject to the Assyrians, so it was afterward under the dominion of Persia. (Comp. Herodotus, i, 106, 178; iii, 5; vii, 63; Strabo, ii, 84; xvi, 1; Arrian, vii; Exped. Alex. vii, 21, 2; Ammianus Marcellinus, xxiii, 20; xxiv, 2; Justin, i, 2, 13.) One writer, Dionysius Periegetes (v, 975), applies the designation of Assyria even to Asia Minor, as far as the Black Sea. Yet, ultimately, this name again became restricted to the original province east of the Tigris, which was called by the Greeks Assyria (Ptolemy, vi, 1), and more commonly Armenia (Strabo, xvi, 507), or Armenia (Dion Cassius, lxxviii, 28), the latter being only a dialectic variety of pronunciation, derived from the Aramaean custom of changing s into t. A trace of the name is supposed to be preserved in that of a very ancient place, Athur, on the Tigris, from four to six hours N.E. of Mosul. Rich, in his Residence in Kurdistan (ii, 129), describes the ruins as those of the "city of Ninrod," and states that some of the better informed of the Turks at Mosul "said that it was Al Athur, or Ashur, from which the whole country was denominated.

2. Boundaries.—According to Ptolemy, Assyria was in his day bounded on the north by Armenia, the Gorgilean or Carduchian mountains, especially by Mount Niphates; on the west by the River Tigris and Mesopotamia; on the south by Susiana, or Chuzistan, in Persia, and by Babylonia; and on the east by a part of Media, and Mount Choathras and Zagros (Ptolemy, vi, 1; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 13; Strabo, xvi, 736). It corresponded to the modern Kurdistan, or country of the Kurds (at least to its larger and western portion), with part of the pashalic of Mosul.—Kitto.

Toward the north Assyria bordered on the strong and mountainous region of Armenia, which may have been at times under Assyrian dominion, but was never reckoned an actual part of the country. (See 2 Kings xix, 37.) Toward the east her neighbors were originally a multitude of independent tribes, scattered along the Zagros chain, who have their fitting representatives in the modern Kurds and Lurs—the real sovereigns of that mountain range. Beyond these tribes lay Media, which ultimately subjected the mountaineers, and was thereby brought into direct contact with Assyria in this quarter. On the south, Elam or Susiana was the border state east of the Tigris, while Babylonia occupied the same position between the rivers. West of the Euphrates was Arabia, and higher up Syria, and the country of the Hittites, which last reached from the neighborhood of Damascus to Anti-Taurus and Amanus.—Smith.

3. General geographical character.—The country within these limits is of a varied aspect. "Assyria," says Mr. Ainsworth (Is searches in Assyria, Babylon, and Chaldaea, Lond. 1838, p. 17), "including Taurus, is distinguished into three districts: by its structure, into a district of plutonic and metamorphic rocks, a district of sedimentary formations, and a district of alluvial deposits; by configuration, into a district of mountains, a district of stony or sandy plains, and a district of low watery plains; by natural productions, into a country of forests and fruit-trees, of olives, wine, corn, and pasturage, or of barren rocks; a country of mulberry, cotton, maize, tobacco, or of barren clay, sand, pebbly or rocky plains; and into a country of date-trees, rice, and pasturage, or a land of saline plants." The northern part is little else than a series of mountains, which, near Julamerk, rise to a very great height, Mount Jewar being supposed to have an elevation of 15,000 feet; in the south it is more level, but the plains are often burnt up with scorching heat, while the traveller, looking northward, sees a snowy alpine ridge hanging like a cloud in mid air. On the west this country is skirted by the great river Tigris, the Hiddekel of the Hebrews (Gen. ii, 14; Dan. x, 4), the Dijlah of the Arabs, noted for the impetuosity of its current. Its banks, once the residence of mighty kings, are now desolate, covered, like those of its twin river the Euphrates, with relics of ancient greatness, in the ruins of fortresses, mounds, and dams, which had been erected for the defence or irrigation of the country. Niebuhr describes a large stone dam at the castle of Nimrod, eight leagues below Mosul, as a work of great skill and labor, and now venerable for its antiquity; and some suppose that it was from the circumstance of so many canals from the Tigris watering the country, and rendering it fruitful, that that river received the Arabic name of Nahr es-Salam, the River of Peace, i. e. prosperity. It leaves the high land at some distance above Tekrit, rushing with great velocity through a pass in the Hamrin mountains. In its progress along Assyria, the Tigris receives from that country, besides other rivers, two rapid mountain streams—the Great and Little Zab (Arab. Dhab, i. e. Wolf), called by the Greeks the Lykos, or Wolf, and the Capros, or Wild Boar. The Greater Zab (called by the Kurds Zerb), used to be laid down as a different river from the Hakkaris, but Dr. Grant found them to be identical; and he likewise detected an error of Kinneir, in representing the Bitlis-su as the same as the Khabour, whereas they are different streams. (See Grant's Nestorians, p. 46.)—Kitto.

On the north and east the high mountain chains of Armenia and Kurdistan are succeeded by low ranges of limestone hills of a somewhat arid aspect, which detach themselves from the principal ridges, running parallel to them, and occasionally inclosing, between their northern or north-eastern flank and the main mountain-line, rich plains and fertile valleys. To these ridges there succeeds at first an undulating zone of country, well watered and fairly productive, which finally sinks down with some suddenness upon the great Mesopotamian plain, the modern district of El-Jezireh. This vast flat, which extends in length for 250 miles from the latitude of Mardin ($37^{\circ} 20'$) to that of Tekrit ($31^{\circ} 33'$), and which is in places of nearly equal width, is interrupted only by a single limestone range, a narrow ridge rising abruptly out of the plain, which, splitting off from Zagros in lat. $33^{\circ} 30'$, may be traced under the names of Sarazur, Hamrin, and Sinjar, from Iwan in Luristan nearly to Rakkab on the Euphrates. "From all parts of the plain the Sinjar is a beautiful object. Its limestone rocks, wooded here and there with dwarf oak, are of a rich golden color; and the numberless ravines which furrow its sides form ribs of deep purple shadow" (Layard, Ni- neh and Babylon, p. 265). Above and below this barrier, stretching southward and westward farther than the eye can reach, and extending northward and eastward 70 or 80 miles to the hill-country before mentioned, is an immense level tract, now for the most part a wilderness, scantily watered on the right bank of the Tigris, but abundantly supplied on the left, which bears marks of having been in early times throughout well cultivated and thickly peopled. This plain is not alluvial, and most parts of it are even considerably raised above the level of the rivers. It is covered in spring time with the richest vegetation, presenting to the eye a carpet of flowers, varying in hue from day to day; but as the summer advances it is parched up, and gradually changes to an arid and yellow waste, except along the courses of the rivers. All over this vast flat, on both sides of the Tigris, rise "grass-covered heaps, marking the site of ancient habitations" (Layard, p. 245). Mr. Layard counted from one spot nearly a hundred (Nineveh and its Remains, i, 315); from another above 200 of these lofty mounds (Nin. and Bab. p. 245). Those which have been examined have been uniformly found to present appearances distinctly connecting them with the remains of Nineveh. See NINEVEH. It may therefore be regarded as certain that they belong to the time of Assyrian greatness, and thus they will serve to mark the extent of the real Assyrian dominion. They are numerous on the left bank of the Tigris from Bavian to the Diyaleh, and on the right they thickly stud the entire country both north and south of the Sinjar range, extending eastward beyond the Khabour (Layard, chs. xii-xiv), northward to Mardin, and southward to the vicinity of Bagdad.—Smith.

4. Natural Productions.—The most remarkable feature, says Ainsworth, in the vegetation of Taurus, is the abundance of trees, shrubs, and plants in the northern, and their comparative absence in the southern district. Besides the productions above enumerated, Kurdistan yields gall-nuts, gum Arabic, mastich, manna (used as sugar), madder, castor-oil, and various kinds of grain, pulse, and fruit. An old traveller, Rauwolf, who passed by Mosul in 1574, dwells with admiration on the finely-cultivated fields on the Tigris, so fruitful in corn, wine, and honey as to remind him of the Assyrian Rabshakeh's description of his native country in 2 Kings xviii, 32. Rich informs us that a great quantity of honey, of the finest quality, is produced; the bees (comp. Isa. vii, 18, "the bee in the land of Assyria") are kept in hives of mud. The naphtha springs on the east of the Tigris are less productive than those in Mesopotamia, but they are much more numerous. The zoology of the mountain district includes bears (black and brown), panthers, lynxes, wolves, foxes, marmots, dormice, fallow and red deer, roebucks, antelopes, etc., and likewise goats, but not (as was once supposed) of the Angora breed. In the plains are found lions, tigers, hyenas, beavers, jerboas, wild boars, camels, etc.—Kitto.

5. Subdivisions and Principal Towns.—Assyria in Scripture is commonly spoken of in its entirety, and unless the Huzab (חֻזָּב) of Nahum (ii, 7) is an equivalent for the Adiabene of the geographers, no name of a district can be said to be mentioned. The classical geographers, on the contrary, divided Assyria into a number of regions—Strabo (xvi, 1 and 4) into Aturia, Arbelitis, Artacene, Apolloniatis, Chalonitis, Dolomene, Calachene, Adiabene, Mesopotamia, etc.; Ptolemy (vi, 1) into Arrapachitis, Adiabene, the Garamanian country, Apolloniatis, Arbelitis, the country of the Sembata, Calacene, and Sittacene. These provinces appear to be chiefly named from cities, as Arbelitis from Arbel; Calacene (or Calachene) from Calah or Halah (Gen. x, 11); Apolloniatis from Apollonia; Sittacene from Sittace, etc. Adiabene, however, the richest region of all, derived its appellation from the Zab (Dhab) rivers on which it lay, as Ammianus Marcellinus informs us (xxiii, 20). Ptolemy (v, 18) made Mesopotamia (which he understood literally as the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris) distinct from Assyria, just as the sacred writers distinguish "Aram-Naharain" from "Asshur." Strabo (xvi, 1) extended Assyria to the Euphrates, and even across it into Arabia and Syria! Farthest north lay the province Arrapachitis, so called, as Rosenmüller conjectures, from Arphaxad, Asshur's brother (Gen. x. 22-24; but see Vater on Genesis, i, 151). South of it was Calchene, by Strabo written Calachene; perhaps the Chaluch of 2 Kings xvii, 6; xviii, 11. Next came Adiabene, so important a district of Assyria as sometimes to give name to the whole country. See ADIABENE. In Aramaean it is called Chulyab or Hulyab. North-east of it lay Arbelitis, in which was Arbel (now Arbil, of which see an account in Rich's Kurdistan, ii, 14; and Appendix, No. i and ii), famous for the battle in which Alexander triumphed over Darius. South of this lay the two provinces of Apolloniatis and Sittacene. The country of Kir, to which the Assyrians transported the Damascene Syrians (2 Kings xvi, 9; Amos i, 5), was probably the region about the river Kur (the Cyrus of the Greeks), i. e. Iberia and Georgia.

The chief cities of Assyria in the time of its greatness appear to be the following: Nineveh, which is marked by the mounds opposite Mosul (Nebbi-Yunus and Konyujik); Calah or Halah, now Nimrud; Asshur, now Kalah Shergat; Sargina, or Dur-Sargina, now Khorsabad; Arbel, still Arbil; Opis, at the junction of the Diyaleh with the Tigris; and Sittace, a little farther down the latter river. If this place should not rather be reckoned to Babylonia. (See the Journal of the Geograph. Soc. vol. ix, part i, p. 35, Lond. 1830.) The capital of the whole country was Nineveh, the Ninus of the Greeks (Herodot. i, 102), the Hebrew name being supposed to denote "the abode of Ninus," the founder of the empire. Its site is believed to have been on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite the modern town of Mosul, where there is now a small town called Nebbi Yunus (i. e. the prophet Jonah), the ruins around which were explored by Rich, and are described in his work on Kurdistan. See NINEVEH. In Gen. x, 11, 12, three other cities are mentioned along with Nineveh, viz. Rehoboth Ir, i. e. the city of Rehoboth, the locality of which is unknown. Caluch (in our version Calah), either a place in the province of Calachene above mentioned, or the modern Hulwân, called by the Syrians Chalach; and Resen, "a great city between Nineveh and Calach," which Bochart identifies with the Larissa of Xenophon (Anabasis, iii, 47), and Michaëlis with a place called Resin (Rish-Ain, caput fontis?), destroyed by the Arabs A. D. 772. Rich notices an old place and convent of that name near Mosul (ii, 81). At the town of Al-Kosh, north of Mosul, tradition places the birth and burial of the prophet Nahum, and the Jews resort thither in pilgrimage to his tomb. But, though he is styled an El-kohite (Nah. i, 1), his denunciation against Assyria and Nineveh were evidently uttered in Palestine; and St. Jerome fixes his birthplace at Helkesai, a village in Galilee.—Kitto; Smith. See JONAH.

6. Present Condition.—The greater part of the country which formed Assyria Proper is under the nominal sway of the Turks, who compose a considerable proportion of the population of the towns and larger villages, filling nearly all public offices, and differing in nothing from other Osmanlis. The Pasha of Mosul is nominated by the Porte, and is subject to the Pasha of Bagdad; there is also a pasha at Solymaneh and Akra; a bey at Arbil, a mussellim at Kirkuk, etc. But the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, and of the whole mountain tract that here divides Turkey from Persia, are the Kurds, the Carduchii of the Greeks; from them a chain of these mountains were anciently called the Carduchian or Gordyaean, and from them now the country is designated Kurdistan. Klaproth, in his

Asia Polyglotta (Paris, 1823, 4to, p. 75), derives the name from the Persian root kurd, i. e. strong, brave. They are still, as of old, a barbarous and warlike race, occasionally yielding a formal allegiance, on the west, to the Turks, and on the east to the Persians, but never wholly subdued; indeed, some of the more powerful tribes, such as the Hakkary, have maintained an entire independence. Some of them are stationary in villages, while others roam far and wide, beyond the limits of their own country, as nomadic shepherds; but they are all more or less addicted to predatory habits, and are regarded with great dread by their more peaceful neighbors. They profess the faith of Islam, and are of the Sunite sect. All travellers have remarked many points of resemblance between them and the ancient Highlanders of Scotland. (See Mr. Ainsworth's second work, Travels and Researches in Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, etc., Lond. 1842, 2 vols.)

The Christian population is scattered over the whole region, but is found chiefly in the north. It includes Chaldeans, who form that branch of the Nestorians that adheres to the Church of Rome, a few Jacobites, or monophysite Syrians, Armenians, etc. But the most interesting portion is the ancient Church of the primitive Nestorians, a lively interest in which has lately been excited in the religious world by the publications of the American missionaries (see, especially, The Nestorians, by Asahel Grant, M. D., Lond. 1841; and compare Dr. E. Robinson, in the Am. Bibl. Repos. Oct. 1841; Jan. 1842; Rev. J. Perkins, ib. Jan. 1843; and Residence in Persia, N. Y. 1843). See NESTORIANS. Another peculiar race that is met with in this end of the neighboring countries is that of the Yezidees (q. v.), whom Grant and Ainsworth would likewise connect with the ten tribes; but it seems much more probable that they are an offshoot from the ancient Manichees, their alleged worship of the Evil Principle amounting to no more than a reverence which keeps them from speaking of him with disrespect (see Homes in the Am. Bibl. Repos. for April, 1842). Besides the dwellers in towns and the agricultural population, there are a vast number of wandering tribes, not only of Kurds, but of Arabs, Turkomans, and other classes of robbers, who, by keeping the settled inhabitants in constant dread of property and life, check every effort at improvement; and, in consequence of this and the influence of bad government, many of the finest portions of the country are little better than unproductive wastes. A copy of a famous history of Kurdistan, entitled Tarikh al-Akrad (Akrad being the collective name of the people), was procured by Mr. Rich when in the country, and is now, along with the other valuable Oriental MSS. of that lamented traveller, preserved in the British Museum. See KURDISTAN.

II. THE ASSYRIAN EMPIRE.—No portion of ancient history is involved in greater obscurity than that of the empire of Assyria. Nor is this obscurity in any very great degree removed by the recent remarkable discoveries of the monumental records of the nation by Layard, Botta, and Loftus.

1. Scriptural Notices of Assyrian History.—In attempting to arrange even the facts deducible from Scripture, a difficulty presents itself at the outset, arising from the ambiguity of the account given of the origin of the earliest Assyrian state in Gen. x, 11. After describing Nimrod, son of Cush, "as a mighty one in the earth," the historian adds (ver. 10), "And the beginning of his kingdom (or, rather, the first theatre of his dominion) was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar," i. e. Babylonia. Then follow the words (as it is in the margin), "Out of that land he (i. e. Nimrod) went into Assyria and builded Nineveh," (comp. Noldius, Concord. Hebr. Particles, ed. Typm., p. 223.) Moses is enumerating the descendants of Ham, and it is not likely that he would interrupt the details to give an account of Asshur, a son of Shem, whose posterity are not introduced till ver. 21. Besides, in the circumstance of Asshur leaving one country to settle in another, there was nothing remarkable, for that was the case with almost all Noah's grandchildren. But if we understand it of Nimrod, both the connection and the sense will be manifest. The design obviously is to represent him as a potent monarch and ambitious conqueror. His brethren, the other sons of Cush, settled in the south, but he, advancing northward, first seized on Babylonia, and, proceeding thence into Assyria (already partially colonized by the Asshurites, from whom it took its name), he built Nineveh and the other strongholds mentioned, in order to secure his conquests. This view is confirmed by a passage in Mic. v. 6, where, predicting the overthrow of Assyria by the Medes and Babylonians, the prophet says, "They shall devour the land of Asshur with the sword; even the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof" (comp. v. 5). It likewise agrees with the native tradition (which we can depend on the report of Ctesias), that the founder of the Assyrian monarchy and the builder of Nineveh was one and the same person, viz., Nimro, from whom it derived its name (q. d. Nim's Abode), and in that case the designation of Nimrod (the Rebel) was not his proper name, but an opprobrious appellation imposed on him by his enemies. Modern tradition likewise connects Nimrod with Assyria; for while, as we have seen, the memory of Asshur is preserved in the locality of Athur, that place is also termed the "city of Nimrod," and (as the above-mentioned dam on the Tigris is styled Nimrod's Castle) Rich informs us that "the inhabitants of the neighboring village of Derawesh consider him as their founder." He adds, that the village story-tellers have a book they call the Kisseh-Nimrod, or "Tales of Nimrod."

It is true that the Authorized Version of Gen. x, 11 is countenanced by most of the ancient translators and by Josephus; but, on the other hand, the one we have preferred is that of the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and of Jerome; and (among the moderns) of Bochart, Hyde, Marsham, Wells, Faber, Hales, and many others. Yet, though Nimrod's "kingdom" embraced the lands both of Shinar and Asshur, we are left in the dark as to whether Babylon or Nineveh became the permanent seat of government, and consequently whether his empire should be designated that of Babylonia or that of Assyria. No certain traces of it, indeed, are to be found in Scripture for ages after its erection. In the days of Abraham, we hear of a king of Elam (i. e. Elymais, in the south of Persia) named Chedorlaomer, who had held in subjection for twelve years five petty princes of Palestine (Gen. xiv, 4), and who, in consequence of their rebellion, invaded that country along with three other kings, one of whom was "Amraphel, king of Shinar." Josephus says "the Assyrians had then dominion over Asia;" and he styles these four kings merely commanders in the Assyrian army. It is possible that Chedorlaomer was an Assyrian viceroy, and the others his deputies; for at a later period the Assyrian boasted, "Are not my princes altogether kings?" (Isa. x, 8.) Yet some have rather concluded from the narrative that by this time the monarchy of Nimrod had been broken up, or that at least the seat of government had been transferred to Elam. Be this as it may, the name of Assyria as an independent state does not again appear in Scripture till the closing period of the age of Moses. Balaam, a seer from the northern part of Mesopotamia, in the neighborhood of Assyria, addressing the Kenites, a mountain tribe on the east side of the Jordan, "took up his parable," i. e. raised his oracular, prophetic chant, and said, "Durable is thy dwelling-place! yea, in a rock puttest thou thy nest; nevertheless, wasted shall be the Kenite, until Asshur shall lead them captive." In this verse, besides the play upon the word ken (the Hebrew for a nest), the reader may remark the striking contrast drawn between the permanent nature of the abode, and the transient possession of it by the occupants. The prediction found its fulfilment in the Kenites being gradually reduced in strength (comp. 1 Sam. xv, 6), till they finally shared the fate of the Transjordanite tribes, and were swept away into captivity by the Assyrians (1 Chr. v, 26; 2 Kings xvi, 9; xix, 12, 13; 1 Chr. ii, 55.). But, as a counter-part to this, Balaam next sees a vision of retaliatory vengeance on their oppressors, and the awful prospect of the threatened devastations, though beheld in far distant times, extorts from him the exclamation, "Ah! who shall live when God doeth this? For ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Assur, and shall afflict Elber, but he also [the invader] shall perish forever." This is not without obscurity; but it has commonly been supposed to point to the conquest of the regions that once formed the Assyrian empire, first by the Macedonians from Greece, and then by the Romans, both of whose empires were in their turn overthrown.

In the time of the Judges, the people of Israel became subject to a king of Mesopotamia, Chushan-rishathaim (Judg. iii, 8), who is by Josephus styled King of the Assyrians; but we are left in the same ignorance as in the case of Chedorlaomer as to whether he was an independent sovereign or only a viceroy for another. The eighty-third Psalm (ver. 9) mentions Ashur as one of the nations leagued against Israel; but as the date of that composition is unknown, nothing certain can be founded on it. The first king of Assyria alluded to in the Bible is he who reigned at Nineveh when the prophet Jonah was sent thither (Jon. iii, 6). Hales supposes him to have been the father of Pul, the first Assyrian monarch named in Scripture, and dates the commencement of his reign B.C. 821. By that time the metropolis of the empire had become "an exceeding great" and populous city, but one pre-eminent in wickedness (Jon. i, 2; iii, 3; iv, 11). See JONAH.

The first expressly recorded appearance of the Assyrian power in the countries west of the Euphrates is in the reign of Manahem, king of Israel, against whom "the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul or (Phul), king of Assyria" (1 Chron. v, 26), who invaded the country, and exacted a tribute of a thousand talents of silver "that his hand," i. e. his favor, "might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand" (2 Kings xv, 19, 20). Newton places this event in the year B.C. 770, in the twentieth year of Iud's reign, the commencement of which he fixes in the year B.C. 790. As to his name, we find the syllable Pul, Phl, or Pal entering into the names of several Assyrian kings (e. g. Pileser, Sardanapal-us); and hence some connect it with the Persian "hale," i. e. high, exalted, and think it may have been part of the title which the Assyrian monarchs bore. Hales conjectures that Pul may have been the second Belus of the Greeks, his fame having reached them by his excursions into Western Asia. About this period we find the prophet Hosea making frequent allusions to the practice both of Israel and Judaea, of throwing themselves for support on the kings of Assyria. In ch. v, 13; x, 6, our version speaks of their specially seeking the protection of a "King Jareb," but the original there is very obscure; and the next Assyrian monarch mentioned by name is Tiglath-pileser. The supposition of Newton is adopted by Hales, that at Pul's death his dominions were divided between his two sons, Tiglath-pileser and Nabonassar, the latter being made ruler at Babylon, from the date of whose government or reign the celebrated era of Nabonassar took its rise, corresponding to B.C. 747. The name of the other is variously written Tiglath and Tilgath, Pileser and Pileser: the etymology of the first is unknown (some think it has a reference to the river Djlath, i. e. the Tigris). Pileser signifies in Persian "exalted prince." When Ahaz, king of Judah, was hard pressed by the combined forces of

Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Damascus-Syria, he purchased Tiglath-pileser's assistance with a large sum, taken out of his own and the Temple treasury. The Assyrian king accordingly invaded territories of both the confederate kings, and annexed a portion of them to his own dominions, carrying captive a number of their subjects (2 Kings xv, 29; xvi, 5-10; 1 Chr. v, 26; 2 Chr. xxviii, 16; Isa. vii, 1-11; comp. Amos i, 5; ix, 7). His successor was Shalman (Hos. x, 4), Shalmaneser or Salmannassar, the Enemessar of the apocryphal book of Tobit (ch. i, 2). He made Hoshea, king of Israel, his tributary vassal (2 Kings xvii, 3); but finding him secretly negotiating with So or Sabaco (the Sabakoph of the monuments), king of Egypt, he laid siege to the Israelitish capital, Samaria, took it after an investment of three years (B.C. 720), and then reduced the country of the ten tribes to a province of his empire, carrying into captivity the king and his people, and settling Cushaeans from Babylonia in their room (2 Kings xvii, 3-6; xviii, 9, 11). Hezekiah, king of Judah, seems to have been for some time his vassal (2 Kings xviii, 7); and we learn from the Tyrian annals, preserved by Menander of Ephesus (as cited by Josephus, Ant. x, 14, 2), that he subdued the whole of Phoenicia, with the exception of insular Tyre, which successfully resisted a siege of five years. The empire of Assyria seems now to have reached its greatest extent, having had the Mediterranean for its boundary on the west, and including within its limits Media and Kir on the north, as well as Elam on the south (2 Kings xvi, 9; xvii, 6; Isa. xx, 6). In the twentieth chapter of Isaiah (ver. 1) there is mention of a king of Assyria, Sargon, in whose reign Tartan besieged and took Ashdod in Philistia (B.C. 715) [see SARGON]; and as Tartan is elsewhere spoken of (2 Kings xviii, 17) as a general of Sennacherib, some have supposed that Sargon is but another name of that monarch, while others would identify him either with Shalmaneser, or with Esarhaddon, Sennacherib's successor. But the correctness of all these conjectures may fairly be questioned; and we adhere to the opinion of Gesenius (Comment. zu Jesa. in loc.), that Sargon was a king of Assyria, who succeeded Shalmaneser, and had a short reign of two or three years. He thinks the name may be equivalent to Sar-jannach, "Prince of the Sun." Von Bohlen prefers the derivation of sergun, "gold-colored." His attack on Egypt may have arisen from the jealousy which the Assyrians entertained of that nation's influence over Palestine ever since the negotiation between its king So, and Hoshea, king of Israel. From many incidental expressions in the book of Isaiah we can infer that there was at this time a strong Egyptian party among the Jews, for that people are often warned against relying for help on Egypt, instead of simply confiding in Jehovah (Isa. xxx, 2; xxxi, 1; comp. xx, 5, 6). The result of Tartan's expedition against Egypt and Ethiopia was predicted by Isaiah while that general was yet on the Egyptian frontier at Ashdod (Isa. xx, 1-4); and it is not improbable that it is to this Assyrian invasion that the prophet Nahum refers when he speaks (iii, 8-10) of the subjugation of No, i. e. Xo-Ammon, or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, and the captivity of its inhabitants. The occupation of the country by the Assyrians, however, must have been very transient, for in the reign of Sargon's successor, Sennacherib, or Sancherib, we find Hezekiah, king of Judah, throwing off the Assyrian yoke, and allying himself with Egypt (2 Kings xviii, 7, 21). This brought against him Sennacherib with a mighty host, which, without difficulty, subdued the fenced cities of Judah, and compelled him to purchase peace by the payment of a large tribute. But "the treacherous dealer dealt very treacherously" (Isa. xxxiii, 1), and, notwithstanding the agreement, proceeded to invest Jerusalem. In answer, however, to the prayers of the "good king" of Judah, the Assyrian was diverted from his purpose, partly by the "rumor" (Isa. xxxvii, 6) of the approach of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, and partly by the sudden and miraculous destruction of a great part of his army (2 Kings xviii, 13-37; xix; Isa. xxxvi and xxxvii). He himself fled (B.C. 712) to Nineveh, where, in course of time, when worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch, he was slain by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer, the paricides escaping into the land of Armenia—a fact which is preserved in that country's traditional history. See ARARAT. Regarding the period of Sennacherib's death, chronologists differ. Hales, following the apocryphal book of Tobit (i, 21), places it fifty-five days after his return from his Jewish expedition; but Gesenius (Comment. zu Jesa., p. 999) has rendered it extremely probable that it did not take place till long after. He founds this opinion chiefly on a curious fragment of Berossus, preserved in the Armenian translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius. It states that, after Sennacherib's brother had governed Babylon as the Assyrian viceroy, the sovereignty was successively usurped by Acises, Merodach, or Berodach-Baladan (Isa. xxxix, 1; 2 Kings xx, 12), and Elibus or Bilibus. But, after three years, Sennacherib regained dominion in Babylonia, and appointed as viceroy his own son Assardan, the Esarhaddon of Scripture. This statement serves to explain how there was in Hezekiah's time a king at Babylon, though, both before and after, it was subject to Assyria. See SENNACHERIB. Sennacherib was succeeded by his son Esarhaddon, or Assarhaddon, who had been his father's viceroy at Babylon (2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38). He is the Sacheron or Sarchedon of Tobit (i, 21), and the Asaradinus of Ptolemy's Canon (B.C. 680). Hales regards him as the first Sardanapalus. The chief notice taken of him in Scripture is that he settled some colonists in Samaria (Ezra iv, 2), and as (at ver. 10) that colonization is ascribed to the "great and noble Asnapper," it is supposed that that was another name for Esarhaddon, but it may have been one of the great officers of his empire. It seems to have been in his reign that the captains of the Assyrian host invaded and ravaged Judah, carrying Manasseh, the king, captive to Babylon. The subsequent history of the empire is involved in almost as much obscurity as that of its origin and rise. The Medes had already shaken off the yoke, and the Chaldeans soon appear on the scene as the dominant nation of Western Asia; yet Assyria, though much reduced in extent, existed as an independent state for a considerable period after Esarhaddon. Hales, following Syncellus, makes him succeeded by a prince called Nimus (B.C. 667), who had for his successor Nebuchodonosor (B.C. 658), for the transactions of whose reign, including the expedition of his general Holofernes into Judea, Hales relies on the apocryphal book of Judith, the authority of which, however, is very questionable. The last monarch was Sarac, or Sardanapalus II (B.C. 636), in whose reign Cyaxares, king of Media, and Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylon, combined against Assyria, took Nineveh, and, dividing what remained of the empire between them, reduced Assyria Proper to a province of Media (B.C. 606).

2. Comparison with ancient Historians and the Intimations on the Monuments.—The original sources of profane history on this subject are Herodotus and Ctesias; but every attempt to reconcile their statements with those of Scripture, or even with each other, has hitherto failed. The former fixes the duration of the Assyrian dominion in Upper Asia at 520 years (Herod. i, 95), while the latter again assigns to the Assyrian empire, from Nimus to Sardanapalus, no less a period than 1305 years (Diodor. Sicul. ii, 21). The authority of Ctesias, however, is very generally discredited (it was so even by Aristotle), though he has recently found a defender in Dr. Russell, in his Connection of Sacred and Profane History. The truth is (as is remarked by the judicious Heeren), that the accounts of both these historians are little better than mere traditions of ancient heroes and heroines (witness the fables about Semiramis!), without any chronological data, and entirely in the style of the East. To detail all the fanciful hypotheses which have been propounded, with the view of forming out of them a consistent and coherent narrative, forms no part of our present design. Considerable light, however, has been thrown, by recent researches, upon certain points of this history.—Kitto.

(1.) The original Settlement of the Country.—Scripture informs us that Assyria was peopled from Babylon (Gen. x, 11), and both classical tradition and the monuments of the country agree in this representation. In Herodotus (i, 7), Nimus, the mythic founder of Nineveh, is the son (descendant) of Belus, the mythic founder of Babylon—a tradition in which the derivation of Assyria from Babylon, and the greater antiquity and superior position of the latter in early times, are shadowed forth sufficiently. That Ctesias (ap. Diol. Sic. ii, 7) inverts the relation, making Semiramis (according to him, the wife and successor of Nimus) found Babylon, is only one out of a thousand proofs of the untrustworthy character of his history. The researches recently carried on in the two countries clearly show, not merely by the statements which are said to have been deciphered on the historical monuments, but by the whole character of the remains discovered, that Babylonian greatness and civilization was earlier than Assyrian, and that, while the former was of native growth, the latter was derived from the neighboring country. The cuneiform writing, for instance, which is rapidly punched with a very simple instrument upon moist clay, but is only with much labor and trouble inscribed by the chisel upon rock, must have been invented in a country where men "had brick for stone" (Gen. xi, 3), and have thence passed to one where the material was unsuited for it. It may be observed, also, that while writing occurs in a very rude form in the earlier Babylonian ruins (Lofthus's Chaldees, p. 169), and gradually improves in the later ones, it is in Assyria uniformly of an advanced type, having apparently been introduced there after it had attained to perfection.

(2.) Date of the Foundation of the Kingdom.—With respect to the exact time at which Assyria became a separate and independent country, there is an important difference between classical authorities, Herodotus placing the commencement of the empire almost a thousand years later than Ctesias! Scripture does but little to determine the controversy; that little, however, is in favor of the former author. Geographically, as a country, Assyria was evidently known to Moses (Gen. ii, 14; xxv, 18; Num. xxiv, 22, 24); but it does not appear in Jewish history as a kingdom till the reign of Menahem (B.C. cir. 770). In Abraham's time (B.C. 2000?) it is almost certain that there can have been no Assyrian kingdom, or its monarch would have been found among those who invaded Palestine with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv, 1). In the time of the early judges (B.C. 1575), Assyria, if it existed, can have been of no great strength; for Chushan-Rishathaim, the first of the foreigners who oppressed Israel (Judg. iii, 8), is master of the whole country between the rivers (Aram-Naharim—"Syria between the two rivers"). These facts militate strongly against the views of Ctesias, whose numbers produce for the founding of the empire the date of B.C. 2182 (Clinton, Fast. Hell. i, 263). The more modest account of Herodotus is at once more probable in itself, more agreeable to Scripture, and more in accordance with the native writer Berossus. Herodotus relates that the Assyrians were "lords of Asia" for 520 years, when their empire was partially broken up by a revolt of the subject-nations (i, 95). After a period of anarchy, the length of which he does not estimate, the Median kingdom was formed, 179 years before the death of Cyrus, or B.C. 708. He would thus, it appears, have assigned to the foundation of the Assyrian empire a date not very greatly anterior to B.C. 1228. Berossus, who made the empire last 526 years to the reign of Pul (ap. Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 4), must have agreed nearly with this view—at least he would certainly have placed the rise of the kingdom within the 13th century. This is, perhaps, the utmost that can be determined with any approach to certainty. If, for convenience' sake, a more exact date be desired, the conjecture of Dr. Brandis has some claim to be adopted, which fixes the year B.C. 1273 as that from which the 526 years of Berossus are to be reckoned (Ream. Assyriarum Tempora Enumerata, p. 17).

(3.) Early Kings, from the foundation of the Kingdom to Pul.—The long list of Assyrian kings which has come down to us in two or three forms, only slightly varied (Clinton, F. H. i, 267), and which is almost certainly derived from Ctesias, must of necessity be discarded, together with his date for the kingdom. It covers a space of above 1200 years, and bears marks besides of audacious fraud, being composed of names snatched from all quarters, Arian, Semitic, and Greek—names of gods, names of towns, names of rivers—and in its estimate of time presenting the impossible average of 34 or 35 years to a reign, and the very improbable phenomenon of reigns in half the instances amounting exactly to a decimal number. Unfortunately, we have no authentic list to substitute for the forgery of Ctesias. Berossus spoke of 45 kings as reigning during his period of 526 years, and mentioned all their names (Euseb. ut sup.); but they have unluckily not been preserved to us. The work of Herodotus on Assyrian history (Herod. i, 106 and 184) has likewise entirely perished, and neither Greek nor Oriental sources are available to supply the loss, which has hitherto proved irreparable. Recently the researches in Mesopotamia have done something toward filling up this sad gap in our knowledge; but the reading of names is still so doubtful that it seems best, in the present condition of cuneiform inquiry, to treat the early period of Assyrian history in a very general way, only mentioning kings by name when, through the satisfactory identification of a cuneiform royal designation with some name known to us from sacred or profane sources, firm ground has been reached, and serious error rendered almost impossible.

The Mesopotamian researches have rendered it apparent that the original seat of government was not at Nineveh. The oldest Assyrian remains have been found at Kalesh-Sherghat, on the right bank of the Tigris, 60 miles south of the later capital; and this place the monuments show to have been the residence of the earliest kings, as well as of the Babylonian governors who previously exercised authority over the country. The ancient name of the town appears to have been identical with that of the country, viz. Ashkur. It was built of brick, and has yielded but a very small number of sculptures. The kings proved to have reigned there are fourteen in number, divisible into three groups; and their reigns are thought to have covered a space of nearly 350 years, from B.C. 1273 to B.C. 930. The most remarkable monarch of the series was called Tiglath-Pileser. He appears to have been king toward the close of the twelfth century, and thus to have been contemporary with Samson, and an earlier king than the Tiglath-Pileser of Scripture. He overran the whole country between Assyria Proper and the Euphrates; swept the valley of the Euphrates from south to north, from the borders of Babylon to Mount Taurus; crossed the Euphrates, and contended in northern Syria with the Hittites; invaded Armenia and Cappadocia; and claims to have subdued forty-two countries "from the channel of the Lower Zab (Zab Asfal) to the Upper Sea of the Setting Sun." All this he accomplished in the first five years of his reign. At a later date he appears to have suffered defeat at the hands of the king of Babylon, who had invaded his territory and succeeded in carrying off to Babylon various idols from the Assyrian temples (Offerhaus, De ant. Assy. imperio, Linga, 1727).

The other monarchs of the Kalesh-Sherghat series, both before and after Tiglath-Pileser, are comparatively insignificant. The later kings of the series are only known to us as the ancestors of the two great monarchs Sardanapalus the first and his son, Shalmaneser or Shalmanubar, who were among the most warlike of the Assyrian princes. Sardanapalus the first, who appears to have been the warlike Sardanapalus of the Greeks (Suidas, s. v.; comp. Hellan. Frag. p. 158), transferred the seat of government from Kalesh-Sherghat to Nimrud (probably the Scriptural Calah), where he built the first of those magnificent palaces which have recently been exhumed by English explorers. A great portion of the Assyrian sculptures now in the British Museum are derived from this edifice. A description of the building has been given by Mr. Layard (Nin. and its Remains, vol. ii, ch. 11). By an inscription repeated more than a hundred times upon its sculptures we learn that Sardanapalus carried his arms far and wide through Western Asia, warring on the one hand in Lower Babylonia and Chaldea, on the other in Syria and upon the coast of the Mediterranean. His son, Shalmaneser or Shalmanubar, the monarch who set up the Black Obelisk, now in the British Museum, to commemorate his victories, was a still greater conqueror. He appears to have overran Cappadocia, Armenia, Azerbejan, great portions of Media Magna, the Kurdish mountains, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Phœnicia; everywhere making the kings of the countries tributary to him. If we may trust the reading of certain names, on which cuneiform scholars appear to be entirely agreed, he came in contact with various Scriptural personages, being opposed in his Syrian wars by Benhadad and Hazael, kings of Damascus, and taking tribute from Jehu, king of Israel. His son and grandson followed in his steps, but scarcely equalled his glory. The latter is thought to be identical with the Biblical Pul, Phul, or Phaloch, who is the first of the Assyrian kings of whom we have mention in Scripture. See PUL.

(4.) The Kings from Pul to Esarhaddon.—The succession of the Assyrian kings from Pul almost to the close of the empire is rendered tolerably certain, not merely by the inscriptions, but also by the Jewish records. In the 2d book of Kings we find the names of Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, following one another in rapid succession (2 Kings xv, 19 and 29; xvii, 3; xviii, 13; xix, 37); and in Isaiah we have the name of "Sargon, king of Assyria" (xx, 1), who is a contemporary of the prophet, and who must evidently, therefore, belong to the same series. The inscriptions, by showing us that Sargon was the father of Sennacherib, fix his place in the list, and give us for the monarchs of the last half of the 8th and the first half of the 7th century B.C. the (probably) complete list of Tiglath-Pileser II, Shalmaneser II, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. For a detailed account of the actions of these kings, see each name in its place. (See Oppert, Chronologie des Assyriens et des Babyloniens, Paris, 1857.)—Smith, s. v.

(a.) Establishment of the Lower Dynasty.—It seems to be certain that at or near the accession of Pul a great change of some kind or other occurred in Assyria. Berosus is said to have brought his grand dynasty of forty-five kings in 526 years to a close at the reign of Pul (Polyhist. ap. Euseb. l. c.), and to have made him the first king of a new series. By the synchronism of Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19), the date of Pul may be determined to about B.C. 770. It was only twenty-three years later, as we find by the Canon of Ptolemy, that the Babylonians considered their independence to have commenced (B.C. 747). Herodotus probably intended to assign nearly to this same era the great commotion which (according to him) broke up the Assyrian empire into a number of fragments, out of which were formed the Median and other kingdoms. These traditions may none of them be altogether trustworthy; but their coincidence is at least remarkable, and seems to show that about the middle of the eighth century B.C. there must have been a break in the line of Assyrian kings—a revolution, foreign or domestic—and a consequent weakening or dissolution of the bonds which united the conquered nations with their conquerors.

It was related by Bion and Polyhistor (Agathias, ii, 25), that the original dynasty of Assyrian kings ended with a certain Belochus or Beletus, who was succeeded by an usurper (called by them Beletaras or Balatorus), in whose family the crown continued until the destruction of Nineveh. The general character of the circumstances narrated, combined with a certain degree of resemblance in the names—for Belochus is close upon Phaloch, and Beletaras may represent the second element in Tiglath-Pileser (who in the inscriptions is called "Tiglath-Palatsirra")—induce a suspicion that probably the Pul or Phaloch of Scripture was really the last king of the old monarchy, and that Tiglath-Pileser II, his successor, was the founder of what has been called the "Lower Empire." It may be suspected that Berosus really gave this account, and that Polyhistor, who repeated it, has been misreported by Eusebius. The synchronism between the revolution in Assyria and the era of Babylonian independence is thus brought almost to exactness, for Tiglath-Pileser is known to have been upon the throne about B.C. 740 (Clinton, Fast. Hell. i, 278), and may well have ascended it in B.C. 747.

(b.) Supposed Loss of the Empire at this Period.—Many writers of repute—among them Clinton and Niebuhr—have been inclined to accept the statement of Herodotus with respect to the breaking up of the whole empire at this period. It is evident, however, both from Scripture and from the monuments, that the shock sustained through the domestic revolution has been greatly exaggerated. Niebuhr himself observes (Vorträge über alte Geschichte, i, 38) that, after the revolution, Assyria soon "recovered herself, and displayed the most extraordinary energy." It is plain, from Scripture, that in the reigns of Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, Assyria was as great as at any former era. These kings all warred successfully in Palestine and its neighborhood; some attacked Egypt (Isa. xx, 4); one appears as master of Media (2 Kings xvii, 6); while another has authority over Babylon, Susiana, and Elymais (2 Kings xvii, 24; Ezra iv, 9). So far from our observing symptoms of weakness and curtailed dominion, it is clear that at no time were the Assyrian arms pushed farther, or their efforts more sustained and vigorous. The Assyrian annals for the period are in the most complete accordance with these representations. They exhibit to us the above-mentioned monarchs as extending their dominions farther than any of their predecessors. The empire is continually rising under them, and reaches its culminating point in the reign of Esarhaddon. The statements of the inscriptions on these subjects are fully borne out by the indications of greatness to be traced in the architectural monuments. No palace of the old monarchy equalled, either in size or splendor, that of Sennacherib at Nineveh. No series of kings belonging to it left buildings at all to be compared with those which were erected by Sargon, his son, and his grandson. The magnificent remains at Kouyunjik and Khorsabad belong entirely to these later kings, while those at Nimrud are about equally divided between them and their predecessors. It is farther noticeable that the writers who may be presumed to have drawn from Berosus, as Polyhistor and Abydenus, particularly expatiated upon the glories of these later kings. Polyhistor said (ap. Euseb. i, 5) that Sennacherib conquered Babylon, defeated a Greek army in Cilicia, and built there Tarsus, the capital. Abydenus related the same facts, except that he substituted for the Greek army of Polyhistor a Greek fleet; and added that Esarhaddon (his Aserdis) conquered Lower Syria and Egypt (Ibid. i, 9). Similarly Menander, the Tyrian historian, assigned to Shalmaneser an expedition to Cyprus (ap. Joseph. Ant. ix, 14), and Herodotus himself admitted that Sennacherib invaded Egypt (ii, 141). On every ground it seems necessary to conclude that the second Assyrian kingdom was really greater and more glorious than the first; that under it the limits of the empire reached their fullest extent, and the internal prosperity was at the highest.

The statement of Herodotus is not, however, without a basis of truth. It is certain that Babylon, about the time of Tiglath-Pileser's accession, ventured upon a revolt, which she seems afterward to have reckoned the commencement of her independence. See BABYLON. The knowledge of this fact may have led Herodotus into his error; for he would naturally suppose that, when Babylon became free, there was a general dissolution of the empire. It has been shown that this is far from the truth; and it may further be observed that, even as regards Babylon, the Assyrian loss was not permanent. Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon all exercised full authority over that country, which appears to have been still an Assyrian fief at the close of the kingdom.

(5.) Successors of Esarhaddon.—By the end of the reign of Esarhaddon the triumph of the Assyrian arms had been so complete that scarcely an enemy was left who could cause her serious anxiety. The kingdoms of Hamath, of Damascus, and of Samaria had been successively absorbed; Phœnicia had been conquered; Judæa had been made a feudatory; Philistia and Idumæa had been subjected, Egypt chastised, Babylon recovered, cities planted in Media. Unless in Armenia and Susiana there was no foe left to reduce, and the consequence appears to have been that a time of profound peace succeeded to the long and bloody wars of Sargon and his immediate successors. In Scripture it is remarkable that we hear nothing of Assyria after the reign of Esarhaddon, and profane history is equally silent until the attacks begin which brought about her downfall. The monuments show that the son of Esarhaddon, who was called Sardanapalus by Abydenus (ap. Euseb. i, 9), made scarcely any military expeditions, but occupied almost his whole time in the enjoyment of the pleasures of the chase. Instead of adorning his residence—as his predecessors had been accustomed to do—with a record and representation of his conquests, Sardanapalus II covered the walls of his palace at Nineveh with sculptures exhibiting his skill and prowess as a hunter. No doubt the military spirit rapidly decayed under such a ruler; and the advent of fresh enemies, synchronizing with this decline, produced the ruin of a power which had for six centuries been dominant in Western Asia.

(6.) Fall of Assyria.—The fate of Assyria, long previously prophesied by Isaiah (x, 5-19), was effected (humanly speaking) by the growing strength and boldness of the Medes. If we may trust Herodotus, the first Median attack on Nineveh took place about the year B.C. 633. By what circumstances this people, who had so long been engaged in contests with the Assyrians, and had hitherto shown themselves so utterly unable to resist them, became suddenly strong enough to assume an aggressive attitude, and to force the Ninevites to submit to a siege, can only be conjectured. Whether more natural increase, or whether fresh immigrations from the east had raised the Median nation at this time so far above its former condition, it is impossible to determine. We can only say that soon after the middle of the seventh century they began to press upon the Assyrians, and that, gradually increasing in strength, they proceeded, about the year B.C. 633, to attempt the conquest of the country. For some time their efforts were unsuccessful; but after a while, having won over the Babylonians to their side, they became superior to the Assyrians in the field, and about B.C. 625, or a little earlier, laid final siege to the capital. See MEDIA. Sarcas, the last king—probably the grandson of Esarhaddon—made a stout and prolonged defence, but at length, finding resistance vain, he collected his wives and his treasures in his palace, and with his own hand setting fire to the building, perished in the flames. This account is given in brief by Abydenus, who probably follows Berosus; and its outline so far agrees with Ctesias (ap. Diod. ii, 27) as to give an important value to that writer's details of the siege. See NINEVEH. In the general fact that Assyria was overcome, and Nineveh captured and destroyed by a combined attack of Medes and Babylonians, Josephus (Ant. x, 5) and the book of Tobit (xiv, 15) are agreed. Polyhistor also implies it (ap. Euseb. i, 5); and these authorities must be regarded as outweighing the silence of Herodotus, who mentions only the Medes in connection with the capture (i, 106), and says nothing of the Babylonians.

(7.) Fulfillment of Prophecy.—The prophecies of Nahum and Zephaniah (ii, 13-5) against Assyria were probably delivered shortly before the catastrophe. The date of Nahum is very doubtful, but it is not unlikely that he wrote about B.C. 718, or at the close of the reign of Hosea. Zephaniah is even later, since he prophesied under Josiah, who reigned from B.C. 639 to 609. If B.C. 625 be the date of the destruction of Nineveh, we may place Zephaniah's prophecy about B.C. 635. Ezekiel, writing in B.C. 588, bears witness historically to the complete destruction which had come upon the Assyrians, using the example as a warning to Pharaoh-Hophra and the Egyptians (ch. xxxi).

It was declared by Nahum (q. v.) emphatically, at the close of his prophecy, that there should be "no healing of Assyria's bruise" (iii, 19). In accordance with this announcement we find that Assyria never rose again to any importance, nor even succeeded in maintaining a distinct nationality. Once only was revolt attempted, and then in conjunction with Armenia and Media, the latter heading the rebellion. This attempt took place about a century after the Median conquest, during the troubles which followed upon the accession of Darius Hystaspis. It failed signally, and appears never to have been repeated, the Assyrians remaining thenceforth submissive subjects of the Persian empire. They were reckoned in the same satrapy with Babylon (Herod. iii, 92; comp. i, 192), and paid an annual tribute of a thousand talents of silver. In the Persian armies, which were drawn in great part from the subject-nations, they appear never to have been held of much account, though they fought, in common with the other levies, at Thermopylae, at Cunaxa, at Issus, and at Arbela.

(8.) General Character of the Empire.—In the first place, like all the early monarchies which attained to any great extent, the Assyrian empire was composed of a number of separate kingdoms. In the East, conquest has scarcely ever been followed by amalgamation, and in the primitive empires there was not even any attempt at that governmental centralization which we find at a later period in the satrapial system of Persia. As Solomon "reigned over all the kingdoms from the river (Euphrates) unto the land of the Philistines and the border of Egypt," so the Assyrian monarchs bore sway over a number of petty kings—the native rulers of the several countries—through the entire extent of their dominions. These native princes—the sole governors of their own kingdoms—were feudatories of the Great Monarch, of whom they held their crown by the double tenure of homage and tribute, Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19), Hoshea (ibid. xvii, 4), Ahaz (ibid. xvi, 8), Hezekiah (ibid. xviii, 14), and Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii, 11-15), were certainly in this position, as were many native kings of Babylon, both prior and subsequent to Nabonassar; and this system (if we may trust the inscriptions) was universal throughout the empire. It naturally involved the frequent recurrence of troubles. Princes circumstanced as were the Assyrian feudatories would always be looking for an occasion when they might revolt and re-establish their independence. The offer of a foreign alliance would be a bait which they could scarcely resist, and hence the continual warnings given to the Jews to beware of trusting in Egypt. Apart from this, on the occurrence of any imperial misfortune or difficulty, such, for instance, as a disastrous expedition, a formidable attack, or a sudden death, natural or violent, of the reigning monarch, there would be a strong temptation to throw off the yoke, which would lead, almost of necessity, to a rebellion. The history of the kings of Israel and Judah sufficiently illustrates the tendency in question, which required to be met by checks and remedies of the severest character. The deposition of the rebel prince, the wasting of his country, the plunder of his capital, a considerable increase in the amount of the tribute thenceforth required, were the usual consequences of an unsuccessful revolt; to which were added, upon occasion, still more stringent measures, as the wholesale execution of those chiefly concerned in the attempt, or the transplantation of the rebel nation to a distant locality. The captivity of Israel is only an instance of a practice long previously known to the Assyrians, and by them handed on to the Babylonian and Persian governments.

It is not quite certain how far Assyria required a religious conformity from the subject people. Her religion was gross and complex polytheistic, comprising the worship of thirteen principal and numerous minor divinities, at the head of the whole of whom stood the chief god, Asshur, who seems to be the deified patriarch of the nation (Gen. x, 22). The inscriptions appear to state that in all countries over which the Assyrians established their supremacy, they set up "the laws of Asshur," and "altars to the Great Gods." It was probably in connection with this Assyrian requirement that Ahaz, on his return from Damascus, where he had made his submission to Tiglath-Pileser, incurred the guilt of idolatry (2 Kings xvi, 10-18). The history of Hezekiah would seem, however, to show that the rule, if resisted, was not rigidly enforced; for it cannot be supposed that he would have consented to re-establish the idolatry which he had removed, yet he certainly came to terms with Sennacherib, and resumed his position of tributary (2 Kings xviii, 14). In any case it must be understood that the worship which the conquerors introduced was not intended to supersede the religion of the conquered race, but was only required to be superadded as a mark and badge of subjection.—Smith, s. v.

The political constitution of the Assyrian empire was no doubt similar to that of other ancient states of the East, such as Chaldea and Persia. The monarch, called "the great king" (2 Kings xviii, 19; Isa. xxxvi, 4), ruled as a despot, surrounded with his guards, and only accessible to those who were near his person (Diod. Sicul. ii, 21, 23; comp. Cephalaion, in Syncell. p. 167). Under him there were provisional satraps, called in Isa. x, 8, "princes," of the rank and power of ordinary kings (Diod. Sic. ii, 24). The great officers of the household were commonly eunuchs (comp. Gesenius on Isa. xxxvi, 2). The religion of the Assyrians was, in its leading features, the same as that of the Chaldeans, viz. the symbolical worship of the heavenly bodies, especially the planets. In Scripture there is mention of Nisroch (Isa. xxxvii, 38), Adrammelech, Anammelech, Nibhaz, Tartak (2 Kings xvii, 31), as the names of idols worshipped by the natives either of Assyria Proper or of the adjacent countries which they had subdued, besides planets (see Gesenius, Zu Jesaias, ii, 347). The language did not belong to the Semitic, but to the Medo-Persian family. As Aramaic, however, was spoken by a large part of the Western population, it was probably understood by the great officers of state, which accounts for Rabshakeh addressing Hezekiah's messengers in Hebrew (2 Kings xviii, 26), although the rabbins explain the circumstance by supposing that he was an apostate Jew (but see Strabo xvi, 745).—Kitto, s. v.

(3.) Its Extent.—With regard to the extent of the Assyrian empire very exaggerated views have been entertained by many writers. Ctesias took Semiramis to India, and made the empire of Assyria at least co-extensive with that of Persia in his own day. This false notion has long been exploded, but even Niebuhr appears to have believed in the extension of Assyrian influence over Asia Minor, in the expedition of Memnon—whom he considered an Assyrian—to Troy, and in the derivation of the Lydian Heracles from the first dynasty of Ninevite monarchs (Alt. Geschicht, i, 28-9). The information derived from the native monuments tends to contract the empire within more reasonable bounds, and to give it only the expansion which is indicated for it in Scripture. On the west, the Mediterranean and the river Halys appear to have been the extreme boundaries, but the dominion beyond the confines of Syria and Asia Minor was not of a strict character; on the north, a fluctuating line, never reaching the Euxine, nor extending beyond the northern frontier of Armenia; on the east, the Caspian Sea and the Great Salt Desert; on the south, the Persian Gulf and the Desert of Arabia. The countries included within these utmost limits are the following: Susiana, Chaldea, Babylonia, Media, Matiene, Armenia, Assyria Proper, Mesopotamia, parts of Cappadocia and Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, and Idunæa. Cyprus was also for a while a dependency of the Assyrian kings, and they may perhaps have held at one time certain portions of Lower Egypt. Lydia, however, Phrygia, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pontus, Iberia, on the west and north, Bactria, Sacia, Parthia, India—even Carmania and Persia Proper—upon the east, were altogether beyond the limit of the Assyrian sway, and appear at no time even to have been overrun by the Assyrian armies.

(10.) Civilization of the Assyrians.—This, as has been already observed, was derived originally from the Babylonians. They were a Semitic race, originally resident in Babylonia (which at that time was Cushite), and thus acquainted with the Babylonian inventions and discoveries, who ascended the valley of the Tigris and established in the tract immediately below the Armenian mountains a separate and distinct nationality. Their modes of writing and building, the form and size of their bricks, their architectural ornamentation, their religion and worship, in a great measure, were drawn from Babylon, which they always regarded as a sacred land—the original seat of their nation, and the true home of all their gods, with the one exception of Asshur. Still, as their civilization developed, it became in many respects peculiar. Their art is of home growth. The alabaster quarries in their neighborhood supplied them with a material unknown to their southern neighbors, on which they could represent, far better than upon enamelled bricks, the scenes which interested them. Their artists, faithful and laborious, acquired a considerable power of rendering the human and animal forms, and made vivid and striking representations of the principal occupations of human life. If they do not greatly affect the ideal, and do not, in this branch, attain to any very exalted rank, yet even here their emblematic figures of the gods have a dignity and grandeur which is worthy of remark, and which implies the possession of some elevated feelings. But their chief glory is in the representation of the actual. Their pictures of war, and of the chase, and even sometimes of the more peaceful incidents of human life, have a fidelity, a spirit, a boldness, and an appearance of life, which place them high among realistic schools. Their art, it should be also noted, is progressive. Unlike that of the Egyptians, which continues comparatively stationary from the earliest to the latest times, it plainly advances, becoming continually more natural and less uncouth, more life-like and less stiff, more varied and less conventional. The latest sculptures, which are those in the hunting-palace of the son of Esarhaddon, are decidedly the best. Here the animal forms approach perfection, and in the striking attitudes, the new groupings, and the more careful and exact drawing of the whole, we see the beginnings of a taste and a power which might have expanded under favorable circumstances into the finished excellence of the Greeks. The advanced condition of the Assyrians in various other respects is abundantly evidenced alike by the representations on the sculptures and by the remains discovered among their buildings. They are found to have understood and applied the arch; to have made tunnels, aqueducts, and drains; to have used the lever and the roller; to have engraved gems; to have understood the arts of inlaying, enamelling, and overlaying with metals; to have manufactured glass, and been acquainted with the lens; to have possessed vases, jars, bronze and ivory ornaments, dishes, bells, ear-rings, mostly of good workmanship and elegant forms—in a word, to have attained to a very high pitch of material comfort and prosperity. They were still, however, in the most important points barbarians. Their government was rude and martial; their religion coarse and sensual; their conduct of war cruel; even their art materialistic and so debasing; they had served their purpose when they had prepared the East for centralized government, and been God's scourge to punish the people of Israel (Isa. x, 5-6); they were, therefore, swept away to allow the rise of that Arian race which, with less appreciation of art, was to introduce into Western Asia a more spiritual form of religion, a better treatment of captives, and a superior government.—Smith, s. v.

As'taroth (Deut. i, 14). See ASHTAROTH.

Astarte (Ἀστάρτη), the Greek form of the Heb. ASITORETH or ASHERAH (q. v.), Græcized also As-troirêchê (Ἀστροίρηχῆ, Herodian, v, 6, 10), the chief Syrian deity (Lucian, De dia Syr. 4), being the goddess of the Sidonians (1 Kings xi, 5, 33), also introduced (from the Tyrians, see Josephus, Apion, i, 18) among the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 10), and worshipped by the apostate Israelites (2 Kings xxiii, 4; Mic. v, 13). She was likewise adored by the Phœnician colony at Carthage (Augustine, Quest. in Jud. xvi; comp. Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 270 sq.), among whom her name appears as a component of common appellations of individuals (Gesenius, in the Hall. Encycl. xxi, 98; comp. Abdastartus [i. e. "servant of Astarte"], in Josephus, Apion, i, 17). She was also worshipped in Thrygia and at Hierapolis (Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 61). She is usually named in connection with Baal (Judg. ii, 13; iii, 7; x, 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4; xii, 10; 1 Kings xviii, 19; 2 Kings xxiii, 24, etc.), and corresponds to the female (generative) principle, otherwise called Tautis (Ταυτίς, worshipped especially at Byblus, see Philo, in Euseb. Præp. Evang. i, 10), the chief goddess of the Phœnicians and Syrians ("Astarte the Great," Samochiath, Frag. ed. Orelli, p. 34), and probably the same with the "queen of heaven" (Jer. vii, 18; xlv, 17; comp. 2 Kings xxiii, 4). Many (Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 65 sq.) identify her with Atergatis (q. v.) or D. recto (comp. Herod. i, 105); but this latter, as a fish-goddess, hardly agrees with the description of Ashtoreth (q. v.) by Samochiath (Frag. ed. Orelli, p. 34; and in Euseb. Præp. Ev. i, 10), nor does Astarte appear in this form on coins (see Montfaucon, Antiq. expliq. II, ii, 38-6; Eckhel, Doctr. Numor. I, iii, 369 sq.; comp. 372; Gesenius, in the Hall. Encycl. xxi, 99). The Greeks and Romans, according to their usual method in treating foreign divinities, compare her to Venus, i. e. Urania (comp. Cic. Nat. Deor. iii, Antique Gem of Astarte, found by Dr. Wilson at Damascus (Lands of Bible, ii, 759).

23; Euseb. Præp. Er. i, 10; Theodoret, iii, 50; Nonni Dionys. iii, 110; sometimes with Juno (Augustine, Quest. in Jud. xvi; comp. Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 270); and sometimes with Luna (Lucian, De dea Syria, 4; comp. Herodian, v, 6, 10). She also appears as the Mylitta of the Babylonians (Herod. i, 131, 199), the Alytta of the Arabians and Armenians (of Anaitis, Strabo, xv, 806), a general representation of the goddess of love and fruitfulness (Herod. i, 144; Baruch vi, 43; Euseb. Vit. Constant. iii, 55; Val. Max. ii, 6, 15; comp. 2 Kings xxiii, 7; see Creuzer, Symbolik. ii, 23 sq.). Some also find traces of the name in the Persian and Syriac terms of the Sabian religious books (Nordberg, Onom. p. 20 sq.). Under the form Asherah (אֲשֵׁרָה) it appears to designate the goddess of good fortune (from אֲשֵׁר, to be happy). See MENT. (See generally Selden, De diis Syris, ii, 2; Gruber, in the *Hall. As'tath (אַסְתָּח, Vulg. Ezead), one of the heads of Israelitish families, whose members (to the number of 120) returned (with Johannes, the son of Acatau) in the party of Ezra from Babylon (1 Esdr. viii, 38); evidently the AZGAD (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra viii, 12).

Asterius. There were several ancient writers of this name.

1. A Cappadocian, converted from paganism to Christianity, who became an Arian. He flourished after the Nicene Council, about the year 330, when he published his celebrated Syntagma, or Syntagmaticon, which is repeatedly mentioned by Athanasius, in which he openly declares that there is in God another wisdom than Christ, which was the creator of Christ himself and of the world. Nor would he allow that Christ was the virtue of God in any other sense than that in which Moses called the locusts "a virtue of God." Athanasius quotes from this work in his Ep. de Synod. Arimin. et Selic. p. 684, and elsewhere.—Baronius, Annales, 370; Lardner, Works, iii, 587 sq.

2. Bishop of Petra, in Arabia. He was originally an Arian, and accompanied the Arian bishops to the Council of Sardica in 347; but when there he renounced Arianism. Hence he suffered, and was banished into Upper Libya. In 362 he attended the council held by Athanasius at Alexandria, and was deputed to endeavor to restore union to the Church of Antioch.

3. Archbishop of Amasea; flourished about 401. Eleven sermons and homilies of his are given in Combes. Bibl. Patr. Appendix, 1648.

Astorga, a town and diocese of Spain. In 446 a council was held in the town of Astorga on account of the Priscillianists.

Astrologer (Heb. and Chald. אֲשֵׁרָה, ashshaph', an enchanter, Dan. i, 20; ii, 2, 10, 27; iv, 7; v, 7, 11, 15; once Heb. אֲשֵׁרָה לְבַרְבֵּר, hober' shama' yin, sky-divider, i. e. former of horoscopes; Sept. ἀστρολόγος τοῦ οὐρανοῦ; Vulg. angur calli, Isa. xlviii, 13), a person who professes to divine future events by the appearance of the stars. See ASTROLOGY. The Babylonians were anciently famous for this kind of lore (Rawlinson's Herodotus, i, Essay x; Simplicius ad Aristot. De Celo, ii, 123; Pliny, Hist. Nat. vii, 56; Vitruv. ix, 9). See ASTRONOMY.

Astrology (ἀστρολογία, science of the stars), a pretended science, which was said to discover future events by means of the stars. Astrology (according to the old distinction) was of two kinds, natural and judicial. The former predicted certain natural effects which appear to depend upon the influence of the stars, such as winds, rain, storms, etc. By the latter, it was pretended, could be predicted events which were dependent upon the human will, as particular actions, peace, war, etc. Astrology accords well with the pre-sterian doctrines of Mohammedanism, and was accordingly cultivated with great ardor by the Arabs from the seventh to the thirteenth century. Some of the early Christian fathers argued against the doctrines of astrology; others received them in a modified form.

In its public capacity the Roman Church several times condemned the system, but many zealous churchmen cultivated it. Cardinal D'Ailly, "the eagle of the doctors of France" (died 1420), is said to have calculated the horoscope of Jesus Christ, and maintained that the Deluge might have been predicted by astrology. Regiomontanus, the famous mathematician Cardan, even Tycho Brahé and Kepler could not shake off the fascination. Kepler saw the weakness of astrology as a science, but could not bring himself to deny a certain connection between the positions ("constellations") of the planets and the qualities of those born under them. The Copernican system gave the death-blow to astrology. Belief in astrology is not now ostensibly professed in any Christian country, though a few solitary advocates have from time to time appeared, as J. M. Pfaff in Germany, Astrologie (Nürnberg, 1816). But it still holds sway in the East, and among Mohammedans wherever situated. Even in Europe the craving of the ignorant of all countries for divination is still gratified by the publication of multitudes of almanacs containing astrological predictions, though the writers no longer believe in them.

Many passages of our old writers are unintelligible without some knowledge of astrological terms. In the technical rules by which human destiny was foreseen, the heavenly houses played an important part. Astrologers were by no means at one as to the way of laying out those houses. A very general way was to draw great circles through the north and south points of the horizon as meridians pass through the poles, dividing the heavens, visible and invisible, into twelve equal parts—six above the horizon, and six below. These were the twelve houses, and were numbered onward, beginning with that which lay in the east immediately below the horizon. The first was called the house of life; the second, of fortune, or riches; the third, of brethren; the fourth, of relations; the fifth, of children; the sixth, of health; the seventh, of marriage; the eighth, of death, or the upper portal; the ninth, of religion; the tenth, of dignities; the eleventh, of friends and benefactors; the twelfth, of enemies, or of captivity. The position of the twelve houses for a given time and place—the instant of an individual's birth, for instance, was a theme. To construct such a plan was to cast the person's nativity. The houses had different powers, the strongest being the first; as it contained the part of the heavens about to rise, it was called the ascendant, and the point of the ecliptic cut by its upper boundary was the horoscope. Each house had one of the heavenly bodies as its lord, who was strongest in his own house. See ASTRONOMY.

Astronomy (ἀστρονομία, the laws of the stars), a science which appears to have grown out of astrology (q. v.). The cradle of astronomy is to be found in Asia. Pliny, in his celebrated enumeration (Hist. Nat. vii, 57) of the inventors of the arts, sciences, and conveniences of life, ascribes the discovery of astronomy to Phœnician mariners, and in the same chapter he speaks of astronomical observations found on burnt bricks (coctilibus latecebis) among the Babylonians, which ascend to above 2200 years before his time. Alexander sent to Aristotle from Babylon a series of astronomical observations, extending through 1900 years. The astronomical knowledge of the Chinese and Indians goes up to a still earlier period (Plin. Hist. Nat. vi, 17-21). From the remote East astronomy travelled in a westerly direction. The Egyptians at a very early period had some acquaintance with it. To them is to be ascribed a pretty near determination of the length of the year, as consisting of 365 days (Herodotus, ii, 4). The Egyptians were the teachers of the Greeks. Some portion of the knowledge which prevailed on the subject would no doubt penetrate to and become the inheritance of the Hebrews, who do not, however, appear to have possessed any views of astronomy which raised their knowledge to the rank of a science, or made it approach to a more correct theory of the mechanism of the heavens than that which was generally held. A peculiarity of the greatest importance belongs to the knowledge which the Israelites display of the heavens, namely, that it is thoroughly imbued with a religious character; nor is it possible to find in any other writings, even at this day, so much pure and elevated piety, in connection with observations on the starry firmament, as may be gathered even in single books of the Bible (Amos v, 8; Psalms xix). This was no doubt owing in part to the fact that the practice of astrology was interdicted to the Hebrews (Deut. xviii, 10). As early as the time of the composition of perhaps the oldest book in the Bible, namely, that of Job, the constellations were distinguished one from another, and designated by peculiar and appropriate names (Job ix, 9; xxxviii, 31). In the Bible are found, (1) Heh'el (הַעֵל) "the morning star," the planet Venus (Isa. xlv, 12; Rev. ii, 28); (2) Kimah' (כִּמְהַב) "Lucifer," "Pleiades," "the seven stars" (Job ix, 9; xxxviii, 31; Amos v, 8), the Pleiades; (3) Kesil' (כְּסִיל) "Orion," a large and brilliant constellation, which stands in a line with the Pleiades. The Orientals seem to have conceived of Orion as a huge giant who had warred against God, and as bound in chains to the firmament of heaven (Job xxxviii, 31); and it has been conjectured that this notion is the foundation of the history of Nimrod (Gesen. Comment. zu Isaiah, i, 457). (4) Ish (אִש) (Job ix, 9), "Arcturus," the Great Bear, which has still the same name among the Arabians (Niebuhr, p. 113). See Job xxxviii, 32, where the sons of Arcturus are the three stars in the tail of the Bear, which stand in a curved line to the left. (5) Nachash' (נָחָשׁ) (Job xxvi, 13, "the crooked serpent"), Draco, between the Great and the Little Bear; a constellation which spreads itself in windings across the heavens. (6) Dioskouri, Διόσκουρι (Acts xxviii, 11, "Castor and Pollux"), Gemini, or the Twins, on the belt of the Zodiac, which is mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 5, under the general name of "the planets" (מַזְלָאֵנוּ), Mazz loth', a word which signifies dwellings, stations in which the sun tarries in his apparent course through the heavens; and also by the kindred term "MAZZA-KOTH" (מַזְלָאֵנוּ, Job xxxviii, 32). (Compare Gen. xxxvii, 9.) The entire body of the stars was called "the host of heaven" (Isa. xl, 26; Jer. xxxiii, 22). (See each of the words here enumerated in its alphabetical order.) No trace is found in the Old Testament of a division of the heavenly bodies into planets, fixed stars, and comets; but in Jer. 13, the phrase "wandering stars" (ἀστὲρ ἀναγύζων) is employed figuratively. After the Babylonish exile, the Jews were compelled, even for the sake of their calendar, to attend at least to the course of the moon, which became an object of study, and delineations were made of the shapes that she assumes (Mishna, Rosh H. Sh. h. ii, 8; Mitchell, Astron. of Bible, N. Y., 1863). See YEAR. At an early period of the world the worship of the stars arose from that contemplation of them which in every part of the globe, and particularly in the East, has been found a source of deep and tranquil pleasure. See ADORATION. "Men by nature" "deemed either fire or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven to be the gods which govern the world;" "with whose beauty being delighted, they took them to be gods" (Wisdom xiii, 2). Accordingly, the religion of the Egyptians, of the Chaldees, Assyrians, and the ancient Arabians, was nothing else than star-worship, although in the case of the first its origin is more thickly veiled. The sun, moon, and seven planets (those, that is, of the fixed stars which shine with especial brightness) excited most attention, and won the greatest observance. We thus find, among the Babylonians, Jupiter (Belus, Gad, 𐎠𐎫, Isa. lxx, 11), Venus (𐎠𐎲𐎠, Meni', Isa. lxx, 11, where the first is rendered in the common version "that troop," the second, "that number"). Both these were considered good principles, the Heb. words both signifying fortune, i. e. good luck. Mercury, honored as the secretary of heaven, is also found in Isa. xlvi, 1, "NEBO (𐎠𐎩) stoopeth;" Saturn (𐎠𐎲𐎠, Kig'm), "Chim," Amos v, 26; Mars (𐎠𐎲𐎠, "NEUGAL," 2 Kings xvii, 30); the last two were worshipped as principles of evil. The character of this worship was formed from the notions which were entertained of the good or ill which certain stars occasioned. Astrology found its sphere principally in stars connected with the birth of individuals. Thus Herodotus (ii, 82) states that among the Egyptians every day was under the influence of some god (some star), and that according to the day on which each person was born, so would be the events he would meet with, the character he would bear, and the period of his death. Astrology concerned itself also with the determination of lucky and unlucky days; so in Job iii, 3, "Let the day perish wherein I was born;" and Gal. iv, 10, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years." The Chaldeans, who studied the stars at a very early period, were much given to astrology, and were celebrated for their skill in that pretended science (Isa. xlvii, 13). (See further on this general subject, Hammer, Ueber die Sternbilder der Araber; Ideler, Untersuchungen üb. d. Sternnamen, Berl. 1809; also Ueb. die Astron. der Alten, Berl. 1806; Weidler, Hist. Astronom. Viteb. 1714; Neumann, Astrognostische Beobachtungen im A. T. Bresl. 1819.)—Kitto, s. v. Astruc, JEAN, an eminent French physician, was born at Sauve, in Lanuodoc, March 19, 1684. His father was a Protestant minister, who, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, became a Roman Catholic. The son studied in the University of Montpellier, and became M. D. in 1703. In 1710 he was made professor of anatomy and medicine in Toulouse; and he was called to Montpellier in 1715, where he remained until 1728. In 1731 he was appointed professor of medicine in the College of France, and he remained in Paris until his death, May 5, 1766. In his profession Astruc was very eminent as teacher, practitioner, and writer; but he is entitled to a place here from a work published in 1753, entitled Conjectures sur les Mémoires originaires dont il parait que Moïse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse (Bruxelles and Paris, 1753, 12mo), in which he started for the first time the theory now so prevalent, that the fact that Moses compiled Genesis, in part at least, from pre-existing documents, is shown by the distinction in the use of the two names Elohim and Jehovah in the different parts of the book. The work is marked by great skill and acuteness, and opened a new era in the criticism of the Pentateuch. See GENESIS. In 1755 Astruc published a treatise Sur l'immortalité, l'immortalité, et la liberté de l'ame (Paris, 12mo).—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 487; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, Suppl. i, 103.

Astyāges (Ἀστυάγης, Diodorus Ἀστυάγας) was the son and successor of Cyaxares (Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.), and the last king of the Medes, B.C. 585-560 or B.C. 592-558, who was conquered by Cyrus (Bel and Dragon 1). The name is identified by Rawlinson and Niebuhr (Gesch. Assur's, p. 32) with Deioctes = Ashdahak (Arm.), Ajis Dahakā (Pers.), the biting snake, the emblem of the Median power. See DARIUS THE MEDE. According to Herodotus, he married the daughter of Abyaltes (i, 74), ascended the throne B.C. 585, and reigned thirty-five years (i, 130), with great severity (i, 123). The same historian states that his daughter was married to Cambyses, a Persian noble, but that, in consequence of a dream, the king caused her child (Cyrus) to be exposed by a herdsman, who, on the contrary, brought him up, till, on attaining manhood, he dethroned his grandfather (i, 107). The account of Ctesias (who calls him Aslygius, Ἀστυάγας) makes him to have been only the father-in-law of Cyrus, by whom he was conquered and deposed, but treated with respect, until at length treacherously left to perish by a royal eunuch (Ctes. Ap. Phot. cod. 72, p. 36, ed. Bekker). Xenophon, like Herodotus, makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyaxares II, on whose death Cyrus succeeded to the vacant throne (Cyrop. i, 5, 2). This account tallies better with the notices in the Book of Daniel (v, 31; vi, 1; ix, 1) and Josephus (Ant. x, 11, 4), where "Darius (q. v.) the Mede" appears to be the same with this Cyaxares (q. v.). In that case Astyages will be identical with the "Ahasuerus" (q. v.) there named as the father of Darius. See CYRUS.

Asupp'im (Heb. Asuppim', אֲשׁוּפִים, collections; Sept. Ἀσούριμ v. r. Ἐσούριμ), a part of the Temple, to which two of the Levites of the family of Obed-edom were assigned as guards (1 Chron. xxvi, 15, 17). They were apparently the two northernmost gates in the western outer wall of the Temple, the space between them being inclosed for store-chambers, by the name of the "house of Asupp'im" (see Strong's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, Appendix ii, p. 30). In the reference to the same building, as restored after the captivity (Neh. xii, 25), the term is falsely rendered "thresholds" (אֲשׁוּפִים אֲשׁוּפִים, in the store-houses of the gates, Sept. πυλοῖσι φυλακῆς). See TEMPLE.

Asylum (אֲשׁוּפִים, miklat', φυλακίον, "refuge"), a place of safety, where it is not permitted to offer violence to, or touch any person, even though a criminal.

I. Such a purpose was served (see Mishna, Maccoth, ii, 1-3; comp. Philo, De profugis, in his Opp. i, 546 sq.) for the unpremeditated murderer, in accordance with an ancient usage, by the altar (in the Tabernacle and Temple, Exod. xxi, 14; 1 Kings i, 50), the horns of which were seized by the refugee. See ALTAR. Under the Law there were instituted, in order to rescue such manslaughterers from the (doubtless very barbarous) blood-revenge (Num. xxxv, 6 sq.; Deut. iv, 41 sq.; xix, 3 sq.; comp. Exod. xxi, 13; Josephus, Ant. iv, 7, 4), six free cities (אֲשׁוּפִים אֲשׁוּפִים, Sept. πόλις φυλακίονων, πόλις καταφυγῆς, Vulg. urbes fugitivorum, Auth. Vers. "cities of refuge"), which lay in different parts of the entire country, and were some of them sacerdotal, others Levitical cities, namely, west of the Jordan, Bezer, Ramoth-Gilead, and Golan; west of the Jordan, Kedesh, Shechem, and (Hebron) Kirjath-Arba (Josh. xx, 7, 8). Here the fugitive, after having undergone a strict investigation to prove that he had not committed the slaughter intentionally, was obliged to remain until the death of the then incumbent of the high-priesthood (comp. the similar exile according to the Athenian statutes, Heffer, Athen. Grichsverf. p. 136); if he quitted the city earlier, the blood-avenger might kill him with impunity (Num. xxxv, 24 sq.). The roads to the cities of refuge were to be kept in good order (Deut. xix, 3; for other particulars, see Maccoth, ii, 5; Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 66; on the boundaries of these cities, see the Mishna, Maaser, iii, 10). Wilful murderers (Num. xxxv, 12; comp. Mishna, Maccoth, ii, 6) were to be put to death, after a legal investigation, even if they had escaped to a city of refuge. See generally Michaelis, Mos. Recht, ii, 434 sq.; Moebii Disputat. theol. p. 105 sq.; Wichmannshausen, De Præsidariis Levitarum urbibus (Viteb. 1715); Reis, De urbibus refugii V. T. eorumque fructu (Marburg, 1753); Oslander, De asylio Hebr. (Tubing. 1672, also in Ugolini Thesaur. xxxi). The reason for assigning the Levitical cities for this purpose was probably in part from their connection with the sacredness of Jehovah, and partly because the Levites, as guardians of the Law, were present to decide concerning the murder as to whether it was intentional or not (see Carpzov, Appar. p. 340). It is not easy to explain the connection of the expiration of the blood-revenge with the death of the high-priest, except that this was regarded as beginning a fresh era (Tabula nova). Bähr (Symbol. ii, 52), following Maimonides (Mora Nerocchim), advances the not improbable supposition that the high-priest was so eminently the head of the theocracy, and representative of the whole nation, that upon his demise every other death should be forgotten, or, at least, mortal enmities buried (for allegorical significations, see Philo, De profugis, i, 466). See BLOOD-REVENGE.

II. Grecian and Roman antiquity likewise affords mention of the right of asylum (Serv. ad En. viii, 341), not only at altars, and temples, and sacred places (Herod. ii, 113; Eurip. Hee. 149; P. usan. ii, 5, 6; iii, 5, 6; Dio Cass. xlvii, 14; Strabo, v, 230; Tacit. Annal. iii, 60, 1; Flor. ii, 12), but also in cities and their vicinity (Polyb. vi, 14, 8; comp. Potter, Greek Ant. i, 48; see Cramer, De ara arcer. templi s. c. p. 16 sq.; Donglat Anal. i, 102 sq.), for insolvent debtors (Plutarch, De vitando are c. 3), for slaves who had fled from the severity of their masters (comp. Philo, Opp. ii, 468), also for murderers. An especially famous city of exemption was Daphne, near Antioch (2 Macc. iv, 33), as also the temple of Diana at Ephesus (Strabo, xiv, 641; Apollon. Ephes. Ep. 65). But as the abuse of the privileges of asylum often interfered with criminal jurisprudence, it was circumscribed by Tiberius throughout the Roman empire (Suet. Tib. 37; comp. Ernesti Excurs. in loc.). On the immunities referred to in Acts xvi, 12, see COLONY. (On cities of refuge in Abyssinia, see Ruppell, ii, 71.)—Winer, i, 379. See CITY OF REFUGE.

III. The privilege of asylum was retained in the Christian Church, probably in imitation of the cities of refuge, under the old dispensation. All criminals who fled to such asylums were held to be safe, and any person violating an asylum was punished with excommunication. All Christian churches, in the early ages, possessed this privilege of affording protection or asylum. It was introduced by Constantine, and first regulated by law under the emperors Theodosius the Great, Arcadius, Honorius, Theodosius, and Justinian. The multiplication of these privileged places soon became exceedingly inconvenient, and it was found necessary, from time to time, to circumscribe the ecclesiastical right of asylum by various limitations. Bishops and councils became jealous of the interference of the civil power in this matter: they contended strongly for the right of sanctuary, and continued to uphold it to an injurious and demoralizing extent. The privilege was extended by the councils of Orange, A. D. 441; of Orleans, 511; of Arles, 541; of Maçon, 586; of Rheims, 630; of Toledo, 681. It was recognised and confirmed by Charlemagne and his successors. The practice long prevailed in popish countries; but the evils at length became so enormous, that even popes and councils were obliged to set limits to the privilege. The custom has now become extinct, or has been greatly reformed.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii. ch. xi.

IV. The laws of King Alfred recognised the right of asylum in England. It was not till the year 1487, in the reign of Henry VII. that by a bull of Pope Innocent VIII it was declared that, if thieves, robbers, and murderers, having taken refuge in sanctuaries, should sally out and commit fresh offences, and then return to their place of shelter, they might be taken out by the king's officers. It was only by an act of Parliament, passed in 1534, after the Reformation, that persons accused of treason were debarred of the privilege of sanctuary. After the complete establishment of the Reformation, however, in the reign of Elizabeth, neither the churches nor sanctuaries of any other description were allowed to become places of refuge for either murderers or other criminals. But various buildings and precincts in and near London continued for a long time after this to afford shelter to debtors. At length, in 1637, all such sanctuaries, or pretended sanctuaries, were finally suppressed by the act 8 and 9 William III, chap. 26.—Penny Cyclop. s. v.

Asyn'critus (Ἀσινκρίτους, not to be compared), the name of a Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. xvi, 14), A. D. 53. The Greek Church held that he was a bishop of Hyrcania, and observe his festival April 8.

A'tad (Heb. אַתָּד, תָּדָס, a thorn; Sept. Ἀτάδ), the person (B. C. 1856 or ante) on whose three-bing-floor the sons of Jacob and the Egyptians who accompanied them performed their final act of solemn mourning for Jacob (Gen. i, 10, 11); on which account the place was afterward called ABEL-MIZRAIM (q. v.), "the mourning of the Egyptians." Schwarz (Palst. p. 79) causes unnecessary difficulty by placing it east of the Jordan; whereas the expression "beyond Jordan" is to be understood with reference to a foreign approach from the east. According to Jerome (Onom. s. v. Arca-atad), it was in his day called Bethgla or Bethacka (Beth-Hogla), a name which he connects with the gyratory dances or races of the funeral ceremony: "locus gyri; eo quod ibi more plangentium circumferunt." Beth-Hoglah is known to have lain between the Jordan and Jericho, therefore on the west side of Jordan [see BETH-HOGLAH]; and with this agrees the fact of the mention of the Canaanites, "the inhabitants of the land," who were confined to the west side of the river (see, among others, verse 13 of this chapter), and one of whose special haunts was the sunken district "by the 'side' of Jordan" (Num. xiii, 29). See CANAAN. The word "תָּדָס," "beyond," although usually signifying the east of Jordan, is yet used for either east or west, according to the position of the speaker. So Jerome quotes "trans Jordanem;" but Dr. Thomson, rejecting this authority, supposes Abel-mizraim to have been located near Hebron (Land and Book, ii, 385). Atad, as a name, is possibly only an appellative descriptive of a "thorny" locality (תָּדָס תָּדָס "the floor [or trodden space] of the thorn"). See JACOB.

At'arah (Heb. אַתְּרָה, תָּרָה, a crown; Sept. Ἐτίρα v. r. Ἀράρα), the second wife of Jerahmeel, of the tribe of Judah, and mother of Onam (1 Chron. ii, 26). B. C. ante 1658.

Atar'gatis (Ἀταργάτις, Strab. xvi, p. 785 [Ἀταργάτιον ἐστὶ τὴν Ἀθίραν. . . . οἱ Ἕλληνας ἰκάλουσι] v. r. Ἀτιογάτις, also Ἀτεργάτις) is the name of a Syrian goddess whose temple (Ἀταργάτιον v. r. Ἀτεργάτιον) is mentioned in 2 Macc. xii, 26. It was destroyed by Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. v, 43, 44), from which passage it appears to have been situated at Ashteroth-Karnaim. Her worship also flourished at Mabug (i. e. Bambyce, afterward called Hierapolis), according to Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 19), who also states that Atergatis is the same divinity as Derecto, Δακέρω (Diod. Sic. vii, 4), or Derecto (Ovid, Met. iv, 45). Besides internal evidences of identity (see Kreuzer, Synbol. ii, 76 sq.), Strabo incidentally cites Ctesias to that effect (xvi, p. 113). Derecto was worshipped in Phœnicia and at Ascalon (where fountains containing sacred fish are still kept—Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 330) under the form of a woman with a fish's tail, or with a woman's face only and the entire body of a fish (Athen. viii, 346). Fishes were sacred to her, and the inhabitants abstained from eating them in honor of her (Lucian, De Dea Syria, xiv). Farther, by combining Diocorus (ii, 4) with Herodotus (i, 105), we may legitimately conclude that the Derecto of the former is the Venus (Aphrodite) Urania of the latter. Lucian compared her with Here, though he allowed that she combined traits of other deities (Aphrodite, Rhea, Selene, etc.). Plutarch (Cruis. 17) says that some regarded her as "Aphrodite, others as Here, others as the cause and natural power which provides the principles and seeds for all things from moisture." This last view is probal by an accurate description of the attributes of the goddess, and explains her fishlike form and popular identification with Aphrodite. Lucian also mentions a ceremony in her worship at Hierapolis which appears to be connected with the same belief, and with the origin of her name. Twice a year water was brought from distant places and poured into a chasm in the temple; because, he adds, according to tradition, the waters of the Deluge were drained away through that opening (De Syria dea, p. 883). Compare Burns, ad Ovid, Met. iv, 45, where most of the references are given at length; Movers, Phœnic. i, 584 sq. Atergatis is thus a name under which they worshipped some modification of the same power which was adored under that of Astarte (q. v.). That the Ἀτεργάτιον of 2 Macc. xii, 26, was at Ashteroth-Karnaim, shows also an immediate connection with Asheroth (q. v.). Whether, like the latter, she bore any particular relation to the moon or to the planet Venus, is not evident. Macrobius (Sat. i, 23, p. 322, Bip. ed.) makes Atargatis to be the earth (which, as a symbol, is analogous to the moon), and says that her image was distinguished from that of the sun by the direction of the rays around it (but see Swinton, in the Philosoph. Transactions, lxi, pt. 1, p. 245 sq.). Kreuzer maintains that those representations of this goddess which contain parts of a fish are the most ancient, and endeavors to reconcile Strabo's statement that the Syrian goddess of Hierapolis was Atergatis, with Lucian's express notice that the former was represented under the form of an entire woman, by distinguishing between the forms of different periods (Symbolik, ii, 68). This fish form shows that Atergatis bears soph. Transactions, LXI, ii, 345 sq.).

No satisfactory etymology of the word has been discovered. That which assumes that Atergatis is אֲתָרֹתִים atâr' d'ig, i. e. magnificent fish, which has often been adopted from the time of Seklen down to the present day, cannot be taken exactly in that sense. The syntax of the language requires, as Michaelis has already objected to this etymology (Orient. Biblioth. vi, 97), that an adjective placed before its subject in this manner must be the predicate of a proposition. The words, therefore, would mean "the fish is magnificent" (Ewald's Hebr. Gram. § 554). Michaelis himself, as he found that the Syriac name of some idol of Ilaran was אֲתָרֹתִים, which might mean aperture (see Assemani, Bibl. Or. i, 327 sq.), asserts that that is the Syriac form of Derceto, and brings it into connection with the great fissure in the earth mentioned in Lucian (ut sup. xiii) which swallowed up the waters of the Flood (see his edition of Castell's Lex. Syr. p. 975). On the other hand, Gesenius (Thesaur. sub voce אֲתָרֹתִים) prefers considering Derceto to be the Syriac דַּרְעֵתָא דִּרְגִישָׁא, fish; and it is certain that such an intrusion of the Resh is not uncommon in Aramaic. (For other etymological derivations, see Alphen, Diss. de terra Chadrach, c. 5.) It has been supposed that Ataroth was the tutelary goddess of the first Assyrian dynasty (Dercetade, fr. Derceto; Niebuhr, Gesch. Assur's, p. 131, 138), and that the name appears in Tiglath- or Tilgath-Pileser (ibid. p. 37).

At'aroth (Heb. Ataroth', אֲתָרֹתִים, crowns; Sept. Ἀταρόθ), the name of several places in Palestine.

1. A city east of Jordan, not far from Gilead, and in the vicinity of Dibon, Jazer, and Aroer, in a fertile grazing district (Num. xxxiii, 3), rebuilt by the Gadites (ver. 34), although it must have lain within the tribe of Reuben, probably on the slope of the hill still retaining the name Attarus (Burckhardt, ii, 630), where there is a river having the same name (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 220).

2. A city on the border of Ephraim and Benjamin, between Janohah and Naaroth, toward Jericho (Josh. xvi, 7), and also between Archi and Japhleti (ver. 2). Professor Robinson discovered a place by the name of Atara, perhaps identical with this, now a large village on the summit of a hill, about six miles N. by W. of Bethel (Researches, iii, 80). The ruins of another place by the same name, nearer Jerusalem on the north, have also been noticed (ibid. iii, Appendix, p. 122), situated at both ends of a defile, leading into the Wady Atara, which extends a distance of 2000 yards, about half way between Beeroth and Mizpah (De Saulcy, i, 101; ii, 257). This locality agrees better with the Ataroth of Ephraim than the other (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 146). The Ataroth (Ἀταρόθ) of Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) lay four miles north of Samaria. This Ataroth is also called "ATAROTH-ADAR" or "ATAROTH-ADAR" (Heb. Atroth' Adlar', אֲתָרֹתִים אֲדָרִים, crowns of Adlar [greatness]; Sept. Ἀταρόθ Ἀδάρ and Ἀζάρ) in Josh. xvi, 5; xviii, 13; where, as well as above, it is located between Bethel and Beth-horon (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 124).

3. "ATAROTH [OF] THE HOUSE OF JOAB" (Heb. Atroth-Yoab, אֲתָרֹתִים יוֹאָב, crowns of the house of Joab; Sept. Ἀταρόθ οἴκου Ἰωάβ) v. r. Ἰωάβ), a city (nominally) in the tribe of Judah, founded by the descendants of Salma (1 Chron. ii, 54). Schwarz (Palest. p. 143) identifies it with Latram (for el-Atron), on the road from Jerusalem to Jaffa, west of Saris, which (although slightly beyond the ancient bounds of Judah) appears plausible, as the well Ayub in the immediate vicinity may be a relic of the epithet here applied distinctively to this place.

4. ATAROTH-SHOPHAN (Heb. Atroth' Shophan', אֲתָרֹתִים שׁוֹפָן, crowns of Shophan [hid'ug]; Sept. merely Σοφάν), another city (nominally) of the tribe of Gad, mentioned in connection with No. 1 (Num. xxxii, 35). The English version overlooks the distinction evidently intended by the suffixed word, translating "Atroth, Shophan," as if two places were thus denoted. The associated names would appear to indicate a locality not far from the border between Gad and Reuben (probably, however, within the latter), perhaps at the head of Wady Eshteh, near Morj-Ekkh (Robinson's Map), as the place was famous for pasturage.

At'aroth-A'dar, At'aroth-Ad'dar. See ATAROTH.

Atbach (אֲתַבַּח) is not a real word, but a factitious cabalistic term denoting by its very letters the mode of changing one word into another by a peculiar commutation of letters. The system on which it is founded is this: as all the letters have a numerical value, they are divided into three classes, in the first of which every pair makes the number ten; in the second, a hundred; and in the third, a thousand. Thus:

דָּ, וּ, טָ, יָ, every pair making ten.
 חָ, טָ, יָ, every pair making a hundred.
 קָ, רָ, שָׁ, every pair making a thousand.

Three letters only cannot enter into any of these numerical combinations, הָ, לָ, and נָ. The first two are nevertheless coupled together; and the last is suffered to stand without commutation. The commutation then takes place between the two letters of every pair; and the term Atbach thus expresses that N is taken for ו, and ו for ט, and conversely. To illustrate its application, the obscure word מִנְיָן in Prov. xxix, 21, may be turned by Atbach into מִנְיָן, testimony (Buxtorf, De Abbreviaturis, s. v.).

ATBASH (אֲתַבַּשׁ) is a similar term for a somewhat different principle of commutation. In this, namely, the letters are also mutually interchanged by pairs; but every pair consists of a letter from each end of the alphabet, in regular succession. Thus, as the technical term Athbash shows, S and T, and ו and ז, are interchangeable; and so on throughout the whole series. By writing the Hebrew alphabet twice in two parallel lines, but the second time in an inverse order, the two letters which form every pair will come to stand in a perpendicular line. This system is also remarkable on account of Jerome having so confidently applied it to the word Sheshak, in Jer. xxv, 26. He then propounds the same system of commutation as that called Athbash (without giving it that name however, and without adducing any higher authority for assuming this mode of commutation than the fact that it was customary to learn the Greek alphabet first straight through, and then, by way of insuring accurate retention, to repeat it by taking a letter from each end alternately), and makes שֵׁשֶׁת to be the same as זָזָז. (See Rosenmüller's Scholien, ad loc.) Hottinger possessed an entire Pentateuch explained on the principle of Athbash (Thesaur. Philol. p. 450).

There is also another system of less note, called ALBAM (אֲלַבַּם), which is only a modification of the preceding; for in it the alphabet is divided into halves, and one portion placed over the other in the natural order, and the pairs are formed out of these letters which would then stand in a row together.—Kitto, s. v.

All these methods belong to that branch of the Cabala (q. v.) which is called אֲתַבַּח, commutation.

A'ter (Heb. Ater', אַתֶּר, shut up; Sept. Ἀτῆρ v. r. in Ezra ii. 42, Ἀτῆρ), the name of three men.

1. A descendant (?) of one Hezekiah (q. v.), whose family, to the number of 98, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21). B. C. ante 536.

2. The head of a family of Levitical "porters" to the Temple, that returned at the same time with the above (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). B. C. 536.

3. One of the chief Israelites that subscribed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). B. C. cir. 470.

Aterezai'as (Ἀτῆρ Ἐτεζαϊας), a mistake (1 Esdr. v. 15) for the phrase "ATER (q. v.) of Hezekiah" (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21). See HEZEKIAH.

A thach (Heb. Athak', אֶתַח, lodging; Sept. Ἀθήχ v. r. Ἀθήχ), one of the cities of Judah (l. e. Simeon) to which David sent a present of the spoils recovered from the Amalekites who had sacked Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 30). According to Schwarz (Palest. p. 113), it is marked by the modern valley Athaca, north of Jebel Madurah, on the edge of the Idumean deserts; given on Zimmermann's map as Hady Atchih, S. of Hebron, opposite the extremity of the Dead Sea, perhaps at the ruins (with water) marked as Abu Terafeh on Van de Veld's Map. Others regard the name as an error of transcription for Ether (Josh. xv. 42).

Athai'ah (Heb. Athayah', אֶתְיָאֵה, perhaps the same as Asai'ah; Sept. Ἀθαιά, a son of Uzziah of the tribe of Judah, who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Neh. xi. 4). B. C. 536. See UTHAI.

Athali'ah (Heb. Athalyah', אֶתְלִיָּהּ, 2 Kings xi. 1, 3, 13, 14; 1 Chron. viii. 26; 2 Chron. xxii. 12; Ezra viii. 17; in the prolonged form Athalya'hu, אֶתְלִיָּהּ הוּ, 2 Kings viii. 26; xi. 2, 20; 2 Chron. xxii. 2, 10, 11; xxiii. 12, 13, 21; xxiv. 7; afflicted by Jehovah), the name of two men and one woman.

1. (Sept. Ἀθολία, and so Josephus, Ant. ix. 7, 1.) The daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, doubtless by his idolatrous wife Jezebel. She is also called the daughter of Omri (2 Chron. xxii. 2), who was the father of Ahab; but by a comparison of texts it would appear that she is so called only as being his granddaughter. Athaliah became the wife of Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. This marriage may fairly be considered the act of the parents; and it is one of the few stains upon the character of the good Jehoshaphat that he was so ready, if not anxious, to connect himself with the idolatrous house of Ahab. Had he not married the heir of his crown to Athaliah, many evils and much bloodshed might have been spared to the royal family and to the kingdom. When Jehoram came to the throne, he, as might be expected, "walked in the ways of the house of Ahab," which the sacred writer obviously attributes to this marriage by adding, "for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife" (2 Chron. xxi. 6). Jehoram died (B. C. 884) of wounds received in a war with the Syrians into which his wife's counsel had led him, and was succeeded by his youngest son Ahaziah, who reigned but one year, and whose death arose from his being, by blood and by circumstances, involved in the doom of Ahab's house. See ABAZIAH. Before this Athaliah had acquired much influence in public affairs (comp. 1 Kings x. 1; Prov. xxi. 1), and had used that influence for evil; and when the tidings of her son's untimely death reached Jerusalem, she resolved to seat herself upon the throne of David at whatever cost (B. C. 883), availing herself probably of her position as king's mother [see ASA] to carry out her design. Most likely she exercised the royal functions during Ahaziah's absence at Jezreel (2 Kings ix), and resolved to retain her power, especially after seeing the danger to which she was exposed by the overthrow of the house of Omri, and of Baal-worship in Samaria. It was not unusual in those days for women in the East to attain a prominent position, their present degradation being the result of Mahommedanism. Miriam, Deborah, Abigail, are instances from the Bible, and Dido was not far removed from Athaliah, either in birthplace or date, if Carthage was founded B. C. 861 (Josephus, c. Apion. i. 18). In order to remove all rivals, Athaliah caused all the male branches of the royal family to be massacred (2 Kings xi. 1); and by thus shedding the blood of her own grandchildren, she undesignedly became the instrument of giving completion to the doom on her father's house, which Jehu had partially accomplished. From the slaughter of the royal house one infant named Joash, the youngest son of Ahaziah, was rescued by his aunt Jehoshela, daughter of Jehoram (probably by another wife than Athaliah), who had married Jehoada (2 Chron. xxii. 11), the high-priest (2 Chron. xxiv. 6). The child, under Jehoada's care, was concealed within the walls of the Temple, and there brought up so secretly that his existence was unsuspected by Athaliah. But in the seventh year (B. C. 877) of her bloodstained and evil reign, Jehoada thought it time to produce the lawful king to the people, trusting to their zeal for the worship of God, and loyalty to the house of David, which had been so strenuously called out by Asa and Jehoshaphat. After communicating his design to five "captains of hundreds," whose names are given in 2 Chron. xxiii. 1, and securing the co-operation of the Levites and chief men in the country-towns in case of necessity, he brought the young Joash into the Temple to receive the allegiance of the soldiers of the guard. It was customary on the Sabbath for a third part of them to do duty at the palace, while two thirds restrained the crowd of visitors and worshippers who thronged the Temple on that day, by occupying the gate of Sur (שַׁר, 1 Kings xi. 6, called of the foundation, שַׁר־יְסוּד, 2 Chron. xxiii. 5, which G-ræch, in loco, considers the right reading in Kings also), and the gate "behind the guard" (Vulg. porta que est post habitaculum scutoriarum), which seem to have been the N. and S. entrances into the Temple, according to Ewald's description of it (Geschichte, iii. 306-7). On the day fixed for the outbreak there was to be no change in the arrangement at the palace, lest Athaliah, who did not worship in the Temple, should form any suspicions from missing her usual guard, but the latter two thirds were to protect the king's person by forming a long and closely-serried line across the Temple, and killing any one who should approach within certain limits. They were also furnished with David's spears and shields, that the work of restoring his descendant might be associated with his own sacred weapons. When the guard had taken up their position, the young prince was anointed, crowned, and presented with the Testimony or Law, and Athaliah was first roused to a sense of her danger by the shouts and music which accompanied the inauguration of her grandson. She hurried into the Temple, but found Joash already standing "by a pillar," or more properly on it, i. e. on the tribunal or throne apparently raised on a massive column or cluster of columns, which the king occupied when he attended the service on solemn occasions. The phrase in the original is אֶת־יְסוּדֵי־הַיְסוּד, rendered ἐπὶ τοῦ στήθους by the Sept., and super tribunal in the Vulgate, while Gesenius gives for the substantive a stage or pulpit. (Comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 3, and Ezek. xlvi. 2.) She arrived, however, only to behold the young Joash standing as a crowned king by the pillar of inauguration, and acknowledged as sovereign by the acclamations of the assembled multitude. Her cries of "Treason!" failed to excite any movement in her favor, and Jehoada, the high-priest, who had organized this bold and successful attempt, without allowing time for pause, ordered the Levitical guards to remove her from the sacred precincts to instant death (2 Kings xi; 2 Chron. xxi. 6; xxii. 10-12; xxiii). The Tyrians afterward avenged her death (Joel ii). The only other recorded victim of this happy and almost bloodless revolution was Mattan, the priest of Baal. (On its plan, see De Wette, Beiträge, p. 95 sq.; Gramberg, Chron. p. 135 sq.; Keil, Chron. p. 361 sq.; Ewald, Geschichte, iii, 574 sq. The latter words of 2 Kings xi, 6, in our version, "that it be not broken down," are probably wrong; Ewald translates "according to custom;" Gesenius gives in his Lexicon "a keeping off.") In modern times the history of Athaliah has been illustrated by the music of Handl and of Mendelssohn, and the stately declamation of Racine.—Kitto; Smith.

2. (Sept. Ἰεροβόλιας v. r. Ἰεροβόλια.) One of the "sons" of Jerobam and chieftains of the tribe of Benjamin, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 27). B. C. apparently 536.

3. (Sept. Ἀθελία v. r. Ἀθελία.) The father of Jeshaiah, which latter was one of the "sons" of Elam that returned with seventy dependents from Babylon under Ezra (Ezra viii, 7). B. C. ante 459.

Athanasian Creed. See CREED (ATHANASIAN).

Athanasius, Patriarch of Alexandria, was born in that city about A. D. 296. The precise date is not known, nor have we any accurate knowledge of his family or of his earlier years. It is clear, however, that he was brought up and educated with a view to the Christian ministry by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and gave promise of his future eminence in early youth. When a young man, he became very intimate with the hermit Anthony (q. v.), whose life he afterward wrote. His intellect matured so early that before he was twenty-four he wrote the treatises Against the Greeks, and Concerning the Incarnation of the Word (of which see an account below). While only a deacon he was sent to the Council of Nice (A. D. 325), where he contributed largely to the decision against the Arians, and to the adoption of the Nicene Creed. See NICE, Council of. It was the great task of his whole after life to defend this creed against the Arians and other heretical sects. On the death of Alexander (A. D. 326), he was made bishop of Alexandria by the voice of the people as well as of the ecclesiastics. He discharged his duties with exemplary fidelity; but the Arians soon commenced a series of violent attacks upon him, which embittered all his remaining life. About 331, Arius, who had been banished after his condemnation by the Council of Nice, made a plausible confession of faith, and Constantine recalled him, directing that he should be received by the Alexandrian Church. But Athanasius firmly refused to admit him to communion, and exposed his pervariation. The Arians, upon this, exerted themselves to raise tumults at Alexandria, and to injure the character of Athanasius with the emperor. In 334 a synod of hostile bishops was called to meet at Caesarea. To this council Athanasius was summoned to defend himself against the charge of having murdered a certain Meletian bishop called Arsenius; but, knowing the enmity entertained by all the members of the council against him, he refused to attend. In the following year a more important council was convoked at Tyre, at which sixty Arian bishops were present, and many of the orthodox faith. No accusation was brought against the faith of Athanasius, but the old charge of the murder of Arsenius was renewed, and he was also accused of having violated the person of a virgin. The first accusation was most clearly refuted by the appearance of Arsenius himself before the synod; and the falsehood of the second as clearly proved by the woman (who was, in fact, a common prostitute, and who had never before seen the bishop) fixing, by mistake, upon another man, Timotheus, who stood near Athanasius, and declaring that it was he who had committed the sin. But Athanasius, seeing that his condemnation was resolved on by the majority, left the council. Athanasius was deposed, fifty bishops, however, protesting against the judgment. Athanasius went at once to the emperor, and laid his complaint before him, upon which, in 336, Constantine called the leaders of the opposing party before him, who, seeing that some new charge must be trumped up to support their conduct, declared that Athanasius had threatened that he would prevent the yearly export of corn from Alexandria to Constantinople; upon which the emperor exiled him to Treves. At the expiration of a year and six months, i. e. in June, 337, Constantine the Great being dead, Athanasius was restored to his see. In 340 Constantine the younger, who was the friend of Athanasius, was killed; and in 341 Athanasius was again deposed in a synod held at Antioch, and Gregory of Cappadocia was elected to succeed him. In the mean time Athanasius betook himself to Rome, where Pope Julius declared his innocence in a synod held in 342. At Rome or in the West he remained till the Synod of Sardica, in 347, had pronounced his acquittal of all the charges brought against him; after which the emperor Constantius, at the entreaty of his brother Constans, recalled him to his see (A. D. 349). In the very next year Constans was slain by Magnentius in Gaul, and in him Athanasius lost his protector. Constantius, now sole emperor, soon gathered the Arians around him, and the court determined to ruin Athanasius. New accusations were trumped up, and he was condemned by a council convened at Arles (353), and by another at Milan (355), and was a third time obliged to flee into the deserts of Thebais. His enemies pursued him even here, and set a price upon his head. In this situation Athanasius composed his most important writings to strengthen the faith of believers, and expose the falsehood of his enemies. He returned with the other bishops whom Julian the Apostate recalled from banishment, and in A. D. 362 held a council at Alexandria, where the belief of a consubstantial Trinity was openly professed. Julian soon became alarmed at the energy with which Athanasius opposed paganism, and banished him, even (according to Theodoret) threatening him with death. He escaped to the desert (A. D. 362). The accession of Jovian brought him back in 363; but Jovian died in 364, and Valens, being an Arian, compelled him to retire from his see (A. D. 367). He hid himself in his father's tomb at the gates of Alexandria for four months. At last Valens (according to one account, for fear of the people of Alexandria, who took arms in favor of Athanasius) recalled the heroic bishop, and he was permitted to sit down in quiet and govern his affectionate Church of Alexandria until his death, May 2, 373 (according to Baronius, 372). Of the forty-six years of his official life he spent twenty in banishment. Athanasius was perhaps the greatest man in the early church. "With the most daring courage and perseverance of purpose, he combined a discreet flexibility, which allowed him after defeats to wait for new contingencies, and prepare himself for fresh exertions. He was no less calm and considerate than determined; and while he shunned useless danger (see his 'Apology for his Flight'), he never admitted the slightest compromise of his doctrine, nor attempted to conciliate by concession even his imperial adversaries. 'In his life and conduct,' says Gregory of Nazianzus, 'he exhibited the model of episcopal government—in his doctrine, the rule of orthodoxy.' Again, the independent courage with which he resisted the will of successive emperors for forty-six years of alternate dignity and misfortune introduced a new feature into the history of Rome. An obstacle was at once raised against imperial tyranny; a limit was discovered which it could not pass over. Here was a refractory subject who could not be denounced as a rebel, nor destroyed by the naked exercise of arbitrary power; the weight of spiritual influence, in the skillful hand of Athanasius, was beginning to balance and mitigate the temporal despotism, and the artifices to which Constantius was compelled to resort, in order to gain a verdict from the councils of Arles and Milan, proved that his absolute power had already ceased to exist. Athanasius did not, indeed, like the Gregories, establish a system of ecclesiastical policy and power—that belonged to later ages and to another climate—but he exerted more extensive personal influence over his own age, for the advancement of the church, than any individual in any age, except perhaps Bernard. "In all his writings," says Photius, "he is clear in expression, concise, and simple; acute, profound, and very vehement in his disputations, with wonderful fertility of invention; and in his method of reasoning he treats no subject with baldness or puerility, but all philosophically and magnificently."

Gregory of Nazianzus has an oration on Athanasius, from which the following passage is given by Cave (Lives of the Fathers, vol. ii): "He was one that so governed himself that his life supplied the place of sermons, and his sermons prevented his corrections; much less need had he to cut or lance where he did but once shake his rod. In him all ranks and orders might find something to admire, something particular for their imitation: one might commend his unwearied constancy in fasting and prayer; another, his vigorous and incessant persevering in watchings and praise; a third, his admirable care and protection of the poor; a fourth, his resolute opposition to the proud, or his condescension to the humble. The virgins may celebrate him as their bridesman, the married as their governor, the hermits as their monitor, the cenobites as their lawgiver, the simple as their guide, the contemplative as a divine, the merry as a bridle, the miserable as a comforter, the aged as a staff, the youth as a tutor, the poor as a benefactor, and the rich as a steward. He was a patron to the widows, a father to orphans, a friend to the poor, a harbor to strangers, a brother to brethren, a physician to the sick, a keeper of the faithful, one who 'became all things to all men, that, if not all, he might at least gain the more.' . . .

With respect to his predecessors in that see, he equalled some, came near others, and exceeded others; in some he imitated their discourses, in others their actions; the meekness of some, the zeal of others, the patience and constancy of the rest; borrowing many perfections from some, and all from others; and so making up a complete representation of virtue, like skillful limners, who, to make the piece absolute, do first from several persons draw the several perfections of beauty within the idea of their own minds; so he, inasmuch that in practice he outdid the eloquent, and in his discourses outwent those who were most versed in practice; or, if you will, in his discourses he excelled the eloquent, and in his practice those who were most used to business; and for those that had made but an ordinary advance in either, he was far superior to them, as being eminent but in one kind; and for those who were masters in the other, he outdid them in that he excelled in both."

The aptitude of his remarkable intellect for grappling with the deepest problems is shown in all his writings, even in the earliest (Λόγος κατά τῶν ἘΑλίμων, Oration against the Greeks), an apologetic work to refute the Grecian attacks on Christianity, which evinces his culture in Greek learning, as well as rare metaphysical acuteness, written as it was before the author was twenty-five (A. D. 318?). The treatise De Incarnatione verbi appeared about the same time, and, indeed, is cited by Jerome as the same work. It treats of the deepest themes, God, creation, anthropology, and Christology. His other most important writings are Epistola de decretis Nicenæ Synodi contra Arianos; Epist. de sententiâ Dionysii; Orationes contra Arianos; Epistola ad Serapionem; Epistola ad Epictetum; Epistola ad Adolphum; Contra Apollinarium. Besides these are Apologia de Fuga sua (to justify his flight from persecution); Epistola ad Alexandros, written by request of certain monks, to give an account of his sufferings and of the Arian heresy. The first, or dogmatical part, is lost. The following passage from this book manifests the modest humility of a grand intellect. Speaking of his attempts to explain the doctrine of the Logos, he says: "The more I think on the subject, the more incomprehensible it appears to me; and I should abandon it entirely were it not for your importunity and the blasphemy of your opponents. I therefore think it proper to say something on the subject; for, though it be impossible to comprehend what God is, yet it is possible to tell what he is not. In like manner, though it is impossible fully to explain the nature of the Logos, yet it is easy to condemn and refute what his adversaries have said against him." After having made this apology, he begs them to return the letter after they had read it, without either copying or permitting it to be copied, as it was at least but an inadequate defence of that great truth, and was too inconsiderable to deserve being transmitted to posterity. In this epistle his views on persecution contrast nobly with those of Augustine's later years. "Nothing," he observes, "more forcibly marks the weakness of a bad cause. Satan, who has no truth to propose to men, comes with axe and sword to make way for his errors. The method made use of by Christ to persuade men to receive his beneficent religion is widely different, for he teaches the truth, and says, If any man will come after me, and be my disciple, etc. When he comes to the heart he uses no violence, but says, Open to me, my sister, my spouse; if we open, he comes in; if we will not open, he retires; for the truth is not preached with swords and spears, nor by the authority of soldiers, but by counsel and persuasion. But of what use can persuasion be where the imperial terror reigns? And what place is there for counsel where resistance to the imperial authority in these matters must terminate in exile or death? It is the property of the true religion to have no recourse to force, but to persuasion. But the state makes use of compulsion in matters of religion, and what is the consequence? Why, the church is filled with hypocrisy and impiety, and the faithful servants of Christ are obliged to hide themselves in caves and holes of the earth, or to wander about in the deserts."

The Orationes contra Arianos, four in number, were written, it is supposed, during the stay of Athanasius in Egypt. In the first discourse he answers the objections which the Arians brought against what is now commonly termed the Eternal Sonship of Christ. In the second he shows the dignity of Christ's nature, and its superiority to that of angels and to all created beings, and explains several portions of Scripture, especially Prov. viii, which he applies to Christ, pointing out what parts relate to his divine nature, and those which are to be understood of his human nature. The third may be divided into three parts. In the first he shows the essential unity and identity of the Father and Son; in the second he explains certain passages of Scripture which relate only to the human nature of Christ, and which the Arians had perverted by applying them to his divinity, in order the better to serve their own cause; in the third part he answers their objections; in the fourth discourse Athanasius shows the unity of the divine nature, and, at the same time, the distinct personality of the Father and the Son. Most of this oration refers to other heresies than Arianism. "We do not hesitate to affirm that the four orations of Athanasius against the Arians contain a dialectics as sharp and penetrating, and a metaphysics as transcendental as any thing in Aristotle or Hegel" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, i, 73). Bishop Kaye gives a digest of the four orations in his Council of Nicea (Lond. 1853, pt. ii).

The Epistola ad Serapionem (four in number) were written in reply to Serapion, an Egyptian bishop, who asked Athanasius to answer certain heretics who maintained that the Holy Spirit was a creature, and one of the ministering spirits of God, different from angels only in rank, but not in nature. "If," say they, "the Holy Spirit be neither an angel nor created being, if he proceed from the Father, he is his Son, and the Logos and he are brothers; if so, how can the Logos be called the only son of God? If they be equal, why is he called the Holy Spirit, and not Son; and why is it that he is not also said to have been begotten by the Father?" To show them the futility of such objections, which suppose that, in speaking of God and his son Jesus, we must be governed by the ideas of natural generation, Athanasius asks in his turn, "Who, then, is the father of the Father, the son of the Son? who the grandchildren, seeing, among men, father implies father antecedent, and son implies son consequent, and so on ad infinitum? Son among men is only a portion of his father; but in God, the Son is the entire image of the Father, and always Son, as the Father is always Father; nor can the Father be the Son, nor the Son the Father. We cannot, therefore, speak of God as having brother or ancestor of any kind, seeing the Scriptures speak of no such thing; nor do they ever give the Holy Spirit the name of Son, but only that of the Spirit of the Father and the Spirit of the Son. The holy Trinity has one and the same godhead or divinity; it is all but one God; we must not attach the idea of creature to it; human reason can penetrate no further; the cherubim cover the rest with their wings." In the second letter Athanasius combats those who place the Son in the rank of created beings, and advances the proofs of his divinity. The third letter shows that what the Scriptures say of the Son as to his divine nature, they say the same also of the Holy Spirit; and that the proofs which establish the divinity of the one, establish also the divinity of the other. In the fourth letter he shows how the Holy Spirit cannot be termed Son, and insists on the necessity of saying nothing of God but what he has revealed concerning himself; and that we must not judge of the divine nature by what we see in men; and that the mystery of the Trinity cannot be fathomed by human wisdom. As Serapion had asked his opinion concerning that text, He who blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost hath no forgiveness, neither in this world nor in that which is to come, he employs the conclusion of this letter in discussing this point. Origen and Theognostus, he observes, asserted that the sin against the Holy Ghost was apostasy after baptism. This Athanasius denies, because the words were addressed to the Pharisees, who had not been baptized, and yet are charged with having committed this sin; he then asserts that as the Jews had seen the miracles which Christ wrought, and attributed them to the power of Beelzebub, thereby denying his divinity, that this alone constitutes the sin against the Holy Ghost. These, says he, who consider only the human acts of Christ, and suppose him, therefore, to be a man only, are in some sort excusable. Those also who, seeing his miracles, doubted whether he was a man, could scarcely be deemed culpable; but those who, seeing his miracles and divine actions, obstinately attributed them to the power of the devil, as the Pharisees did, committed a crime so enormous that there is reason to fear such a sin is unpardonable. This, therefore, is the sin against the Holy Ghost of which Christ speaks. The treatise against Apollinaris and the Epistle to Epictetus treat with unrivalled skill and acumen of the true doctrine of the humanity of Christ.

The Athanasian Creed, so called, is not the work of Athanasius. See CREED, ATHANASIAN. For the doctrinal views of Athanasius, and for his great services to the church in setting the scientific doctrine of the Trinity, see Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, bk. iii, ch. iii; bk. v, ch. vi; Smith's Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 87-105; Neander, History of Dogmas, ii, 290 sq. Bishop Kaye's Account of the Council of Nicea (Lond. 1853, 8vo) gives a history of the Arian heresy from its rise to the death of Athanasius, and also a digest of the "Four Orations against the Arians." See also the articles ARIANISM; TRINITY.

Athanasius brought against the Arian and other heresies three classes of arguments: (1) from the authority of preceding writers and the general sense of the church; (2) philosophical and rational arguments; (3) scriptural and exegetical proofs. In each of these fields he showed entire mastery of the material. But the great merit of his position was his assertion of the supreme authority of Scripture as against the assertions or presuppositions of reason. The Arians, Sabellians, etc. were simply precursors of the modern Rationalism; Athanasius, on the other hand, maintained that the mind of man is not, and cannot be, the measure of the universe, still less of God, the creator of the universe. Neander sums up his share in the Arian controversy as follows: "When the Arians maintained that the Son of God was only distinguished from other created beings by the fact that God created him first of all, and then all other beings by him; Athanasius, on the contrary, said, It is a narrow-minded representation that God must require an instrument for creation; it looks as if the Son of God came into existence only for our sakes; and by such a representation we might be led to regard the Son of God, not as participating immediately in the divine essence, but as requiring an intermediate agency for himself. What, then, could that agency be between him and God? Grant that such existed, then that would be the Son of God in a proper sense; nothing else, indeed, than the divine essence communicating itself. If we do not stand in connection with God through the Son of God as thus conceived of, we have no true communion with him, but something stands between us and God, and we are, therefore, not the children of God in a proper sense. For, in reference to our original relation, we are only creatures of God, and he is not in a proper sense our Father; only so far as he is our Father as we are placed in communion with the Father through Christ, who is the Son of God by a communication of the divine essence: without this doctrine it could not be said that we are partakers of the divine nature (Orat. contr. Arian. 1, 16)—(ἀνάγκη λέγειν τὸ ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς ἴσον αὐτοῦ σὺν παντί εἶναι τὸν υἱόν· τὸ γὰρ ὅλος μετέχειν τὸν υἱόν, ἴσον ἴσῃ λέγειν ὅτι καὶ γεννᾷ· τὸ ἐκ γεννῆν τί σημαίνει ἢ υἱόν; αὐτὸ γοῖν τοῦ υἱοῦ μετέχει τὰ πάντα κατὰ τὴν τοῦ πνεύματος γνησιότην παρ' αὐτοῦ χάρις, καὶ φανερὸν ἐκ τούτου γίνεται, ὅτι αὐτὸς μὲν οὐδὲ οὐδὲν μετέχει, τὸ ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς μετέχον, τοῦτό ἐστι οὐ υἱός· αὐτὸ γὰρ τοῦ υἱοῦ μετέχοντες τοῦ θεοῦ μετέχον λέγομεθα ("ἵνα γίνηται ζωὴς κοινωνοὶ φέσεως"—"οὐκ οὐσαί, ὅτι υἱὸς θεοῦ ἴσῃ;"—"ἡμεῖς γὰρ υἱὸς θεοῦ ἴσῃον ἴσοις," 2, 59). Thus, in Athanasius, the ideas of redemption, adoption, and communion with God were connected with the idea of Jesus as the true Son of God. As the Arians believed that they ought to pay divine honor to Christ according to the Scriptures, he charged them with inconsistency, since, on their principles, men were made idolaters and worshippers of a creature. The Arians objected to the Nicene doctrine that the idea of the Son of God could not be distinguished from that of a created being unless anthropopathic notions were admitted. Athanasius replied that certainly all religious expressions are symbolical, and have something anthropopathic at their basis, which we must abstract from them in order to get the correct idea. But the same is the case with the idea of creation, which the Arians are willing to maintain; we should fall into error if we tried to develop this according to human representations. In like manner we must abstract from the ideas Son of God and begotten of God what belongs to sensuous relations, and then there is left to us the idea of unity of essence and derivation of nature. Athanasius objects to the Semi-Arians that the ideas of likeness and unlikeness suit only creaturely relations; in reference to God we can speak only of unity or diversity. It belongs to the idea of creation that something is created out of nothing, ab extra, by the will of God; to the idea of the Son of God belongs derivation from the essence of God. It was a difficulty to the Semi-Arians in general, as well as to the Arians, that the Son of God was asserted to maintain his existence not by a direct act of the Father's will, and both parties urged against the Nicæans the dilemma that either God brought the Son into being by his own will, or that he was begotten against his will by necessity. Athanasius emphatically maintained the doctrine they impugned. If the will of God be supposed to be the origin of the Son's existence, then the Son of God belongs to the class of creatures. The existence of the divine Logos precedes all particular acts of the divine will, which are all effectuated only by the Logos, who himself is the living divine will. Our opponents think only of the contrast between will and compulsion; they ignore what is higher, namely, the idea of that which is founded in the divine essence. We cannot say God is good and merciful first of all, by a special act of his will, but all the acts of the divine will presuppose the being of God. The same holds good of the Logos and the acts of God's will."—Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, i, 295.

Athanasius must be classed among the greatest of Christian theologians. Yet in some points he was "weak like other men;" and the ascetic and monastic spirit received a strong impulse from his writings, and especially from his life of St. Anthony (q. v.). This and some other of his writings were doubtless interpolated by later writers in the interest of Romish corruptions, yet enough remains to show that he shared in some of the Gnostic errors, especially with regard to religious virginity and celibacy. Thus, in his oration against the Greeks, the following passage occurs: "The Son of God," says Athanasius (i, 698), "made man for us, and having abolished death, and having liberated our race from the servitude of corruption, hath, besides his other gifts, granted to us to have upon earth an image of the sanctity of angels, namely, virginity. The maids possessing this (sanctity), and whom the church catholic is wont to call the brides of Christ, are admired, even by the gentiles, as being the temple of the Logos. Nowhere, truly, except among us Christians, is this holy and heavenly profession fully borne out or perfected; so that we may appeal to this very fact as a convincing proof that it is among us that true religion is to be found." And thus, in the undoubted tract of the same father on the Incarnation, we meet the very same prominent doctrine spoken of as a characteristic of the Christian system, and even including the Gnostic phrase applied to virginity, that it was an excellence obeying a rule "above law." "Who is there but our Lord and Saviour Christ that has not deemed this virtue (of virginity) to be utterly impracticable (or unattainable) among men, and yet he has so shown his divine power as to impel youths, as yet under age, to profess it, a virtue beyond law?" (i, 165). (Taylor, Ancient Christianity, i, 222; see also Taylor's remarks on Athanasius's Life of Anthony, p. 280.)

The most complete edition of the works of Athanasius is that of the Benedictines (Athanasii Opera omnia quæ extant, et quæ eius nomine circumferuntur, etc. Padua, 1777, 4 vols. 8d.). Very convenient for ordinary students is Athanasii opera dogmatica selecta, ed. Thilo (Lips. 1853, 1000 pp. 8vo.), which contains all the really important writings of Athanasius. The Four Orations against the Arians were translated by S. Parker (Oxf. 1713, 2 vols. 8vo.). We have also in English, Select Treatises in Controversy with the Arians, in the "Library of the Fathers," vols. viii, xix (Oxf. 1842-43); Historical Tracts (Lib. of Fathers, xiii, Oxf. 1843). The "Festal Letters" of Athanasius were long lost, but were edited in 1818 by Mr. Cureton, from a newly-found Syrian MS., and translated into German under the title Die Fest-Briefe des Heiligen Athanasius, aus dem Syrischen übersetzt und durch Anmerkungen erläutert von F. Larzow (Leipzig, 1852, pp. 156); also into English by Burgess (Oxf. 1854, 8vo, pp. 190). See Journal of Sac. Lit. Jan. 1855, p. 255. A complete list of the works of Athanasius, including the doubtful and supposititious as well as the genuine, is given in Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. ed. Harles, vii, 184-215. The sources of information as to the life of Athanasius, besides his own writings, are the church histories of Soerates (lib. i, iii), Sozomen (ii, iii), Theodoret (i, ii), and the material is well arranged by Montfaucon, Vita Athanasii, prefixed to the Benedictine ed. of his works. There is also a modern biography by Möhler, Athanasius d. Grosse und die Kirche seiner Zeit, which gives a careful analysis of his doctrine and writings. Athanasius, a priest of Alexandria, was the son of Isidora, sister of Cyril of Alexandria. He was robbed of his property, and degraded by Dioscorus, and, being driven out of Egypt, wandered about in poverty and distress until 451, in which year he carried his complaint before the Council of Chalcedon. This complaint is given in Labbe, iv, 405.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 451.

Athanasius (Junior), or CELETES, surnamed HERNIUSUS, was bishop of Alexandria from about A.D. 490 to 497, and was esteemed a good Biblical scholar, an active bishop, and a devout man. He is supposed to be the author of several works ascribed to Athanasius the Great, particularly the Sacra Scriptura Egyptiaca; Questiones et Responsiones ad Antiochum; two tracts, De Incarnatione Verbi Dei; Synagoga Doctrinae ad Clericos et Laicos; de Virginitate sive Asceti.—Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.

Atharîas (Arṣanîac), a name given (1 Esdr. v, 40) in connection with that of Nehemias (Nehemiah), evidently by the translator misunderstanding the title TRISHATHA (q. v.) of the original text (Ezra ii, 63; comp. Neh. viii, 9).

Ath'arim (Heb. Atharim, אֲתָרִים, regions; Sept. Ἀθανίμ), a place in the south of Palestine near which the Israelites passed on their way thither (Num. xxi, 1, where the English version improperly renders אֲתָרִים אֲתָרִים, "the way of the spies"; see Gesenius, Theos. Heb. p. 171). It was, perhaps, a general designation of the region north of Mount Seir through which the Canaanites presumed that the Israelites were about to pass, as indeed they would have done but for the Edemites' refusal of a passage to them. Atheism (from ἀθεός, without God), in popular language, means the negation of the existence of God. 1. Use of the Word.—In all ages the term has been applied according to the popular conception of θεός (God). Thus the word ἀθεός, atheist, in old Greek usage, meant one who denied "the gods," especially the gods recognized by the law of the state. In this way several of the Greek philosophers (even Socrates) were called atheists (Cicero, Nat. Deorum, i, 23). Cicero himself defines an atheist as one who in theory denies the existence of any God, or practically refuses to worship any (Atheus, qui s'ne Deo est, impius, qui Deum esse non credit, aut si credit, non colit, Deorum contemptor). This distinction of atheism into theoretical and practical has remained, in popular language, to this day. At a later period the Pagans applied the term atheists to the Christians as a generic name of reproach, because they denied the heathen gods and derided their worship (Eusebius, Ch. Hist. iv, 15; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. i, ch. ii, § 1). In the theological strifes of the early church it was not uncommon for the contending parties to call each other atheists, and, later still, the burning of heretics was justified by calling them atheists. The term was applied, in scientific theology, to such forms of unbelief as that of Pomponatius (Pomponazzi, †1524) and Vanini (†1619). Bacon (Essay xvi) uses the term to designate infidelity in general, and the denial of God in particular ("I had rather believe," he says, "all the fabulous tales in the Talmud and the Alcoran, than that the universal frame is without a mind"). So also in the De Augmentis (i, 11) he speaks of "a little knowledge inclining the mind of man to atheism." Toward the end of the 17th century the term is not infrequently found, e. g. in Kortholt's De Tribus Impostoribus, 1680, to include Deism such as that of Hobbes, as well as blank Pantheism like Spinoza's, which more justly deserves the name. The same use is seen in Colerus's work against Spinoza, Arcana Atheismi Revelata. Tillotson (Serm. i on Atheism) and Bentley (Doyle Lectures) use the word more exactly, and the invention of the term deism induced in the writers of the 18th century a more limited and exact use of the word atheism. But in Germany, Reinmanns (Historia Univ. Atheismi, 1725, p. 437 sq.) and Buddaeus (De Atheismo et Superstitione, 1723, ch. iii, § 2) use it most widely, and especially make it include disbelief in immortality (Farar, Critical History of Free Thought, 414). Walch (Bibliotheca Theol. Selecta, 1757, i, 676, etc.) uses it to include Spinoza, Hobbes, and Collins as writers who, if not avowed atheists, are yet substantially such. It is a great mistake, in the interest of truth as well as in view of charity, to extend too far the application of the word atheist. Bayle does it (Bib. Crit.), also Brucker (Hist. Phil. t. i), both probably of design; and Harduin (Athei Detect. i. Amsterd. 1733) puts Jansenius, Malebranche, Quesnel, and others in his black list. On the other hand, it is both unwise and uneretical to except the extreme Pantheists (e. g. Spinoza) and Materialists from the number of Atheists. Lewes, in his Biographical History of Philosophy, and also in Fortnightly Review, 1865, p. 338, vindicates Spinoza from the charge of spiritual atheism, and states that Spinoza himself emphatically repudiated Atheism; but yet Lewes admits that logically there is little difference between Spinoza's Acosmism, which makes God the one universal being, and Atheism, which makes the cosmos the one universal existence. This point is fully discussed in Brenna, De gen. human. consensu in agnoscenda Divinitate (Florence, 1773, 2 vols. 4to). See also Perrone, Praelect. Theologicae (Paris, 1856, i, 238).

2. In scientific theology, atheism is opposed to theism. The doctrine of Christian theism is that God is absolute, self-conscious personal spirit, the beneficent creator and upholder of the universe. Every system of philosophy or religion must be built upon this principle or its opposite; that is, must be either theistic or atheistic. Hence a great deal of what passes for Deism and Pantheism is in fact Atheism. Christianity apprehends God not as entirely apart from the world and exerting no providence (Deism), nor as existing only in the world (Pantheism), but as existing apart from creation, but himself creator and controller (i. e.

Providence). On this theory of a living and personal God Christianity undertakes to explain the phenomena of the universe. Those who seek to explain these phenomena by substituting other ideas for this idea of God are, in the view of Christian theology, atheists. The term should be applied to none who profess to believe in a personal, self-conscious, spiritual God. Atheism is divided into positive or dogmatic, which absolutely declares that there is no God, and negative or sceptical, which declares either (a) that, if there be a God, we cannot know either the fact or the nature of his existence, and therefore it is no concern of ours, or (b) that, if there be a God, we can never know of him by tradition or by faith, and can never have proof satisfactory to the intellect of his existence. Some Christian writers and philosophers have incautiously attempted to stand upon this latter ground. The so-called Positive Philosophy stands upon the first ground (a), but logically leads (in spite of Mr. J. S. Mill's denial, in his Exposition of Comte) to dogmatic atheism. To state that we only know, and only can know phenomena, is to exclude God; for God is not only no phenomenon, but is, in the Christian sense, the absolute ground of all phenomena. The theories which attempt to explain phenomena without the idea of God may be classed as (1) the Idealistic, which substitutes for the absolute, self-conscious Spirit, a so-called world-spirit; not a living, personal being, but an unconscious and abstract one—in a word, a mere conception of ideal being as the abstract totality of all individual conceptions; (2) the Materialistic, which substitutes for a personal God the forces inherent in matter, and holds that these sufficiently explain all phenomena; (3) the Subjective-idealistic, which asserts that phenomena are nothing but the creations or modifications of the thinking mind or subject, and that thought creates not only matter, so called, but God. To the first and third of these classes belong Fichte, Hegel, and (during his early life) Schelling, among the Germans, and their followers in England and America. To the second class belong Comte, and the so-called Positive philosophers in general. It is true that Lewes (Philosophy of the Sciences, p. 24) denies that Comte was an atheist; and Wallace (Art, Scenery, and Philosophy in Europe), while admitting Comte's individual atheism, denies that atheism is a characteristic of Positivism. But these denials are vain, so long as the very aim of the Positive method is to eliminate mind and will from the universe. A science of pure phenomenalism can never coexist with Christian theism. Perhaps the most open declarations of atheism in modern times are to be found in D'Holbach's Système de la Nature (1770), the ultimate fruit, in theistic materialism, of the sensational philosophy. Even Voltaire pronounced it "abominable" (see note to Brougham, Discourse on Natural Theology; Renouvier, Philosophie Moderne, bk. v, § 2). The doctrine of the book is that nothing, in fact, exists but matter and motion, which are inseparable. "If matter is at rest, it is only because hindered in motion, for in its essence it is not a dead mass. Motion is twofold, attraction and repulsion, and the different motions we see are the products of these two; and through these arise the different connections and the whole manifoldness of things, under laws which are eternal and unchangeable. It flows from these positions, first, that man is material, and, secondly, that the belief in God is a chimera. Another chimera, the belief in the being of a God, is the twofold division of man into body and soul. This belief arises like the hypothesis of a soul-substance, because mind is falsely divided from matter, and nature is thus made twofold. The evil which men experienced, and whose natural cause they could not discover, they assigned to a deity which they imagined for the purpose. The first notions of a God have their source, therefore, in sorrow, fear, and uncertainty. We tremble because our forefathers for thousands of years have done the same. This circumstance awakens no auspicious prepossession. But not only the rude, but also the theological idea of God is worthless, for it explains no phenomena of nature. It is, moreover, full of absurdities; for since it ascribes moral attributes to God, it renders him human; while, on the other hand, by a mass of negative attributes, it seeks to distinguish him absolutely from every other human being. The true system, the system of nature, is hence atheistic. But such a doctrine requires a culture and a courage which neither all men nor most men possess. If we understand by the word atheist one who considers only dead matter, or who designates the morning power in nature with the name God, then is there no atheist, or whoever would be one is a fool. But if the word means one who denies the existence of a spiritual being, a being whose attributes can only be a source of annoyance to men, then are there indeed atheists, and there would be more of them, if a correct knowledge of nature and a sound reason were more widely diffused. But if atheism is true, then should it be diffused. There are, indeed, many who have cast off the yoke of religion, who nevertheless think it is necessary for the common people in order to keep them within proper limits. But this is just as if we should determine to give a man poison lest he should abuse his strength. Every kind of Deism leads necessarily to superstition, since it is not possible to continue on the stand-point of pure Deism. With such premises the freedom and immortality of the soul both disappear. Man, like every other substance in nature, is a link in the chain of necessary connection, a blind instrument in the hands of necessity. If any thing should be endowed with self-motion, that is, with a capacity to produce motion without any other cause, then would it have the power to destroy motion in the universe; but this is contrary to the conception of the universe, which is only an endless series of necessary motions spreading out into wider circles continually. The claim of an individual immortality is absurd. For to affirm that the soul exists after the destruction of the body, is to affirm that a modification of a substance can exist after the substance itself has disappeared. There is no other immortality than the remembrance of posterity" (Schwegler, History of Philosophy, § 32). The Dictionnaire des Athées of Sylvain Maréchal, edited by Lalande (Paris, 1799), is a flagrant specimen of the same kind. The strongest German development is Strauss's identification of God with the universal being of man, in his Dogmatik; and Feuerbach's bald atheism, in his Wesen des Christenthums (Smith's Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 293). The so-called English "secularism" is an atheistic doctrine resting on, or similar to that of the Positive Philosophy. It holds the eternity of matter; it knows of nothing greater than nature; its creed is a stern fatalism; its worship is labor; its religion is science; its future is a "black, impenetrable curtain." One of its advocates says, "A deep silence reigns behind the curtain; no one within will answer those he has left without; all that you can hear is a hollow echo of your question, as if you shouted into a cavern" (Holroyde, Logic of Death). Such is the wretched atheism which is expounded by itinerant lecturers, and disseminated by periodical pamphlets throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain, and which is perverting and contaminating the minds of the more thoughtful and inquisitive among the working classes of that country to an unprecedented and incredible extent (London Review, xi, 20. See also Christian Examiner, Boston, Nov. 1859; North British Review, Nov. 1860).

We close this article with the following admirable passage from a modern writer: "The whole history of philosophy and theology shows that, when the material world is taken by itself, it is a contradiction of God. Atheism was not coeval with man. No atheist pretends that it was. It was always a denial, and a denial presupposes an affirmation. The denial of a God presupposes the existence in man of some faculty anterior to reflection which may apprehend Infinite Being. It is a denial, also, which has always been preceded by misapprehension of God. Pseudo-theism precedes atheism. The first denial of God is made unintentionally. Men begin to worship remarkable peculiarities of the material universe. Thus worship fell from its primitive spirit and truth into deification of the heavens and earth, to which the overflowing soul of man lent some of its own unbounded life. The Book of Job, one of the oldest of human writings, refers to this primitive idolatry in the following words: 'If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge; for I should have denied the God that is above.' This declaration plainly shows that such things had begun to be in his day, but were not universal. It is a very simple exposition of the rise of idolatry everywhere. Pseudo-theism is incipient atheism; but it testifies to a pure theism going before it. The mistake of this early false worship is, as every one sees, the radical mistake of materializing the conception of God. It is the result of idly resting in an impression made by material objects. This impression would never have been made unless those objects expressed a life corresponding to ours. It was an impression at first perhaps innocently cherished as a religious influence; but it proved the means of shutting out God, the Being of love, wisdom, and power, as an object of true faith, and the source of a glowing worship. It ended in atheism. In modern times, the same result has followed from men's seizing on the external as their means of making clear the Divine Life. It would be quite possible to trace a parallel between the consequences of giving the great name of God to the sun, moon, and earth, and the consequences of giving the same august name to laws of nature which are simple categories of the human understanding; for the forms of the understanding may stand between the soul and God, preventing his immanence in the consciousness, no less than the stars of heaven and the imposing forms of earth. The forms of the understanding, though impalpable, are media, no less than visible and palpable matter; and it is important to observe that they are as much so. They have proved as fruitful sources of atheism when rested on as ultimate; for if they have not corrupted man's sensual nature by making his rites of worship bodily vice, they have paralyzed his spirit by substituting intellectual speculation for the fervent spiritual exercise which involves his might and heart, no less than his mind, in a reasonable service. But to give a logical priority of matter to mind, in an argument for the being of the spiritual God, is to beg the question at once. This Plato has observed. He says in his Laws: 'Atheists make the assumption that fire and water, earth and air, stand first in the order of existences, and calling them nature, they evolve soul out of them. In scrutinizing this position of the class of men who busy themselves with physical investigations, it will perhaps appear that those who come to conclusions so different from ours, and irreverent of God, follow an erroneous method. The cause of production and dissolution, which is the mind, they make, not a primary, but a secondary existence' (Christian Examiner, Sept, 1858). Athenagōras (Ἀθηναγόρας, a frequent Greek name), a philosopher of Athens, celebrated for his knowledge of theology and science, both Christian and pagan. He flourished about 177. (This has been shown by Mosheim in his essay De vera etate Apologeticæ quem Athen. scripsit, in his Dissert. ad Hist. Ecclæs. pertinet, i, 272 sq.) Neither Eusebius nor Jerome mention Athenagoras, but he is cited by Methodius in a passage preserved by Epiphanius (Her. 65) and by Photius (Biblioth. Cod 234). Philip Sidetes (5th century) gives an account of him in a fragment first published by Dodwell (Append. ad Dissert. in Irenæum), but Basnage and others have shown that this account is inaccurate, to say the least. It is said that when a Gentile, Athenagoras strove against the Christian faith; but as he was engaged in searching the Holy Scriptures for weapons to turn against the faithful, it pleased God to convert him. After this he left Athens and went to Alexandria, where, according to the account of Sidetes, he became head of the catechetical school there; but this account is not to be relied upon. He wrote a work called Προσέβια πρὸς Χριστιανῶν, An Apology (or Embassy) in behalf of the Christians, and addressed it either to Marcus Antoninus and Lucius Verus (about A.D. 165), or to the emperors Marcus Aurelius and his son Commodus (about A.D. 177). In this apology he refutes the three chief calumnies urged against the Christians in that day, viz. (1) that they were atheists; (2) that they ate human flesh; (3) that they committed the most horrible crimes in their assemblies. He also claimed for the Christians the benefit of the toleration which in the Roman Empire was granted to all religions. Athenagoras wrote another treatise on the doctrine of the Resurrection (πρὸς ἀναστάσεως τῶν νεκρῶν), arguing the doctrine from the goodness, wisdom, and power of God, together with the natural constitution of man. On the clearness of his conception of God, see Dorner, Doct. of the Person of Christ, i, 283. The best editions of his works are those of the Benedictines (Par. 1742, fol.) and of Otto (Jena, 1857, 8vo). Separate editions of his Apology were published by Lindner (Langensal. 1774) and by Paul (Halle, 1856). There is an English translation by David Humphreys, The Apologetics of Athenagoras (Lond. 1714, 8vo); and an older one of The Resurrection by Richard Porder (Lond. 1573, 8vo). Athe'nian (Ἀθηναῖος, Acts xviii, 21, rendered "of Athens" in ver. 22, also in 2 Macc. vi, 7; ix, 15), an inhabitant of the city of ATHENS (q. v.).

Atheno'bius (Ἀθηνοβίος, a "friend" of the Syrian king Antiochus (VII) Sidetes, sent by him as a special ambassador to Simon, the Jewish high-priest, to demand possession of the chief fortresses of Palestine; which being refused, the envoy, although greatly impressed with what he saw of the splendor of Jerusalem, yet returned enraged to his master (1 Macc. xv, 28-36). Josephus, however, gives a somewhat different account of the negotiation (Ant. xiii, 7, 2; War, i, 2, 2), and does not name Athenobius. See ASYROCUS.

Ath'ens (Ἀθήναι, plural of Ἀθήνη, Minerva, the tutelary goddess of the place) mentioned in several passages of Scripture (2 Macc. ix, 15; Acts xvii, 15 sq.; xviii, 1; 1 Thess. iii, 1), a celebrated city, the capital of Attica and of the leading Grecian republic, and the seat of the Greek literature in the golden period of the nation (Müller, Topog. of Athens, trans. by Lockhart, Lond. 1842; Kruse, Hellas, Lpz. 1826, II, i, 10 sq.; Leake, Topography of Athens, Lond. 1841, 2d ed.; Forchhammer, Topographie von Athen, Kiel, 1841; Wachsmuth, *Hellen. The inhabitants had the reputation of being fond of novelty (Acts xvii, 21; comp. Ælian, Var. Hist. v, 13; Demosth. Phil. i, 4; Schol. ad Thuc. ii, 38; ad Aristoph. Phut. 338; see Wetstein, ii, 567), and as being remarkably zealous in the worship of the gods (Acts xvii, 16; comp. Pausan. i, 24, 3; Strabo, x, 471; Philostr. Apol. vi, 3; iv, 19; Ælian, *Var. in Phot. cod. 243; see Eckhard, Athenæ superstitionæ, Viteb. 1618); hence the city was full of temples, altars, and other sacred places (Liv. xlv, 27). Paul visited Athens on his second missionary journey from Berea (Acts xvii, 14 sq.; comp. 1 Thess. iii, 1), and delivered in (but not before) the Areopagus (q. v.) his famous speech (Acts xvii, 22-31).—Winer, i, 111.

The earlier and more obscure period of the Grecian province named Attica reaches down nearly to the final establishment of democracy in it, and even then the foundations of her greatness were already laid. The infertile soil and dry atmosphere of Attica, in connection with the slender appetite of the people, have been thought favorable to their mental development; the barrenness of the soil, moreover, prevented invaders from coveting it; so that, through a course of ages, the population remained unchanged, and a moral union grew up between the several districts. To a king named Theseus (whose deeds are too much mixed with fable to be narrated as history) is ascribed the credit of uniting all the country towns of Attica into a single state, the capital of which was Athens. The population of this province was variously called Pelasgian, Achaian, and Ionian, and probably corresponds most nearly to what was afterward called Æolian (Pritchard, Phys. Hist. of Man, iii, 434). When the Dorians, another tribe of Greeks of very different temperament, invaded and occupied the southern peninsula, great numbers of its Achaian inhabitants took refuge in Attica. Shortly after, the Dorians were repulsed in an inroad against Athens, an event which has transmitted to legendary renown the name of King Codrus, and thenceforward Athens was looked upon as the bulwark of the Ionian tribes against the barbarous Dorians. Overloaded with population, Attica now poured forth colonies into Asia, some of which, as Miletus, soon rose to great eminence, and sent out numerous colonies themselves, so that Athens was revered as a mother of nations by powerful children scattered along the western and northern coasts of Anatolia. Dim tradition shows us isolated priesthoods and elective kings in the earliest times of Attica; these, however, gradually gave way to an aristocracy, which in a series of years established themselves as a hereditary ruling caste. But a country "ever unravaged" (such was their boast) could not fail to increase in wealth and numbers; and after two or three centuries, while the highest commoners pressed on the nobles, the lowest became overwhelmed with debt. The disorders caused by the strife of the former were vainly sought to be stayed by the institutions of Draco; the sufferings of the latter were ended, and the sources of violence dried up by the enactments of Solon. Henceforth the Athenians revered the Laws of Solon (νόμοι) as the groundwork of their whole civil polity; yet they retained by the side of them the ordnances of Draco (δρακόν) in many matters pertaining to religion. The date of Solon's reforms was probably B.C. 594. The usurpation of Pisistratus and his sons made a partial breach in the constitution; but upon their expulsion, a more serious change was effected by Clisthenes, head of the noble house of the Alcmaeonidae (B.C. 508), almost in the same year in which Tarquin was expelled from Rome. An entirely new organization of the Attic tribes was framed, which destroyed whatever remained of the power of the nobles as an order, and established among the freemen a democracy, in fact as well as in form. Out of this proceeded all the good and all the evil with which the name of Athens is associated; and though greatness which shot up so suddenly could not be permanent, there can be no difficulty in deciding that the good greatly preponderated. Very soon after this commenced hostilities with Persia; and the self-slaying, romantic, successful bravery of Athens, with the generous affability and great talents of her statesmen, soon raised her to the head of the whole Ionian confederacy. As long as Persia was to be feared, Athens was loved; but after tasting the sweets of power, her sway degenerated into a despotism, and created at length, in the war called the Peloponnesian, a coalition of all Dorian and Æolian Greece against her (B.C. 431). In spite of a fatal pestilence and the revolt of her Ionian subjects, the naval skill of Athenian seamen and the enterprise of Athenian commanders proved more than a match for the hostile confederacy; and when Athens at last fell (B.C. 404), she fell by the effects of internal sedition more truly than by Spartan lance or Persian gold, or even by her own rash and over-grasping ambition. The demoralizing effects of this war on all Greece were infinitely the worst result of it, and they were transmitted to succeeding generations. It was substantially a civil war in every province; and, as all the inhabitants of Attica were every summer forced to take refuge in the few fortresses they possessed, or in Athens itself, the simple countrymen became transformed into a hungry and profligate town rabble. From the earliest times the Ionians loved the lyre and the song, and the hymns of poets formed the staple of Athenian education. The constitution of Solon admitted and demanded in the people a great knowledge of law, with a large share in its daily administration. Thus the acuteness of the lawyer was grafted on the imagination of the poet. These are the two intellectual elements out of which Athenian wisdom was developed; but it was stimulated and enriched by extended political action and political experience. History and philosophy, as the words are understood in modern Europe, had their birth in Athens about the time of the Peloponnesian war. Then first, also, the oratory of the bar and of the popular assembly was systematically cultivated, and the elements of mathematical science were admitted into the education of an accomplished man. This was the period of the youth of Plato, whose philosophy was destined to leave so deep an impress on the Jewish and Christian schools of Alexandria. Its great effort was to unite the contemplative mysticism of Eastern sages with the accurate science of Greece; to combine, in short, the two qualities—intellectual and moral, argumentative and spiritual—into a single harmonious whole; and whatever opinion may be formed of the success which attended the experiment, it is not wonderful that so magnificent an aim attracted the desires and riveted the attention of thoughtful and contemplative minds for ages afterward. In the imitative arts of sculpture and painting, as well as in architecture, it need hardly be said that Athens carried off the palm in Greece; yet, in all these, the Asiatic colonies vied with her. Miletus took the start of her in literary composition; and, under slight conceivable changes, might have become the Athens of the world. That Athens after the Peloponnesian war never recovered the political place which she previously held, can excite no surprise—that she rose so high toward it was truly wonderful. Sparta and Thebes, which successively aspired to the "leadership" of Greece, abused their power as flagrantly as Athens had done, and, at the same time, more coarsely. The never-ending cabals, the treaties made and violated, the coalitions and breaches, the alliances and wars, recurring every few years, destroyed all mutual confidence, and all possibility of again uniting Greece in any permanent form of independence; and, in consequence, the whole country was soon swallowed up in the kingdom of Macedonia. With the loss of civil liberty, Athens lost her genius, her manly mind, and whatever remained of her virtue: she long continued to produce talents, which were too often made tools of iniquity, panders to power, and petty artificers of false philosophy. Under the Roman empire, into which it was absorbed with the rest of Greece, its literary importance still continued, and it was the great resort of students from Rome itself. During the Middle Ages it languished under the Ottoman yoke in every respect, but since Greece regained its independence (in 1834), it has revived (see Schubert, Reisen, iii, 473 sq.) as the capital of the new European kingdom. (For a detailed account of the history and topography of Athens, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.; McCulloch's Gazetteer, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v. Athenai.) See GREECE. In order to understand the localities mentioned in the sacred narrative, it may be observed that four hills of moderate height rise within the walls of the city. Of these, one to the north-east is the celebrated Acropolis, or citadel, being a square craggy rock of about 150 feet high. Immediately to the west of the Acropolis is a second hill of irregular form, but inferior height, called the

Areopagus. To the south-west rises a third hill, the Pnyx, on which the assemblies of the citizens were held; and to the south of the latter is a fourth hill, known as the Museum.—KITTO. See AREOPAGUS.

A Christian Church existed in Athens soon after the apostolic times, having doubtless been planted by the labors of Paul (although no allusions to it occur in the N. T.), but as the city had no political importance, the Church never assumed any eminent position (see Baronius, Annal. Ecol. an. 554, n. 25, 26). Tradition, however (Eusebius, Hist. Ecol. iii, 4), assigns as its first bishop Dionysius (q. v.) the Areopagite (Acts xvii, 34). There are two points requiring special elucidation connected with the N. T. mention of Athens (from Winer):

(1.) Respecting the "altar on which was inscribed, To the Unknown God," referred to in Acts xvii, 23, various opinions have been expressed by interpreters (see Fabric. Bibliogr. antig. p. 296; Wolf, Cur. ii, 1261 sq.; Douglai Anal. p. 86 sq.; Kuinöl, Comment. iv, 598 sq.; comp. also Grube [Sogers], De ara ignoti dei, Regim. 1710; Heller, De deo ignoto Athn. in Gronov. Thes. vii, 223 sq.; Schickendanz, De ara ignoto deo consecrata, Tervest. 1748; Geiger, De ignoto Athen. deo, Marb. 1754; Wallenius, De deo ignoto, Gryph. 1797; Baden, Diss. ara deo ignoto dicata, Havn. 1787). It by no means follows from the classical passages usually adduced (Pausan. i, 1, 4; Philostr. Apoll. vi, 3; comp. Lucian, Philopat. 9, 29), that any of the single altars mentioned in these writers had the inscription "to unknown gods" (ἀγνωστων θεων), in the plural, but more naturally that each was dedicated separately to an unknown deity (ἀγνωστω θεω); yet these instances in the singular must have been collectively employed with a plural reference, since they unitedly speak of all such altars. There appear, moreover, to have been several altars in various parts of Athens with the inscription "to an unknown god," a circumstance that is not invalidated by the mention (Pausan. v, 14, 6) of a single (in Elis!) "altar of unknown gods (βομιος ἀγνωστων θεων). One plausible interpretation respecting the altar in question (in Eichhorn's Bibl. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 414) supposes that, as in ancient times the art of writing was not generally known, or but little practised, there were (perhaps several) altars at Athens without any inscription (βομοι ἀνομιτοι, Diog. Laert. i, 10, 3). Eventually these, when found standing thus indefinite by the religious Athenians, would be marked by the words "to some unknown god" (ἀγρ. θεω). It is simpler, however, to suppose that in spots where some supposed preternatural event had occurred, which persons sought by a memorial to attribute to some distinct deity as author, they erected such an altar, that profane styrs might not approach too near (compare the phrases Si deo, Si deæ, used in such cases, Gell. i, 28, 3; Macrob. Saturn. iii, 9, ed. Bip.; see Douglai Anal. ii, 87) the unrecognised deity (comp. Neander, Planting, i, 262 sq.). That the expression was intended to designate specially the God of the Jews (comp. the ironical expression "Judæa devoted to the worship of an uncertain god," in Lucian, ii, 592), as Anton insists (Progr. in Act. xvii, 22 sq., Gortie. 1822), is very unlikely. (The treatise of Wolle, De ignoto Julaor. et Athen. deo, Lips. 1727, is without worth; and Mosheim, Cogit. in N. T. loc. i, 77 sq., treats the subject in an unantiquarian manner.) See ALTAR.

(2.) The "market" (ἀγοά) at Athens, mentioned (Acts xvii, 17) as the place where Paul spoke to the assembled populace, has (with most modern interpreters since Kuinöl) been understood as meaning, not the proper definite market-place called "the Forum in the Ceramicus" (ἀγοά εν Κεραμικω), but a so-called new market-place lying much farther north, to which Meursius (Ceramic. genin. c. 16) was the first to call attention, and which Müller (Holl. Encyclop. vi, 132) located on his plan from the notice in Pausanias (i, 17) and Strabo (x, 447); according to the latter of which, this spot appears to have borne the designation of the Eretria (Ἐρετρία). Pausanias, however, refers to no other market-place than the well-known one lying between the Acropolis, the Pnyx, and the place of holding the Areopagus (Forchhammer, ut sup. p. 53 sq.); and Strabo's words ("from the Eretria at Athens, which is now the market-place"), which have been regarded as indicating that the Forum was situated there in his time, are susceptible of another and more probable interpretation (Leake, Attica, p. 21). Later inquirers have therefore acquiesced in the opinion that the passage in the Acts refers to nothing more than the usual market-place, in the neighborhood of which (see Forchhammer's Plan, opposite the Acropolis on the west), moreover, lay the "miscellaneous porch" (σπυρι ποικίλη), of which avail may be made (as has usually been found necessary) for the explanation of Acts xvii, 18 (Cookesly, Map of Athens, Lond. 1852). See MARKET.

Athos. See ASS.

Athos, a mountain at the extremity of the promontory of Chalkis, in the province of Salonica, in European Turkey. It was an early resort of monks and anchorites, and is called Monte Santo, or "Holy Mountain," in the lingua franca, and in Greek ἅγιον ὄρος. There are now upon the sides of the mountain between twenty and thirty monasteries, and a vast multitude of hermitages, which contain more than six thousand monks called Calogers (q. v.), mostly Russian, of the order of St. Basil. Here they live in a state of complete abstraction from the world; and so strict are their regulations that they do not tolerate any female being, not even of the class of domestic animals, among them. They still own considerable possessions in Bulgaria, Serbia, the Danubian Principalities, and Russia. They elect annually a common council of administration, called Protobaton. They are now chiefly occupied in carving little images of the saints, which they send down to the market-town of Kareis, where a weekly market is held, and where purchases are made for various parts, especially Russia; but formerly they were occupied with the nobler work of transcription. The libraries of the monasteries are particularly rich in MSS. and other literary treasures. Many of these works have of late years been purchased by travellers, and thus found their way into various libraries of Europe. The monasteries and churches on this mountain are the only ones in the Ottoman empire that have bells. Under the reign of Catharine II of Russia, the learned Eugen Bulgaris took up his abode on Mount Athos as director of an academy founded by Patriarch Cyril of Constantinople. For some time the academy was very flourishing, but at length the patriarch had to yield to the demands of the ignorant portion of the monks and to abolish it. From that time ignorance has generally prevailed among the monks, and only recently (1859) they have set up a printing-press and commenced the publication of a religious newspaper. No complete list of the MSS. extant at Mount Athos has yet been made. See Curzon, Monasteries of the Levant (N. Y. 1851, 12mo); Leake, Trav. in Greece, vol. iii; Jour. of Geog. Soc. of Lond. 1837, vii, 61; Fallmerayer, Fragmente aus dem Orient, ii, 1 sq. (Stuttg. 1845); Bidron aîné, *Ann. Athronges (Ἀθρόγγος), a person of mean extraction, and by occupation a shepherd, who, without any other advantages than great bodily stature and undaunted hardihood, raised a body of banditti in Judaea, in connection with his four brothers, during the rule of Gratus, so powerful that they at last assumed royalty, and were with difficulty subdued in detail and captured by the successive procurators (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 10, 7). In the parallel account (Her. ii, 4, 3) he is called Athrongeus (Ἀθρόγγος).

At'ipha (Ἀτρεφία, Vulg. Agisti), one of the "templo-servants" whose "sons" returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 32); evidently the ἈΤΙΠΗΑ (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 54).

Atonement (expressed in Heb. by קָפַר, kaphar', to cover over sin, hence to forgive; Gr. καταλλαγή, reconciliation, as usually rendered), the satisfaction offered to divine justice for the sins of mankind by the death of Jesus Christ, by virtue of which all penitent believers in Christ are reconciled to God, and freed from the penalties of sin.

I. Scripture Doctrine.—1. The words used to describe Christ's work.—The redeeming work of Christ, in its several aspects, is denoted in Scripture by various terms, namely, reconciliation, propitiation, expiation, atonement, redemption, satisfaction, substitution, and salvation. The following summary of the uses and meanings of these terms is taken, with slight modifications, from Angus, Bible Hand-book, § 329. (a.) Looking into the English N. T., we find "reconciliation" and "reconcile" in several passages, in all of which (except one) the Greek word is some form of ἀλλάσσω, "to produce a change between parties" (when, for example, they have been at variance); in turning to the Sept. we find this word never used in this sense at all, nor have the many passages in the O. T., which speak of "making reconciliation," any verbal reference to these passages in the N. T. The idea is involved in several passages, but it is never expressed by this word, nor by any single word. "To turn away anger," "to restore to favor," "to accept," are the common expressions, generally forms of קָפַר and עָקַר (Isa. lvi, 7; Jer. vi, 20; Lev. xix, 7). Hence the conclusion, that in the word of the N. T. translated "reconcile" there is reference only to the change or effect produced by some measure of mercy, and not to the nature of that measure itself: it describes merely the change produced in our relation to God; his moral sentiment of displeasure against sin (called his "wrath") is appeased, and the sinner's enmity and misgivings are removed. That there is this double change may be gathered from the following passages: Heb. x, 26, 27; Rom. v, 9; Heb. ix, 26, 28; 2 Cor. v, 18-20; Eph. ii, 16; 1 Cor. vii, 11; Col. i, 20, 21. (b.) In one passage, however (Heb. ii, 17), we have in Greek another word, ἰλάσκομαι, translated also "make reconciliation." Its meaning may be gathered from the passages in the O. T. in which it occurs. It is, in fact, the constant rendering of a word translated in the English version "to make reconciliation" or "to atone for" (Lev. vi, 30; viii, 15; Ezek. xlv, 20; Dan. ix, 24, etc.). (c.) But it would excite surprise if this were the only passage in the N. T. where this phrase is found. It occurs again, in fact, in Rom. iii, 25; 1 John ii, 2; iv, 10; but in each of these passages it is translated PROPITIATION, a word which does not occur in the O. T. EXPIATION, again, does not occur in the New, and but once in the Old (Numb. xxxiii, 35); it is the same word, however, as is translated elsewhere "to make reconciliation" or "to atone for." ATONEMENT itself does not occur in the N. T., except in Rom. v, 2, and there it has no connection with the O. T. phrase, but is the same word as is translated "reconciliation" in the first sense above indicated; a change, that is, of state between parties previously at variance. (d.) Thus far, therefore, the result is clear. Reconciliation and atonement are, in all the N. T., except Heb. ii, 17, translations of the same word, and mean the state of friend-ship and acceptance into which the Gospel introduces us. "Reconciliation" in the sense in which it is used in Heb. ii, 17, and "atonement" in the uniform sense of the Old Testament, "propitiation" in the New Testament, and "expiation" in the Old, are all different renderings of one and the same Hebrew and Greek words קָפַר, kaphar (in the Piel form קָפַר) and ἰλάσκομαι, in some of their forms. These words, which may be regarded as one, have two senses, each involving the other. They mean to appease, pacify, or propitiate (Gen. xxxiii, 20; Prov. xvi, 14; Ezek. lvi, 63); and also to clear from guilt (1 Sam. iii, 14; Psa. lxx, 3; Prov. xvi, 6; Isa. vi, 7, etc.). In propitiation, we have prominence given to the first idea; in expiation, to the second; in atonement, we have a distinct reference to both. (e.) The thing which atones, propitiates, or expiates is called in Greek ἱλασμός, ἰδῶλασμός, and ἄντρον, all translations of two derivatives of the Hebrew word קָפַר (קָפַר and קָפַר), i. e. price or covering. (f.) The use of ἄντρον for קָפַר introduces another form of expression, "redemption." This word, as a noun, always represents in the N. T. λύτρωσις or ἀπολύτρωσις. Both are descriptive of the act of procuring the liberation of another by paying some λύτρον or ἄποινα, i. e. "ransom" or "forfeit," and hence always in the N. T. of the state of being ransomed in this way. These words mean (1) to buy back, by paying the price, what has been sold (Lev. xxv, 25), and (2) to redeem what has been devoted by substituting something else in its place (Lev. xxvii, 27; Exod. xiii, 13; Psa. lxxii, 14; Psa. cxxx, 8; Isa. lxxiii, 9). The price paid is called λύτρον (Matt. xx, 28; Mark x, 45), ἀντίλυτρον (1 Tim. ii, 6), the Hebrew terms being קָפַר and קָפַר, answering precisely to λύτρον, and קָפַר, which again answers to ἱλασμός. In 1 Tim. ii, 6, this ransom is said to be Christ himself. "Redemption," therefore, is generally a state of deliverance by means of ransom. Hence it is used to indicate deliverance from punishment or guilt (Eph. i, 7; Col. i, 14); sanctification, which is deliverance from the dominion of sin (1 Pet. i, 18); the resurrection, which is the actual deliverance of the body from the grave, the consequence of sin (Rom. viii, 23); completed salvation, which is actual deliverance from all evil (Eph. i, 14; iv, 30; 1 Cor. i, 30; Tit. ii, 14). Once it is used without reference to sin (Heb. xi, 35), and perhaps in Luke xxi, 28. (g.) Another word, translated "redemption" (ἀγοράζω, Gal. iii, 13; iv, 5; Rev. v, 9; xiv, 3, 4), means, as it is everywhere else translated, to buy, referring to a purchase made in the market. What is paid in this case is called τιμή (price), and this price is said to be Christ (Gal. iii, 15), or his blood (Rom. v, 9). In Acts xx, 28, the word rendered "purchase" (πρωτοαίμα) has no reference to redemption or to price, but means simply "acquired for himself;" the following words, however, indicate that the sense is not materially different from purchasing, as that term is used elsewhere. (h.) The word "satisfaction" is not found in the N. T., but it occurs twice in the Old (Numb. xxxv, 31, 32). It is there a translation of קָפַר or λύτρον, "that which expiates" or "ransoms." The use of these terms, in reference to the N. T. doctrine, implies that what was done and paid in the death of our Lord satisfied the claims of justice, and answered all the moral purposes which God deemed necessary, under a system of holy law. (i.) The word "substitution" is not to be found in either Testament, but the idea is frequently expressed in both: "it shall be accepted for him" (Lev. i, 4; vii, 18) is the O. T. phrase, and the New corresponds. There we find in frequent use ἰπέρ, and ἄντι, the former meaning "on behalf of," "for," and "instead," and the latter meaning undoubtedly "instead of." Much stress ought not to be laid upon the first of these terms, as it is frequently used where it may mean "for the advantage of" (Rom. viii, 26, 31; 2 Cor. i, 2); yet in John xv, 13, and 1 John ii, 16, it seems to mean "instead of;" and this is certainly the meaning of ἄντι (Matt. xx, 28; Mark x, 45; see Matt. ii, 22, "in the room of"). Apart, however, from particular prepositions, three sets of phrases clearly teach this doctrine. (1) Christ was made a curse for us (Gal. iii, 13); so a similar phrase (2 Cor. v, 21). (2)

He gave himself as a sacrifice for our sins (1 Cor. xv, 3; Eph. v, 2; Gal. i, 4; 1 Tim. ii, 6, 14; Heb. vii, 27; v, 1, 3; x, 12; Rom. v, 6, 7, 8; 1 Cor. i, 13; v, 7; xi, 21; 1 Pet. iii, 18; iv, 1). (3) Christ gave his life for our life, or we live by his death (Gal. ii, 20; Rom. xiv, 15; 2 Cor. v, 15). Compare Rom. xvi, 4; Isa. liii, 45). The idea of substitution is in all these passages, and the phrase, though not scriptural, is a convenient summary of them all. (j.) "Salvation" is everywhere in the N. T. the representative of σωτηρία or σωτήριον; σωτηρία is always translated "salvation" except in three passages (Acts vii, 25; xxvii, 34, and Heb. xi, 7, where it refers to temporal deliverance), and the idea included in the term is whatever blessings redemption includes, but without any reference to λήτρωσις, or anything else as the ground of them. It includes present deliverance (Luke xix, 9) or future (Phil. i, 19; Rom. xiii, 11). "Salvation," therefore, is the state into which the Gospel introduces all who believe, and without reference to the means used. On turning to the Sept., however, we find that the idea of propitiation is involved even here; σωτήριον is very frequently the translation of שָׁלוֹם (שָׁלוֹם), peace-offering, זָבַח שְׁלוֹמִיָּהוּ (Lev. iii, 1-3; iv, 10; vii, 20; xi, 4; Judg. xx, 26; xxi, 4). שָׁלוֹם is the sacrifice or retribution restoring peace, and thus the meaning of σωτήριον touches upon the meaning of propitiation.

"From this comparison, therefore, of the N. T., the Sept., and the Hebrew, we gather the following conclusions: Propitiation, giving prominence to the secondary meaning of ἔλεος, compassion, and the primary meaning of ἐξάλασκαται, is an act prompting to the exercise of mercy, and providing for its exercise in a way consistent with justice; Expiation, giving prominence to the primary meaning of ἔλεος and the secondary meaning of ἐξάλασκαται, is an act which provides for the removal of sin, and cancels the obligation to punishment; Atonement, giving prominence to both, and meaning expiation and propitiation combined. Christ's atonement is said to be by substitution, for he suffered in our stead, and he bears our sin; and it is by satisfaction, for the broken law is vindicated, all the purposes of punishment are answered with honor to the Law-giver, and eventual holiness to the Christian. Its result is reconciliation (κατάλλαξις); the moral sentiment of justice in God is reconciled to the sinner, and provision is made for the removal of our enmity; and it is redemption, or actual deliverance for a price from sin in its guilt and dominion, from all misery, and from death. Substitution is also actual deliverance, but without a distinct reference to a price paid. Atonement, therefore, is something offered to God; redemption or salvation is something bestowed upon man; atonement is the ground of redemption, and redemption is the result of atonement (Isa. liii, 4-9, 10, 12). The design of the first is to satisfy God's justice, the design of the second to make man blessed; the first was finished upon the cross, the second is in daily operation, and will not be completed in the case of the whole church till the consummation of all things (Dan. ix, 24; Eph. iv, 20)."

2. The Scripture doctrine of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ is taught in the passages above cited, and indeed seems to underlie the whole "go-pel" of salvation contained in the teaching of Christ and his apostles. It may be stated further (1) that the sacrifices of the O. T. were (at least many of them) expiatory [see this shown under EXPIATION], and the terms used by Christ and his apostles (ransom, sacrifice, offering, etc.) were necessarily understood by their hearers in the sense which they had been accustomed for ages to attach to them. (2) If this be so, then nothing could be more misleading, and even absurd, than to employ those terms which, both among Jews and Gentiles, were in use to express the various processes and means of atonement and placular propitiation, if the apostles and Christ himself did not intend to represent his death strictly as an expiation for sin; misleading, because such would be the natural and necessary inference from the terms themselves, which had acquired this as their established meaning; and absurd, because if, as Socinians say, they used them metaphorically, there was not even an ideal resemblance between the figures and that which it was intended to illustrate. So totally irrelevant, indeed, will those terms appear to any notion entertained of the death of Christ which excludes its expiatory character, that to assume that our Lord and his apostles used them as metaphors is profanely to assume them to be such writers as would not in any other case be tolerated; writers wholly unacquainted with the commonest rules of language, and, therefore, wholly unfit to be teachers of others, and that not only in religion, but in things of inferior importance" (Watson, Dict. s. v. Expiation).

Immediately upon the first public manifestation of Christ, John the Baptist declares, when he sees Jesus coming to him, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i, 29); where it is obvious that, when John called our Lord "the Lamb of God," he spoke of him under a sacrificial character, and of the effect of that sacrifice as an atonement for the sins of mankind. This was said of our Lord even before he entered on his public office; but if any doubt should exist respecting the meaning of the Baptist's expression, it is removed by other passages, in which a similar allusion is adopted, and in which it is specifically applied to the death of Christ as an atonement for sin. In the Acts (viii, 32) the following words of Isaiah (liiii, 7) are by Philip the Evangelist distinctly applied to Christ and to his death: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth: in his humiliation his judgment was taken away; and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth." This particular part of the prophecy being applied to our Lord's death, the whole must relate to the same subject, for it is undoubtedly one entire prophecy; and the other expressions in it are still stronger: "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed: the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." In the First Epistle of Peter is also a strong and very apposite text, in which the application of the term "lamb" to our Lord, and the sense in which it is applied, can admit of no doubt: "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Pet. i, 18, 19). It is therefore evident that the prophet Isaiah, seven hundred years before the birth of Jesus; that John the Baptist, at the commencement of Christ's ministry; and that Peter, his companion and apostle, subsequent to the transaction, speak of Christ's death as an atonement for sin under the figure of a lamb sacrificed. The passages that follow plainly and distinctly declare the atoning efficacy of Christ's death: "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix, 26, 28). "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, forever sat down on the right hand of God; for by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x, 12). It is observable that nothing similar is said of the death of any other person, and that no such efficacy is imputed to any other martyrdom. "While we were yet sinners Christ died for us; much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him; for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life" (Rom. v, 8-10). The words "reconciled to God by the death of his Son" show that his death had an efficacy in our reconciliation; but reconciliation is only preparatory to salvation. "He has reconciled us to his Father in his cross, and in the body of his flesh through death" (Col. i, 20, 22). What is said of reconciliation in these texts is in some other spoken of sanctification, which is also preparatory to salvation. "We are sanctified"—how? "by the offering of the body of Christ once for all" (Heb. x, 10). In the same epistle (x, 29), the blood of Jesus is called "the blood of the covenant by which we are sanctified." In these and many other passages that occur in different parts of the New Testament, it is therefore asserted that the death of Christ was efficacious in the procuring of human salvation. Such expressions are used concerning no other person, and the death of no other person; and it is therefore evident that Christ's death included something more than a confirmation of his preaching; something more than a pattern of a holy and patient martyrdom; something more than a necessary antecedent to his resurrection, by which he gave a grand and clear proof of our resurrection from the dead. Christ's death was all these, but it was much more. It was an atonement for the sins of mankind, and in this way only it became the accomplishment of our eternal redemption.

The teaching of the New Testament, and the agreement of the statements of Christ with those of his apostles on this subject, are thus set forth (without regard to theological distinctions) by Dr. Thomson, bishop of Gloucester: "God sent his Son into the world to redeem lost and ruined man from sin and death, and the Son willingly took upon him the form of a servant for this purpose; and thus the Father and the Son manifested their love for us. God the Father laid upon his Son the weight of the sins of the whole world, so that he bare in his own body the wrath which men must else have borne, because there was no other way of escape for them; and thus the atonement was a manifestation of divine justice. The effect of the atonement thus wrought is that man is placed in a new position, freed from the dominion of sin, and able to follow holiness, and thus the doctrine of the atonement ought to work in all the hearers a sense of love, of obedience, and of self-sacrifice. In shorter words, the sacrifice of the death of Christ is a proof of divine love and of divine justice, and is for us a document of obedience. Of the four great writers of the New Testament, Peter, Paul, and John set forth every one of these points. Peter, the witness of the sufferings of Christ, tells us that we were 'redeemed with the blood of Jesus, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot;' says that 'Christ bare our sins in his own body on the tree.' If we 'have tasted that the Lord is gracious,' we must not rest satisfied with a contemplation of our redeemed state, but must live a life worthy of it. No one can well doubt, who reads the two epistles, that the love of God and Christ, and the justice of God, and the duties thereby laid on us, all have their value in them; but the love is less dwelt on than the justice, while the most prominent idea of all is the moral and practical working of the cross of Christ upon the lives of men. With St. John, again, all three points find place: that Jesus willingly laid down his life for us, and is an advocate with the Father; that He is also the propitiation, the suffering sacrifice for our sins; and that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin, for that whoever is born of God doth not commit sin: all are put forward. The death of Christ is both justice and love—both a propitiation and an act of loving self-surrender; but the moral effect upon us is more prominent even than these. In the epistles of Paul the three elements are all present: in such expressions as a ransom, a propitiation who was 'made sin for us,' the wrath of God against sin, and the mode in which it was turned away, are presented to us. Yet not wrath alone: 'The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again.' Love in him begets love in us; and, in our reconciled state, the holiness which we could not practice before becomes easy. Now in which of these points is there the semblance of contradiction between the apostles and their Master? In none of them. In the gospels, as in the epistles, Jesus is held up as the sacrifice and victim, quaffing a cup from which his human nature shrank, feeling in him a sense of desolation such as we fail utterly to comprehend on a theory of human motives. Yet no one takes from him his precious redeeming life; he lays it down of himself out of his great love for men; but men are to deny themselves, and take up their cross, and tread in his steps. They are his friends only if they keep his commands and follow his footsteps" (Vids to Faith, p. 337. See also Storr and Flatt, Biblical Theology, § 65-70).

II. History of the Doctrine.—(1.) The Fathers.—In the early ages of the church the atoning work of Christ was spoken of generally in the words of Scripture. The value of the sufferings and death of Christ, in the work of redemption, was from the beginning loth held in Christian faith, and also plainly set forth, but the doctrine was not scientifically developed by the primitive fathers. But it is one thing to admit that the atonement was not scientifically apprehended, and quite another thing to assert that it was not really held at all in the sense of vicarious sacrifice. The relation between the death of Christ and the remission of sins was not a matter of much dispute in that early period. The person of Christ was the great topic of metaphysical-theological inquiry, and it was not until after this was settled by the general prevalence of the Nicene Creed that anthropological and sociological questions came up into decided prominence. Baur (in whose Versöhnungslehre this subject is treated with ample learning, though often with dogmatic assertion of conclusions arrived at hastily and without just ground) admits that in the writings of the apostolical fathers there is abundant recognition of the sacrificial and redemptive death of Christ. Thus Barnabas: "The Lord condescended to deliver his body to death, that, by remission of our sins, we might be sanctified, and this is effected by the shedding of his blood" (c. v). So also Clement quotes Isa. liii and Psa. xxiii, 7, 9, adding, "His blood was shed for our salvation; by the will of God he has given his body for our body, his soul for our soul." Similar passages exist in Irenæus and Polycarp, and stronger still in the Epist. ad Diognet. ch. ix. (See citations in Shedd, History of Doctrines, bk. v, ch. i; Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 68; Thomson, Bampton Lectures, 1853, Lect. vi). In the second century Justin Martyr (A. D. 147) says that "the Father willed that his Christ should take upon himself the curses of all for the whole race of man" (Dial. c. Tryph. 95). "In Justin may be found the idea of satisfaction rendered by Christ through suffering, at least lying at the bottom, if not clearly grasped in the form of conscious thought" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 20; Neander, Ch. History, i, 642). The victory of the death of Christ over the power of the devil begins now to play a prominent part in the idea of the atonement. Baur maintains that this was really due to Gnostic ideas taken up into the line of Christian thought; "that as the relation between the Demiurge and Redeemer was, in the Marcionite and Ophitic systems, essentially hostile, so the death of Jesus was a contrivance of the Demiurge, which failed of its purpose and disappointed him." Baur asserts that Irenæus (A. D. 180) borrowed this idea from Gnosticism, only substituting Satan for the Demiurge. But Dörner shows clearly that Irenæus, with entire knowledge of Gnosticism, repelled all its ideas, and that Baur's charge rests upon a misinterpretation of a passage (Adv. Her. v. 1. 1) in which, although the Satanic idea is prominent, it is far removed from Gnosticism (Dörner, Person of Christ, i. 463; see also Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, ii. 213). Baur's theory that the foundations of the doctrine of vicarious satisfaction were laid in the notion that it was the claims of Satan, and not of God, that were satisfied, falls to the ground; for "if this theory can be found in any of the fathers, it is in Irenæus" (Shedd, l. c.). Nevertheless, it is true (though not in the Gnostic spirit) that Irenæus represents the sufferings of Christ as made necessary by the hold of Satan on man, and in order to a rightful deliverance from that bondage. Tertullian (A.D. 200) uses the word satisfactio, but not with reference to the vicarious sufferings of Christ, yet in several of his writings he assumes the efficacious work of Christ's sufferings for salvation. In the Alexandrian fathers we find, as might be expected, the Gnostic influence more obvious, and the idea of ransom paid to the devil comes out fully in Origen (A.D. 230). Yet it is going quite too far to say that Origen does not recognise the vicarious suffering of Christ; so (Hom. 24 on Numbers) he says that "the entrance of sin into the world made a propitiation necessary, and there can be no propitiation without a sacrificial offering." Dr. Shedd finds the general doctrine of the Alexandrian school inconsistent with vicarious atonement, and interprets the special passages which imply it accordingly; but in this he differs from Thomasius (Origenes, Nürnberg, 1837) and Thomson (Bampton Lectures). Origen doubtless held the vicarious atonement, though it was mixed up with speculations as to the value of the blood of the martyrs, and debased by his fanciful views of the relation of Christ's work to the devil. This was carried to a greater extent by later fathers, e. g. Gregory of Nyssa (A.D. 370), who says in substance that the devil was cheated in the transaction by a just retaliation for his deception of men: "Men have come under the dominion of the devil by sin. Jesus offered himself to the devil as the ransom for which he should release all others. The crafty devil assented, because he cared more for the one Jesus, who was so much superior to him, than for all the rest. But, notwithstanding his craft, he was deceived, since he could not retain Jesus in his power. It was, as it were, a deception on the part of God (ἀπάτη τις ἕνεκα πρῶτου τινός), that Jesus veiled his divine nature, which the devil would have feared, by means of his humanity, and thus deceived the devil by the appearance of flesh" (Græc. Catech. 22-26). Athanasius (A.D. 370), on the other hand, not only maintained the expiation of Christ, but rejected the fanciful Satan theory (De Incarn. Verbi, vi. et al.). Cyril of Jerusalem (A.D. 350) (Catech. xii. § 33) enters more deeply into this doctrine, developing a theory to show why it was necessary that Jesus should die for man. Similar views were expressed by Eusebius of Cæsarea, Gregory of Nazianzen, Cyril of Alexandria, and Chrysostom (See Gieseler, Dogmengeschichte, p. 285). Several of these fathers also maintain that Christ, by his death, did more than would have been necessary for the redemption of men. They undertook to show that Christ alone was able to achieve redemption, and discussed the qualities which were necessary for his redemptive character. These discussions are especially met with in the writings against the Arians and the Nestorians. Augustine (A.D. 388) was occupied more, in all his controversies, with anthropology than with soteriology, but the vicarious atonement is clearly taught or implied in his De Trinit. Meritis, i. 36, and in other places; but he called these debts (debita) who maintained that God could provide no other means of redemption (De Agone Christ. c. 1). Gregory the Great

(A.D. 590) taught the doctrine with great clearness, and approached the scientific precision of a later age (Moralia, xvii, 36). Little is to be added to these statements up to the time of Anselm. Enough has been said to show that, although the earlier view may have been incomplete and mingled with error, it is wrong to assert, as Baur and his English followers (Jowett, Garden, etc.) do, that the "doctrine of substitution is not in the fathers, and lay dormant till the voice of Anselm woke it; or that Anselm was the inventor of the doctrine." (Comp. Brit. and For. Er. Review, Jan. 1861, p. 48.)

2. The Scholastic Period.—Nevertheless, Anselm († 1109) undoubtedly gave the doctrine a more scientific form by giving the central position to the idea of satisfaction to the divine justice (Cur Deus homo? transl. in Bibliotheca Sacra, vols. xi, xii). Nicholas of Methone (11th or 12th cent.?), in the Greek Church, developed the necessity of vicarious satisfaction from the nature of God and his relations to man, but it is not certain that he had not seen Anselm's writings. Anselm's view is, in substance, as follows: "The infinite guilt which man had contracted by the dishonor of his sin against the infinitely great God could be atoned for by no mere creature; only the God-man Christ Jesus could render to God the infinite satisfaction required. God only can satisfy himself. The human nature of Christ enables him to incur, the infinity of his divine nature to pay this debt. But it was incumbent upon Christ as a man to order his life according to the law of God; the obedience of his life, therefore, was not able to render satisfaction for our guilt. But, although he was under obligation to live in obedience to the law, as the Holy One he was under no obligation to die. Seeing, then, that he nevertheless voluntarily surrendered his infinitely precious life to the honor of God, a recompense from God became his due, and his recompense consists in the forgiveness of the sins of his brethren" (Chambers, Encycl. s. v.; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, Boln's ed. ii, 517). Anselm rejects entirely the claims of Satan, and places the necessity of atonement entirely in the justice of God. His theory is defective with regard to the appropriation of the merits of Christ by the believer; but, on the whole, it is substantially that in which the Christian Church has rested from that time forward. His doctrine was opposed by Abelard, who treated the atonement in its relation to the love of God, and not to his justice, giving it moral rather than legal significance. Peter Lombard seems confusedly to blend Abelard's views and Anselm's. Thomas Aquinas developed Anselm's theory, and brought out also the superabundant merit of his death, while he does not clearly affirm the absolute necessity of the death of Christ (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 181). See AQUINAS. Bernard of Clairvaux, in opposition to Abelard, brought up again the idea of the claims of Satan. Duns Scotus, in opposition to Anselm, denied the necessity of Christ's death, and denied also that the satisfaction rendered was an equivalent for the claims of justice, holding that God accepted Christ's sacrifice as sufficient. See ACCEPTATION. On the whole, the scholastic period left two streams of thought closely allied, yet with an element of difference afterward fully developed, viz. the Anselmic, of the satisfaction of divine justice, absolutely considered; and that of Aquinas, that this satisfaction was relative, and also superabundant. The Romish doctrine of supererogation and indulgence doubtless grew out of this.

3. From the Reformation.—All the great confessions—Greek, Roman, Lutheran, Reformed, and Methodist—agree in placing the salvation of the sinner in the mediatorial work of Christ. But there are various modes of apprehending the doctrine in this period (see Winer, Comparat. Darstellung, ch. vii). The Council of Trent confounds justification with sanctification, and hence denies that the satisfaction of Christ is the sole ground of the remission of sin (Cantones, De Justificatione, vii, viii). The Romanist writers generally adopt the "accipitation" theory of Scotus rather than that of Anselm, and hold that the death of Christ made satisfaction only for sins before baptism, while as to sins after baptism only the eternal punishment due to them is remitted; so that, for the temporal punishment due to them, satisfaction is still required by penance and purgatory. Luther does not treat of satisfaction in any special treatise; he was occupied rather with the appropriation of salvation by faith alone, though he held fast the doctrine of expiation through Christ. So, in Melancthon's Loc'i, and in the Augsburg Confession (A.D. 1530), the atoning work of Christ is fully stated, but under the head of justifying faith. "Men are justified gratuitously for Christ's sake through faith when they believe that they are received into favor, and that their sins are remitted on account of Christ, who made satisfaction for our transgressions by his death. This faith God imputes to us as righteousness" (Augsburg Confession, art. iv). The distinction between the active and passive obedience of Christ came later; its first clear statement in the Lutheran Church is in the Formula of Concord (1576): "That righteousness which is imputed to the believer simply by the grace of God is the obedience, the suffering, and the resurrection of Christ, by which he has satisfied the claims of the law and atoned for our sins. For as Christ is not merely man, but God and man in one person, he was, as Lord of the law, no more subject to it than he was subject to suffering death; hence not only his obedience to God the Father, as exhibited in his sufferings and death, but also by his righteous fulfillment of the law on our behalf, is imputed to us, and God acquits us of our sins, and regards us as just in view of his complete obedience in what he did and suffered, in life and in death" (Francke, Lib. Sym', 685). Nor did this distinction appear early among the Calvinists any more than among the Lutherans. Calvin joins them together (Institutes, bk. ii, §16, 5). None of the reformed confessions distinguish between the active and passive obedience before the Formula Consensus Helvetica (1675; comp. Guericke, Symbolik, §47).

The Socinians deny the vicarious atonement entirely. They assert that satisfaction and forgiveness are incompatible ideas; that the work of atonement is subjective, i. e. the repentance and moral renovation of the sinner; that God needs no reconciliation with man. Christ suffered, not to satisfy the divine justice, but as a martyr to his truth and an example to his followers. Socinus did, however, admit that the death of Christ affords a pledge of divine forgiveness, and of man's resurrection as following Christ's (see Winer, Comp. Darstellung, vii, 1; and comp. Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, §268; Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, bk. v).

In opposition to Socinus, Grotius wrote his D. fensio fidei Cathol. de Satisfactione (1617), which forms an epoch in the history of the doctrine. He deduced the necessity of satisfaction from the administrative or rectoral justice of God, and not from his retributive justice. He taught that the prerogative of punishing is to be ascribed to God, not as an injured party, but as moral governor of the world. So the prerogative of substitution, in place of punishment, belongs to God as moral governor. If, by any other means than punishment, he can vindicate the claims of justice, he is at liberty, as moral governor, to use those means. The atonement does thus satisfy justice; and through Christ's voluntary offering, the sinner can be pardoned and the law vindicated. The defect of this theory lies in its not referring the work of Christ sufficiently to the nature of God, contemplating it rather in its moral aspects as an exhibition of the evil of sin. The Dutch Arminian divines bring out more prominently the idea of sacrifice in the death of Christ. The Methodist theology asserts the doctrine of satisfaction strongly, e. g. Watson: "Satisfaction [by the death of Christ] by Christ is not to be regarded as a merely fit and wise expedient of government (to which Grotius leans too much), for this may imply that it was one of many other possible expedients, though the best; whereas we have seen that it is everywhere in Scripture represented as necessary to human salvation, and that it is to be concluded that no alternative existed but that of exchanging a righteous government for one careless and relaxed, to the dishonor of the divine attributes, and the sanctioning of moral disorder, or the upholding of such government by the personal and extreme punishment of every offender, or else the acceptance of the vicarious death of an infinitely dignified and glorious being, through whom pardon should be offered, and in whose hands a process for the moral restoration of the lapsed should be placed. The humiliation, sufferings, and death of such a being did most obviously demonstrate the righteous character and administration of God; and if the greatest means we can conceive was employed for this end, then we may safely conclude that the righteousness of God in the forgiveness of sin could not have been demonstrated by inferior means; and as God cannot cease to be a righteous governor, man in that case could have had no hope" (Watson, Theol. Institutes, vol. ii, pt. ii, ch. xx). The Arminian theology did nevertheless maintain that God is free, not necessitated as moral governor, and that the satisfaction of Christ has reference to the general justice of God, and not to his distributive justice. The Methodist theology also brings out prominently the love of God, which is organic and eternal in him—his essential nature—as the source of redemption, and holds that the free manifestation of the divine love is under no law of necessity. Even Ebrard, one of the most eminent modern writers of the Reformed Church, sets this forth as a great service rendered to theology by the Arminians (Ebrard, Lehre der stellvertretenden Genugthuung, Königsb. 1857, p. 25; compare also Warren, in Methodist Quarterly, July, 1866, 330 sq.; and, on the other side, Shedd, History of Doctrines, bk. v, ch. v; and his Discourses and Essays, 294). Hill (Calvinist), in his Lectures on Divinity (bk. iv, ch. iii), appears to adopt the Grotian theory.

Extent of the Atonement.—One of the most important questions in the modern Church with regard to the atonement is that of its extent, viz. whether the benefits of Christ's death were intended by God to extend to the whole human race, or only to a part. The former view is called universal or general atonement; the latter, particular, or limited. What is called the strict school of Calvinists holds the latter doctrine, as stated in the Westminster Confession. "As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ; are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only" (ch. iii, §6; comp. also ch. viii, §§5 and 8). The so-called moderate (or modern) Calvinists, the Arminians, the Church of England, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, adopt the doctrine of general or universal atonement. See CALVINISM. The advocates of a limited atonement maintain that the atonement cannot properly be considered apart from its actual application, or from the intention of the author in regard to its application; that, in strictness of speech, the death of Christ is not an atonement to any until it be applied; that the sufferings of the Lamb of God are therefore truly vicarious, or, in other words, that Christ, in suffering, became a real substitute for his people, was charged with their sins, and bore the punishment of them, and thus has made a full and complete satisfaction to divine justice in behalf of all who shall ever believe on him; that this atonement will eventually be applied to all for whom in the divine intention it was made, or to all to whom God in his sovereignty has been pleased to decree its application. But they believe that although the atonement is to be properly considered as exactly commensurate with its intended application, yet that the Lord Jesus Christ did offer a sacrifice sufficient in its intrinsic value to expiate the sins of the whole world, and that, if it had been the pleasure of God to apply it to every individual, the whole human race would have been saved by its immeasurable worth. They hold, therefore, that, on the ground of the infinite value of the atonement, the offer of salvation can be consistently and sincerely made to all who hear the Gospel, assuring them that if they will believe they shall be saved; whereas, if they willfully reject the overtures of mercy, they will increase their guilt and aggravate their damnation. At the same time, as they believe, the Scriptures plainly teach that the will and disposition to comply with this condition depends upon the sovereign gift of God, and that the actual compliance is secured to those only for whom, in the divine counsels, the atonement was specifically intended. The doctrine, on the other hand, that Christ died for all men, so as to make salvation attainable by all men, is maintained, first and chiefly, on scriptural ground, viz. that, according to the whole tenor of Scripture, the atonement of Christ was made for all men. The advocates of this view adduce, (1.) Passages which expressly declare the doctrine. [a] Those which say that Christ died "for all men," and speak of his death as an atonement for the sins of the whole world. [b] Those which attribute an equal extent to the death of Christ as to the effects of the fall. (2.) Passages which necessarily imply the doctrine, viz.: [a] Those which declare that Christ died not only for those that are saved, but for those who do or may perish. [b] Those which make it the duty of men to believe the Gospel, and place them under guilt and the penalty of death for rejecting it. [c] Those in which men's failure to obtain salvation is placed to the account of their own opposing wills, and made wholly their own fault. (See the argument in full, on the Arminian side, in Watson, Theol. Institutes, ii, 284 sq.; Storr and Platt, Bibl. Theol. gy., bk. iv, pt. ii; Fletcher, Works, ii, 63 et al.) The Arminian doctrine is summed up in the declaration that Christ "obtained (impestravit) for all men by his death reconciliation and the forgiveness of sins, but upon this condition, that none actually possess and enjoy this forgiveness of sins except believers" (Acta Synod. Remonst., pt. ii, p. 280; Nicholls, Arminianism and Calvinism, p. 114 sq.). It has been asserted (e. g. by Amyraut, q. v.) that Calvin himself held to general redemption; and certainly his language in his Comm. in Job, bk. iii, 15, 16, and in 1 Tim. ii, 5, seems fairly to assert the doctrine. Comp. Fletcher, Works (N. Y. ed. ii, 71); but see also Cunningham, The Reformers (Essay vii). As to the variations of the Calvinistic confessions, see Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 249. In the French Reformed Church, the divines of Saumur, Camero, Amyraut, and Placens maintained universal grace (see the articles on these names). The English divines who attended the Synod of Dort (Hall, Hales, Davenant) all advocated general atonement, in which they were followed by Baxter (Universal Redemption; Methodus Theologicus; Orme, Life of Baxter, ii, 61). The most able advocate of universal grace in the 17th century was John Goodwin, Redemption Redeemed, 1650 (see Jackson, Life of Goodwin, 1828).

On the other hand, Owen, the so-called strict Calvinists of England, and the Old-School Presbyterian Church in America, adhere to the Westminster Confession, interpreting it as maintaining limited atonement. Their doctrine on the whole subject in substance is, that the atonement was made and intended only for the elect; and that its necessity with respect to them arose out of the eternal justice of God, which required that every individual should receive his due desert; and, consequently, that the sufferings of Christ were the endurance of punishment equivalent in amount of suffering, if not identical in nature (as Owen maintains) with that to which the elect were exposed; and, moreover, that the meritorious obedience of Christ in fulfilling the law imputes a righteousness to those for whom the atonement secures salvation, which gives them a claim to the reward of righteousness in everlasting life. The differences of view in the two divisions of the Presbyterian Church in America are thus stated by Dr. Duffield: "Old-School Presbyterians regard the satisfaction rendered to the justice of God by the obedience and death of Christ as explicable upon principles of justice recognised among men in strict judiciary procedures. While they concede that there is grace on the part of God in its application to the believer, inasmuch as he has provided in Christ a substitute for him, they nevertheless insist that he is pardoned and justified of God as judge, and as matter of right and strict justice in the eye of the law, inasmuch as his claims against him have all been met and satisfied by his surety. The obligations in the Lord having been discharged by his security, the judge, according to this view, is bound to give sentence of release and acquittal to the original failing party, the grace shown being in the acceptance of the substitute. Their ideas of the nature of the divine justice, exercised in the pardon and justification of the sinner because of the righteousness of Christ, are all taken from the transactions of a court of law. New-School Presbyterians, equally with the Old, concede the grace of God in the substitution of Christ, the whole work of his redemption to be the development of 'the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Jesus Christ'; but they prefer to regard and speak of the atonement of Christ, his obedience and death, by which he satisfied the justice of God for our sins, as the great expedient and governmental procedure adopted by the great God of heaven and of earth in his character of chief executive, the governor of the universe, in order to magnify his law and make it honorable, rather than as a juridical plea to obtain a sentence in court for discharging an accused party on trial" (Bibliotheca Sacra, xx, 418).

The doctrine of Payne, Wardlaw, Pyc Smith, and other so-called moderate Calvinists in England, and of many in America, is in substance that the atonement consists in "that satisfaction for sin which was rendered to God as moral governor of the world by the obedience unto death of his son Jesus Christ. This satisfaction preserves the authority of the moral government of God, and yet enables him to forgive sinners. That this forgiveness could not be given by God without atonement constitutes its necessity. The whole contents of Christ's earthly existence, embracing both his active and passive obedience—a distinction which is unsupported by the Word of God—must be regarded as contributing to the atonement which he made. As to the 'extent' of the atonement, there is a broad distinction to be made between the sufficiency of the atonement and its efficacy. It may be true that Jehovah did not intend to exercise that influence of the Holy Spirit upon all which is necessary to secure the salvation of any one; but as the atonement was to become the basis of moral government, it was necessary that it should be one of infinite worth, and so in itself adequate to the salvation of all." In New England the younger Edwards († 1801) modified the Calvinistic doctrine of the atonement, representing it, as the Arminians do, as a satisfaction to the general justice, and not to the distributive justice of God. Among American Calvinistic divines Dr. E. D. Griffin holds a very high place. His "Humble Attempt to reconcile the Differences of Christians" was republished by Dr. E. A. Park in 1859, in a volume of essays on the atonement by eminent New England divines. A summary of it is given in the Bibliotheca Sacra for Jan. 1858, and is noticed in the Methodist Quarterly, April, 1858, p. 311. "Dr. Griffin held that the atonement was not a literal suffering of the penalty, nor a literal satisfaction of the distributive justice of God, nor a literal removal of our desert of eternal death, nor a literal surplusage of Christ's meritorious personal obedience becoming our imputed obedience. On the other hand, the atonement was a divine method by which the literal suffering of the penalty might be dispensed with, by which government could be sustained and honored without inflicting distributive justice, by which the acceptors of the work might be saved without the removal of their intrinsic desert of hell; and all this without imputing Christ's personal obedience as our personal obedience, but by Christ obtaining a meritorious right to save us, as his own exceeding great reward from God." The article named in the Bibliotheca Sacra contains a valuable sketch of the rise of the "Edwardian theory of the atonement," and sums up that theory itself as follows: "1. Our Lord suffered pains which were substituted for the penalty of the law, and may be called punishment in the more general sense of that word, but were not, strictly and literally, the penalty which the law had threatened. 2. The sufferings of our Lord satisfied the general justice of God, but did not satisfy his distributive justice. 3. The humiliation, pains, and death of our Redeemer were equivalent in meaning to the punishment threatened in the moral law, and thus they satisfied Him who is determined to maintain the honor of this law, but they did not satisfy the demands of the law itself for our punishment. 4. The active obedience, viewed as the holiness of Christ, was honorable to the law, but was not a work of supererogation performed by our substitute, and then transferred and imputed to us, so as to satisfy the requisitions of the law for our own active obedience. The last three statements are sometimes comprehended in the more general proposition that the atonement was equal, in the meaning and spirit of it, to the payment of our debts; but it was not literally the payment of either our debt of obedience or our debt of punishment, or any other debt which we owed to law or distributive justice. Therefore, 5. The law and the distributive justice of God, although honored by the life and death of Christ, will yet eternally demand the punishment of every one who has sinned. 6. The atonement rendered it consistent and desirable for God to save all who exercise evangelical faith, yet it did not render it obligatory in him, in distributive justice, to save them. 7. The atonement was designed for the welfare of all men, to make the eternal salvation of all men possible, to remove all the obstacles which the honor of the law and of distributive justice presented against the salvation of the non-elect as well as the elect. 8. The atonement does not constitute the reason why some men are regenerated and others not, but this reason is found only in the sovereign, electing will of God: 'Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.' 9. The atonement is useful on men's account, and in order to furnish new motives to holiness; but it is necessary on God's account, and in order to enable him, as a consistent ruler, to pardon any, even the smallest sin, and therefore to bestow on sinners any, even the smallest favor." That this so-called "Edwardian theory" is in substance the Arminian theory, is shown by Dr. Warren in the Methodist Quarterly for July, 1860. See also Fiske, The New England Theology (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865, p. 571).

As to minor forms of opinion we must be very brief. The orthodox Quakers admit the doctrine of the atoning death of Christ, but not the full Anselmic doctrine of satisfaction; thus W. Penn: "We cannot say the sufferings and death of Christ were a strict and rigid satisfaction for that eternal death and misery due to man for sin and transgression. As Christ died for sin, so we must die to sin, or we cannot be saved by the death and sufferings of Christ." Barclay treats redemption as twofold: one wrought out in the body of Christ upon the cross, the other wrought in man by the spirit of Christ (Apol. Theol., vii, 3). Zinzendorf and the Moravians made the doctrine of atonement, in its more internal connection with the Christian life, the essence of Christianity, but at the same time gave to it a certain sensuous aspect. On mystical grounds, the doctrine of atonement was altogether rejected by Swedenborg. Kant assigned to the death of Christ only a symbolico-moral significance: "Man must, after all, deliver himself. A substitution, in the proper sense of the word, cannot take place; moral liabilities are not transmissible like debts. The sinner who reforms suffers, as does the impenitent; but the former suffers willingly for the sake of virtue. Now what takes place internally in the repentant sinner takes place in Christ, as the personification of the idea of suffering for sin. In the death which he suffered once for all, he represents for all mankind what the new man takes upon himself while the old man is dying" (Religion innerhalb d. Grenzen d. blossen Vernunft, p. 87, cited by Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 360). The Rationalists of Germany lost sight even of the symbolical in the merely moral, but De Wette made the symbolical more prominent. Schleiermacher represented the sufferings of Christ as vicarious, but not as making satisfaction; and his obedience as making satisfaction, but not as vicarious. He held that "the redeeming and atoning principle is not the single fact that Christ died, but the vital union of man with Christ. By means of this vital union, man appropriates the righteousness of Christ" (Schleiermacher, Christl. Glaube, ii, 103, 128, cited by Hagenbach, l. c.). The Hegelian speculative school of German theology regards the death of the God-man as "the cessation of being another (Aufheben des Andersseins), and the necessary return of the life of God, which had assumed a finite form, into the sphere of the infinite." Some of the strict supernaturalists (e. g. Stier) find fault with the theory of Anselm, and endeavor to substitute for it one which they regard as more scriptural; and in 1856, even among the strict Lutherans of Germany, a controversy arose on this doctrine which is at present (1866) not yet ended; Prof. Hofmann, in Erlangen, rejects the idea of vicarious satisfaction, which is defended by Prof. Philippi and others. Schneider, in Stud. u. Krit. Sept. 1860, shows clearly that Anselm's doctrine is that of the Lutheran as well as of the Reformed Church, in opposition to Hofmann, who maintains that his view accords with the church doctrine as well as with Scripture. See also Smith's Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 500, and the references there given. The modern Unitarian view may perhaps be safely gathered, in its best form, from the following statement of one of its ablest writers: "There is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.' This can only refer to unrivalled pre-eminence, not to exclusive function. For all higher minds do, in fact, mediate between their less gifted fellow-creatures and the great realities of the invisible world. This 'one' is a human mediator, 'the man Christ Jesus'; not a being from another sphere, an angel, or a God, but a brother from the Losom of our own human family. 'He gave himself a ransom for all' who embrace his offers and will hearken to his voice. He brings from God a general summons to repent, and with that he conveys, through faith, a spiritual power to shake off the bondage of sin, and put on the freedom of a new heart and a new life. He is a deliverer from the power of sin and the fear of death. This is the cut of his mediation. This is the redemption of which he paid the price. His death, cheerfully met in the inevitable sequence of faithful duty, was only one among many links in the chain of instrumentalities by which that deliverance was effected. It was a proof such as could be given in no other way of trust in God and immortality, of fidelity to duty, and of love for mankind. In those who earnestly contemplated it and saw all that it implied, it awoke a tender response of gratitude and confidence which softened the obdurate heart, and opened it to serious impressions and the quickening influences of a religious spirit" (Taylor, Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty).

The semi-infidelity which has recently sprung up in high places in the Church of England, so far as it refers to the atonement, may be represented by Jowett as follows: "The only sacrifice, atonement, or satisfaction with which the Christian has to do is a moral and spiritual one; not the pouring out of blood upon the earth, but the living sacrifice 'to do thy will, O God,' in which the believer has part as well as his Lord; about the meaning of which there can be no more question in our day than there was in the first ages." "Heathen and Jewish sacrifices rather show us what the sacrifice of Christ was not, than what it was. They are the dim, vague, rude, almost barbarous expression of that want in human nature which has received satisfaction in him only. Men are afraid of something; they wish to give away something; they feel themselves bound by something; the fear is done away, the gift offered, the obligation fulfilled in Christ. Such fears and desires can no more occupy their souls; they are free to lead a better life; they are at the end of the old world, and at the beginning of a new one. The work of Christ is set forth in Scripture under many different figures, lest we should rest in one only. His death, for instance, is described as a ransom. He will set the captives free. Ransom is deliverance to the captive. 'Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin.' Christ delivers from sin. 'If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.' To whom? for what was the ransom paid? are questions about which Scripture is silent, to which reason refuses to answer" (Jowett, On St. Paul's Epistles, ii, 368). See also Essays and Reviews; Replies to Essays and Reviews; Aids to Faith (all republished in New York). Maurice (Theological Essays; Doctrine of Sacrifice; Tracts for Priests and People) is uncertain and obscure in this, as in other points of theology (see Hitzg. Anglican Theology; and Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865, 653). The so-called Broad School, in the Church of England, tends to eviscerate the atonement of all meaning except as a moral illustration or example. Dr. Bushnell (of Hartford) has set forth some of the old heresies in very attractive style in his God in Christ (1819), and Vicious Sacrifice (1865). In the former work he distinguishes three forms of the doctrine of atonement—"the Protestant form, which takes the ritualistic (objective) side of the Gospel, but turns it into a human dogma; the speculative, or philosophic form, identifying atonement with reconciliation of men unto God, one of the varieties of which is the Unitarian doctrine, which 'pumps out' the contents of these holy forms; and the Romish form, which passes beyond the ritual, objective view, and Judaizes or paganizes it by dealing with blood as a real and miraculous entity." In the latter work he makes "the sacrifice and cross of Christ his simple duty, and not any superlative, optional kind of good, outside of all the common principles of virtue. . . . It is only just as good as it ought to be, or the highest law of right required it to be." He holds that Christ did not satisfy, by his own suffering, the violated justice of God. Christ did not come to the world to die, but died simply because he was here; there was nothing penal in the agony and the cross; the importance of the physical sufferings of Christ consists to us not in what they are, but in what they express or morally signify; Christ is not a ground, but a power of justification; and the Hebrew sacrifices were not types of Christ to them who worshiped in them, but were only necessary as types of Christian language (see Methodist Quarterly, Jan. 1851, p. 114; American Presby. Review, Jan. 1866, p. 162). A view somewhat similar to Bushnell's is given by Schultz, Begriff d. stellvertretendn Leidens (Basel, 1864). See N. Brit. Rev. June, 1867, art. iii.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF (יָוֵם הַכִּיפּוּרִים, yom kippurim), day of the expiations; Sept. ἡμέρα ἐξιδασμοῦ, Vulg. dies expiationum or dies propitiationis, the Jewish day of annual expiation for national sin. In the Talmud this day is called יוֹם הַכִּיפּוּרִים, great fasting, and so in Philo, ὑψηλαίς ἐσπρήν (Lib. de Sept. v, 47, ed. Tauchn.); and in Acts xxvii, 9, ἡ ὑψηραία. The Talmudical writers, however, often designate it merely as יוֹם הַכִּיפּוּרִים, the day; a circumstance which has suggested to some commentators the notion that by ἡμέρα (Heb. vii, 27) the apostle intended this atonement day. Though perhaps originally meant as a temporary day of expiation for the sin of the golden calf (as some would infer from Exod. xxxiii), yet it was permanently instituted by Moses as a day of atonement for sins in general; indeed, it was the great day of national humiliation, and the only one commanded in the Mosaic law, though the later Jews, in commemoration of some disastrous events, especially those which occurred at and after the destruction of the two temples, instituted a few more fast days, which they observed with scarcely less rigor and strictness than the one ordained by Moses for the purpose of general absolution (Hottinger, Solen. expiationum dei, Tigur. 1754). See FAST.

I. The Time.—It was kept on the tenth day of Tisri, that is, from the evening of the ninth to the evening of the tenth of that month, five days before the Feast of Tabernacles. See FESTIVAL. This would correspond to the early part of October. See CALENDAR (JEWISH). This great fast, like all others among the Jews, commenced at sunset of the previous day, and lasted twenty-four hours, that is, from sunset to sunset, or, as the rabbins will have it, until three stars were visible in the horizon.—Kitto, s. v. See DAY.

II. Commemorative Signification.—Some have inferred from Lev. xvi, 1, that the day was instituted on account of the sin and punishment of Nadab and Abihu. Maimonides (Mora Nevochim, xviii) regards it as a commemoration of the day on which Moses came down from the mount with the second tables of the law, and proclaimed to the people the forgiveness of their great sin in worshipping the golden calf (q. v.).

III. Scriptural Prescriptions respecting it.—The mode of its observance is described in Lev. xvi, where it should be noticed that in v. 3 to 10 an outline of the whole ceremonial is given, while in the rest of the chapter certain points are mentioned with more details. The victims which were offered, in addition to those strictly belonging to the special service of the day, and to those of the usual daily sacrifice, are enumerated in Num. xxix, 7-11; and the conduct of the people is emphatically enjoined in Lev. xxiii, 26-32. The ceremonies were of a very laborious character, especially for the high-priest, who had to prepare himself during the previous seven days in nearly solitary confinement for the peculiar services that awaited him, and abstain during that period from all that could render him unclean, or disturb his devotions. It was kept by the people as a solemn sabbath. They were commanded to set aside all work and "to afflict their souls," under pain of being "cut off from among the people." It was on this occasion only that the high-priest was permitted to enter into the Holy of Holies.

1. Having bathed his person and dressed himself entirely in the holy white linen garments, he brought forward a young bullock for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, purchased at his own cost, on account of himself and his family, and two young goats for a sin-offering with a ram for a burnt-offering, which were paid for out of the public treasury, on account of the people. He then presented the two goats before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle and east lots upon them. On one lot the word יָחַד (i. e. for Jehovah) was inscribed, and on the other אֲזַזְלֵךְ (i. e. for Azazel). He next sacrificed the young bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family. Taking with him some of the blood of the bullock, he filled a censer with burning coals from the brazen altar, took a handful of incense, and entered into the most holy place. He then threw the incense upon the coals and enveloped the mercy-seat in a cloud of smoke. Then, dipping his finger into the blood, he sprinkled it seven times before the mercy-seat, eastward. (See Lev. xvi, 14. The English version, "upon the mercy-seat," appears to be opposed to every Jewish authority. [See Drusius in loc. in the Criticæ Sacre.] It has, however, the support of Ewald's authority. The Vulgate omits the clause; the Sept. follows the ambiguity of the Hebrew. The word eastward must mean either the direction in which the drops were thrown by the priest, or else on the east side of the ark, i. e. the side toward the vail. The last clause of the verse may be taken as a repetition of the command, for the sake of emphasis on the number of sprinklings: "And he shall take of the blood of the bullock and sprinkle it before the mercy-seat, on the east; and seven times shall he sprinkle the blood with his finger before the mercy-seat.") The goat upon which the lot "for Jehovah" had fallen was then slain, and the high-priest sprinkled its blood before the mercy-seat in the same manner as he had done that of the bullock. Going out from the Holy of Holies, he purified the holy place, sprinkling some of the blood of both the victims on the altar of incense. (That the altar of incense was thus purified on the day of atonement we learn expressly from Ex. xxx, 10. Most critics consider that this is what is spoken of in Lev. xvi, 18 and 20. But some suppose that it is the altar of burnt-offerings which is referred to in those verses, the purification of the altar of incense being implied in that of the holy place mentioned in ver. 16. Abenezra was of this opinion [see Drusius in loc.]. That the expression "before the Lord" does not necessarily mean within the tabernacle, is evident from Ex. xxix, 11. If the golden altar is here referred to, it seems remarkable that no mention is made in the ritual of the cleansing of the brazen altar. But perhaps the practice spoken of by Josephus and in the Mishna of pouring what remained of the mixed blood at the foot of the large altar was an ancient one, and was regarded as its purification.) At this time no one besides the high-priest was suffered to be present in the holy place. The purification of the Holy of Holies, and of the holy place, being thus completed, the high-priest laid his hands upon the head of the goat on which the lot "for Azazel" had fallen, and confessed over it all the sins of the people. The goat was then led, by a man chosen for the purpose, into the wilderness, into "a land not inhabited," and was there let loose.

2. The high-priest after this returned into the holy place, bathed himself again, put on his usual garments of office, and offered the two rams as burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people. He also burnt upon the altar the fat of the two sin-offerings, while their flesh was carried away and burned outside the camp. Those who took away the flesh and the man who had led away the goat had to bathe their persons and wash their clothes as soon as their service was performed.

The accessory burnt-offerings mentioned Num. xxix, 7-11, were a young bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a young goat. It would seem that (at least in the time of the second Temple) these were offered by the high-priest along with the evening sacrifice (see Lelew, V, 7).—Smith, s. v.

3. The ceremonies of worship peculiar to this day alone (besides those which were common to it with all other days) were: (1.) That the high-priest, in his pontifical dress, confessed his own sins and those of his family, for the expiation of which he offered a bullock, on which he laid them; (2.) That two goats were set aside, one of which was by lot sacrificed to Jehovah, while the other (AZAZEL), which was determined by lot to be set at liberty, was sent to the desert burdened with the sins of the people. (3.) On this day, also, the high-priest gave his blessing to the whole nation; and the remainder of the day was spent in prayers and other works of penance. It may be seen that in the special rites of the Day of Atonement there is a natural gradation. In the first place, the high-priest and his family are cleansed; then atonement is made by the purified priest for the sanctuary and all contained in it; then (if the view to which reference has been made be correct) for the brazen altar in the court, and, lastly, reconciliation is made for the people.—Kitto, s. v. See SIN-OFFERING.

IV. Statement of Josephus.—In the short account of the ritual of the day which is given by this Jewish writer in one passage (Ant. iii, 10, 3), there are a few particulars which are worthy of notice. His words, of course, apply to the practice in the second Temple, when the ark of the covenant had disappeared. He states that the high-priest sprinkled the blood with his finger seven times on the ceiling and seven times on the floor of the most holy place, and seven times toward it (as it would appear, outside the veil), and round the golden altar. Then, going into the court, he either sprinkled or poured the blood round the great altar. He also informs us that along with the fat, the kidneys, the top of the liver, and the extremities (αἱ ἑσχατῆς) of the victims were burned.

V. Robbinical Details.—The treatise of the Mishna, entitled Yoma, professes to give a full account of the observances of the day according to the usage in the second Temple. The following particulars appear either to be interesting in themselves, or to illustrate the language of the Pentateuch.

1. The high-priest himself, dressed in his colored official garments, used, on the Day of Atonement, to perform all the duties of the ordinary daily service, such as lighting the lamps, presenting the daily sacrifices, and offering the incense. After this he bathed himself, put on the white garments, and commenced the special rites of the day. There is nothing in the Old Testament to render it improbable that this was the original practice.

2. The high-priest went into the Holy of Holies four times in the course of the day: first, with the censor and incense, while a priest continued to agitate the blood of the bullock lest it should coagulate; secondly, with the blood of the bullock; thirdly, with the blood of the goat; fourthly, after having offered the evening sacrifice, to fetch out the censor and the plate which had contained the incense. These four entrances, forming, as they do, parts of the one great annual rite, are not opposed to a reasonable view of the statement in Heb. ix, 7 (where the apostle tells us that the high-priest entered only once on that day, since the expression, ἅπασι τοῖς ἔτησιν, may refer to the one day in the year when such a service alone took place), and that in Josephus (War. v, 5, 7). Three of the entrances seem to be very distinctly implied in Lev. xvi, 12, 14, and 15.

3. It is said that the blood of the bullock and that of the goat were each sprinkled eight times—once toward the ceiling, and seven times on the floor. This does not agree with the words of Josephus (see above, IV).

4. After he had gone into the most holy place the third time, and had returned into the holy place, the high-priest sprinkled the blood of the bullock eight times toward the veil, and did the same with the blood of the goat. Having then mingled the blood of the two victims together and sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, he came into the court and poured out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering.

5. Most careful directions are given for the preparation of the high-priest for the services of the day. For seven days previously he kept away from his own house and dwelt in a chamber appointed for his use. This was to avoid the accidental causes of pollution which he might meet with in his domestic life. But, to provide for the possibility of his incurring some uncleanness in spite of this precaution, a deputy was chosen who might act for him when the day came. In the treatise of the Mishna entitled “Pirke Aboth,” it is stated that no such mishance ever befell the high-priest. But Josephus (Ant. xvii, 6, 4) relates an instance of the high-priest Matthias, in the time of Herod the Great, when his relation, Joseph, took his place in the sacred office. During the whole of the seven days the high-priest had to perform the ordinary sacerdotal duties of the daily service himself, as well as on the Day of Atonement. On the third day and on the seventh he was sprinkled with the ashes of the red heifer, in order to cleanse him in the event of his having touched a dead body without knowing it. On the seventh day he was also required to take a solemn oath before the elders that he would alter nothing whatever in the accustomed rites of the Day of Atonement. (This, according to the “Jerusalem Gemara” on Yoma [quoted by Lightfoot], was instituted in consequence of an innovation of the Sadducean party, who had directed the high-priest to throw the incense upon the censor outside the veil, and to carry it, smoking, into the Holy of Holies.)

6. Several curious particulars are stated regarding the scape-goat. The two goats of the sin-offering were to be of similar appearance, size, and value. The lots were originally of boxwood, but in later times they were of gold. They were put into a little box or urn, into which the high-priest put both his hands and took out a lot in each, while the two goats stood before him, one at the right side and the other on the left. The lot in each hand belonged to the goat in the corresponding position; and when the lot “for Azazel” happened to be in the right hand, it was regarded as a good omen. The high-priest then tied a piece of scarlet cloth on the scape-goat’s head, called “the scarlet tongue” from the shape in which it was cut. Maimonides says that this was only to distinguish him, in order that he might be known when the time came for him to be sent away. But in the Gemara it is asserted that the red cloth ought to turn white, as a token of God’s acceptance of the atonement of the day, referring to Isa. i, 18. A particular instance of such a change, when also the lot “for Azazel” was in the priest’s right hand, is related as having occurred in the time of Simon the Just. It is farther stated that no such change took place for forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The prayer which the high-priest uttered over the head of the goat was as follows: “O Lord, the house of Israel, thy people, have transgressed, rebelled, and sinned before thee. I beseech thee, O Lord, forgive now their trespasses, rebellions, and sins which thy people have committed, as it is written in the law of Moses, thy servant, saying that in that day there shall be ‘an atonement for you to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord’” (Gemara on Yoma, quoted by Frischmuth). The goat was then goaded and rudely treated by the people till it was led away by the man appointed. As soon as it reached a certain spot, which seems to have been regarded as the commencement of the wilderness, a signal was made by some sort of telegraphic contrivance to the high-priest, who waited for it. The man who led the goat is said to have taken him to the top of a high precipice and thrown him down backward, so as to dash him to pieces. If this was not a mistake of the writer of Yoma, it must have been, as Spencer argues, a modern innovation. It cannot be doubted that the goat was originally set free. Even if there be any uncertainty in the words of the Hebrew, the explicit rendering of the Sept. must be better authority than the Talmud (καὶ ὁ ἱεραπόσιθάλων τὸν χιμαῶν τὸν ἑσταλάμενον εἰς ἄβυσσον κ. τ. λ. Lev. xvi. 26).

7. The high-priest, as soon as he had received the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read some lessons from the law, and offered up some prayers. He then bathed himself, resumed his colored garments, and offered either the whole or a great part of the necessary offering (mentioned Num. xxxix, 7-11) with the regular evening sacrifice. After this he washed again, put on the white garments, and entered the most holy place for the fourth time, to fetch out the censer and the incense-plate. This terminated the special rites of the day.

8. The Mishna gives very strict rules for the fasting of the people. In the law itself no express mention is made of abstinence from food; but it is most likely implied in the command that the people were "to afflict their souls." According to Yoma, every Jew (except invalids, and children under thirteen years of age) is forbidden to eat anything so large as a date, to drink, or to wash from sunset to sunset.—Smith, s. v.

VI. On the Scape-goat, see AZAZEL.

VII. Modern Observance of the Day.—The day previous to the day of expiation, the strict class of Jews provide a cock, which they send to an inferior rabbi to be slain; the person whose property it is then takes the fowl by the legs, and with uplifted hands swings it nine times over the heads of himself and his company, and at the same time prays to God that the sins they have been guilty of during the year may enter into the fowl. This cock, which they call קָדֵשׁ (pardon, atonement), seems to be substituted for the scape-goat of old. They then take the fowl and give it to the poor to eat, with a donation according to their means. On the same evening, one hour before synagogue service, they partake of a sumptuous feast, which they call taking their fast, after which they go to the synagogue. In the great synagogue in London, the clerk stands up in the midst, where a large stage is erected for the accommodation of the singers, who chant the customary prayers. The clerk offers up a blessing, and afterward the free-gift offering. Every man, according to his capacity (but it is not compulsory), gives a sum, which is offered up, and inserted in a book kept for that purpose. Most of the Jews endeavor on this occasion to provide themselves with the best apparel, as they say they appear before the King of kings to have their final doom settled upon them. Then begins the evening prayer of the fast, when the reader and chief rabbi, and many of the congregation, are clad with the shroud in which they are to be buried, continuing in prayer and supplication for upward of three hours. There are many who will stand upon one spot from the ninth day (of Tisri) at even until the tenth day at even; and when the service is ended on the ninth eve, those who return home to their dwellings come again in the morning at five o'clock, and continue until dark, observing the following order: First are said the morning prayers, which commence as soon as they come to the synagogue. After saying the usual prayers and supplications peculiar to the day, they then take forth the Law, and read the portion Lev. xvi; the musaph (a certain portion of the Law so named by the Jews) is Num. xxix, 7-11; the portion from the prophets from Isa. lvii, 14, to the end of chap. lviii. They then say the prayer for the prosperity of the government under which they dwell, and then put the Law into the ark again, which ends the morning prayer, after having continued for six hours without intermission. They next say the prayer of the musaph (i. e. "addition"), which makes mention of the additional sacrifice of the day (Num. xxix, 7), and supplicates the Almighty to be propitions to them. They finally say the offering of the day from Num. xxix, 7-27. They abstain from food altogether during the day. For many more ceremonies observed among the present Jews on the Day of Atonement, see Picard, Cérémonies et Coutumes Religieuses, etc. t. i. c. 6, p. 18.

VIII. Typical Import of the Ent're Observance.—As it might be supposed, the Talmudists miserably degraded the meaning of the Day of Atonement. They regarded it as an opportunity afforded them of wiping off the score of their more heavy offences. Thus Yoma (cap. viii) says, "The day of atonement and death make atonement through penitence. Penitence itself makes atonement for slight transgressions, and in the case of grosser sins it obtains a respite until the coming of the Day of Atonement, which completes the reconciliation." More authorities to the same general purpose are quoted by Frischmuth (p. 317), some of which seem also to indicate that the peculiar atoning virtue of the day was supposed to rest in the scape-goat. Philo (L. b. de Septenario) regarded the day in a far nobler light. He speaks of it as an occasion for the discipline of self-restraint in regard to bodily indulgence, and for bringing home to our minds the truth that man does not live by bread alone, but by whatever God is pleased to appoint. The prayers proper for the day, he says, are those for forgiveness of sins past and for amendment of life in future, to be offered in dependence, not on our own merits, but on the goodness of God. It cannot be doubted that what especially distinguished the symbolical expiation of this day from that of the other services of the law was its broad and national character, with perhaps a deeper reference to the sin which belongs to the nature of man. Ewald instructively remarks that, though the least uncleanness of an individual might be atoned by the rites of the law which could be observed at other times, there was a consciousness of secret and indefinite sin pervading the congregation which was aptly met by this great annual fast. Hence, in its national character, he sees an antithesis between it and the Passover, the great festival of social life; and in its atoning significance, he regards it as a fit preparation for the rejoicing at the gathering of the fruits of the earth in the Feast of Tabernacles. Philo looked upon its position in the Jewish calendar in the same light.

In considering the meaning of the particular rites of the day, three points appear to be of a very distinctive character: 1. The white garments of the high-priest. 2. His entrance into the Holy of Holies. 3. The scape-goat. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix, 7-25) teaches us to apply the first two particulars. The high-priest himself, with his person cleansed and dressed in white garments, was the best outward type which a living man could present in his own person of that pure and holy One who was to purify His people and to cleanse them from their sins. But respecting the meaning of the scape-goat we have no such light to guide us, and (as may be seen from the discussion under the word Azazel) the subject is one of great doubt and difficulty. Of those who take Azazel for the Evil Spirit, some have supposed that the goat was a sort of bribe or retaining fee for the accuser of men. Spencer, in supposing that it was given up with its load of sin to the enemy to be tormented, made it a symbol of the punishment of the wicked; while, according to the strange notion of Hengstenberg, that it was sent to mock the devil, it was significant of the freedom of those who had become reconciled to God. Some few of those who have held a different opinion on the word Azazel have supposed that the goat was taken into the wilderness to suffer there vicariously for the sins of the people. But it has been generally considered that it was dismissed to signify the carrying away of their sins, as it were, out of the sight of Jehovah. (In the similar part of the rite for the purification of the leper [Lev. xiv, 6, 7], in which a live bird was set free, it must be evident that the bird signified the carrying away of the uncleanness of the sufferer in precisely the same manner.) If we keep in view that the two goats are spoken of as parts of one and the same sin-offering, and that every circumstance connected with them appears to have been carefully arranged to bring them under the same conditions up to the time of the casting of the lots, we shall not have much difficulty in seeing that they form together but one symbolical expression. Why there were two individuals instead of one may be simply this—that a single material object could not, in its nature, symbolically embrace the whole of the truth which was to be expressed. This is implied in the reasoning of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews on the office and sacrifice of Christ (Heb. ix). Hence some, regarding each goat as a type of Christ, supposed that the one which was slain represented his death, and that the goat set free signified his resurrection (Cyril, Bochart, and others, quoted by Spencer). But we shall take a simpler, and perhaps a truer view, if we look upon the slain goat as setting forth the act of sacrifice, in giving up its own life for others “to Jehovah,” in accordance with the requirements of the divine law; and the goat which carried off its load of sin “to an utter distance” as signifying the cleansing influence of faith in that sacrifice. Thus, in his degree, the devout Israelite might have felt the truth of the Psalmist’s words, “As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.” But for us the whole spiritual truth has been revealed in historical fact in the life, death, and resurrection of Him who was made sin for us, who died for us, and who rose again for our justification. This Mediator it was necessary should, “in some unspeakable manner, unite death and life” (Maurice, On Sacrifice, p. 85). See Journ. Sac. Lit. Jan. 1849, p. 74 sq.—Smith, s. v.

Atium. In ancient churches, between the first porch, called the propylona, or vestibulum magnum, and the church itself, was a large area or square plot of ground, which the Latins called atrium or inpharium, because it was a court open to the air without any covering. It was surrounded by cloisters. In this place stood the first class of penitents, according to Eusebius, who says it was the mansion of those who were not allowed to enter farther into the church. They generally stood in this porch to beg the prayers of the faithful.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii, ch. iii, § 5; Farrar, Eccl. Dictatory, s. v.

At'troth (NUM. xxxii, 35). See ATAROTH.

At'tai (Heb. Attay', אַטַי, perhaps opportune, comp. Ittai), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. אַטַי v. r. אַטַי.) A son of the daughter of Sheshan (of the tribe of Judah) by his Egyptian servant Jarha, and the father of Nathan (1 Chron. ii, 35, 36). B. C. prob. ante 1658.

2. (Sept. אַטַי v. r. אַטַי.) The sixth of David's mighty men from the tribe of Gad during his freebooter's life in the desert of Judæa (1 Chron. xii, 11). B. C. cir. 1061.

3. (Sept. אַטַי v. r. אַטַי.) The second of the four sons of King Rehoboam, by his second and favorite wife Maachah, the daughter of Absalom (2 Chron. xi, 20). B. C. post 972.

Attalí'a (Ἀττάλια), a maritime city of Pamphylia (near Lycia, to which it is assigned by Stephen of Byzantium), in Asia Minor, near the mouth of the river Catarrhactes (see Wesseling, ad Antoin. Itin. p. 579, 670). It derived its name from its founder, Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus (Strabo, xiv, 657), who ruled over the western part of the peninsula from the north to the south, and was in want of a port which should be useful for the trade of Egypt and Syria, as Troas was for that of the Ægean. All its remains are characteristic of the date of its foundation. It was visited by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary tour, being the place from which they sailed on their return to Antioch from their journey into the inland parts of Asia Minor (Acts xiv, 25). It does not appear that they made any stay, or attempted to preach the Gospel in Attalia (see Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i, 200). This city, however, though comparatively modern at that time, was a place of considerable importance in the first century. Its name in the twelfth century appears to have been Satalia, a corruption, of which the crusading chronicler, William of Tyre, gives a curious explanation. It still exists under the name of Adalia (Büsching, Erdbeschr. xi, 1, 121), and extensive and important ruins attest the former consequence of the city (Leake's Asia Minor, p. 193). This place stands on the west of the Catarrhactes, where Strabo (xiv, 4) places it; Ptolemy, however (v, 5, 2), places the ancient city on the east of the river, on which accounts Admiral Beaufort (Karamania, p. 135) held the present Laava to be the representative of Attalia, and the modern Adalia (or Satalia) to be the site of the ancient Olbia, which Mannert (Geog. vi, 130) thought to be the same with Attalia (see Forbiger, Alle Geogr. ii, 268); but Spratt and Forbes (Lycia, i, 217) have found the remains of Olbia farther west, and it is therefore probable that the bed of the Catarrhactes changed at different times (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.).

At'talus (Ἀττάλος), a Macedonian name of uncertain signification, a king of Pergamus in the time of the Jewish prince Simon (1 Macc. xi, 22), and, as would appear from the connected circumstances, about B. C. 139; a closer determination of the date depends upon the year of the consul Lucius (q. v.), named in the same connection (ycr. 16), which is itself doubtful. As Attalus was the name of three kings of Pergamus, who reigned respectively B. C. 241–197, 159–118 (Philadelphus), 138–133 (Philometor), and were all faithful allies of the Romans (Liv. xiv, 13), it is uncertain whether the letters sent from Rome in favor of the Jews (1 Macc. xv, 22) were addressed to Attalus II (Polyb. xxv, 6; xxxi, 9; xxxii, 3, 5, 8, etc., 25 sq.; Just. xxxv, 1; xxxvi, 4, 5; App. Mith. 62), known as the “friend of the Roman people” (Strabo, xiii, p. 624), or Attalus III (Philometor), the nephew and successor of Attalus II, and son of Eumenes II, who ascended the throne B. C. 138, and by whose testament the kingdom of Pergamus passed over (B. C. 133) into the hands of the Romans (Justin, xxxvi, 4; Flor. ii, 20; Strabo, xiii, 624). Josephus quotes a decree of the Pergamenes in favor of the Jews (Ant. xiv, 10 22) in the time of Hyrcanus, about B.C. 112 (comp. Rev. ii, 12-17).—Smith, s. v.

Attendant Genius. See GUARDIAN ANGEL.

Atterbury, Francis, bishop of Rochester, was born March 6th, 1662, at Milton-Keynes, Bucks, where his father was rector. See ATTERBURY, LEWIS, below. He began his studies at Westminster, and finished his course at Christ Church, Oxford. He first distinguished himself by the publication, at Oxford, in 1687, of a "Reply to some Considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther, and the Original of the Reformation," a tract written by Walker, master of University College. In the same year he took the degree of Master of Arts, and became tutor to the earl of Orrery's son. In 1690 he married, and soon after went to London, and established so high a reputation by his preaching that he was made almoner to the king. In 1700 he published a vindication of the rights, powers, and privileges of the Lower House of Convocation, which occasioned a warm controversy with Archbishop Wake and others, and raised up a host of adversaries (see Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography, i, 358, and Lathbury, History of Convocation). The University of Oxford, however, testified its approval of his work by granting him the degree of D.D. without the usual fees. In 1704 he became dean of Carlisle. In 1706 he had a controversy with Hoadley as to "the advantages of virtue with regard to the present life." In a funeral sermon he had asserted that, "if the benefits resulting from Christianity were confined to our present state, Christians would be, of the whole human race, the most miserable." Hoadley, on the contrary, maintained, in a printed letter to Atterbury, that it was a point of the utmost importance to the Gospel itself to vindicate the tendency of virtue to the temporal happiness of man. In 1707 he had another controversy with Hoadley concerning "passive obedience." Under Queen Anne, Atterbury was in high favor, and in 1713 was made bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster, and was on the point of being made archbishop of Canterbury, when George I, who had justly conceived a strong prejudice against him, came to the throne. From this time he opposed the house of Hanover, and used all his energies to secure the return of the Stuarts. In 1715, when an attempt was made to restore the Stuarts, the archbishop of Canterbury drew up an address to the bishops of his province, exhorting them to excite the devotion of the clergy of their dioceses toward the house of Brunswick. This address Atterbury, and Smalridge, the bishop of Bristol, refused either to sign or to publish in their dioceses; and this conduct rendered him suspected at court. In 1722 he was accused of being in correspondence with "the Pretender," and was seized and sent to the Tower. No proof was alleged sufficient to warrant the charge; but, on the 9th of April, 1723, a bill of attainder was introduced into the House of Lords, and he was called upon to make his defense, which he did in the most admirable manner, in a speech abounding in eloquence. The court influence, however, was too great: a special law was introduced against him and passed, and he was condemned to be stripped of all his places and dignities, and to be banished from his country forever. On the 18th of June he left England for Calais. He retired first to Brussels, and afterward to Paris, where he died, February 15th, 1731.

The fame of Atterbury rests chiefly on his sermons, which are both argumentative and unaffectedly eloquent, and on his epistolary correspondence with Pope. His familiar letters, for their ease and elegance, are preferred to the more labored efforts of his correspondent, Pope. As a controversialist, his parts were splendid; but his prejudices were too strong, and his judgment not sufficiently cool to entitle him to a high rank among the inquirers after truth. It was, however, thought at the time that no man understood better than he the points in dispute between the Church of England and the Church of Rome, as well as the dissenters of all denominations. Atterbury has been somewhat absurdly charged, on the strength of an improbable anecdote which Dr. Maty says Lord Chesterfield related to him, with having been, at least in early life, a sceptic; but the whole tenor of his conduct, and every reference in his private as well as public writings, contradict such a supposition. He was a worldly-minded and ambitious man, but that he firmly believed the religious truths which he so eloquently defended there can be no reasonable doubt. (See a refutation of this story, in detail, in the New and General Biographical Dictionary, 1784, i, 389.) The conduct of Atterbury with reference to the Stuart dynasty is the great blot on his public career, and though perhaps illegally convicted, he was undoubtedly guilty of the treason for which he was condemned. But it was for no selfish ends that he adhered to its desperate fortunes, nor was his conduct wholly inconsistent with his position as a prelate of the English Church. The plan on which he had fixed his hope of securing the restoration of the Stuarts was that of inducing James to educate his son in the Protestant faith; an absurd expectation undoubtedly, but it was characteristic of Atterbury to overlook obstacles when he had set his heart on accomplishing a great purpose. Hook (Eccles. Biography, i, 374) calls him "an ecclesiastical politician and intriguer, devoting himself, not to the establishment of a principle, but to the mere triumph of a party. Great principles were injured by his advocacy of them, since he gave to them a party coloring, and made what was heavenly appear earthly." In private life the haughtiness and asperity of the politician and controversialist wholly disappeared, and no man ever succeeded in winning a more affectionate attachment from friends as well as relatives. As a preacher, a speaker, and a writer, he had few rivals; and Lord Mahon (Hist. of Eng. c. xii) hardly exaggerates his literary merits when he says that "few men have attained a more complete mastery over the English language than Atterbury; and all his compositions are marked with peculiar force, elegance, and dignity of style" (English Cyclopædia). Doddridge (Lectures on Preaching, iv, 18) calls him the "glory of English pulpit orators." Wesley (Works, vii, 420) says that in Atterbury "all the qualities of a good writer meet." The Tattler (No. 66), having observed that the English clergy too much neglect the art of speaking, makes a particular exception with regard to Atterbury, who "has so particular a regard to his congregation that he commits to his memory what he has to say to them, and has so soft and graceful a behavior that it must attract your attention. His person," continues this author, "it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not losing that advantage, and adding to propriety of speech (which might pass the criticism of Longinus) an action which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience who could not be intelligent hearers of his discourse were there no explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is used with the most exact and honest skill. He never attempts your passions till he has convinced your reason. All the objections which you can form are laid open and dispersed before he uses the least vehemence in his sermon; but when he thinks he has your head, he very soon wins your heart, and never pretends to show the beauty of holiness till he has convinced you of the truth of it." His writings include Sermons (Lond. 1740, 4 vols. 8vo, 5th ed.);—Correspondence and Charges (Lond. 1783-87, 4 vols. 8vo); besides many controversial tracts and pamphlets of temporary interest. Atterbury, Lewis, father of Bishop Atterbury, was born about the year 1631. He was the son of Francis Atterbury, rector of Milton, Northamptonshire, who, among other ministers, subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant in 1648. Lewis was entered a student of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1647, took the degree of bachelor of arts February 23, 1649, and was created M.A. by a dispensation from Oliver Cromwell March 1, 1651. He was one of those who submitted to the authority of the visitors appointed by the Parliament. In 1654 he became rector of Great or Broad Rissington, in Gloucestershire, and, after the Restoration, took a presentation for that benefice under the great seal, and was instituted again, to confirm his title to it. On the 11th of September, 1657, he was admitted rector of Middleton or Middleton Keynes, in Bucks, and at the return of Charles II took the same prudent method to corroborate his title to this living. July 25, 1660, he was made chaplain extraordinary to Henry, duke of Gloucester, and on the 1st of December, in the same year, was created doctor in divinity. Returning from London, whither the lawsuits he was frequently involved in had brought him, he was drowned near his own house in the beginning of December, 1663. He published three occasional sermons, the titles of which may be seen in Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. ii, col. 412.—New Gen. Biog. Dict. i, 377.

Atterbury, Lewis, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Caldecot, in Bucks, on the 2d of May, 1656. He was educated at Westminster School under Dr. Busby, and at Christ Church, Oxford. He was ordained deacon in September, 1679. In 1683 he served as chaplain to Sir William Pritchard, lord-mayor of London. In February, 1684, he was instituted rector of Symel, in Northamptonshire. In 1691 we find him lecturer of St. Mary Hill, in London. Soon after his marriage he settled at Highgate, where he supplied the pulpit of the reverend Mr. Daniel Latham, on whose death, in June, 1695, he became pastor of the chapel. He had a little before been appointed one of the six preaching chaplains to the princess Anne of Denmark at Whitehall and St. James's, which place he continued to supply after she came to the crown, and likewise during part of the reign of George I. To help the poor of his parish, he studied physic; and after acquiring considerable skill, practiced gratis among his poor neighbors. In 1707 the queen presented him to the rectory of Shepperton, in Middlesex, and in March, 1719, the bishop of London collated him to the rectory of Hornsey. In 1720, on a report of the death of Dr. Sprat, archdeacon of Rochester, he applied to his brother to succeed him. The bishop giving his brother some reasons why he thought it improper to make him his archdeacon, the doctor replied, "Your lordship very well knows that Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, had a brother for his archdeacon, and that Sir Thomas More's father was a pious judge when he was lord chancellor. And thus, in the sacred history, did God himself appoint that the safety and advancement of the patriarchs should be procured by their younger brother, and that they, with their father, should live under the protection and government of Joseph." In answer to this, the bishop informs his brother that the archdeacon was not dead, but well, and likely to continue so. He died, however, soon after; and on the 20th of May, 1720, the bishop collated Dr. Brydges, the duke of Chandos's brother, to the archdeaconry, after writing thus in the morning to the doctor: "I hope you are convinced, by what I have said and written, that nothing could have been more improper than the placing you in that post immediately under myself. Could I have been easy under that thought, you may be sure no man living should have had the preference to you." To this the doctor answered: "... There is some show of reason, I think, for the non-acceptance, but none for the not giving it. And since your lordship was pleased to signify to me that I should overrule you in this matter, I confess it was some disappointment to me. . . . I hope I shall be content with that meaner post in which I am; my time at longest being but short in this world, and my health not suffering me to make those necessary applications others do, nor do I understand the language of the present times; for I find I begin to grow an old-fashioned gentleman, and am ignorant of the weight and value of words, which in our times rise and fall like stock." This correspondence is creditable to the bishop, at least.

Dr. Atterbury died at Bath, October 20, 1731. He published Twelve Sermons (London, 1720, 8vo);—Ten Sermons (Lond. 1699, 8vo);—Select Sermons, edited by Yardley, with a life of Dr. Atterbury (2 vols. 8vo, 1745);—Letters on the Council of Trent; and several translations from the French. In his will he gave some few books to the libraries at Bedford and Newport, and his whole collection of pamphlets, amounting to upward of two hundred volumes, to the library of Christ Church, Oxford. He charged his estate forever with the payment of ten pounds yearly to a schoolmistress to instruct girls at Newport-Pagnel, which salary he had himself in his lifetime paid for many years. He remembered some of his friends, and left a respectful legacy of one hundred pounds to his "dear brother, in token of his true esteem and affection," as the words of the will are, and made the bishop's son Osborn (after his granddaughter, who did not long survive him) heir to all his fortune.—New Gen. Biog. Dictionary, i, 377; Biographica Britannica, vol. i.

Attersoll, WILLIAM, a clergyman of the Church of England, rector of East Hoadley, was ejected for non-conformity in 1662, and was subsequently minister at Isfield, Sussex. His writings include A Commentary on the Epistle to Philemon (London, 1612 and 1633, fol.);—A Commentary on the History of Adam and Eve (1to);—A Commentary upon the Fourth Book of Moses, called Numbers (London, 1618; and in Dutch, at Amsterdam, in 1667);—The Trumpet of God (London);—De Sacramentis (1to);—Catechismus. The work on the sacraments was printed in English in 1614, under the title The New Covenant. He also wrote Three Treatises, on Luke xii, 1; xiii, 1; Jonah iii, 4.—London, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, i, 610; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 81.

Attar'ates (Ατταράτης), given (1 Esdr. ix, 49) as a person's name; evidently by a mistake of the translator (comp. ATHARIAS for the title THUSIATHA (q. v.) of the original text (Neh. viii, 9).

Atticus, Sr., patriarch of Constantinople in 406, during the life of the rightful patriarch, Chrysostom; he succeeded Arsacius, who was intruded into the throne when Chrysostom was driven away. He was born at Sebaste, in Armenia, and led an ascetic life under Eustathius, the bishop of that see. He was a man of ability. Palladius accuses him of being the author of the conspiracy against Chrysostom; and the share he took in the persecution of that saint, and his refusal after his death to replace his name on the diphtychs, caused the Western bishops and the people of Constantinople to refuse him their communion until the name of St. Chrysostom was restored. Socrates, who was no great admirer of Chrysostom, gives a more favorable account of Atticus (lib. vi, cap. 20; vii, cap. 2). He died Oct. 10, 426, having filled the see twenty years. Socrates has preserved a letter of this patriarch to Calliopius, bishop of Nicæa, in which he informs him that he has sent him three hundred golden crowns for the poor of that city. He directs him to administer to the wants of those poor persons who were ashamed to come forward for relief, and on no account to give anything to those who made a business of begging. He also recommends that the distribution should be made without any distinction as to religious grounds (Hist. Eccles. vii, 25). Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. viii, 27) says of him that "he possessed more natural gifts than literary attainments, while he evinced aptitude for the management of affairs, and was as skillful in carrying on intrigues as in evading the machinations of others. His sermons did not rise above mediocrity, and were not accounted by his auditors of sufficient value to be preserved in writing," and asserts that "as Atticus was distinguished alike for learning, piety, and discretion, the churches under his episcopate attained a very flourishing condition." He also wrote to Euphysius concerning the incarnation (Theodor.) and to St. Cyril of Alexandria concerning the restitution of the name of St. Chrysostom in the diptychs, and another to Peter and Edeusius, deacons of the church of Alexandria, concerning the restoration of peace in that church. A fragment of a homily on the Nativity will be found in Labbe, iii, 116.—Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 384; Laudon, Eccles. Dict. i, 610.

Attila (called by the ancient Germans Etzel, in the Magyar language Atzel), a celebrated king of the Huns, ruled from 434 to 453. He assured his people that he had discovered the sword of their god, with which he was to procure for them the dominion of the world. He called himself the Scourge of God, and his subjects looked upon him with superstitious awe. He extended his sway over a large portion of Europe and Asia, and but for his defeat by Etius in the Catalaunian plains, in 451, would have destroyed the Roman Empire. He spared the city of Rome in consequence, it is believed, of the impression made upon his mind by Pope Leo I. See LEO I, Pope.

Attire (כֶּשְׂמֵרִים, keshurim', girdles, Jer. ii, 32; "headbands," Isa. iii, 20). Under this head we propose to bring together a general description of the various articles of apparel with either sex among the ancient Jews, so far as this can be gathered from the notices of antiquity, leaving a more detailed account to each portion of dress in its alphabetical place, while a comparison with modern Oriental styles will be found under COSTUME, and a statement of the materials under CLOTHING. (See generally Jahn's Archæology, § 118-135.) Compare also DRESS.

I. MALE garments.—The regular pieces of raiment worn by men were chiefly the following, to which may be added, in cases of royalty or eminence, the signet, crown, and sceptre, and (for ornament) the anklet, bracelet, etc. (which see severally).

1. The shirt or tunic, in Heb. כִּטּוֹנֶת, kittoneth, generally rendered by the Sept. χιτών, which indeed is but a Grecized form of the Heb. word (see Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 724). It was the usual under-garment (comp. Lev. xvi, 4) of youths (Gen. xxvii, 3, 23, etc.) and men (2 Sam. xv, 32), also of the priests and Levites in their service (Exod. xxviii, 40; Lev. viii, 7, 13; x, 5). Female tunics or "chemises" were also called by the same name (2 Sam. xiii, 18; Cant. v, 3). The kittoneth was commonly quite short, scarcely reaching to the knee; but eventually, as a peculiar kind, there is mentioned (Gen. xxvii, 3; xxiii, 32; 2 Sam. xiii, 18 sq.), as an ornamental dress of young persons of either sex, the kittoneth passim', כִּטּוֹנֶת עֲצָמַי, tunic of the extremities, i. e. reaching to the feet (for so the word appears to signify; see Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 1117; rather than party-colored tunic, "coat of many colors," as in the Auth. Vers. after the Sept. and Vulg.), which was an under-dress with sleeves, and extending to the ankles (Josephus, Ant. vii, 8, 1).—Winer, ii, 333. See TEXTILE.

2. The mantle or robe, a comprehensive term that appears to include several Heb. words, signifying not only a long flowing outer garment, but sometimes also a wide under-garment or double tunic. See RONE. It sometimes approaches the signification of "veil" (see below), as this was often like a modern cloak, or at least shawl. Wide flowing mantles were a fashion introduced by the ancients from the Babylonians, Medes, and Persians (Herod. i, 195; Strabo, xi, 526). Such are doubtless referred to in Dan. iii, 21; it only remains uncertain which of the Chaldee terms there employed (כַּרְבְּלָהּ, karblah', Auth. Vers. "hat," or אֶבְרַתָּהּ, subbia', "coat") has this signification. *Gesenius (Theb. Heb. in verb.) renders both pellium, or cloak, against the improbability that in a single verse two kinds of mantle would be named. Others, as Lengerke, understand the second word to mean stockings, which would yield a good sense, and one agreeable to etymology, could we be sure that hosiery was employed by the ancient Babylonians. The word פֶּתִיגִיל, pthigil' (Isa. iii, 24, Auth. Vers. "stomacher"), which some regard as a cloak, is probably a fistive garment or finery (see Gesenius, Theb. Heb. p. 1137). Ewald separates the word thus: קֶרֶן, breadth of mantle (comp. Syr. קֶרֶן, breadth). In the N. T. the mantle is denoted by σιμόλη, a robe, such as the scribes wore (Mark xii, 38), a long garment like a gown, reaching to the feet. For the χαριῆς and φελάριος, see APPAREL.—Winer, ii, 54.

3. The girdle, in Heb. חֲגוּרָה, chagor', or חֲגוּרָה, chagorah' (the usual name both for male and female girdles, Isa. iii, 24; whether the same article of apparel is designated by חֲגוּרָה, genazim', "chest," in Ezek. xxvii, 24, as supposed by Hartmann, is doubtful), Gr. ζώνη, one of the most distinguished articles of attire among the Hebrews and Orientals generally (comp. Ezek. xxiii, 15; Dan. x, 5), except the Phœnicians (Auson. Panegy. Grat. 14; Tertull. Pall. i; Plaut. Pœn. v, 2, 15; see Crœmer, Joel. p. 146 sq.), being a belt by which the under-garment (tunic) was gathered at the waist, and thus prevented from floating, as well as binding the person in walking (1 Kings xviii, 46; 2 Kings iv, 29; ix, 1) or in any other bodily motion (sometimes dancing, 2 Sam. vi, 14). Hence girdles were often bestowed as presents (2 Sam. xviii, 11; 1 Macc. x, 87), and were an article of fancy goods (Prov. xxxi, 24). The poor and ascetic classes wore girdles of leather (2 Kings i, 8; Matt. iii, 4; Mark i, 6, as they still do in the East, of half a foot in width), the rich of linen (Jer. xlii, 1; comp. Arvieux, iii, 247) or byssus (Ezek. xvi, 10; the moderns even of silk, of some four fingers' breadth, Mariti, p. 214; Chardin, iii, 68), ornamented (Dan. x, 5; 1 Macc. x, 89; xi, 58; xiv, 44; Curt. iii, 3, 18; comp. Arvieux, iii, 241; a Persian fashion, Xenoph. Anab. i, 4, 9; comp. Brisson, Regn. Pers. p. 169 sq.) in a costly manner (with gold, jewels, etc.); this last description was especially valued in female girdles, which, being an indispensable part of household manufacture (Prov. xxxi, 17), was probably the chief article of feminine luxury (Isa. iii, 20, 24; comp. Ibid., xiv, 181; Odyss. v, 231; Hartmann, Hebræerin. ii, 299 sq.). The men wore girdles about the loins (1 Kings ii, 5; xviii, 46; 2 Kings iv, 29; Jer. xlii, 11; Rev. i, 13; xv, 6, etc.), but the priests somewhat higher around the breast (Josephus, Ant. iii, 7, 2); the women, as still in the East, wore the girdle lower and looser (Niebuhr, Reis. ii, 184, pl. 27; 236, pl. 64; comp. Odyss. iii, 154). The sacerdotal girdle is called חֲגוּרָה אֲבֵנִית, abnet', and was tied up in front, so that the two ends hung down to the feet; female girdles were called חֲגוּרָה קִישְׁשׁוּרִים, kishshurim' (Isa. iii, 20; Jer. ii, 32); while men's girdles were generally called חֲגוּרָה, ezor'. Anciently, as still, persons wore in the girdle the sword (dagger, 2 Sam. xx, 8; xxv, 13; Judg. iii, 16; Curt. iii, 3, 18; comp. Arvieux, iii, 241; hence a secure girdle was an essential part of a good equipment of the warrior, 1 Kings ii, 5; Isa. v, 27; and the phrase "to gird one's self" is tantamount to arming for battle, Isa. viii, 9; Psa. lxxvi, 11; 1 Macc. iii, 58; comp. Herod. viii, 120; Plutarch, Coriol. 9) and the inkstand (Ezek. ix, 2; comp. Shaw, p. 199; Schulz, Litt. v, 390); it also served as a purse (Matt. x, 9; Mark vi, 8; comp. 2 Sam. xviii, 11; Jamblich, Vit. Pythag. 27, p. 121; Liv. xxxiii, 29; Suet. 170, 16; Plaut. Pan. v, 2, 48 sq.; Juven. xiv, 297; Gell. xv, 12, 4; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 64; Shaw, p. 199; see Rost, De vet. zona pecuniaria, Jen. 1681). The passing over one's girdle to another is among friends a mark of great confidence and intimate relation (1 Sam. xviii, 4; see Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 103); when it occurs between (high) functionaries it is a symbol of installation into honor (Isa. xxii, 21; on Isa. iii, 24, see Gesenius, in loc.; and in general see Credner, Joel, p. 142 sq.). —Winer, i, 448. See GIRDELE.

4. The turban, of which there were various kinds:

Ancient Oriental Modes of Attire.

1. Egyptian.—a. Royal. b. Female. c. Sacerdotal.
2. Assyrian.—d. King. e. Priest. f. Sceptre-bearer (Eunuch).

Modern Oriental Modes of Attire.

a. Bedouin. b. Mamelook. c. Bethlehemite Women.

(1.) Among the ancient Hebrews of either sex, coifs, formed of folds wound about (comp. כִּיְבִישׁ הַבִּינָה) the head, were in common use, but nothing distinct is given as to their shape. Their usual names are as follows: (a.) טַנְיָפָה , tsaniph', which is applied to men (Job xxix, 14), women (Isa. iii, 23), and the high-priest (Zech. iii, 5); but which, according to all the passages, was a prominent distinctive costume. (b.) מִטְסַף'פְּהוֹת , mitsaf'pheth (Sept. κίβανος or μύρα), which occurs more frequently of the cap of the high-priest (Exod. xxviii, 4, 37, 39; xxix, 6; Lev. xvi, 4, etc.), and but once of the king (Ezek. xxi, 31). See HIGH-PRIEST. (c.) מִגְבָּאָה , migbaah', simply the bonnet of the ordinary priests (Exod. xxviii, 40; xxix, 9; Lev. viii, 13; see the description of Josephus, under the article SACERDOTAL ORDER). (d.) $\text{פֶּעֶר'$, which occurs of the head-dress of men (Isa. lxi, 3, 10; Ezek. xxiv, 17) and women (Isa. iii, 20), and sometimes stands in connection with the foregoing term ($\text{פֶּעֶר' הַמִּגְבָּאָה}$, Exod. xxxix, 28; comp. Ezek. xlv, 18). This was likewise a piece of special apparel. Schroeder (Vestit. Mul. p. 94 sq.) understands a high-towering turban. The תְּשֵׁפִירָה , tsephirah' (Isa. xxviii, 5), signifies a crown or diadem, and does not belong here (see Gesenius in loc.); on the other hand, Hartmann (Hebräer. iii, 262) explains it of a chaplet of gorgeous flowers. See CROWN. Among the modern Arabs and Persians there are very various kinds of turbans (some of them exceedingly costly), which are always wound out of a long piece of muslin (Arvieux, Voyage, iii, 243; Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 159, comp. pl. 14-23). Nevertheless, this species of head attire appears not to have been customary in the ancient East. On the ruins of Persepolis are delineated sometimes caps (flat and pointed), sometimes turbans, which were wholly wound out of strips of cloth, and ended in a point (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, pl. 21, 22). The latter is the more probable form of the coiffure of the Hebrews. Ordinary Israelites, i. e. laborers, probably bound the hair about only with a cord or ribbon (Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 64; Reisen, i, 292; comp. the Persepolitan figures in vol. ii, pl. 22, fig. 9; pl. 23, fig. 5, 6, 11), or wrapped a cloth around the head, as is yet customary in Arabia. The nets (סַבְּכִיָּה) mentioned in the Talmud (Mishna, Chol. xxiv, 16) were not hoods (of women), but protectives for the eye-sight. (2.) The tiaras of the Chaldeans (Herod. i, 195) are called טְבֻלִים , tebulim' (Ezek. xxiii, 15), probably from their colored material; they were, according to the monuments (Münter, Rel. d. Babyl. p. 97), high in form; and such some interpreters (as Jahn, Archäol. I, ii, 118 sq.) find among the Persians ($\text{טַקְרִיק'$, takrik', Esth. viii, 15; קַרְבֵּלָה , karbela', Dan. iii, 21), although both these passages rather refer to cloaks (see Lengerke, in loc.).—Winer, ii, 634. See HEAD-DRESS.

5. The shoc (שֹׁךְ , no'al; $\text{ὑπόδημα, σανδάλιον, sandal}$) was among the Orientals (as also among the Greeks and Romans), and still is, a simple sole of leather or wood, which was fastened under the foot (comp. Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 63, pl. 2; Mariti, Trav. p. 214; Harner, Obs. iii, 304 sq.) by a thong (סַרְסוֹף , sarsof', Gen. xiv, 23; Isa. v, 27; ἰσός , Mark i, 7; Luke iii, 16, etc.; comp. Perizonius ad Alban. Var. Hist. ix, 11) passing over it. This protection for the feet, at once suitable to the climate of the East, and probably cheap (comp. Amos ii, 6; viii, 6), is found very generally represented on the Persepolitan monuments (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, 132, pl. 23, 6; Ker Porter, Trav. i, pl. 39, 40, 41, 47). Females probably wore a more costly sort of sandals (Jud. xvi, 11; comp. Cant. vii, 1 [see the Targ.]; Ezek. xli, 10), since also among the Syrians (Virg. Æn. i, 366 sq.), the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans (Martial, ii, 29, 8), shoes of variegated (especially purple-colored) leather, and even gilt (calcei aurei), were a favorite article of luxury; and, although a considerable part of this decoration might be expended upon the latchet merely, yet there is also evidence that sandals with a side and upper leather (like slippers) were employed. The (müient) Persians certainly wore actual shoes (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 1, 41; Strabo, xv, 734), and the monuments represent a kind of half-boot (Ker Porter, Trav. i, pl. 39); the shoes of the Babylonians, according to Strabo (xvi, 746), were no ordinary sandal, and it is possible that the later Hebrews wore a covering for the feet similar to theirs. The task of binding on and unbinding (ἄνωγ, ἀριστοφ. Thesmoth. 1183; in Heb. $\text{לָבַשׁ, לָבַשׁוּ, לָבַשׁוּ, לָבַשׁוּ}$, or לָבַשׁוּ) these soles, and of carrying them about for one's use, was assigned to (menial) slaves (Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 7; John i, 27; Acts xiii, 25; comp. Talm. Bab. Kiddush. xvii, 2; Kethuboth. lxvi, 1; Plutarch, Sympos. vii, 8, 4; Arrian, Epict. iii, 26, 21; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv, 15; see Kypre, Observ. i, 12 sq.; C. W. Volland [A. Plathner], De sandaligenus' Hist. Vitteb, 1712; also in Ugolini Thesaur. xxix). Indoors the Orientals wore no shoes, which visitors were required to leave in the outer hall (comp. also Plat. Sym-

pos. p. 213). Only at the paschal meal were the Israelites to keep their shoes on (Exod. xii, 11), in order to complete their equipment for travelling, since for a journey and on going out persons of course assumed their sandals (Acts xii, 8). It was customary in very early times, however, to walk barefoot (עַרְסוּ, עַרְסוּ, nudi pede) in sacred spots, where the Deity was believed to have been disclosed (Exod. iii, 5; Acts vii, 33; Josh. v, 15); and, according to Jewish tradition (see Josephus, Ant. ii, 15, 1), which the O. T. by no means contradicts, the Jewish priests performed their sacred services unsandalled (comp. Ovid, Fast. vi, 897; see Balduin, De calceo, p. 23; Douglai Analect. i, 57 sq.; Spanheim ad Callim. Cerer. 325; Carpov, De discalciatione in loco sacro, Lips. 1729; also in his Apparat. antiq. p. 769 sq.; Walch, De religiosa veterum aevorum, Jen. 1756; also in his Dissert. ad Acta Ap. i.; Wichtmannhausen, De calceo in Ebraeor. scriptis deponendo, Viteb. 1721; also in Ugolini Thesaur. xxix). Also, in deep grief, persons went unsnshod (2 Sam. xv, 30; Ezek. xxiv, 17, 23; Isa. xx, 2; comp. Bion, Igill. i, 21; Stat. Theb. ix, 572; Kirchmann, De funerib. Rom. p. 355; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iv, 340). The pulling off the shoe was a legal act, symbolical, with respect to the Levirate marriage (Dent. xxv, 9, 10; Ruth iv, 7; comp. Otho, Lec. Rab. p. 112), that the individual surrendered his title or passed it over to another, who thus, as it were, stepped into his shoes (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 71 sq.), a usage that seems to be alluded to in Psa. lx, 10; cviii, 10 (comp. Castell, Lec. l. plat., 2342; Balduin, De calceo, p. 217 sq.; see Ewald, Psalm. p. 313). The generally unavoidable collection of dust and stains upon the covering of the feet among the Israelites rendered the frequent washing of the feet necessary. See UNCLEANNESS, Shoemakers are named in the Talmud [see MECHANIC]; among the Persians the fabrication of foot-clothing was carried on in manufactories (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 2, 5). On the subject generally, see Bynæus, De calceis vet. Hebr. (Dordr. 1682, 1715; also in Ugolini Thesaur. xxix); Rotthoff, De vestib. et calceis Israelit. (Hafn. 1753); Balduin, Calceus antiq.; and Nigron, De calceis vet. (L. B. 1711).—Winer, ii, 428. See SANDAL.

II. FEMALE articles of apparel consisted, in addition to the foregoing, of the following pieces of ornament (unless we except the veil) rather than necessity. See also PAINT; ORNAMENT; HEAD-DRESS.

6. The veil (in general perhaps עֵשֶׂה, a covering of the eyes, Gen. xx, 16) belongs throughout the East to this day as a most indispensable piece of female attire, and no lady of character and respectability allows herself to be seen without it in public, or even by strangers within doors (comp. the Koran, xxxiii, 56). Only female slaves (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, 162), public dancing-girls (who are probably always prostitutes, yet do not usually dispense with the veil, Hasselquist, Tror. p. 73, but are easily induced to lay it aside, Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 184), and in general women of the lowest class constitute an exception to this universal custom. These usages appear, on the whole, to have been prevalent among the Israelites (see Bucher, Antiquit. Hebr. et Græc. de rebus feminis, Budiss. 1717), since we cannot suppose the privacy and restraint of females to have been less than in modern Oriental society [see WIFE], although in patriarchal times a less strict etiquette would seem to have prevailed with regard to the use of the veil. Virgins (Gen. xxiv, 15 sq.) and even wives (Gen. xii, 11) of the old Hebrew nomads, especially in domestic employments, appear to have gone unhesitatingly without a veil, as still in Arabia (Wellsted, i, 249) and Palestine (Russegger, iii, 109); but the betrothed covered herself in the presence of her bridegroom (Gen. xxiv, 65; comp. the phrase nubere virgini), and to this act of delicacy the apostle appears to allude in 1 Cor. xi, 5 sq. Courtesans were known by their deep veiling

(Gen. xxxviii, 15; comp. Petron. 16), and sought the more to decoy by this mark of modesty. That the veil was a principal article of female costume in the Israelitish republic appears from Isa. iii, 22; Cant. v, 7; and ladies of rank may have worn several veils, one over the other, like the modern Oriental women (Buckingham, ii, 383). The various species of veils designated by the several Heb. terms having this general significance are but uncertainly indicated by the etymologies of the different words: (1.) עֵשֶׂה, ra'âl (Isa. iii, 19), is thought (in accordance with its Arabic synonym raûl) to be the large general covering thrown loosely around the head and temples, and hanging down in walking, yet so arranged about the eyes as to allow the female to see through the folds (see Jahn, pl. 9, fig. 10). In the Talmud (Mishna, Shabb. vi, 6) Arab women are designated (עֵשֶׂה) with this peculiarly of dress. (2.) עֵשֶׂה, radid' (Isa. iii, 23; Cant. v, 7), may denote the thin covering that Oriental females still wear over the entire clothing, and might have been earlier styled a mantle (see Jahn, pl. 8, fig. 12; comp. Schröder, Vestit. mulier. p. 368 sq.). (3.) A still different kind of veil, which is yet worn in Egypt (Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 166) and Syria (Arvioux, Voyage, iii, 247), covered the bosom, neck, and cheek as far as the nose, while the eyes were left free (see Jahn, pl. 10, fig. 1). This form is depicted on the Persepolitan ruins, and may also have been in common use by the Hebrewesses. Yet this import cannot, on intrinsic grounds, be assigned to either of the words עֵשֶׂה, tsamiph' (Gen. xxv, 65; xxxviii, 14, 19; Sept. Σιγαύρον), or עֵשֶׂה, tsammah' (Cant. iv, 1, 3; vi, 7; Isa. xlvii, 2); and whether this last means in general veil (Hartmann, Hebræum. iii, 236 sq.) is doubtful (Gesenius, Jesa. in loc.; Rosenmüller, Cant. in loc.).—Winer, ii, 416. See VEIL.

7. The armlet, or band for the wrist (עֵשֶׂה, tsamid', or עֵשֶׂה, tsamidah'), was a very favorite ornament, not only of all ancient nations (Plin. xxxiii, 10, 12; xii, 42; vii, 29; Liv. x, 41; Suet. Ner. 30), but especially of Orientals (so much so that gold and silver ones are forbidden in the Koran, xviii, 30; xxxv, 30; lxxvi, 21; on the forms of ancient Egyptian ones, see Wilkinson, iii, 374), being worn by men as well as women (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 3, 2; Anab. i, 5, 8; Curt. viii, 9, 21; Petron. Sat. 22; comp. Bartholin, De armillis vet. Amst. 1676; Schröder, De Vestit. mul. p. 56 sq.). Among the Hebrew females it was general from the earliest times (Gen. xxiv, 22, 30, 47; comp. Isa. iii, 19; Ezek. xvi, 11; xxiii, 42; Jud. x, 14), but among the men those of rank only appear to have worn it (2 Sam. i, 10; comp. Num. xxxi, 50; see Harmer, ii, 126 sq.; Ker Porter, ii, pl. 60). They consisted either of rings (of ivory, precious metals, etc.); among the poor probably likewise of horn, as in modern times, Harmer, iii, 368) or of cords and chains, עֵשֶׂה, sheveth' (Isa. iii, 19). They were worn on both arms or (more usually) on one arm (the right? Sirach, xxi, 23), and partly covered the wrist (Xenoph. Cyrop. vi, 4, 2); but (in Persia) they are often so broad as to reach to the elbows (comp. Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 164; Hartmann, Hebr. ii, 178 sq.; Buckingham, Mesopot. p. 433). See BRACELET. Like the ear-rings, the armlets also generally served as amulets (Plin. xxviii, 47).—Winer, i, 88. See TALISMAN.

8. The anklet (עֵשֶׂה, el'es; comp. περιφόριον, Herod. iv, 168, perisolis; also περι, Lucian, Leviphon. 9), of metal, horn, ivory, etc., was in ancient times, as still by Eastern ladies, extensively worn about the feet (Isa. iii, 18; see Michaelis, in Pott's Syllage. ii, 90; Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 164; Russell, Altopo. ii, 130; Harmer, ii, 400 sq.; Kuppel, Abbyss. i, 201; ii, 179; comp. Longi Pastor. i, 2; Aristocrat. Ep. i, 19), being indeed an Oriental fashion (Horace, Ep. i, 17, 56; Plin.

xxxiii, 54; comp. Jud. x, 4). They are generally so arranged that in walking a clapping or clinking is heard (Isa. iii, 16; comp. Koran, xxiv, 32; Tertull. Cult. fem. 7; Douglai Analect. i, 243; Arviens, iii, 251; Shaw, p. 211), of which the wearer is greatly proud (comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iv, 212), especially among coquettish females (comp. Aristænet. Ep. i, 4; Douglai Analect. i, 248). Sometimes small chains (כַּבְּדֵי, tsëiroth', Isa. iii, 20; Talm. כַּבְּדֵי, kebalim') were fastened from one foot to the other, probably in order to secure a short genteel step (Harmer, iii, 468; Rappel, Abgss. ii, 53; comp. Clem. Alex. Prolog. ii, 89; and the Gemara, in Shubb. vi, 4); according to the rabbins (see Surenhusius's Mischna, ii, 25), perhaps to prove their maidenly innocence (Michaelis, Mos. Recht. ii, 156 sq.). (See generally Schröder, De Vestit. mul. c. i, § 3; Bynæus, De calceis Hebr. i, 8; Hartmann, Hebræica, ii, 183 sq.; iii, 217 sq.; [P. Lyser] C. G. Blumberg, De כַּבְּדֵי, Ljps. 1683; also in Haseel et Ikenii Nov. thes. i, 853 sq.; also in Ugolini Thesaur. xxix).—Winer, i, 381. See ANKLET.

9. The necklace, כַּבֵּד, rabid', a still very favorite ornament in the East (Prov. i, 9; iii, 3; xxv, 12; Ezek. xvi, 11; Hos. ii, 13), which not only women (Cant. iv, 9; Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 5, 18), but also (eminent men, even warriors, perhaps the last, however, among the Medes and Persians (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 3, 2; ii, 4, 6; Anab. i, 5, 8; 8, 29; Curt. iii, 3, 13; Philostr. Apoll. ii, 1; Strabo, iv, 197; comp. Odyss. xv, 450; Adams, Rom. Antig. ii, 138), as among the Belgic Gauls (Strabo, iv, 197), for we find no trace of this as an article of male attire among the Israelites (see Scheffler, De torquibus, Holm. 1658; c. notis a J. Nicolai, Hamb. 1707). Necklaces were made sometimes of metal, at others of stones or pearls, which were strung upon a cord (כַּבְּדֵי, charuzim', Cant. i, 10; comp. Frähn, ad Ibn Foslan. Petropol. 1823, p. 86 sq.; the כַּבְּדֵי, torim', Cant. i, 10, are probably not a necklace [Vulg. marionde], but an ornament for the head, most likely strings of pearls entwisted in the hair or attached to the head-dress [q. v.] and flowing down, see Michaelis, in loc., and hung down to the breast, or even as far as the girdle (Jerome ad Ezech. xvii, 11; Arviens, iii, 253). Persons of rank perhaps wore several such. Other articles of finery were also at times attached to them, such as (1.) כַּבְּדֵי, sokronim', half-moons or crescents, Isa. iii, 18 (Sept. μηνίσκοι; comp. Inula, Plant. Epil. v, i, 34; see Tertull. Cult. fem. ii, 19; called in Arabic ahabat); comp. Jud. v, viii, 21 (where similar trinkets appear as ornaments for camels' necks); (2.) Snelling-bottles, כַּבְּדֵי, bottey' ne'phesh (lit. houses of the soul), Isa. iii, 20 (comp. Le Bruyn, Voyage, i, 217; Chardin, iii, 72); (3.) perhaps little stellated studs, כַּבְּדֵי, shebisim', Isa. iii, 18; and (4.) serpents, כַּבְּדֵי, lechshim', Isa. iii, 20, probably as amulets (q. v.); but see Gesenius, Comm. z. Jesu. i, 209, 211. Ladies may also have worn rings (collars) of metal around the neck (see Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 164; comp. Virg. Æn. v, 559). Among the Persians kings used to invest men with a necklace (כַּבְּדֵי, hamuk', which, however, may mean armlet) as a mark of favor (Dan. v, 7; xvi, 29; comp. Xenoph. Anab. i, 2, 27; Cyrop. viii, 5, 18); and it appears that a higher rank was associated with this distinction (Dan. v, 7). In Egypt the prime minister of state was adorned with a (state) necklace (Gen. xli, 42); the chief-justice also wore a golden chain, with the symbol of truth attached (Diod. Sic. i, 48; comp. Hengstenberg, Moses, p. 29 sq.). (See generally Schröder, Vestit. mulier. p. 130 sq.; Hartmann, Hebræica, ii, 172 sq., 259 sq.; iii, 208, 267 sq.)—Winer, i, 456. See NECKLACE.

10. Ear-rings were universal in the East with women (Exod. xxxii, 2; Ezek. xvi, 12; Jud. x, 4) and children of both sexes (Exod. xxxii, 2; comp. Buckingham, Trav. p. 241, 342). Travellers have found them sometimes small and closely fitting the ear, sometimes very large and heavy (Mandello, Reisen, p. 21; in North Africa as thick as a good-sized pipe-stem, Host, Morocco, p. 119), four fingers' breadth in diameter; they so enlarge the hole through the lobe of the ear that it is said one can pass two fingers through it (Harmer, Obs. iii, 314). Luxury has carried the fashion to such a pitch that women puncture as many apertures in the ear-lobe as possible, and hang a ring through each (Arviens, iii, 25); Wellsted (Travels, i, 224) counted sometimes fifteen in a single ear, and Russegger (II, ii, 180) speaks of even twenty. The ancient Hebrews designated this ornament by the terms כַּבְּדֵי, ne'zem (e. g. Gen. xxxv, 4, כַּבְּדֵי, ne'zemim'), the rings that were in their ears, and כַּבְּדֵי, agil (Ezek. xvi, 2), which almost everywhere also signify ring or hoop. See RING. Besides proper rings (of horn, bone, or metal), persons also wore other trinkets in the ear, which were called, for example, (1.) כַּבְּדֵי, netiphoth', little drops (Judg. viii, 26; Isa. iii, 19), i. e. ear pendants with tiny bells, namely pearls (Gr. σταλαγμα, Lat. stalagmium, Plant. Men. iii, 18); (2.) כַּבְּדֵי, kumutz', on the other hand, is probably not an ear-ring, but necklace or amulet (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 692); (3.) for a peculiar kind of Jewish ear-ring, see the Mishna (Cholim, xi, 9; according to the Mishna, Shubb. vi, 6, the girls first drew a cord through the ear after piercing, until it was healed). Whether men among the Jews made use of ear ornaments is uncertain; Pliny (xi, 50) asserts the custom of Orientals without distinction, and other writers state the usage in the case of men with respect to several Eastern nations more or less positively and reliably; e. g. the inhabitants along the Euphrates (Juvén. i, 104), the Lydians (Xenoph. Anab. iii, 1, 31), the Libyans (Macrob. Sat. vii, 3), the Arabians (Petron. Sat. 192), the Carthaginians (Plant. Poen. v, 2, 21), the Indians (Curt. ix, 1, 30), the Parthians (Tertull. Cult. fem. x), the Assyrians (Asiatic Journ. 1843, No. 8, pl. xvii), and probably others (see Bochart, Hieroz. i, 342). The modern Arabs likewise certainly wear ear-rings (Niebuhr, Daschr. p. 65; Reisen, p. 164 sq.), as anciently the Midianites (Judg. viii, 24). Among the Greeks only children wore rings, and that but in the right ear (Isid. Orig. xix, 31, 10; Appul. Habit. i, 160, ed. Bip.; yet see Dio Chrys. xxxii, 361 [or 654 ed. Reiske]); among the Romans the women had reached the highest pitch of luxury in ear-rings, wearing gold, jewels, and the most costly pearls in their ears, not singly, but in pairs and triple (Seneca, Deuf. vii, 9; Vit. beat. 17; Pliny, ix, 56). Nevertheless, Exod. xxxii, 2, appears indirectly to forbid the supposition that they were at that time worn by male Israelites; and we may assume from the Mishna (Shubb. vi, 6) that among the later Jews even children did not usually have these ornaments. It remains to notice that in early times ear-rings were employed as charms (Gen. xxxv, 4; comp. Jonathan's Targ. in loc.; see Maimonid, Abolol. vii, 10; Augustine, Ep. 73); and Eielhorn (Enchiridion N. T. i, 524) would introduce their mention into Matt. vi, 6, as the rendering for "pearls") of the original Aramaean Gospel. See AMULET. On the boring the ear of a slave (Deut. xv, 17), see SERVANT. (See generally Schröder, Vestit. mul. p. 187 sq.; Hartmann, Hebræica, ii, 163 sq.; Bartholin, De insulari. vet. signatima, Amstel. 1676; Rathgeber, in the Hall. Encyclop. III, ii, 333 sq.)—Winer, i, 173. See EAR-RING.

11. The nose-ring (in general כַּבְּדֵי, ne'zem, comp. Prov. xi, 22; Ezek. xvi, 12; more definitely כַּבְּדֵי, ne'zem ha-ayh, jewel of the nose, Isa. iii, 21; probably also כַּבְּדֵי, chavh, Exod. xxxv, 22), a very favorite adornment among Oriental females from the earliest times (Gen. xxiv, 22, 47; comp. Mishna, Shabb. vi, 1, where it appears that the Jews wore no nose-rings on the Sabbath, but ear-rings only). Eastern women to this day wear in the perforated extremity of the cartilage of the left (Chardin, in Harmer, iii, 310 sq.) or right nostril (see the fig. in Hartmann, Hebræerin, pl. 2), or even in the middle partition of the nose (Mariti, p. 216), a ring of ivory or metal (doubtless often decorated with jewels) of two or three inches diameter, which hangs down over the mouth, and through which the men are fond of applying their kiss (Arvieux, iii, 252; see Tavernier, i, 92; Shaw, p. 211; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 65; Joliffe, p. 35; Ruppel, Arab. p. 203; comp. Hartmann, Hebræerin, ii, 106 sq., 292; Bartholin, De conulis maritanis, in his treatise De morbis Bibl. c. 19; also in his work De insularibus et. Amstel. 1767). Even among the aborigines of America this ornament has been found. Occasionally men also in the East affect the use of the nose-ring (Russeger, II, ii, 180). But whether it was derived from the practice of treating animals thus (as Hartmann thinks) is not clear; for the female love of decoration might naturally introduce nose-rings as well as ear-rings, since the nose and the ears are such conspicuous parts of the person as readily to lead to a desire to set them off by artificial finery.—Wild beasts were led (as still bears and buffaloes are) by a ring through the nose, as the easiest mode of subduing and holding them; the same is sometimes done with large fishes that have been caught private acts of worship they assumed the position which, according to their modes of doing homage or showing respect, seemed to them the most suitable to their present feelings or objects. It would appear, however, that some form of kneeling was most usual in private devotions. See ADORATION.

1. Standing in public prayer is still the practice of the Jews. This posture was adopted from the synagogue by the primitive Christians, and is still maintained by the Oriental Churches. This appears, from their monuments, to have been the custom also among the ancient Persians and Egyptians, although the latter certainly sometimes knelt before their gods. In the Moslem worship, four of the nine positions (1, 2, 3, 8) are standing ones; and that posture which is repeated in three out of these four (2, 4, 8) may be pointed out as the proper Oriental posture of reverential standing, with folded hands. It is the posture in which people stand before kings and great men.

While in this attitude of worship, the hands were sometimes stretched forth toward heaven in supplication or invocation (1 Kings viii, 22; 2 Chron. vi, 12, 29; Isa. i, 15). This was perhaps not so much the conventional posture (1) in the Moslem series, as the more natural posture of standing adoration with outspread hands, which we observe on the Egyptian mon-and again placed in the water (comp. Bruce, ii, 314). Such a ring is likewise called חֲכָךְ , chach, or חֲכֹרֶת , cho'ach (Job xl, 26 [21]; comp. 2 Kings xix, 28; Isa. xxxvii, 29; Ezek. xix, 4; xxxix, 4; xxxviii, 2), by the Arabs Chizâm.—Winer, ii, 137. See NOSE-JEWEL.

Attitude. From the numerous allusions in Scripture to postures expressive of adoration, supplication, and respect, we learn enough to perceive that the usages of the Hebrews in this respect were very nearly, if not altogether, the same as those which are still practised in the East, and which the paintings and sculptures of Egypt show to have been of old employed in that country. See SALUTATION.

1. ADORATION AND HOMAGE.—The Moslems in their prayers throw themselves successively, and according to an established routine, into the various postures (nine in number) which they deem the most appropriate to the several parts of the service. For the sake of reference and comparison, we have introduced them all at the head of this article; as we have no doubt that the Hebrews employed on one occasion or another nearly all the various postures which the Moslems exhibit on one occasion. This is the chief difference. (See Lane's Arabian Nights, passim; Mod. Egyptians, i, 105 sq.; Thomson's Land and Book, i, 26.) In public and common worship the Hebrews prayed standing (1 Kings viii, 54; Ezra ix, 5; Dan. vi, 10; 2 Chron. vi, 13); but in their separate and uments. The uplifting of one hand (the right) only in taking an oath was so common, that to say "I have lifted up my hand" was equivalent to "I have sworn" (Gen. xiv, 22; comp. xli, 44; Deut. xxxii, 40). This posture was also common among other ancient nations; and we find examples of it in the sculptures of Persia (fig. 1) and Rome (fig. 2, above).

2. Knelling is very often described as a posture of worship (1 Kings viii, 54; Ezra ix, 5; Dan. vi, 10; 2 Chron. vi, 13; comp. 1 Kings xix, 18; Luke xxii, 41; Acts vii, 60). This is still an Oriental custom, and three forms of it occur (5, 6, 9) in the Moslem devotions. It was also in use, although not very frequent, among the ancient Egyptians; who likewise, as well as the Hebrews (Exod. xxxiv, 18; 2 Chron. xxxix, 29; Isa. i, 15), sometimes prostrated themselves upon the ground. The usual mode of prostration among the Hebrews by which they expressed the most intense humiliation was by bringing not only the body, but the head to the ground.

Modern Oriental Prostration.

The ordinary mode of prostration at the present time, and probably anciently, is that shown in one of the postures of Moslem worship (5), in which the body is not thrown flat upon the ground, but rests upon the arms, knees, and head. In order to express devotion, sorrow, compunction, or humiliation, the Israelites threw dust upon their heads (Josh. vii, 6; Job ii, 12; Lam. ii, 10; Ezek. xxiv, 7; Rev. xviii, 19), as was done also by the ancient Egyptians, and is still done by the modern Orientals. Under similar circumstances it was usual to smite the breast (Luke xviii, 13). This was also a practice among the Egyptians (Herod. ii, 85), and the monuments at Thebes

3. In 1 Chron. xvii, 16, we are told that "David the king came and sat before the Lord," and in that posture gave utterance to eloquent prayer, or rather thanksgiving, which the sequel of the chapter contains. Those unacquainted with Eastern manners are surprised at this. But there is a mode of sitting in the East which is highly respectful and even reverential. It is that which occurs in the Moslem forms of worship (9). The person first kneels, and then sits back upon his heels. Attention is also paid to the position of the hands, which they cross, fold, or hide in the opposite sleeves. The variety of this formal sitting which the annexed figure represents is highly respectful. The prophet Elijah must have been in this or some other similar posture when he inclined himself so much forward in prayer that his head almost touched his knees (1 Kings xviii, 42). See SITE.

his knees (1 Kings xviii, 42). See SITE.

II. SUPPLICATION, when addressed externally to man, cannot possibly be exhibited in any other forms than those which are used in supplication to God. Uplifted hands, kneeling, prostration, are common to both. On the Egyptian monuments suppliant captives, of different nations, are represented as kneeling or standing with outspread hands. This also occurs in the sculptures of ancient Persia (Persepolis). The first of the accompanying figures is of peculiar interest, as representing an inhabitant of Lebanon.

1. Prostration, or falling at the feet of a person, is often mentioned in Scripture as an act of supplication or of reverence, or of both (1 Sam. xxv, 21; 2 Kings iv, 37; Esth. viii, 3; Matt. xviii, 29; xxviii, 9; Mark v, 22; Luke viii, 41; John xi, 32; Acts x, 25). In the instance last referred to, where Cornelius threw himself at the feet of Peter, it may be asked why the apostle forbade an act which was not unusual among his own people, alleging as the reason, "I myself also am a man." The answer is that, among the Romans, prostration was exclusively an act of adoration, rendered only to the gods, and therefore it had in him a significance which it would not have had in an Oriental (Kuinoel, ad Act. x, 26). This custom is still very general among the Orientals; but, as an act of reverence merely, it is seldom shown except to kings; as expressive of alarm or supplication, it is more frequent (Hackett's Illustr. of Script. p. 109).

2. Sometimes in this posture, or with the knees bent as before indicated, the Orientals bring their forehead to the ground, and before resuming an erect position either kiss the earth, or the feet, or border of the garment of the king or prince before whom they are allowed to appear. There is no doubt that a similar practice existed among the Jews, especially when we refer to the original words which describe the acts and attitudes of salutation, as $\text{בָּרַךְ אֶת הָאָרֶץ}$, to bend down to the earth, $\text{שָׁפָר אֶת הָאָרֶץ}$, to fall prostrate on the earth, $\text{בָּרַךְ אֶת אַחֲרָיו}$, to fall with the face to the earth, and connect them with allusions to the act of kissing the feet or the hem of the garment (Matt. ix, 20; Luke vii, 38, 45).

3. Kissing the hand of another as a mark of affectionate respect we do not remember as distinctly mentioned in Scripture. But as the Jews had the other forms of Oriental salutation, we may conclude that they had this also, although it does not happen to have been specially noticed. It is observed by servants or pupils to masters, by the wife to her husband, and by children to their father, and sometimes their mother. It is also an act of homage paid to the aged by the young, or to learned and religious men by the less instructed or less devout. Kissing one's own hand is mentioned as early as the time of Job (xxxi, 27), as an act of homage to the heavenly bodies. It was properly a salutation, and as such an act of adoration to them. The Romans in like manner kissed their hands as they passed the temples or statues of their gods. See ADORATION. It appears from 1 Sam. x, 1; 1 Kings xix, 18; Psa. ii, 12, that there was a peculiar kiss of homage, the character of which is not indicated. It was probably that kiss upon the forehead expressive of high respect which was formerly, if not now, in use among the Bedouins (Antar, ii, 119). See KISS.

III. BOWING.—In the Scriptures there are different words descriptive of various postures of respectful bowing: as $\overline{\text{רָכַע}}$, to incline or bow down the head; $\overline{\text{שָׁרַף}}$, to bend down the body very low; $\overline{\text{שָׁרַף}}$, to bend the knee, also to bless. These terms indicate a conformity with the existing usages of the East, in which the modes of bowing are equally diversified, and, in all likelihood, the same. These are, 1, touching the lips

(is this the kissing of the hand noticed above?) and the forehead with the right hand, with or without an inclination of the head or of the body, and with or without previously touching the ground; 2, placing the right hand upon the breast, with or without an inclination of the head or of the body; 3, bending the body very low, with folded arms; 4, bending the body and resting the hands on the knees: this is one of the postures of prayer, and is indicative of the highest respect in the presence of kings and princes. In the Egyptian paintings we see persons drop their arms toward the ground while bowing to a superior, or standing respectfully with the right hand resting on the left shoulder. See BOWING.

Ancient Egyptians Bowing.

It is observable that, as before noticed, the word $\overline{\text{בָּרַךְ}}$, barak, means to bless and to bend the knee, which suggests the idea that it was usual for a person to receive a blessing in a kneeling posture. We know also that the person who gave the blessing laid his hands upon the head of the person blessed (Gen. xlviii, 14). This is exactly the case at the present day in the East, and a picture of the existing custom would furnish a perfect illustration of the patriarchal form of blessing.—Kitto, s. v.

Attributes of God. See GOD.

Attrition, in the Romish theology, means imperfect contrition. See CONTRITION. The term was introduced by the schoolmen in the twelfth century, to make a distinction between a perfect and an imperfect repentance, after they had brought penance into the number of the sacraments. By contrition they mean a thorough or complete repentance (contritio cordis), the spirit being crushed under a sense of sin; by attrition they mean an inferior degree of sorrow, such as may arise from a consideration of the turpitude of sin or from the fear of hell (timor servilis). Alexander of Hales distinguishes as follows (p. 4, qu. 74, membr. 1): Timor servilis principium est attritionis, timor initialis (i. e. that with which the life of sanctification begins) principium est contritionis. . . . Item contritio est a gratia gratum faciente, attritio a gratia gratis data. Comp. Thom. Aquinas, qu. 1, art. 2; Bonaventura, in lib. iv, dist. 17, p. 1, art. 2, qu. 3 (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 188). This distinction is maintained by the Council of Trent as follows: "Imperfect contrition, which is called attrition, commonly arising from a consideration of the turpitude of sin and a fear of hell and punishment, the intention of continuing in sin with the hope of receiving pardon at last being disavowed, not only does not make a man a hypocrite and a greater sinner, but is really a gift of God and an impulse of the Holy Spirit; not that the Spirit does as yet dwell in the soul, but merely excites the penitent, who, thus aided, prepares his way to righteousness. And although it cannot of itself conduct the sinner to justification without the sacrament of penance, yet it disposes him to seek the grace of God in the sacrifice of penance" (Sess. xiv, c. iv). To Protestant eyes, attrition seems to have been devised to make a way of salvation easier than contrition. If attrition, with penance and priestly absolution, avail before God unto justification, then imperfect repentance, arising from fear, is all the repentance necessary in practice to a sinner, whatever the theory may be. So Denis: "Imperfect contrition is required, and it is sufficient; perfect contrition, though best, is not absolutely required, because this last justifies without the sacrament" (Theologia, t. vi, no. 51). This is one of the worst features of the Romish theology. "A belief in sacerdotal power to procure acceptance for those who merely feel a servile fear of divine wrath is one of those things that require to be plucked up by the roots," if human society, in Roman Catholic countries, is to be preserved pure. The better class of divines in that church seek to palliate this doctrine; they would do better to conspire for its subversion.—Elliott, Delineation of Romanism, bk. ii, c. x; Bergier, Dict. de Théologie, i, 210; Perrone, Prælect. Theologicae, ii, 337; Gibson, Preservative against Popery, ii, 36 (fol. ed.); Soames, Latin Church, p. 98; Ferraris, Promta Bibliotheca, s. v. Baptismus.

Atwater, JEREMIAH, D. D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Haven in 1774; graduated at Yale College in 1793; was tutor in that college from 1795 to 1799; president of Middlebury College from 1800 to 1809; and president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, from 1810 to 1818. From that period he lived in retirement until his death, July 29th, 1858. Dr. Atwater was a man of great reading, and of a retentive memory, especially of historical events, and the lives and characters of men he had known, but he had no fondness for writing, and has left, it is believed, but few literary remains.—Am. Cong. Year-book (vol. vi, 1859, p. 118).

Auberlen, KARL AUGUST, an eminent German theologian, was born November 19, 1821, at Fellbach, near Stuttgart. He studied four years, from 1837, at Blaubeuern, and in 1841 entered the University of Tübingen as theological student. F. C. Baur (q. v.) was then at the height of his glory, and Auberlen for a time was carried away by this brilliant Rationalist; a discipline which probably helped to fit him for his later work in resisting the destructive school of theologians. The lectures of Schmid and Beck (who came to Tübingen in 1843) helped to save him from the abyss of Pantheism. He had hardly taken his doctor's degree when he published Die Theosophie Oetinger's, ein Beitrag z. Dogmengeschichte, etc. (Tübingen, 1847, 8vo), showing the higher sphere into which his studies
